Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 6, and Saturday afternoon, December 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E-flat major No. 7. This work has had so few performances that it comes practically as a novelty. It is the Seventh Symphony, which finally gave Bruckner, after long years of waiting, recognition as one of the great composers of his time. It will be particularly interesting to hear Dr. Muck's interpretation of it because he is not only an admirer of Bruckner and his music, but he gave the first performances of this symphony in Austria while he was conductor of the Styrian Musical Society in Graz in 1886 and in Berlin in 1894 at one of the royal concerts. The Symphony for Saturday evening is Glazounoff's No. 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society under Anton Seidl in the spring of 1898 and it has since been performed in one of the concerts of the Russian Orchestra.

The soloists on Thursday evening will be Moritz Rosenthal and on Saturday afternoon Timothée Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT NOVEMBER 24, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK MAKES AN "ALL-RUSSIAN" PROGRAMME

Rimsky-Korsakoff in an Overture, Tschaikovski in the Violin Concerto and Glazounoff in a New Symphony—Russian Music at Its Brightest—Mr. Gogorza's Song Recital—Concerts of Next Week and Weeks to Come—Musical News

Dr. Muck made a hazardous venture at the Symphony concert yesterday with a programme that consisted wholly of music by Russian composers—Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to his opera "The Betrothed of the Tsar"; Tschaikovski's concerto for violin, played by Mr. Petschnikoff, and Glazounoff's fifth symphony, in B-flat major, heard for the first time in Boston. No one of the three is of notable distinction as Russian music goes; no one represents the composer at his best and fullest, and each discloses rather transparently the characteristic virtues and shortcomings of Russian music. By this last token there is a measure of similarity in the three pieces; for, the "new" Russian music as we of the West hear it, is cut to the same last, even as are the operas of the "new" Italians, and the work of the "new" Frenchmen, if they have happened to be pupils of César Franck. There was a kindred brightness of instrumental color, for example, in Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, and in many parts of Glazounoff's symphony. The cantilena of Tschaikovski's concerto and the cantilena of Glazounoff's slow movement, different in many respects as they are, still kept, so to say, a family resemblance, discernible in their melodic outline rather than in their melodic contents. The turbulent finale of the concerto and of the symphony beginning abruptly, rising and falling sharply, is one of the earmarks of the whole Russian school.

So equally with less obvious resemblances. Note, for example, the aptitude of all three composers for instrumentation. Their ears and their imaginations are sensitive to very delicate distinctions of instrumental color, and their skill with the orchestra brings those distinctions to expression. Their instrumentation can be as exquisitely delicate and suggestive as it can be rudely powerful. They think in instruments; they imagine in them. How, for example, what seems merely passage-work for the display of the violinist's dexterity in Tschaikovski's concerto is really a searching of the heart of the instrument. Contrast the subtle lightness of Glazounoff's scherzo with the flamboyant tumult of his finale. Note, too, the ease of invention which all three men seem to enjoy, but do not listen too closely, lest that invention shall seem oftener an adroit transformation or a very slightly disguised repetition of catch phrases or of a musical idea already fully expressed. Consider, too, a certain gleaming quality in all three of the compositions played yesterday. First and last they were highly decorative music. The peril of an "all-Russian" programme is that this brilliance may ultimately cloy and pall, and that it may sometimes only illuminate—and much too brightly—a certain emptiness behind. The peril was the greater yesterday since all the music was comparatively light. Naturally in a violin concerto Tschaikovski does not mount the heights or plunge into the depths of passionate expression. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture is decorative preluding to his opera without the gorgeous pictorial quality of his "Scheherazade" or the dramatic power of his "Antar." As for Glazounoff's symphony, it was the first piece of musical entertainment that the audience has had in the six concerts of the year, and it testified its pleasure in heartier applause than a new symphony or almost any new composition has received for long.

Narrow as the Russian composers sometimes seem, there are many sorts of Russian music—glowing Oriental fantasies like Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," tone-poems of Russian legend like the same composer's "Sadko" or Glazounoff's own "Stenka Razine"; "tone-pictures" like Ippolitoff-Ivanoff's "The Cliff," or Glazounoff's "Kremlin"; ballets that glorify the dance and transfigure with tones the material things of the theatre; and symphonies like the fifth and the sixth of Tschaikovski that traverse primitive passions at intense play. These are the sorts of Russian music that our concerts ordinarily make known to us. There was curiously little of any of these qualities in the Russian music of which Dr. Muck made his programme yesterday. There was no touch of the neighboring Orient; no tone-poems or tone-pictures; and no play of primitive passion. It was the brightness of Russian music, the peculiar kaleidoscopic quality of it, and of its instrumental coloring above all, that programme, conductor and band seemed most to disclose. Perhaps they disclosed as well, though least in the concerto, the facility of it, that makes much of it, have shimmer rather than depth and leave little impression when the exhilaration of the moment has passed.

Tschaikovski's and Glazounoff's cantilena wheedles the listener. The fantastic grace, the light tonal imagery, the invariable instrumental felicity of Glazounoff's scherzo is exquisite pleasure as one hears. There is no resisting at the moment the sonorous and pliant energy of his allegro, the tumult of his finale. Tschaikovski and Mr. Petschnikoff searched the secrets of the violin or leapt into the relief of their turbulent finale. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture is all brightness. The concerto has become one of the stalking horses of the virtuosi of the violin. It has been long with us and it will remain. There is no escaping it or forgetting it. But how completely has recollection of Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture passed though it has been twice played at our symphony concerts! And will Glazounoff's symphony be easy to recall a year hence, except, perhaps, the scherzo? The Russian music that lasts is the music of primitive passion, or of folk-legend or folk-tune; or of the mysterious Orient or of the bare steppes. Yesterday Glazounoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff were of Petersburg, the urban, when the Nevsky Prospekt and the restaurants in the islands of the river are at their gayest on a bright winter afternoon.

H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

The Symphony Orchestra gives an extra concert in Symphony Hall on Monday evening at eight o'clock in honor of Camille Saint-Saëns, the eminent French composer, who is now paying his first visit to America and about whom several articles have appeared recently in these columns. The programme consists entirely of Saint-Saëns's music, but the composer himself will appear only as a pianist, playing the pianoforte part in his concerto in G-minor, and a group of short pieces. The overture to one of his later operas, "The Barbarians," begins the concert, and for ending comes his symphony in C-minor, notable for the skill in instrumentation and the fertility in the development and modulation of what is practically a single melody, that is displays, and unusual by its addition of a piano and an organ to the orchestra. In these and in the concerto Dr. Muck will conduct, while in the symphony Mr. Zach takes the piano and Mr. Goodrich the organ.

At the regular Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next in Symphony Hall, Moriz Rosenthal, one of the most distinguished of living pianists, about whom there is an article in another column, reappears in Boston after an absence of eight years, playing the pianoforte part in Liszt's concerto in E-flat major. As notable is the appearance of a symphony by Bruckner on the programme—the seventh, in E-flat major, which has been played only once before in Boston, and then twenty years ago. Thus it is virtually new music, and in it Dr. Muck will give the first proof of the admiration in which he holds Bruckner's work. In Germany and Austria he is barely beginning to come into his own, while in America his music is still almost unknown. The remaining number of [illegible]programme is Beethoven's third [illegible]

---

ss

TWO events of unusual interest marked the opening of the musical season: the coming of Dr. Muck to lead the Boston Symphony and the appearance of M. Saint-Saëns for the first time in this country.

Dr. Muck made a most favorable impression at the first Symphony concerts as a musician of the highest order. His interpretations of Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms were sympathetic, scholarly and sincere, abstaining from any sensationalism. The orchestra and the public are to be congratulated on this leader.

As M. Saint-Saëns is the first of the modern French composers and well known in this country, his renderings of many favorite works at his recent concerts were interesting events. He was assisted by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra. While an excellent pianist, it is as a composer that he will be remembered.

[76]

...n Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV 25, 1906.

Dr Muck's sixth symphony program was thoroughly Russian in character, three Slav composers of the modern school being represented, and the Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, appearing as soloist. The fifth symphony, by Glazounoff, was played for the fist time here. Tschaikowsky's D major violin concerto and the Rimsky-Karsakoff overture to "Betrothed of the Tsar", completed the selections. The concert as a whole was of a vigorous type, with the Muscovite musical, or unmusical characteristics liberally introduced. The overture, though, comes not within this category, for although the opera is filled with tragic episodes the introductory music, which was admirably played by the orchestra, is but slightly suggestive of the story.

Glazounoff's symphony abounds in well-contrasted "colors," and some of them are laid on pretty heavily. He is prone to make his announcements in reiterative measures given to various groups of instruments and nearly all the themes are worked up to a riotous climax. The first part was of this nature and it gave the different contingents capital opportunities to display their splendid quality of tone in fortissimo work, which in some orchestras is blatant or rough.

There is a charming scherzo for the second movement, with quaint figurations for the lighter instruments and just a few touches of the Slavic harshness to form a connecting link with the other divisions of the work. This part was so delightfully played that the audience became very enthusiastic. The lighter strings continued their good work in the third movement, which was quite interesting because of its romantic character, and in the finale the crashing turbulency of the scheme was exemplified with becoming vigor. All through the work the orchestration shows great skill and ingenuity in the obtaining of legitimate musical results, but like other composers of this nationality, Glazounoff frequently offends the ear by combinations that have no melodic significance to express, aside from being noisy.

Petschnikoff played the immensely difficult violin concerto with wonderful verve and impetuosity, his sureness of intonation suffering at times from his rushing fingering. When he played the same selection with the orchestra about six years ago the technical feats, possibly, were not so brilliant as they were yesterday; but at that time he was regarded as a violinist of high attainments, and certainly he is a great, or greater, artist today. His tone is generally very sweet, he readily masters all difficulties of fingering, and his bowing, though a bit rough in chord passages once in a while, is firm and even. The young artist was rapturously applauded. The orchestral accompaniment was a trifle uncertain in some of the "two-forty" passages, the pace of the soloist being so rapid as to cause a bit of lagging in the tempo.

Rosenthal will be this week's soloist in the Liszt E flat major concerto for piano and orchestra. Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3, and Bruckner's seventh symphony will complete the program.

...NG AT SYMPHONY HALL.

The announcement that the distinguished French composer, M Saint-Saens, would appear as a pianist with the Symphony orchestra at the special concert tomorrow evening, instead of as conductor and organist, has been received with great satisfaction by the musical public of this city. Unquestionably Saint-Saens is one of the great pianists of the world. So far he has played four times in New York, always to overflowing houses, and with similar success he has appeared in Chicago with the Chicago orchestra.

This is all the more astonishing when one considers that Saint-Saens is now a man of 71 years. All reports have agreed that in spirit he is as youthful as ever he was and that his arms and his hands are in perfect condition. His technique has been most heartily praised and, of course, of his musicianship no comment is necessary.

Dr Muck has kindly consented to be the conductor tomorrow, since it was impossible for Saint-Saens both to conduct and play the piano in the same evening. In fact, it has just about been decided that Saint-Saens will do no conducting in this country during his present visit.

Dr Muck's appearance at this concert will give many who are not regular subscribers to the Symphony a chance to hear the orchestra under its new conductor. The program has necessarily been considerably changed. The works will all be by Saint-Saens. The purely orchestral numbers will be the overture to the opera, "Les Barbares," and the symphony in C minor, No. 3. Saint-Saens will play his concerto in G minor and a group of solo pieces for the piano.

BOSTON POST,
NOVEMBER 25, 1906

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Yesterday's programme was devoted to the modern Russian school. It consisted of the overture to Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "The Betrothal of the Czar"; Tchaikowsky's violin concerto, and a new symphony by Glazounoff, No. 5 in B flat. Mr. Alexander Petschnikoff was the soloist, another modern Russian. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture bears much the same relation to his other works that Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" bears to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," or "Melusina." One hardly recognizes in this work the composer of "Sadko," "Antar" or "Scheherazade." It is a rather conventional prelude to an opera, and as the programmatist justly observes has little relation to what follows.

Mr. Petschnikoff certainly had a surprise up his sleeve for those who heard him play this same concerto six years ago. At that time he was sharply criticised as lacking tone, having a generally insecure technique and a lamentable tendency to sentimentalize. Certainly none of these things were in evidence last night. His tone was manly and virile to a degree, surcharged with tense, nervous energy. The first movement was read with breadth and poise; the second, with its deep Slav melancholy, nobly sung, and the last movement taken with fiery, almost brutal, wildness and abandon. The work does not rank among the greatest compositions of the Russian, but Mr. Petschnikoff played it for exactly what it was worth and did not make the mistake that has often been made of endeavoring to smooth over the coarseness and savagery of it.

There was some curiosity about Glazounoff's symphony, not so much on account of the work, for Glazounoff, as heard in Boston up to this time, can scarcely be called an epoch-making composer, but to see how Dr. Muck would drill our orchestra upon an entirely new work. And it may be unqualifiedly stated that our new conductor "made good" in every sense of the word. As a virtuoso piece for orchestra the symphony serves well, and this may have had something to do with Dr. Muck's choice of it. The themes and their development in the first movement were presented with admirable clarity, and the brass blew with an edifying sonority grateful to the ear. It is a very glib movement. The scherzo showed at their best the perfection of our wood-wind, and was performed with the greatest delicacy, fleetness and precision. In the slow movement the strings covered themselves with glory and the last went with the utmost brilliancy, the heavy chords were struck off like the crack of a whip and there were telling dynamic effects. The men seemed to play the new work with quite as much ease and security as in other things with which they have long been familiar. There was a constantly varying rich stream of orchestral color, and each detail was carefully worked out, although kept well in its place and subordinated to the main scheme of the composition.

Glazounoff is a Russian, and a very gentlemanly one. One cannot by any stretch of the imagination conceive of him drinking fiery vodka, or doing anything in the least degree improper. The contrast was the more evident coming after Tchaikowsky's more personal and elemental work. His instrumentation is rich and sumptuous, displaying an oriental love of color; but there is a fatal facility about his writing, and counterpoint seems to obsess rather than serve him. The two middle movements are by far the best. They seem to be at least the real Glazounoff and we can appreciate them as far as they go. The scherzo might accompany a ballet which one would like to see, and the slow movement is a pretty, harmless song without words. The last is best described by the word "bosh." It has elements of a superficial popularity, and the scherzo seemed to please mightily. The performance was another testimony to the ability of Dr. Muck and the virtuosity of [illegible] orchestra.

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, NOVEMBER 25, 1906

BY PHILIP HALE.

Dr. Muck's programmes have provoked discussion. Those of the first four concerts seemed ultra-conservative. The statements that he made shortly after his arrival, or was reported to make, concerning the dearth of interesting contemporaneous works and his undying devotion to the old masters, seemed to be his personal commentary on the programmes.

The concerts took place, and no one's finer susceptibilities were seriously hurt. Dr. Muck triumphed gloriously with the symphony by Brahms—a case of old wine in new bottles.

Some remembered during the discussion which raged about the first four programmes that Dr. Muck arranged them before he crossed the Atlantic; that they were made in Germany. The eminent conductor had no personal knowledge of the character of the orchestra; nor did he know how the audience was musically disposed, whether it were hide bound in conservatism or, like the ancient Athenians, spending time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing. It was natural that a conductor should choose in view of these circumstances long approved compositions known thoroughly by him, compositions so familiar to the audience that there could not be serious controversy over their inherent merits, compositions with which he had worked wonders in European cities.

Then came the programme of the fifth concert. The appearance of the overture to "Oberon," coming immediately as it did after the performance of the overture to "Der Freischutz," was indeed, discouraging, for there is no sworn band of devoted Weberites in the town. Was it possible that the "Euryanthe" overture would follow? Some saw in approaching and ghastly procession the overtures to "Peter Schmoll," "Silvana," "Abu Hassan," "The Ruler of the Spirits," not to mention the "Jubel," with the patriotic air dear to more than one nation. But on the same programme there was a symphony, the one by Sinding, which was practically unknown to the great majority of the audience. Sinding's Symphony, whether you like or dislike it, is certainly not, as the French say, "old hat."

Mr. Petschnikoff comes to play Tschaikowsky's concerto; lo, and behold, a strictly Russian programme; an overture by Rimsky-Korsakoff, an Orientalist in music, and a symphony by the Glazounoff of the barbaric and better days.

It should be remembered that the programme of the fifth concert was arranged in view of the fact that the orchestra, returning from its first trip, would have little time to rehearse. Preceding conductors have borne this principle in mind each season. But does Dr. Muck purpose to shape his programmes to suit the selection made by the soloist—as in Mr. Petschnikoff's case? If a pianist wishes to play Grieg's concerto, will there be a Scandinavian concert? If a concerto be one of the romantic school, will the whole programme necessarily be romantic?

Reforms in Concert Halls.

The question of programme-making has exercised seriously the wits of deep German thinkers in their efforts to institute "concert reform." Strange experiments have been made in this direction, with the disposition of the orchestra and the management of lights. We are now speaking of the concert hall, not of the opera house. Von Buelow occasionally darkened the room, and it is reported that incense was burned by his order during a performance of the funeral march in Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. At Heidelberg in 1903 the first concert of a music festival was given with a sunken orchestra and unseen solo singers and chorus—for the conductor, Philipp Wolfrum, composer and professor at Heidelberg University, wished to test the theory that "invisible music" is the most effective. On the second day, for the sake of comparison, the singers and the orchestra were in the sight of the audience, but the stage was divided into four separate floors to gain a variety in dynamic force. On the third day an oratorio was performed, with the chorus on a raised stage, but the orchestra was seated on a level with the main floor of the hall and separated from the audience by a "non-transparent sound wall." Dr. Wolfrum's purpose was characterized by an enthusiast, who wrote apparently without even one foot on the ground, as "purely ideal and theoretically quite art imbued."

A dozen years before the time of these experiments Dr. Pudor, 'cellist raging pamphleteer, and for a time director of the Dresden Conservatory, wrote an essay, "The Concert Hall of the Future," and took for his text a sentence from "Wilhelm Meister": "He was accustomed to hear music only with shut eyes that he might concentrate his whole being on the sole and pure enjoyment of the ear." An eminent music critic made this experiment and soon after the editor of the journal represented by the critic received a letter saying: "No wonder your critic writes inane articles? Haven't you a hired man that can keep awake? Or perhaps your critic is given to booze!"

Pudor believes that after the audience is seated the lights should be lowered or, better still, extinguished. If players or singers need a certain amount of light which will be visible to the audience, the hearers should sit with their backs to the stage. If there be light, a solo pianist or violinist should be concealed by a dark curtain or a screen. The hearer in a dark hall will not be disturbed by the sight of a sad or grotesque face of a neighbor, or by the dress and general appearance of a performer. Music is wholly a matter of impression. The hearer must be sensitive; he must not be one of a crowd; there must be helps to self-concentration. A man is more sensitive to musical impressions early in the morning or in the evening, especially at twilight. "The fitting season is winter, when nature sleeps, and the white robe of peace is stretched over the earth; but still more fitting perhaps is the late fall, the twilight of the year."

Pudor on Programmes.

One is not always in the mood to hear a Strauss waltz or Beethoven's funeral march. It would seem as though certain conductors arranged programmes as if they drew at random from a grab bag. In 1889 von Buelow conducted a double performance of the Ninth symphony in one and the same concert. This was a grievous error in judgment, for no one sensitive to musical impressions can hear the colossal work twice consecutively with any appreciative enjoyment. Did von Buelow wish to show that music should appeal to intelligence rather than emotion? Did he think the audience would understand the work better the second time? If the hearer did not understand everything during the first performance, exhausted by the effort he would not have the mental force to grasp the meaning at a second hearing. If he understood at first—he was probably acquainted with the symphony—he was so impressed that he was in no mental condition for a second hearing.

Yet when Debussy's highly poetic "Nocturns" were first played in Boston they were performed twice at the same concert, and the experiment was most successful. Of course, these "Nocturns," which are comparatively short, do not have the exhaustive power of the 9th symphony.

It was a mistake, Dr. Pudor says, for Franz Wuellner to conduct at a Rhenish music festival the nine symphonies of Beethoven in three successive days. It is a mistake to put three symphonies, or two symphonies and an overture on the same programme. A "historical programme" is like unto a museum; the appeal is to an acquaintance with the history and the development of music or the audience at such a concert must have a certain historical and scientific knowledge. The enjoyment will be far from that which is induced by a true display of art. Thus Dr. Heinrich Pudor.

Paul Ehler's Views.

Another deep thinker, Mr. Paul Ehler of Koenigsberg, freed his mind a few years ago.

He believes—and he is not alone in this—that there should be no solo singer or player in a symphony concert of the first rank. There should be, at least, no lyric solo piece. After a great orchestral composition, the hearer's aesthetic sense is disturbed by a piano or violin concerto or by songs with a piano accompaniment. Such compositions are for a small hall. Injury is done to the performer. Operatic arias wrenched from their place in the opera are ineffective and impertinent. This is especially true of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas. The place for arias from operas which are no longer in the theatre repertory is a vocal concert.

The player of a concerto is an unduly prominent and disturbing element in a concert of purely orchestral and serious works. In Mahler's second symphony, Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," or Strauss' "Don Quixote," although in the first a singer sings a whole movement; in the second a viola and in the third a violoncello appears as a solo instrument; both singer and viola and violoncello merely take part in the ensemble; no one of them is the main purpose of the composition.

"Historical," "educational" programmes are only for the music school.

"It is nonsense to make a programme out of works by Mozart and Richard Strauss; or to include works by Bach, Saint-Saens and Wagner in the same programme." The musical natures of these composers are so different that they cannot thus be put together. Nor do Bach and Mozart walk together in close communion. "Bach, in spite of his severe style, was an anachronism." He is more at ease with Beethoven or Wagner than with Mozart, "the master of the rococo."

The programme should always be a crescendo of interest and emotion. This may come from "the musical and metaphysical contents" of the music, or through the means of outward expression. It is a good thing to give concerts devoted to the works of one composer; or contrasts may be made, as by giving in the same concert symphonies by Brahms and Bruckner: The natural antagonism would here give piquancy.

But it is a good thing to give a "Beethoven," a "Brahms," a "Richard Strauss" concert? Does not monotony with consequent boredom lie that way? What student at Berlin 20 or 30 years ago does not remember with a shudder the Mozart, Beethoven, Raff, Schubert, and other exclusive "evenings" at Bilse's?

The concerts should not be too long, and there should be an intermission between any two important compositions.

In the reverence paid the older masters there should be no lack of sympathy for the composers living and striving today.

Thus Mr. Paul Ehler of Koenigsberg.

Let us listen to one more opinion.

Von Hausegger's Case.

Mr. Siegmund von Hausegger, whose "Barbarossa" has been performed in Boston at a Symphony concert, resigned last season his position as a conductor at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and he wrote a letter in explanation. He began by premising that art is not a commodity to be offered for sale as adapted to the wants of the buyer, alias the public. He then insisted that in concerts of a serious nature everything which does not serve artistic purposes should be rigidly excluded.

"The dignity of art will also make it necessary for the representatives of society, so-called, to drop, as far as art is concerned, all of their customary privileges except those that are to be found in all circles.

"This forbids the introduction of virtuosity, which tends to present a brilliant display of technical cleverness as an apparently secondary, but often, in reality, a main purpose.

"The true object of orchestral concerts lies in the presentation of symphonic works. Pieces with a piano part require on the part of the hearer conditions which differ from the purely orchestral and therefore do not belong in the realm of these concerts. The programmes should not present an aimless series of compositions, but should have the basic purpose of awakening understanding of the personalities of the various composers; of their style, of the development of our art, of the schools which often continue through long epochs; as well, on the other hand, as a deeper insight into individual peculiarities.

"At the foundation of every programme should be a leading thought and a clear plan. With all consideration for the capacity of the public the rule should be concentration, not diversity. A certain degree of capacity must always be taken for granted. Soloists will increase the effect of those programmes if they are suited to the general plan. All these are not new ideas, for they are clearly understood by those who treat art with earnestness and conviction. To expect to succeed from the first moment with such a plan would be an idle desire, but gradual progress will bear its own promise of final success."

Soloists' Influence.

Thus do deep thinkers cuss and discuss. Thus do they advance theories and propose reforms without consideration for the business manager.

It is true that an ideal symphony concert is without the disturbing presence of a be-jewelled prima donna, of an emotional fiddler with only the whites of his eyes seen as he almost swoons in a melting andante, of a formidable pianist who, when he takes his seat, bows to the conductor, as much as to say: "Now let her go! You can't drown me!"

continued

Saint-Saens and Symphony Orchestra Tomorrow Night

The announcement that Mr. Camille Saint-Saens will appear as a pianist with the Symphony orchestra at the special concert tomorrow evening, and not as conductor and organist, has been received with satisfaction by the musical public. Unquestionably M. Saint-Saens is one of the great pianists of the world. So far he has played in New York four times, always to overflowing houses, and efforts are making for two more appearances. With similar success he has appeared three times in Chicago with the Chicago orchestra, and there, too, they wish to have him again.

This is all the more astonishing when one considers that Saint-Saens is now in his 72d year. All reports agree that in spirit he is as youthful as ever he was, and that his arms and his hands are in perfect condition. His technique has been most heartily praised, and no comment concerning his qualities as a musician is necessary.

The concert will gain in interest from the fact that Dr. Muck has kindly consented to be the conductor. Mr. Saint-Saens made a particular request that he conduct the performance, since it was impossible for the former both to conduct and play the piano in the same evening. It has about been decided that Saint-Saens will do no conducting in this country during his present visit. Dr. Muck's appearance at this special concert will give many who are not regular subscribers to the Symphony a chance to hear the orchestra under its new conductor.

[77]

...LY ADVERTISER
NOVEMBER 26, 1906

MUSICAL MATTERS

...symphony concert ...
...the great majority of the audience ...
"Who is the soloist this week?" ...
"what is the symphony?"; not "Is there a new work?"

There is no need of insisting on this point. The list of soloists in the September announcement plays a more important part than the list of works to be performed. How many Bostonians would bid eagerly at the auction sale if the concerts were to be without solo singers, violinists, pianists or even a stray violoncellist?

Reasonable conductors and orchestral players know full well that there must be outside "attractions" if orchestras are to be maintained on a substantial basis. Artistic theories are all very well, but art, like Venus, freezes without corn and wine.

Let the necessity of soloists be granted. The question then comes up: "How should the conductor treat them in the arrangement of programmes?"

The prima donna and the wandering virtuoso believe in nine instances out of 10 that their appearance is the event of the evening. This belief is not wholly without reason, for their approach is heralded; their pictures are published in the journals a few days before the concerts; they are heartily applauded at the concerts in Boston, and whether they deserve the applause or not, they are recalled. The orchestral players themselves applaud; some of them languidly, it is true, if the visiting violinist rouses the public to enthusiasm.

The virtuoso at the beginning of the season is prepared to play certain concertos. A pianist does not wish to play here in 1906 the concerto that he played here in 1889 or in 1902. But suppose that the concerto he purposes to play is not in sympathy with the orchestral works chosen by the conductor for the concert? Who is to give way? Has not the virtuoso a right to say, "I have prepared this concerto, and I have never played it here? On the other hand, should the conductor feel obliged to make his programme anew?

Mr. Petschnikoff announced his intention of playing Tschaikowsky's concerto. He played it when he was here some years ago. Perhaps he is a man of one concerto; yet it is said that "Single Speech" Hamilton made several excellent speeches. Dr. Muck at once determined the programme. The concerto is Russian and romantic. Why not play orchestral pieces by Russians? Tschaikowsky was looked on by Rimsky-Korsakoff as a cosmopolite. Tschaikowsky was much interested in Glazounoff. The latter's fifth symphony had not been played here. Why not dispose of three Russians at a shot?

Conflicting Wishes.

There is an art in programme making, and when the conductor is a master in this art he cannot expect to please everybody. Theodore Thomas, probably the most distinguished of all programme makers, was inclined in his later years to give the hearer too much.

It is the custom in certain cities to ask the audience of a symphony series to choose the programme of one concert by vote. The pieces are then chosen—one symphony—one overture and so on, according to their popularity. An interesting experiment might thus be made in Boston.

There are some in the Symphony audience who wish to hear only "modern" music, not knowing that there is music by Bach which is today harmonically ultra-modern.

There are others who protest against the Russian composers because they are "so noisy" ang against Franck, Chabrier, d'Indy, Loeffler, Debussy because they are "decadent"; but if they were on trial for their lives they could not tell what decadent really means; they look on the word as a synonym of "rotten." Furthermore they are convinced that all the Frenchmen in this list were or are sadly improper persons whose music should not be heard.

There are those who cry out against anything that is new and strange to them. They at first protested against Wagner; now they find he is old fashioned at times. They would not have Tschaikowsky; now they adore him. They said at first of Richard Strauss' music: "This will never do"; now they applaud it with hands high in the air that they may be seen and known as persons of taste. In a year or two [illegible] will begin to appreciate Vincent d'Indy and Claude Debussy. They applaud Mr. Loeffler's music, partly because they suspect vaguely that it is strikingly original and beautiful, and partly because he lives and works here and is a man of blameless life. But those fellows over in Paris!

Suppose now that Dr. Muck should attempt to suit all tastes! He has a keen sense of humor and a pretty wit. He would at least enjoy the variety of the opinions, all dogmatically expressed.

The Future.

Dr. Muck is by this time fully acquainted with the character of the orchestra and of the orchestral library. He knows the great repertory of the orchestra. He sees that many schools of composition, that many nationalities have been represented. He also knows in great measure the audience's capacity of appreciation.

Is it not also possible that he has tastes and preferences of his own?

It is very plain that he thoroughly enjoys conducting music, nor is it likely that he will spend much time in exhuming dull, long-buried compositions or seeking anxiously for new works that might be helpful in cases of chronic sleeplessness. As an experienced and brilliant conductor of operas he naturally looks for emotional effects in music, and if music is not emotional, why should it be played? But bear in mind that emotionalism and sensationalism are not synonymous terms. There are fugues by Bach that are more emotional than some modern pieces in which there is a striving after intensity. Would it not be safe to leave the matter of programme making in Dr. Muck's hands and trust to his knowledge, experience, taste, judgment? He certainly has no thought of refusing a hearing to a composer simply because this composer happened to be born after Schumann died. It is not easy to think of Dr. Muck as confining his interest to the old worthies.

No sane person wishes to hear only the music of the old masters.

No sane person wishes to hear only ultra-modern music.

No sane person with a sense of humor wishes to hear only music that is made in Germany.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Rimsky-Korsakoff. Overture, "The Betrothed of the Czar."
Tschaikowsky. Violin Concerto in D. (Soloist, Mr. A. Petschnikoff).
Glazounoff. Symphony in B flat, No. 5.

One of those unified programmes for which Dr. Muck is becoming celebrated. Russian composers and a Russian soloist. Nor, judging by the applause, was it Caviare to the general. The first number was more intelligible to an American audience than the name of its composer. Even Russians seem to be at sea as to how to accent his name. The Russian ambassador, Baron Rosen, once told the present writer that the accent was on the first syllable of both names; Andrew D. White, our minister to Russia, agreed with this; but a pupil of the composer has since given him the information that the gentleman himself accents his name on the first syllable of the first and the second syllable of the second name—RIM-sky Kor-SA-koff.

What's in a name? A Russian by any name whatever would write melodiously and be intelligible in his music, and this composition, with all its pomp and circumstance, its military effects and its ponderous brass phrases, is yet attractive in a tuneful manner. That the performance had an occasional touch of roughness was condonable because of the virility of the picture. In this work we do not have a kaleidoscopic array of fragments, such as we often find in modern French and German works, but steady and comprehensible tunes which charm by their contrasts and also in a more advanced manner by the development of some of their figures. Such a work is refreshing in these days of musical problems.

Tschaikowsky's violin concerto seems to us about as artificial as anything he has ever composed. The first movement might have been written by either De Beriot or Vieuxtemps, providing they ever became so prolix. One might have applied to it the Shakespearian words,—

"This will last out a night in Russia,
When nights are longest there."

The second movement (also too long) was at least more characteristic and less conventional. The horn tones, giving the effect of a bell, as in Berlioz's "Childe Harold" symphony, were very impressive, and here at least there seemed to be something earnest and poetic in the contents of the work. In the last movement the folk-song bazar was opened, as is usual in the finale of many of Tschaikowsky's works, and there was a brilliant ending. But it was not the Tschaikowsky of the "Pathetique," or of the piano concerto, or of the "Romeo and Juliet" overture, after all.

As to the artist, Petschnikoff played both correctly and fluently, but with a Dresden China fragility of tone that was out of place in Symphony Hall. His work on the G string was much lighter than it ought to have been, but his intonation was flawless and his harmonics were very pure. His delicacy of expression was quite in place in the second movement, but more force would have been acceptable both in the first and last movements.

The cadenza, placed like that in the Mendelssohn concerto, a good way from the end of the first movement, was brilliant enough, but we found Petschnikoff less great than many violinists that we have recently heard; there were some sitting back of him, in the orchestral ranks, who could have excelled him. Yet the audience evidently did not share this view, for they applauded the first movement to the echo, and recalled the artist twice at the end of the work.

The Glazounoff symphony began majestically enough and its broad unison passages were given with much dignity. There was possibly too much bombast in its make-up and the brasses came too often to the front in its measures.

Again we found the tunefulness of the Muscovite revealed. The Scherzo contained a march that was as popular as the march in Raff's "Lenore" symphony, tinkled out with Glockenspiel and with every sugary effect possible. Naturally this was applauded almost to the encore point.

The slow movement was most beautiful, the gem of the work. It is chiefly founded on a figure much like the first six notes of "Celeste Aida," but treated in a manner that removed it altogether from the Verdi vein and put all thought of resemblance or plagiarism to flight. Here also was a most effective contrast, a sudden change to a portentous phrase on the trombones which came in with striking power and weirdness. This movement was read exquisitely.

Now there came an amount of revelry and devilry that suggested that Charpentier's "Montmartre" scenes had been transplanted into symphony. Yet it was so frankly "canaille" that it possessed an odd attraction. If Mr. Gericke ever repressed the brasses they now had their compensation. "Is a Muck running the brasses or are the brasses running amuck?" asked an astonished auditor of the reviewer. The wildest orgies of Kunavina, during the fair of Nijni-Novgorod, might be represented by such music. It was Vodka in tones. But what a headache the celebrants must have had the next morning!

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Journal
NOVEMBER 26, 1906.

RUSSIAN NIGHT FOR THE SYMPHONY

Petschnikoff as Soloist and Program of Slav Music Delighted the Orchestra Patrons.

At the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening the following was the program:

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in D major, for violin, op. 35, Tschaikowsky
Symphony in B flat major, No. 5, op. 55, Glazounoff

The presence as soloist of Alexander Petschnikoff, the Russian violinst, and his selection of the Tschaikowsky concerto appears to have inspired Dr. Muck to a program composed entirely of Russian music. The lack of variety that might have resulted found its alleviation in the fact that the Russian composers selected were not always as Russian as they might have been. The Rimsky-Korsakoff overture, for example, is Eastern rather than Slavic in its charming melodies, which please, if they do not especially impress.

Less Russian still, if the fourth movement be excepted, is the Glazounoff symphony, which was heard in this city for the first time. Originality does not force itself to the attention in this score. Indeed, it would not be difficult to support by evidence charges of the very antithesis of originality, for Glazounoff certainly owes something to predecessors and contemporaries for ideas. The scherzo shares this lack of originality, but it possesses a daininess and tunefulness that, added to the richness of the orchestration, almost places the movement in the "popular" class. In the finals, however, the Slav comes very much into evidence, and the coarse strength of the music bears the stamp of originality. As a whole the symphony is worthy, but not unduly impressive.

The soloist, whose violin was heard with the Symphony some half-dozen years ago, made an excellent impression in the familiar Tschaikowsky concerto, which may have been better played here, but never with more zeal. Mr. Petschnikoff was very much in earnest, and was evidently in close sympathy with the work; perhaps more so than the majority of his auditors.

The orchestra played with spirit and much breadth of tone, and Dr. Muck conducted with inspiring beat.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA

lo
th
mADEREWSKI AND HIS "UNFINISHED" SYMPHONY
a
a
sme. Sc[illegible]ch's Song [illegible]ital—A Little Study of Her Artistry at Its Finest—Petschnikoff at the Symphony Concert—Professor Baker Lectures on the Theatre—"The Vicar of Wakefield" as a "Romantic Opera"—News of the Hour.

In spite of much persuasion in an exchange of telegrams between Paderewski and the management of the Symphony Orchestra, the pianist has decided not to come to America in December to play at eight concerts with the band in Boston and elsewhere. The chief object of Paderewski's visit was to hear his new symphony, which the orchestra was to play here early in January from the manuscript parts. Last September he was far enough advanced upon it to believe that he could have it ready for rehearsal and performance in ample season. In fact, as he proceeded with the instrumentation, new ideas came to him that materially altered the scheme of the symphony. Therefore he wished to rewrite large parts of it so that performance was out of the question for the present. Since there would be no new symphony to hear, Paderewski was unwilling to cross and recross the Atlantic in midwinter for so short and purposeless a stay in view of the long American tour that he is to begin next autumn. In the course of that visit, presumably, the new symphony in its revised form will be played. As for the current gossip that Dr. Muck had declined to prepare the symphony, there is no truth whatever in it. He had examined a rough draft of the score, and he was quite ready to proceed to rehearsals had Paderewski been able to complete the instrumentation.

BOSTON POST,
NOVEMBER 27, 1906

THE SAINT-SAENS CONCERT

Last night's concert, in honor of the famous French composer, Saint-Saens, was a brilliant triumph. Dr. Muck opened the concert by giving a superb performance of the overture to "Les Barbares." Some may have noticed the length of the number. The reason is that the arrangement used last night includes the prelude to the opera, which is a symphonic accompaniment to a spoken prologue, which directly followed the overture.

And then came what all were waiting for, and what pianists had been dreaming about for weeks.

The great French composer entered amid thunderous applause, seating himself at his excellent instrument, and struck with breadth and virility the opening chords of the first movement of his G minor concerto. And what a lesson for musicians, in these days of thunderous virtuosity, of truly artistic playing. The breadth of the first movement, the indescribable "esprit" and piquancy of the second, and the fiery dash and sweep of the last. It was played throughout with unassumed but absolute mastery, and with the modesty and yet self-confidence of a born genius. The wonderful clarity and rhyme, the exquisite fluting and the dazzling virtuosity displayed will make the performance one that will linger long in the memory of Boston.

The Second Part

For the second part of the programme Mr. Saint-Saens had chosen three waltzes for the piano, Valse Nonchalante, Valse Mignonne and Valse Canariote, the last being a souvenir of his visit to the Canary Islands. These pieces are little more than of a charming salon type, and well as they were played, hardly seemed to fit in with the rest of the programme. But an encore was added which was the greatest delight of all, his wonderful arrangement of the Andante of Haydn's "Surprise Symphony." Here he displayed to the greatest advantage his mastery of tone color and his acute feeling for delicate dynamic gradations. One seemed to hear the various orchestral instruments with all their individual color, and the old-fashioned Haydnesque charm made.

Then followed the C minor symphony. Dr. Muck's performance of this work, which is considered abroad to be Saint-Saens' greatest creation, was one of exceptional depth and power. The entrance of the organ at the last of the first movement was most dramatically conceived, and the grandiose ending of the work fairly swept one away. It made a more profound impression than ever before, and those who had only observed the lighter qualities of the French composer's work went home with a far greater conception of his place in art. At the end of the concert the composer was enthusiastically recalled, and during the intermission was presented with a large wreath, honors which he acknowledged with the heartiest good will.

He left on the midnight train for New York, where he gives a piano recital this afternoon, playing the things he played here last night, and additional pieces by Bach, Ramea, Beethoven, Chopin and his own arrangement of fragments from the first act of "Samson and Delilah." Mr. Saint-Saens hopes to return the week of Dec. 17 and conduct in person another programme of his own compositions.

---

om [illegible]

ddress

ate

Paderewski.

That Paderewski is not coming to America this winter to play a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. Last summer when Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw Mr. Paderewski at his home in Morges, Switzerland, the symphony was finished with the exception of the instrumentation of the last movement. In doing this work, Mr. Paderewski discovered that he would have to make a great many changes. He sent word to Mr. Ellis that to hear the symphony produced for the first time by the greatest orchestra in the world was his great ambition, and if he came to America without it he would have absolutely no heart in his concerts and could not possibly do himself justice. It is now settled that Mr. Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the season of 1907-8 the great pianist will give about one hundred concerts in this country under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis of Boston, to whose press agent we are indebted for the above information.

[78]

BOSTONIANS WILDLY APPLAUD SAINT-SAENS

Eminent French Composer, Pianist, Virtuoso, Veteran of Thousand Concerts, Receives an Impressive Ovation.

One of the most important musical events Boston has known for many years—perhaps the most important, so far as affectionate sentiment and the personal equation are concerned—was that which had its enthusiastic scene in Symphony Hall last evening when Camille Saint-Saens, the grand old man of France, and the greatest composer now living in the world, stood before nearly 3000 friends and modestly, but genially, bowed his head to the plaudits of the throng.

The incident was all the more touching and impressive because Saint-Saens is old, and yet age was not the prevailing note. Above and beyond all was immense admiration for the man who has for over forty-five years upheld the banner of absolute music in France; who has written symphonies, operas, masses, songs, concertos, chamber music entr'act pieces, oratorios, chorals, organ compositions, cantatas—in fact, everything known to the human musical mind—and who has achieved in all this prodigious mass of music many things of a grace, beauty and piquancy that will send them down the years to whatever immortality is destined for the music of the nineteenth century. There was felt, too, that uplifting that comes to most human beings in the presence of a great man. And there was the extreme pleasure of hearing highly prized works interpreted by the master from whose mind and heart they sprang.

The concert was, of course, entirely made up of Saint-Saens' pieces, two of them familiar, the others less so. The Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck lent their services, and certainly the composer could not have been other than satisfied at the interpretation of his musical thoughts by the splendid band and its virile and magnetic conductor. The wonderfully clear and vivid playing of the overture "Les Barbares," which seldom-given work led all the rest, infused into it more interest and effectiveness than is sometimes the case, for it is not in Saint-Saens' most attractive vein. And the remarkably poetic and powerful reading of the C minor symphony made that long and sometimes diffuse, though always beautiful composition, a thing of true enjoyment.

Saint-Saens himself played the sparkling and exquisite G minor pianoforte concerto, the warhorse of countless hordes of newly fledged pianists, and he played it with amazing power and technical skill for a man of his years. The sonorous force of his left hand, the flexibility of his trills and roulades and the clean-cut virtuosity of everything that he did were almost incredible. As for his charm of authority, the beauty of his rhythmic expression, the elegance of all his phrasing, no praise can be extravagant. Saint-Saens is that rare sort of genius, a great composer and a great pianist.

Flowers and Plaudits.

At the close of the concerto the enthusiasm of the big audience was unbottled and the player was recalled time after time, in the midst of which journeys off and on the stage he was presented with an enormous stand-wreath of palm leaves, with C. S. S. in immortelles running across and a bow of French tricolor at the bottom.

The smiling veteran of a thousand concerts carried his trophy away by main force, struggling, but happy. Afterward he played three waltzes of his own, pretty trifles, elegantly turned, and then, as an encore piece, a fantasie on a familiar Haydn symphony air, which pleased the audience as much as anything during the evening.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
NOV 30 1907

That Paderewski is not coming to America to play a week's tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as announced last fall, is owing entirely to the fact that he has not finished the symphonic work he was to have brought with him. When Manager Ellis saw Paderewski at his home in Morges, Switzerland, the symphony was all done except the instrumentation of the last movement. In this, Paderewski answered he would have to make many changes. He sent word to Ellis that to have the symphony produced for the first time by the greatest orchestra in the world" was his great ambition, and if he came to America without it he would have no heart for concerts and could not do himself justice. It is now agreed that Paderewski will finish the symphony over in October, 1907 and bring it then be played. During that season the pianist is under contract to give forty concerts in this country.

ST. SAENS CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Overture to "The Barbarians."
Piano Concerto in G minor.
Valse Nonchalante.
Valse Mignonne.
Valse Canariote.
Symphony No. 3 in C minor.

One of the great events in Boston's musical history took place in Symphony Hall last night. A great foreign composer, possibly the very first of the French composers of the present, made his debut in our city. The occasion was made worthy of the great visitor. Our famous orchestra with its equally celebrated conductor collaborated with him and the programme was made up entirely of his compositions. The tremendous audience and the enthusiasm also proved that Boston appreciated the importance of the concert. M. St. Saens was received with a fervor that must have convinced him of the rank he holds in our estimation.

All considerations of the rank of the composer aside, it was a wonderful thing to find this septuagenarian (born Oct. 9, 1835) a pianist of high rank; not, perhaps, a technicist of the Lhevinne or Rosenthal type, but a poet of the instrument, a man whose phrasing was perfection, who appreciated the soul of his work and artistically submerged his personality in the ensemble. The musical thought came first, the technique, ample though it was, remained ever a means and not an end.

We were glad that the composer chose his G minor concerto for this memorable concert. It is, to our mind, the best of his works in this form, and is likely to remain a favorite work with pianists and public for a generation or two. Its form is rather free, but that is no fault in the 20th century, although when it was written, in 1868, the omission of a strict first movement was held to be very iconoclastic. In every part of this work there is beauty and charm. Here one finds no crabbedness, no puzzles, no artificial ugliness. The movements are well-contrasted and the brilliancy of the finale comes as an excellent climax after the delicacy of the Scherzo.

The pianist-composer interpreted each mood to perfection, but the chief success was undoubtedly won in the bright and crisp second movement. In every movement, however, the veteran showed himself a master of "nuance." We have had so many infant prodigies upon the piano that it was refreshing to change to a prodigy of seventy-one! When St. Saens grows up he will be one of the world's finest pianists. But we scarcely thought the three waltzes (mere "omelettes soufflees" of music) fitting to the occasion, and he must reserve the variations of "Ah vous dirai-je Maman" (played as an encore) for some 40 years hence, when he has reached his second childhood and once more poses as an infant phenomenon.

Nevertheless it was very wonderful to hear the grace and daintiness, the coquetry and piquancy with which the veteran invested these trifles, and the applause after them, as well as after the concerto, was frenzied. A huge floral tribute was also given to the composer.

The orchestral pieces were rather unequal. The overture to "Les Barbares" is in the "medley" form; that is, it is made up from themes used in the opera which are strung together in good contrast, but without regard to much figure development or to the time-honored "sonata-allegro" form. It is, however, scored for a large modern orchestra and shows a surety in handling tone-colors that proves St. Saens's right to high rank among the orchestral radicals.

Yet we do not think the overture one of the composer's great successes. There is a lack of that vigor and ferocity which, according to Gibbon, was a trait of ancient Gaul. The barbarians, as well as the Roman legions, are somewhat too Chesterfieldian. One needs the composer of the battle-scene of "Heldenleben" for a subject of this kind.

It was a pity that this short work was not conducted by the composer, although sometimes the creator of an orchestral work is by no means its best interpreter, and, after all, the two orchestral numbers, as well as the piano concerto, could scarcely have been in better hands than when led by Dr. Muck, who certainly shared in the triumphs of the evening.

But the magnificent third symphony was open to no "if" or "but" or other mental reservations; it was a colossal work written to the memory of Franz Liszt, and it introduces both organ and piano as orchestral adjuncts.

In this great work we have St. Saens at his best, as the master of figure development, a giant in the field of thematic treatment. The figures for this treatment are audible even in the introduction, and part of the thematic material of the chief theme is overlapped into the subordinate theme, just as Beethoven and Brahms did in the two great symphonic predecessors in the same key.

St. Saens is not trammelled by form in this work. He does not make the usual sonata return of the first part in this first movement, but he allows the essential parts of the melodies to return and form a transition into the Adagio, in which he introduces the organ and gives a hymn-like character and a celestial ending well-fitted as a homage to the memory of the great composer which this work celebrates.

In the next movement the piano enters, not as a solo, not even as an obbligato instrument, but as a definite tone-color, its scales being joined to certain piccolo passages and rounding them off with a decidedly novel effect. It is possible that the piano was introduced with some reference to the memory of the greatest of pianists, but it has something definite to say, which could have been said by no other instrument.

There is again magnificent figure treatment in this second division of the mighty work. Violins and violas give a figure in unison that is answered upon the kettle-drums (tonic and dominant). The working-out is as ingenious as ever D'Indy could have conceived, yet it is never ugly or even very puzzling, although it is carried to too great a length. Even Richard Strauss could not have juggled rhythms more intricately. After an alternation of 6-8 and 9-8 the theme is suddenly transformed in 2-2 in a march style, and then again changes into a 3-1 rhythm. And amid all these changes one can follow the [illegible] development of the violin-viola [illegible] rather brutal body [illegible] short, after the complex and [illegible] tone-coloring of the most recent school are in this work, without the usual and senseless dissonance that too often accompany them. It is perhaps St. Saens's greatest work, and it was an epoch-making event to have this given in Boston under the composer's own supervision, if not under his personal direction.

Mr. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ, and that instrument added tremendously to the effect. The piano was at the rear of the orchestra, since, for once, it had no leading part.

At the close of the symphony M. St. Saens was called to the platform and again forced to bow his acknowledgments.

We have had several great composers in America in the recent past. Mascagni, Leoncavallo, Guilmant, etc., and very soon Puccini is to direct one of his own operas on this side of the Atlantic; but, since Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky and Dvorak were among us there has been nothing comparable to the musical event which took place last night in Symphony Hall.

Louis C. Elson.

CITIZEN
N. Y.
DEC 1 - 1907

The lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening will be given at Association Hall on Wednesday at 4 p. m. (Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society). Charles M. Skinner, music editor of the Brooklyn "Daily Eagle," will be the lecturer, and Robert Thallon the pianist.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
DEC 1 - 1907

Rosenthal returns from Boston to be soloist of the local Boston Symphony concert on Thursday next. The symphony will be Bruckner's in E-flat, No. 7. The new Fifth Symphony of Glazounoff will be played on Friday in Brooklyn and on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Gustav Strube, of the first violins, is composer of a concerto that Adamowski will play at the matinée.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC - 1 1907

The lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening will be given at Association Hall on Wednesday, at 4 P.M. (Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society). Charles M. Skinner, music critic of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, will be the lecturer, and Robert Thallon, the pianist.

Doings in the Musical World Outside of Opera.

ROSENTHAL, Austrian pianist, will be the soloist at the first of the second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening. He will play Liszt's first concerto. On Saturday afternoon, Adamowski, the violinist, will play a new concerto by Gustave Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, so richly endowed with musicians. Both the symphonies announced are unfamiliar. On Thursday Bruckner's seventh, which Dr. Muck conducted at its first performance in Graz in 1886, will be played; on Saturday Glazounoff's fifth.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
GLOBE
COMMERCIAL
DEC 1 - 1907

The programmes for the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening, Dec. 6, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 8, at Carnegie Hall are as follows: For Thursday—Beethoven's overture "Leonore No. 3"; Liszt's piano concerto in E flat, and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. For Saturday—Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar," a new violin concerto by Gustav Strube, and Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony. The soloist on Thursday will be Moriz Rosenthal, on Saturday Timothée Adamowski.

[79]

A particularly attractive programme has been arranged by Dr. Muck for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, Dec. 7, at 8:15. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, concert-master of the orchestra, who will play Beethoven's Concerto in D major for the violin. Mr. Hess' performance of this concerto last spring caused nothing short of a sensation, the critics uniting in saying that it was one of the most superb interpretations of this greatest work for the violin that has ever been heard in the Boston Symphony Hall. In order to keep his programme within limits of a reasonable endurance, Dr. Muck has confined the rest of it to two numbers. The first will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," which is probably, from the popular point of view at least, the finest work this extraordinary composer has ever written. The final number will be Glazounoff's brilliantly barbaric Fifth Symphony, a work which while not so well known in America as the Fourth and the Sixth, is regarded by connoisseurs as being the most Russian of modern Russian music. It is a world of great technical difficulties and demands a virtuoso band, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is.

The lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, will be given at Association Hall on Wednesday, at 4 P. M. (Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society). Charles M. Skinner, music editor of the "Brooklyn Daily Eagle," will be the lecturer, and Robert Thallon, the pianist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
CITIZEN.
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 1 - 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come here for its second concert this season on Friday evening, playing at the Baptist Temple (Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society); and having Prof. Willy Hess, its concert master, for soloist instead of Mme. Samaroff, the pianist. Prof. Hess will play with the orchestra the Beethoven Concerto in D major, op. 61, which has three movements. Last season he played the "Largo" at one of the symphony concerts and won all hearers by breadth of his conception and the beauty of his playing. He is an artist of the highest rank and one of the great living masters of the violin, his distinguished career lasting over thirty years. He studied with Joachim at Berlin, and became at nineteen the leader of the opera and museum concerts at Frankfort, Germany, remaining there for eight years, when he went to Amsterdam as professor in the conservatory. He filled several fine positions and in 1903 succeeded Emile Sauret as professor of the violin in the Royal Academy of Music in London, remaining there for one year and then coming to America. The symphony by Glazounoff, will be played for the first time. It is his B flat major, No. 5, op. 53. The tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after Lenau), op. 20, by Richard Strauss, will open the programme, and thus it will be seen that Director Dr. Karl Muck has joined numbers of varied interest in a harmonious whole.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
CITIZEN
N. Y.
DEC 1 - 1907

That Paderewski is not coming to America this winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. It is now settled that Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the season of 1907 and 1908 the great pianist will give about one-hundred concerts in this country under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, of Boston.

[illegible] is a peace-disturbing [illegible] doctrine.

Bruckner's 7th symphony which will be played at the Symphony concert this week has been heard in Boston only once, Feb. 5, 1887. Dr. Muck's name has been closely identified with this work. While he was the conductor of the Styrian Musical Society in Graz he led "the first performance of this symphony in Austria," and later he conducted its performance in Berlin at one of the Royal Orchestra concerts in 1894. He is an ardent admirer of the genius Bruckner, and much may be expected from this performance.

It is said that the members [illegible]

The Transcript Journal
NOVEMBER 27, 1906

3000 BOSTONIANS WILDLY APPLAUD SAINT-SAENS

Eminent French Composer, Pianist, Virtuoso, Veteran of Thousand Concerts, Receives an Impressive Ovation.

One of the most important musical events Boston has known for many years—perhaps the most important, so far as affectionate sentiment and the personal equation are concerned—was that which had its enthusiastic scene at Symphony Hall last evening when Camille Saint-Saens, the grand old man of France, and the greatest composer now living in the world, stood before nearly 3000 friends and modestly, but genially, bowed his head to the plaudits of the throng.

The incident was all the more touching and impressive because Saint-Saens is old, and yet age was not the prevailing note. Above and beyond all was immense admiration for the man who has for over forty-five years upheld the banner of absolute music in France; who has written symphonies, operas, masses, songs, concertos, chamber music entr'act pieces, oratorios, chorals, organ compositions, cantatas—in fact, everything known to the human musical mind—and who has achieved in all this prodigious mass of music many things of a grace, beauty and piquancy that will send them down the years to whatever immortality is destined for the music of the nineteenth century. There was felt, too, that uplifting that comes to most human beings in the presence of a great man. And there was the extreme pleasure of hearing highly prized works interpreted by the master from whose mind and heart they sprang.

The concert was, of course, entirely made up of Saint-Saens' pieces, two of them familiar, the others less so. The Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck lent their services, and certainly the composer could not have been other than satisfied at the interpretation of his musical thoughts by the splendid band and its virile and magnetic conductor. The wonderfully clear and vivid playing of the overture "Les Barbares," which seldom-given work led all the rest, infused into it more interest and effectiveness than is sometimes the case, for it is not in Saint-Saens' most attractive vein. And the remarkably poetic and powerful reading of the C minor symphony made that long and sometimes diffuse, though always beautiful composition, a thing of true enjoyment.

Saint-Saens himself played the sparkling and exquisite G minor pianoforte concerto, the warhorse of countless hordes of newly fledged pianists, and he played it with amazing power and technical skill for a man of his years. The sonorous force of his left hand, the flexibility of his trills and roulades and the clean-cut virtuosity of everything that he did were almost incredible. As for his charm of authority, the beauty of his rhythmic expression, the elegance of all his phrasing, no praise can be extravagant. Saint-Saens is that rare sort of genius, a great composer and a great pianist.

Flowers and Plaudits.

At the close of the concerto the enthusiasm of the big audience was unbottled and the player was recalled time after time, in the midst of which journeys off and on the stage he was presented with an enormous stand-wreath of palm leaves, with C. S. S. in immortelles running across and a bow of French tricolor at the bottom.

The smiling veteran of a thousand concerts carried his trophy away by main force, struggling, but happy. Afterward he played three waltzes of his own, pretty trifles, elegantly turned, and then, as an encore piece, a fantasie on a familiar Haydn symphony air, which pleased the audience as much as anything during the evening.

SUN

That Paderewski is not coming to America to play a week's tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as announced last fall, is owing entirely to the fact that he has not finished the symphonic work he was to have brought with him. When Manager Ellis saw Paderewski at his home in Morges, Switzerland, the symphony was all done except the instrumentation of the last movement. In this, Paderewski discovered he would have to make many changes. He sent word to Ellis that to hear the symphony produced for the first time "by the greatest orchestra in the world" was his great ambition, and if he came to America without it he would have no heart in his concerts and could not do himself justice.

It is now agreed that Paderewski will bring the symphony over in October, 1907 and it will then be played. During that season the pianist is under contract to give about 100 concerts in this country.

ADVERTISER
NOVEMBER 27, 1906

THE SAINT-SAENS CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Overture to "The Barbarians."
Piano Concerto in G minor.
Valse Nonchalante.
Valse Mignonne.
Valse Canariote.
Symphony No. 3 in C minor.

One of the great events in Boston's musical history took place in Symphony Hall last night. A great foreign composer, possibly the very first of the French composers of the present, made his debut in our city. The occasion was made worthy of the great visitor. Our famous orchestra with its equally celebrated conductor collaborated with him and the programme was made up entirely of his compositions. The tremendous audience and the enthusiasm also proved that Boston appreciated the importance of the concert. M. St. Saens was received with a fervor that must have convinced him of the rank he holds in our estimation.

All considerations of the rank of the composer aside, it was a wonderful thing to find this septuagenarian (born Oct. 9, 1835) a pianist of high rank; not, perhaps, a technicist of the Lhevinne or Rosenthal type, but a poet of the instrument, a man whose phrasing was perfection, who appreciated the soul of his work and artistically submerged his personality in the ensemble. The musical thought came first, the technique, ample though it was, remained ever a means and not an end.

We were glad that the composer chose his G minor concerto for this memorable concert. It is, to our mind, the best of his works in this form, and is likely to remain a favorite work with pianists and public for a generation or two. Its form is rather free, but that is no fault in the 20th century, although when it was written, in 1868, the omission of a strict first movement was held to be very iconoclastic. In every part of this work there is beauty and charm. Here one finds no crabbedness, no puzzles, no artificial ugliness. The movements are well-contrasted and the brilliancy of the finale comes as an excellent climax after the delicacy of the Scherzo.

The pianist-composer interpreted each mood to perfection, but the chief success was undoubtedly won in the bright and crisp second movement. In every movement, however, the veteran showed himself a master of "nuance." We have had so many infant prodigies upon the piano that it was refreshing to change to a prodigy of seventy-one! When St. Saens grows up he will be one of the world's finest pianists. But we scarcely thought the three waltzes (mere "omelettes souffleés" of music) fitting to the occasion, and he must reserve the variations of "Ah vous dirai-je Maman" (played as an encore) for some 40 years hence, when he has reached his second childhood and once more poses as an infant phenomenon.

Nevertheless it was very wonderful to hear the grace and daintiness, the coquetry and piquancy with which the veteran invested these trifles, and the applause after them, as well as after the concerto, was frenzied. A huge floral tribute was also given to the composer.

The orchestral pieces were rather unequal. The overture to "Les Barbares" is in the "medley" form; that is, it is made up from themes used in the opera which are strung together in good contrast, but without regard to much figure development or to the time-honored "sonata-allegro" form. It is, however, scored for a large modern orchestra and shows a surety in handling tone-colors that proves St. Saens's right to high rank among the orchestral radicals.

Yet we do not think the overture one of the composer's great successes. There is a lack of that vigor and ferocity which, according to Gibbon, was a trait of ancient Gaul. The barbarians, as well as the Roman legions, are somewhat too Chesterfieldian. One needs the composer of the battle-scene of "Heldenleben" for a subject of this kind.

It was a pity that this short work was not conducted by the composer, although sometimes the creator of an orchestral work is by no means its best interpreter, and, after all, the two orchestral numbers, as well as the piano concerto, could scarcely have been in better hands than when led by Dr. Muck, who certainly shared in the triumphs of the evening.

But the magnificent third symphony was open to no "if" or "but" or other mental reservations; it was a colossal work written to the memory of Franz Liszt, and it introduces both organ and piano as orchestral adjuncts.

In this great work we have St. Saens at his best, as the master of figure development, a giant in the field of thematic treatment. The figures for this treatment are audible even in the introduction, and part of the thematic material of the chief theme is overlapped into the subordinate theme, just as Beethoven and Brahms did in the two great symphonic predecessors in the same key.

St. Saens is not trammelled by form in this work. He does not make the usual sonata return of the first part in this first movement, but he allows the essential parts of the melodies to return and form a transition into the Adagio, in which he introduces the organ and gives a hymn-like character and a celestial ending well-fitted as a homage to the memory of the great composer which this work celebrates.

In the next movement the piano enters, not as a solo, not even as an obbligato instrument, but as a definite tone-color, its scales being joined to certain piccolo passages and rounding them off with a decidedly novel effect. It is possible that the piano was introduced with some reference to the memory of the greatest of pianists, but it has something definite to say, which could have been said by no other instrument.

There is again magnificent figure treatment in this second division of the mighty work. Violins and violas give a figure in unison that is answered upon the kettle-drums (tonic and dominant). The working-out is as ingenious as ever D'Indy could have conceived, yet it is never ugly or even very puzzling, although it is carried to too great a length. Even Richard Strauss could not have juggled rhythms more intricately. After an alternation of 6-8 and 9-8 the theme is suddenly transformed in 2-2 in a march style, and then again changes into a 3-1 rhythm. And amid all these changes one can follow the most subtle development of the violin-viola theme and another, rather broken melody in three-noted figures, rhythmic complexity, and the finale is grand and lofty and in it the organ blends with the orchestra in a noble climax. In short, all of the complexities and the orchestral tone-coloring of the most radical school are in this work, without the ugliness and senseless dissonance that too often accompany them. It is perhaps St. Saens's greatest work, and it was an epoch-making event to have this given in Boston under the composer's own supervision, if not under his personal direction.

Mr. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ, and that instrument added tremendously to the effect. The piano was at the rear of the orchestra, since, for once, it had no leading part.

At the close of the symphony M. St. Saens was called to the platform and again forced to bow his acknowledgments.

We have had several great composers in America in the recent past. Mascagni, Leoncavallo, Guilmant, etc., and very soon Puccini is to direct one of his own operas on this side of the Atlantic; but, since Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky and Dvorak were among us there has been nothing comparable to the musical event which took place last night in Symphony Hall.

Louis C. Elson.

---

s

The lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening will be given at Association Hall on Wednesday at 4 p. m. (Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society). Charles M. Skinner, music editor of the Brooklyn "Daily Eagle," will be the lecturer, and Robert Thallon the pianist.

---

ss

Rosenthal returns from Boston to be soloist of the local Boston Symphony concert on Thursday next. The symphony will be Bruckner's in E-flat, No. 7. The new Fifth Symphony of Glazounoff will be played on Friday in Brooklyn and on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Gustav Strube, of the first violins, is composer of a concerto that Adamowski will play at the matinée.

---

ss

The lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, will be given at Association Hall on Wednesday, at 4 P.M. (Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society). Charles M. Skinner, music critic of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, will be the lecturer, and Robert Thallon, the pianist.

---

ss

Doings in the Musical World Outside of Opera.

ROSENTHAL, Austrian pianist, will be the soloist at the first of the second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening. He will play Liszt's first concerto. On Saturday afternoon, Adamowski, the violinist, will play a new concerto by Gustave Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, so richly endowed with musicians. Both the symphonies announced are unfamiliar. On Thursday Bruckner's seventh, which Dr. Muck conducted at its first performance in Graz in 1886, will be played; on Saturday Glazounoff's fifth.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m

ress

te

The programmes for the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening, Dec. 6, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 8, at Carnegie Hall are as follows: For Thursday—Beethoven's overture "Leonore No. 3"; Liszt's piano concerto in E flat, and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. For Saturday—Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar," a new violin concerto by Gustav Strube, and Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony. The soloist on Thursday will be Moriz Rosenthal, on Saturday Timothée Adamowski.

[79]

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC - 1 1906

A particularly attractive programme has been arranged by Dr. Muck for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, Dec. 7, at 8:15. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play Beethoven's Concerto in D major for the violin. Mr. Hess' performance of this concerto last spring caused nothing short of a sensation, the critics uniting in saying that it was one of the most superb interpretations of this greatest work for the violin that has ever been heard in the Boston Symphony Hall. In order to keep his programme within limits of a reasonable endurance, Dr. Muck has confined the rest of it to two numbers. The first will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," which is probably, from the popular point of view at least, the finest work this extraordinary composer has ever written. The final number will be Glazounoff's brilliantly barbaric Fifth Symphony, a work which while not so well known in America as the Fourth and the Sixth, is regarded by connoisseurs as being the most Russian of modern Russian music. It is a world of great technical difficulties and demands a virtuoso band, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is.

The lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, will be given at Association Hall on Wednesday, at 4 P. M. (Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society). Charles M. Skinner, music editor of the "Brooklyn Daily Eagle," will be the lecturer, and Robert Thallon, the pianist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come here for its second concert this season on Friday evening, playing at the Baptist Temple (Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society), and having Prof. Willy Hess, its concert master, for soloist instead of Mme. Samaroff, the pianist. Prof. Hess will play with the orchestra the Beethoven Concerto in D major, op. 61, which has three movements. Last season he played the "Largo" at one of the symphony concerts and won all hearers by breadth of his conception and the beauty of his playing. He is an artist of the highest rank and one of the great living masters of the violin, his distinguished career lasting over thirty years. He studied with Joachim at Berlin, and became at nineteen the leader of the opera and museum concerts at Frankfort, Germany, remaining there for eight years, when he went to Amsterdam as professor in the conservatory. He filled several fine positions and in 1903 succeeded Emile Sauret as professor of the violin in the Royal Academy of Music in London, remaining there for one year and then coming to America. The symphony by Glazounoff, will be played for the first time. It is his B flat major, No. 5, op. 53. The tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after Lenau), op. 20, by Richard Strauss, will open the programme, and thus it will be seen that Director Dr. Karl Muck has joined numbers of varied interest in a harmonious whole.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n

ress

e

That Paderewski is not coming to America this winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. It is now settled that Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the season of 1907 and 1908 the great pianist will give about one hundred concerts in this country under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, of Boston.

---

is a peace-disturbing, home-shattering doctrine.

Bruckner's 7th symphony which will be played at the Symphony concert this week has been heard in Boston only once, Feb. 5, 1887. Dr. Muck's name has been closely identified with this work. While he was the conductor of the Styrian Musical Society in Graz he led "the first performance of this symphony in Austria," and later he conducted its performance in Berlin at one of the Royal Orchestra concerts in 1894. He is an ardent admirer of the genius of Bruckner, and much may be expected from this performance.

It is said that the members of the

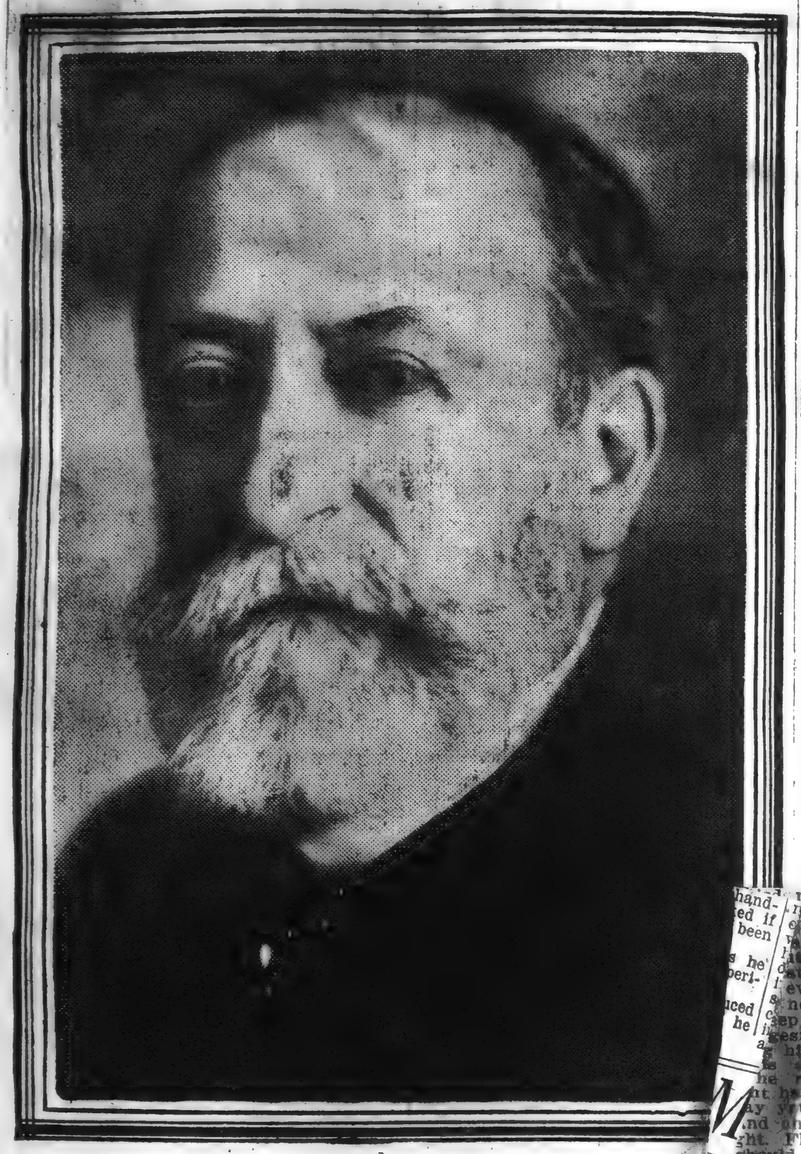
BOSTON HERALD---TUESDAY, NOVEMBER

1906

SAINT-SAENS IN SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Pays Great Composer Homage

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS, THE FAMOUS FRENCH COMPOSER.



Distinguished Pianist, 72 Years Old, P... Own Works Before Crowded Hous... Assisted by Orchestra.

BY PHILIP HALE.

Mr. Camille Saint-Saens, assisted by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, gave a concert last night in Symphony Hall, which was crowded, for many stood. The programme included these compositions of the distinguished visitor: Overture to the opera, "The Barbarians"; concerto in G minor, No. 2, for piano; these piano solos—Valse nonchalante, Valse Mignonne, Valse canariote—to which Mr. Saint-Saens added his transcription of a familiar symphonic andante by Haydn; symphony in C minor, No. 3.

Mr. Saint-Saens visited us for the first time, and early in his 72d year. His compositions have been played and applauded in turn for 30 years in this city, which welcomed him long ago as a composer, as it had welcomed Berlioz before him. He has been playing the piano for 60 years; he has triumphed gloriously in the chief cities of Europe, in the Orient, in South America. What a long and brilliant career: What has he not seen and heard, this keen, ironical, friendly observer of towns and men and life! What has he not done in all the fields of musical composition!

When he first played in public, the year was 1846. Mendelssohn had died only the year before and Schumann had yet 10 years to live. Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" had been produced the year before and Verdi's "Rigoletto" and "Il Trovatore" did not see the footlights until the early fifties. Brahms was a lad and Tschaikowsky was only 6 years old. Eighteen hundred and forty-six was the year of the production of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Mr. Saint-Saens has seen the revolutionaries in music flourishing torches and alarming orthodox citizens and then becoming orthodox themselves. He has seen the apotheosis of composers who in life were hooted at or ignored. He has seen Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner, Verdi, Franck, take their place among the immortals.

He is now living in the period of d'Indy, Debussy and Richard Strauss. Through all the years he has been musically active and alert, he has been true to himself and his beliefs, and he has worshipped sincerely in the great Temple of Art. When chamber and symphonic music were neglected in Paris, he worked indefatigably to make it understood. A sturdy patriot in daily life, he was not chauvinistic in his musical opinions and in his career as a concert giver. Extremely versatile, he is poet, playwright, play actor, essayist, archeologist, interested in all branches of science, a polished man of the world, famous for his wit and shrewd reflection.

No wonder then that Boston paid him homage last night in Symphony Hall. It will not soon have the opportunity of paying a like tribute to one as worthy.

Mr. Saint-Saens came before us as a composer and as a pianist. Many were eager to hear him play the well known concerto. Many would fain have heard the "Danse Macabre" or "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" in the place of the overture to "The Barbarians," which is not one of the composer's works of marked distinction. Some, no doubt, would have willingly not heard the three waltzes for the piano. The "Valse Nonchalante" is not without grace, but the others of the group are commonplace, if not wholly without interest.

The symphony, led with skill and sympathy by Dr. Muck, is in many respects a noble composition, one in which the composer is without the characteristic irony that flavors his symphonic poems and thus saves them from the reproach that may often be made justly against music with an explanatory and interlinear text.

It is not necessary to speak now at length concerning the character of Mr. Saint Saens' music, or to discuss the question whether it be skilfully made and eclectic or irreproachably made and also individual. He has been called the "finest, sanest, soundest and most versatile French musician of the 19th century." He is certainly the most versatile, and he is perhaps the finest in the true meaning of the word. "Sanest and soundest" may not be the highest compliment or the most far-seeing judgment. There is a wild imagination that is divine insanity, and this quality distinguishes the best work of Berlioz, a colossal genius who happened to express himself in music.

Mr. Pope was an eminently sane and sound poet, but who would rank him above Coleridge, Byron, Shelley or the Wordsworth of a few poems? A composer named Cesar Franck lived in the 19th century. Or if exquisite taste and a rarely poetic spirit count for something, there are the songs and chamber music of one Gabriel Faure, as there are the poems of Collins in literature. Should not the great composer be deeply emotional, passionate with a passion not extravagant yet glowing?

But time settles all these questions in his impassive way. It is enough to say that Mr. Saint-Saens now seems sure of a most honorable rank among the composers of France and for the artistic perfection of his musical expression stands among the very first.

The audience did not grow weary of applauding Mr. Saint-Saens after his performance of the concerto. This performance was interesting in many ways. It was surprising, in view of the age of the pianist, and chiefly so on account of the display of mechanical clearness and dexterity.

...hand- ...ed if ...been ...s he ...peri- ...uced ...he

...movement of the concerto ...presto. It was taken at ...speed, and there, as in the ...ments, the pianist was in- ...strip the orchestra, more ...at the expense of rhythm. ...ever that of the first move- ...not call for any interpreta- ...sep sentiment. The opening ...gests Bach living in Paris and ...g himself gracefully to its in- ...s admirable in its dignity. ...he melodic passages of this ...t have little inherent warmth, ...ay yet be sung with more elas- ...nd charm than they were sung ...ght. Fleetness, clearness and ele- ...should distinguish the interpreta- ...f the scherzo and the finale, and ...se movements Mr. Saint-Saens re- ...d to us in large measure the sub- ...tial reason for his high and long- ...tained reputation as a pianist. ...s appearance is even now a memory, ...it is doubtful whether he will ever ...t us again to revive it. It was a ...at pleasure to see and hear him, and ...s pleasure should be an abiding one. ...e man himself won all hearts. The ...bute paid was not only to the com- ...ser and pianist; it was also to one ...o has for 60 years maintained an hon- ...able name as artist, patriot and man.

SAINT-SAENS IN BOSTON -- 1906

[80]

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1906.

SAINT-SAENS AND FARRAR

THE COMPOSER AND PIANIST APPEARS IN BOSTON

The Honors That He Received—Some Personal Impressions—His Skill as a Pianist—The Tribute of His Own Music as the Symphony Orchestra Played It—Geraldine Farrar Makes Her American Debut at the Metropolitan Opera House for the Opening of the New Season—Much Praise and Some Questionings—The Traits of Her Voice and Acting

The Symphony Orchestra gave a concert last evening in Symphony Hall in honor of Camille Saint-Saëns, the distinguished French composer and pianist, who is now visiting America. The programme consisted wholly of his music—the overture to his recent opera, "The Barbarians," his second piano concerto in G minor, three of his waltzes ("Nonchalante," "Mignonne" and "Canariote") for piano solo, and his third symphony in C minor in which he adds a piano and an organ to the orchestra. Mr. Saint-Saëns himself played the three waltzes and the piano part in the concerto; while Dr. Muck conducted in the three orchestral numbers; and Mr. Zach and Mr. Goodrich took respectively the piano and the organ in the symphony. The audience filled every seat and lined, two or three deep, the sides of the hall. Its applause was quick, long and hearty when Mr. Saint-Saëns took his place at the piano. It became warmer in the pauses in the concerto and at the end it recalled him insistently. It was heartiest of all when a sort of trophy of palms bearing his initials in white immortelles and tied with ribbons of the French colors was handed to him. Time and again, after the short piano pieces, the audience brought him back to the stage, and at the close of the symphony, to which he had listened at the door of the anteroom, the whole house rose to its feet and twice recalled him. It is very long indeed since there has been such spontaneous, sustained and insistent enthusiasm at a concert in Boston. Distinctly, Mr. Saint-Saëns was a guest of honor.

Until recent years, eminent composers to visit America have been few, and to visit Boston have been fewer. Rubinstein came—and comparatively in the early days of musical appreciation in America—as a mighty pianist rather than as a composer of the third or the fourth rank. Tschaikovski decked the dedication of the concert hall in New York that was one of the earliest triumphs as a "public benefactor" of Andrew Carnegie, and Russian music generally was less known and admired fifteen or twenty years ago than it is now. Dvorák, as teacher and advertisement of a conservatory, spent two or three years in America—unhappily in New York, happily in the transplanted Bohemia of Spillville, Iowa. Richard Strauss came in the threefold aspect of composer, conductor and propagandist of his own music, and incidentally gave concerts in a loft of a dry goods shop in New York for the greater glory of Mr. John Wanamaker. Sir Edward Elgar, last spring, was "the feature" of a Western musical festival at which he conducted his own oratorios. Mr. d'Indy, last winter, was the representative and propagandist of the school of French music of which he is the honored and honorable chief. Foor Humperdinck, in his deafness and shyness, was a passing incident in a season at the Metropolitan Opera House that happened to include his "Hänsel and Gretel." The music of Strauss, d'Indy and Elgar is still, and may long be, a matter of divergent opinion and of uncertain place. Mr. Saint-Saëns's eminence, like Tschaikovski's and Dvorák's, was established long before he came to America. His music indeed began to be familiar on this side of the Atlantic well before theirs. Neither the Russian nor the Bohemian visited Boston, and the circumstances under which each came to America did not add to his dignity. Mr. Saint-Saëns, on the other hand, comes under worthy conditions and with as much personal dignity as did Mr. d'Indy. He is here to exploit nothing, not even his own music. Naturally the orchestras and their public in the chief American cities have hastened to do him honor. In New York, Chicago and Philadelphia he has already been received as warmly as he was in Boston last night.

Moreover, Mr. Saint-Saëns is unique in some respects among the composers that have visited America. They have come in the prime of middle age; he in his seventy-second year. To most of them, even to an itinerant virtuoso, as Rubinstein was, or a wandering "star" conductor as Strauss is, the journey to America was an experience of travel. From his youth Mr. Saint-Saëns has loved and pursued the delights of new lands and new manners from the Canary Islands on the west to Cochin China on the east. The wonder is that he has deferred a visit to America so long, and that he has waited until this autumn to yield to a temptation that, he admits, has often beset him. Rubinstein was interesting as a virtuoso, Strauss as a conductor; while the other composers who have come to America have been composers only. Mr. Saint-Saëns has a dozen titles to interest—as composer, pianist, acoustician, archæologist, playwright, comedian, caricaturist, writer, reviewer, amateur of art and the sciences, mathematician, traveller, man of the world—almost what you will. Tschaikovski and Mr. d'Indy were at ease only among those that were in close sympathy with them. Dvorák was always a peasant with exceptional gifts for music. Elgar has the British shyness that the rest of the world thinks British—and snobbish—pride. Strauss played the recluse in America. Mr. Saint-Saëns is at his ease here, as he has been at his ease in any society from his youth upward. He is as various, alert and elegant as ever.

Paris for forty years ... cultivated people in half the ... Europe that came upon the stage of Symphony Hall last night. No man could look less the musician, as the traditional notion of that calling goes. Call him banker, lawyer, man of affairs, man of letters, man of the world you might, but by none of the conventional earmarks did Mr. Saint-Saëns seem a musician. Of medium stature, his frame was unbent, though a little stiffened, by his years. His well-favored body carried no trace of age. His beard was white, but his dark hair still mocked at time. His ample head was distinctly impressive, luminous with intelligence, strong with reflection, animated with alertness. The forehead suggested intellectual force; the eyes were singularly vivacious and the mouth had the trick of a half-smile of kindly astuteness and gentle cynicism. His manner was polished self-possession without a hint of stiffness or affectation. His response to the applause of his audience was appreciative urbanity itself, and the fineness of his acknowledgment made the tribute the finer. It was stimulating to watch the effortless poise that was in all that he did or suggested. An eminent musician was a man, also, of the cultivated and polished world. "Musical circles" had not tarnished and segregated him. He might have been of any one or of all the interests that he has pursued.

The physical strain of conducting has made it nearly impossible in recent years to Mr. Saint-Saëns, and still more when he has barely recovered from the sickness that befel him on his voyage to America. His audiences here, as in the rest of the world, have known him long and familiarly as a composer. He could therefore disclose himself freshly only as a pianist, and by the pleasure of his virtuosity make return for the honors he was receiving. It is not easy to recall any other pianist who has passed his seventy-first birthday, and who may still give that pleasure after sixty years of concerts. Ten years ago last summer, fifty years after "le petit Saint-Saëns" had made his first appearance in Paris, he gave a jubilee concert there and gossip prophesied his retirement as a virtuoso. Now, he says, he is ready to fulfil the prophesy after a farewell concert in Paris, but his listeners will doubt the necessity of it as readily and summarily as Benedick doubted the necessity of peopling the earth. A dozen pianists must have played the concerto in G minor in Boston, and a few of them have left memories of it behind. More than one of them, in the flower of his strength, has excelled Mr. Saint-Saëns in power and in warmth; but none, as memory runs, has given it such aristocratic elegance and rhythmical fascination. He played it with a lucidity that seemed to lead each melody into the light and then glint the facets of it. There was an exquisite sense of form in his shaping of the tonal contours and in his outdrawing of the musical development. His rhythms were sensitively pliant and graceful. His sense of the rounded phrase and the proportioned period was of a just nicety. His ornaments sparkled. He kept many things perfectly poised. Under his fingers, the concerto purled along, never losing its aristocratic charm, its piquant fascination, its lacework filigree of tonal light and shade. It was the music of elegance played with an adroit lightness and brightness of touch and diction. Then, to the little waltzes he gave a similar iridescent grace and alluring rhythmic delicacy. Had the playing been a little tenderer, it were easy to call it Mozartean. It was of his century in the fineness of its musical feeling and in its formal and aristocratic charm. Always it was of a quality, in spite of its clear dryness, that scarcely a pianist now brings to music that invites it. Fancy our heaven-storming virtuosi content with "mere" elegance!

We that listened last night were honoring our guest. We were therefore in courtesy bound to make our just compliments as delicately as we might to his playing, and to hear his music, when he did not share in the performance of it, with sympathetic responsiveness. To pass judgment upon it the moment that the door has closed upon him were a discourtesy the worse for the hiding. Enough has been said in these columns, for many years and within a few weeks, by more practised hands and more discriminating insight, of Mr. Saint-Saëns's music. Suffice it for the moment to note the operatic glamor, the incisively imagined contrasts, the large and easy mastery of resource, the declamatory voice of the overture to "The Barbarians," and to recall the symphony in C minor as the most puissant and characteristic of Mr. Saint-Saëns's symphonies. Dedicated to the memory of Liszt, it courts the freedom of form and the upbuilding of a whole musical structure by the development, the modulation, the transformation, the almost endless evolution of a melody that Liszt sought in his concerto in A major. It accomplishes its end almost equally by tireless fertility of invention and tireless felicity of expression. At the moment when the melodic idea seems on the point of faltering, Mr. Saint-Saëns's knowledge directs it and his imagination animates it. Meanwhile he is expressing the results of both with insistent beauty and with sustained power. There are truly grandiose passages in the symphony. There are equally passages of persuasive grace and passages, like the slow section, that are charged with an unusually warm and sensuous beauty. Vague may be the musical substance, but the tonal texture is to the ear as velvet of the richest and softest to the hand. Upon the conductor and the orchestra, as the chief hosts, it was incumbent to play all this music with the keenest understanding, the warmest sympathy, and the most responsive and compelling utterance. Nowhere did they fail or even flag. They recreated the symphony—and the emotions of its beauty or its power in those that heard.

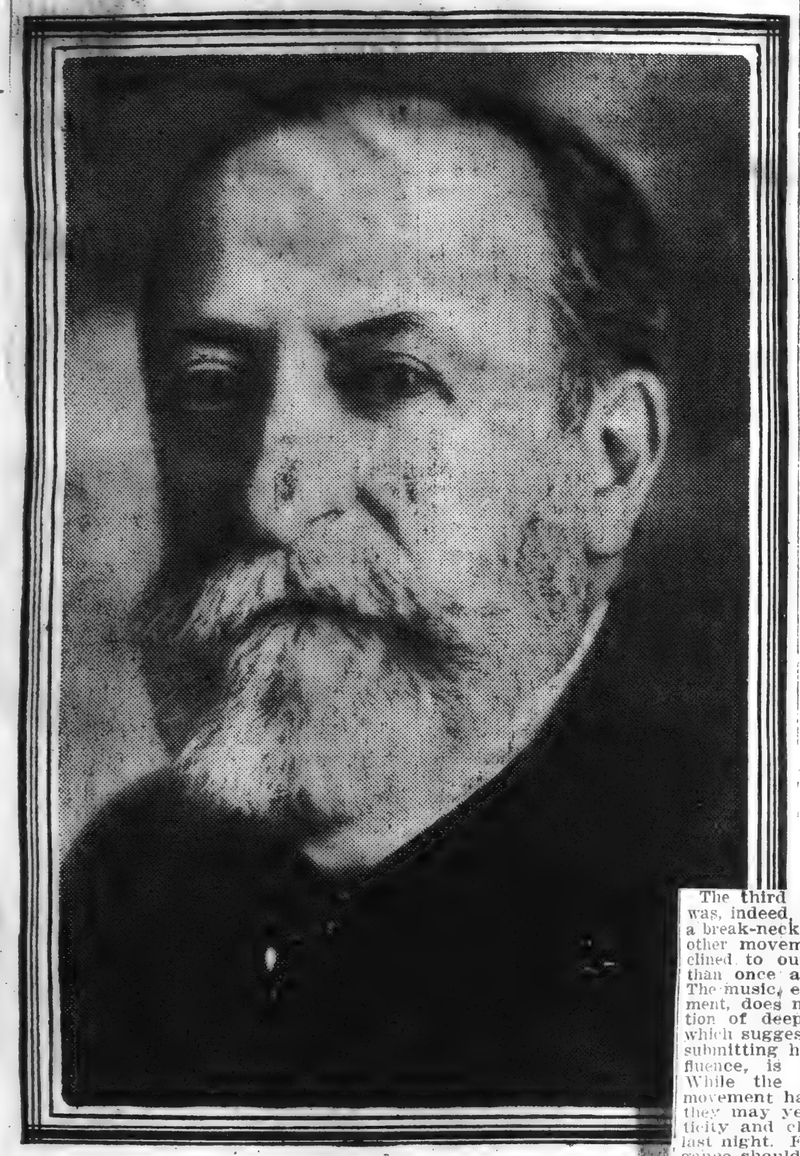
H. T. P.

1906

SAINT-SAENS IN SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Pays Great Composer Homage

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS, THE FAMOUS FRENCH COMPOSER.



Distinguished Pianist, 72 Years Old, Own Works Before Crowded Ho Assisted by Orchestra.

BY PHILIP HALE.

Mr. Camille Saint-Saens, assisted by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, gave a concert last night in Symphony Hall, which was crowded, for many stood. The programme included these compositions of the distinguished visitor: Overture to the opera, "The Barbarians"; concerto in G minor, No. 2, for piano; these piano solos—Valse nonchalante, Valse Mignonne, Valse canariote—to which Mr. Saint-Saens added his transcription of a familiar symphonic andante by Haydn; symphony in C minor, No. 3.

Mr. Saint-Saens visited us for the first time, and early in his 72d year. His compositions have been played and applauded in turn for 30 years in this city, which welcomed him long ago as a composer, as it had welcomed Berlioz before him. He has been playing the piano for 60 years; he has triumphed gloriously in the chief cities of Europe, in the Orient, in South America. What a long and brilliant career! What has he not seen and heard, this keen, ironical, friendly observer of towns and men and life! What has he not done in all the fields of musical composition!

When he first played in public, the year was 1846. Mendelssohn had died only the year before and Schumann had yet 10 years to live. Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" had been produced the year before and Verdi's "Rigoletto" and "Il Trovatore" did not see the footlights until the early fifties. Brahms was a lad and Tschaikowsky was only 6 years old. Eighteen hundred and forty-six was the year of the production of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Mr. Saint-Saens has seen the revolutionaries in music flourishing torches and alarming orthodox citizens and then becoming orthodox themselves. He has seen the apotheosis of composers who in life were hooted at or ignored. He has seen Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner, Verdi, Franck, take their place among the immortals.

He is now living in the period of d'Indy, Debussy and Richard Strauss. Through all the years he has been musically active and alert, he has been true to himself and his beliefs, and he has worshipped sincerely in the great Temple of Art. When chamber and symphonic music were neglected in Paris, he worked indefatigably to make it understood. A sturdy patriot in daily life, he was not chauvinistic in his musical opinions and in his career as a concert giver. Extremely versatile, he is poet, playwright, play actor, essayist, archeologist, interested in all branches of science, a polished man of the world, famous for his wit and shrewd reflection.

No wonder then that Boston paid him homage last night in Symphony Hall. It will not soon have the opportunity of paying a like tribute to one as worthy.

Mr. Saint-Saens came before us as a composer and as a pianist. Many were eager to hear him play the well known concerto. Many would fain have heard the "Danse Macabre" or "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" in the place of the overture to "The Barbarians," which is not one of the composer's works of marked distinction. Some, no doubt, would have willingly not heard the three waltzes for the piano. The "Valse Nonchalante" is not without grace, but the others of the group are commonplace, if not wholly without interest.

The symphony, led with skill and sympathy by Dr. Muck, is in many respects a noble composition, one in which the composer is without the characteristic irony that flavors his symphonic poems and thus saves them from the reproach that may often be made justly against music with an explanatory and interlinear text.

It is not necessary to speak now at length concerning the character of Mr. Saint Saens' music, or to discuss the question whether it be skilfully made and eclectic or irreproachably made and also individual. He has been called the "finest, sanest, soundest and most versatile French musician of the 19th century." He is certainly the most versatile, and he is perhaps the finest in the true meaning of the word. "Sanest and soundest" may not be the highest compliment or the most far-seeing judgment. There is a wild imagination that is divine insanity, and this quality distinguishes the best work of Berlioz, a colossal genius who happened to express himself in music.

Mr. Pope was an eminently sane and sound poet, but who would rank him above Coleridge, Byron, Shelley or the Wordsworth of a few poems? A composer named Cesar Franck lived in the 19th century. Or if exquisite taste and a rarely poetic spirit count for something, there are the songs and chamber music of one Gabriel Faure, as there are the poems of Collins in literature. Should not the great composer be deeply emotional, passionate with a passion not extravagant yet glowing?

But time settles all these questions in his impassive way. It is enough to say that Mr. Saint-Saens now seems sure of a most honorable rank among the composers of France and for the artistic perfection of his musical expression stands among the very first.

The audience did not grow weary of applauding Mr. Saint-Saens after his performance of the concerto. This performance was interesting in many ways. It was surprising, in view of the age of the pianist, and chiefly so on account of the display of mechanical clearness and dexterity.

The third movement of the concerto was, indeed, a presto. It was taken at a break-neck speed, and there, as in the other movements, the pianist was inclined to outstrip the orchestra, more than once at the expense of rhythm. The music, even that of the first movement, does not call for any interpretation of deep sentiment. The opening, which suggests Bach living in Paris and submitting himself gracefully to its influence, is admirable in its dignity. While the melodic passages of this movement have little inherent warmth, they may yet be sung with more elasticity and charm than they were sung last night. Fleetness, clearness and elegance should distinguish the interpretation of the scherzo and the finale, and in these movements Mr. Saint-Saens revealed to us in large measure the substantial reason for his high and long-maintained reputation as a pianist.

His appearance is even now a memory, and it is doubtful whether he will ever visit us again to revive it. It was a great pleasure to see and hear him, and this pleasure should be an abiding one. The man himself won all hearts. The tribute paid was not only to the composer and pianist; it was also to one who has for 60 years maintained an honorable name as artist, patriot and man.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1906

SAINT-SAENS AND FARRAR

THE COMPOSER AND PIANIST APPEARS IN BOSTON

The Honors That He Received—Some Personal Impressions—His Skill as a Pianist—The Tribute of His Own Music as the Symphony Orchestra Played It—Geraldine Farrar Makes Her American Debut at the Metropolitan Opera House for the Opening of the New Season—Much Praise and Some Questionings—The Traits of Her Voice and Acting

The Symphony Orchestra gave a concert last evening in Symphony Hall in honor of Camille Saint-Saëns, the distinguished French composer and pianist, who is now visiting America. The programme consisted wholly of his music—the overture to his recent opera, "The Barbarians," his second piano concerto in G minor, three of his waltzes ("Nonchalante," "Mignonne" and "Canariote") for piano solo, and his third symphony in C minor in which he adds a piano and an organ to the orchestra. Mr. Saint-Saëns himself played the three waltzes and the piano part in the concerto; while Dr. Muck conducted in the three orchestral numbers; and Mr. Zach and Mr. Goodrich took respectively the piano and the organ in the symphony. The audience filled every seat and lined, two or three deep, the sides of the hall. Its applause was quick, long and hearty when Mr. Saint-Saëns took his place at the piano. It became warmer in the pauses in the concerto and at the end it recalled him insistently. It was heartiest of all when a sort of trophy of palms bearing his initials in white immortelles and tied with ribbons of the French colors was handed to him. Time and again, after the short piano pieces, the audience brought him back to the stage, and at the close of the symphony, to which he had listened at the door of the anteroom, the whole house rose to its feet and twice recalled him. It is very long indeed since there has been such spontaneous, sustained and insistent enthusiasm at a concert in Boston. Distinctly, Mr. Saint-Saëns was a guest of honor.

Until recent years, eminent composers to visit America have been few, and to visit Boston have been fewer. Rubinstein came—and comparatively in the early days of musical appreciation in America—as a mighty pianist rather than as a composer of the third or the fourth rank. Tschaikovski decked the dedication of the concert hall in New York that was one of the earliest triumphs as a "public benefactor" of Andrew Carnegie, and Russian music generally was less known and admired fifteen or twenty years ago than it is now. Dvorák, as teacher and advertisement of a conservatory, spent two or three years in America—unhappily in New York, happily in the transplanted Bohemia of Spillville, Iowa. Richard Strauss came in the threefold aspect of composer, conductor and propagandist of his own music, and incidentally gave concerts in a loft of a dry goods shop in New York for the greater glory of Mr. John Wanamaker. Sir Edward Elgar, last spring, was "the feature" of a Western musical festival at which he conducted his own oratorios. Mr. d'Indy, last winter, was the representative and propagandist of the school of French music of which he is the honored and honorable chief. Foor Humperdinck, in his deafness and shyness, was a passing incident in a season at the Metropolitan Opera House that happened to include his "Hänsel and Gretel." The music of Strauss, d'Indy and Elgar is still, and may long be, a matter of divergent opinion and of uncertain place. Mr. Saint-Saëns's eminence, like Tschaikovski's and Dvorák's, was established long before he came to America. His music indeed began to be familiar on this side of the Atlantic well before theirs. Neither the Russian nor the Bohemian visited Boston, and the circumstances under which each came to America did not add to his dignity. Mr. Saint-Saëns, on the other hand, comes under worthy conditions and with as much personal dignity as did Mr. d'Indy. He is here to exploit nothing, not even his own music. Naturally the orchestras and their public in the chief American cities have hastened to do him honor. In New York, Chicago and Philadelphia he has already been received as warmly as he was in Boston last night.

Moreover, Mr. Saint-Saëns is unique in some respects among the composers that have visited America. They have come in the prime of middle age; he in his seventy-second year. To most of them, even to an itinerant virtuoso, as Rubinstein was, or a wandering "star" conductor as Strauss is, the journey to America was an experience of travel. From his youth Mr. Saint-Saëns has loved and pursued the delights of new lands and new manners from the Canary Islands on the west to Cochin China on the east. The wonder is that he has deferred a visit to America so long, and that he has waited until this autumn to yield to a temptation that, he admits, has often beset him. Rubinstein was interesting as a virtuoso, Strauss as a conductor; while the other composers who have come to America have been composers only. Mr. Saint-Saëns has a dozen titles to interest—as composer, pianist, acoustician, archæologist, playwright, comedian, caricaturist, writer, reviewer, amateur of art and the sciences, mathematician, traveller, man of the world—almost what you will. Tschaikovski and Mr. d'Indy were at ease only among those that were in close sympathy with them. Dvorák was always a peasant with exceptional gifts for music. Elgar has the British shyness that the rest of the world thinks British—and snobbish—pride. Strauss played the recluse in America. Mr. Saint-Saëns is at his ease here, as he has been at his ease in any society from his youth upward. He is as [illegible] alert and elegant as ever.

[illegible] Paris for forty years [illegible] cultivated people in half the [illegible] Europe that came upon the stage of Symphony Hall last night. No man could look less the musician, as the traditional notion of that calling goes. Call him banker, lawyer, man of affairs, man of letters, man of the world you might, but by none of the conventional earmarks did Mr. Saint-Saëns seem a musician. Of medium stature, his frame was unbent, though a little stiffened, by his years. His well-favored body carried no trace of age. His beard was white, but his dark hair still mocked at time. His ample head was distinctly impressive, luminous with intelligence, strong with reflection, animated with alertness. The forehead suggested intellectual force; the eyes were singularly vivacious and the mouth had the trick of a half-smile of kindly astuteness and gentle cynicism. His manner was polished self-possession without a hint of stiffness or affectation. His response to the applause of his audience was appreciative urbanity itself, and the fineness of his acknowledgment made the tribute the finer. It was stimulating to watch the effortless poise that was in all that he did or suggested. An eminent musician was a man, also, of the cultivated and polished world. "Musical circles" had not tarnished and segregated him. He might have been of any one or of all the interests that he has pursued.

The physical strain of conducting has made it nearly impossible in recent years to Mr. Saint-Saëns, and still more when he has barely recovered from the sickness that befel him on his voyage to America. His audiences here, as in the rest of the world, have known him long and familiarly as a composer. He could therefore disclose himself freshly only as a pianist, and by the pleasure of his virtuosity make return for the honors he was receiving. It is not easy to recall any other pianist who has passed his seventy-first birthday, and who may still give that pleasure after sixty years of concerts. Ten years ago last summer, fifty years after "le petit Saint-Saëns" had made his first appearance in Paris, he gave a jubilee concert there and gossip prophesied his retirement as a virtuoso. Now, he says, he is ready to fulfil the prophesy after a farewell concert in Paris, but his listeners will doubt the necessity of it as readily and summarily as Benedick doubted the necessity of peopling the earth. A dozen pianists must have played the concerto in G minor in Boston, and a few of them have left memories of it behind. More than one of them, in the flower of his strength, has excelled Mr. Saint-Saëns in power and in warmth; but none, as memory runs, has given it such aristocratic elegance and rhythmical fascination. He played it with a lucidity that seemed to lead each melody into the light and then glint the facets of it. There was an exquisite sense of form in his shaping of the tonal contours and in his outdrawing of the musical development. His rhythms were sensitively pliant and graceful. His sense of the rounded phrase and the proportioned period was of a just nicety. His ornaments sparkled. He kept many things perfectly poised. Under his fingers, the concerto purled along, never losing its aristocratic charm, its piquant fascination, its lacework filigree of tonal light and shade. It was the music of elegance played with an adroit lightness and brightness of touch and diction. Then, to the little waltzes he gave a similar iridescent grace and alluring rhythmic delicacy. Had the playing been a little tenderer, it were easy to call it Mozartean. It was of his century in the fineness of its musical feeling and in its formal and aristocratic charm. Always it was of a quality, in spite of its clear dryness, that scarcely a pianist now brings to music that invites it. Fancy our heaven-storming virtuosi content with "mere" elegance!

We that listened last night were honoring our guest. We were therefore in courtesy bound to make our just compliments as delicately as we might to his playing, and to hear his music, when he did not share in the performance of it, with sympathetic responsiveness. To pass judgment upon it the moment that the door has closed upon him were a discourtesy the worse for the hiding. Enough has been said in these columns, for many years and within a few weeks, by more practised hands and more discriminating insight, of Mr. Saint-Saëns's music. Suffice it for the moment to note the operatic glamor, the incisively imagined contrasts, the large and easy mastery of resource, the declamatory voice of the overture to "The Barbarians," and to recall the symphony in C minor as the most puissant and characteristic of Mr. Saint-Saëns's symphonies. Dedicated to the memory of Liszt, it courts the freedom of form and the upbuilding of a whole musical structure by the development, the modulation, the transformation, the almost endless evolution of a melody that Liszt sought in his concerto in A major. It accomplishes its end almost equally by tireless fertility of invention and tireless felicity of expression. At the moment when the melodic idea seems on the point of faltering, Mr. Saint-Saëns's knowledge directs it and his imagination animates it. Meanwhile he is expressing the results of both with insistent beauty and with sustained power. There are truly grandiose passages in the symphony. There are equally passages of persuasive grace and passages, like the slow section, that are charged with an unusually warm and sensuous beauty. Vague may be the musical substance, but the tonal texture is to the ear as velvet of the richest and softest to the hand. Upon the conductor and the orchestra, as the chief hosts, it was incumbent to play all this music with the keenest understanding, the warmest sympathy, and the most responsive and compelling utterance. Nowhere did they fail or even flag. They recreated the symphony—and the emotions of its beauty or its power in those that heard.

H. T. P.

[80]

...Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
DEC 1 - 1906

String, Wood Winds and Brasses.

"MADAM BUTTERFLY" finishes half its engagement at the Garden Theatre to-night. Owing to the cross-continent tour laid out by Mr. Henry W. Savage, there will be only three more weeks in which to enjoy the fascinating music and poetic atmosphere of this Puccini opera in English.

Victor Herbert and his orchestra will conclude their fall series of concerts at Lyric Theatre to-morrow night. Every number of the programme will be a composition by Mr. Herbert, and he will make one of his rare appearances as a soloist upon the 'cello. The singer will be Miss Blanche Duffield, soprano.

The first of the popular Sunday concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House tomorrow will be given with the co-operation of several operatic stars and with a most attractive programme. The stars in question will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, the young American soprano, who made such a remarkable impression on the occasion of her debut on Monday; Mme. Louise Homer, the favorite contralto; Mr. Carl Burrian, the famous tenor of the Dresden Opera House, and Mr. Steiner.

No better proof can be found of the profound impression which Pierne's "Children's Crusade" has made in Germany than the fact that several German cities are bringing it out this year and that twenty have put on their programme for next year. This is a rare tribute to a modern French composer. The first German performance was given in Augsburg in April this year. Musical conductors and critics attended from all parts of Germany.

The enthusiasm of the audience was reflected in the comments of the German press. One of the leading musical journals of Leipzig declared that the work was one of the most important in the field of modern oratorio music, and welcomed its advent in Germany. The comments from Munich, Nuremberg, Stuttgart, Frankfort and Augsburg were unanimous in according the highest merit to the work.

The Oratorio Society of New York will bring out the work at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, December 4. The society's chorus of three hundred will be augmented by a chorus of two hundred children from the public schools of New York, carefully chosen and thoroughly drilled. Add the New York Symphony orchestra and Frank Damrosch will have under his bato[illegible]

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 6, and Saturday afternoon, December 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E flat, No. 7. This work has had so few performances that it comes practically as a novelty. It is the Seventh Symphony, which finally gave Bruckner, after long years of waiting, recognition as one of the great composers of his time.

It will be particularly interesting to hear Dr. Muck's interpretation of it because he is not only an admirer of Bruckner and his music, but he gave the first performance of this symphony in Austria, while he was conductor of the Styrian Society in Graz in 1886, and in Berlin in 1894 at one of the royal concerts.

The symphony for Saturday evening is Glazounoff's No. 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society under Anton Seidl, in the spring of 1898, and it has since been performed in one of the concerts of the Russian Orchestra.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Moriz Rosenthal, and on Saturday afternoon Timothée Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra.

Recitals for [illegible] Jones, c[illegible]day evening; Simon Buchhalter, pianist, Mendelssohn Hall, Wednesday evening; Leandro Campanari, violinist, at Mendelssohn Hall, on Thursday afternoon; Francis MacMillan, violinist, at Carnegie Hall, on Friday evening, assisted by the New York Symphony.

TIMES.
[illegible], N. Y.
ess
DEC - 1

...EW YORK EV'G POST
ess
DEC - 1 190

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Brooklyn programme for next Friday includes R. Strauss's "Don Juan," Beethoven's violin concerto, and Glazounoff's fifth symphony.

...blished: London, 1881; New [illegible]

NEW YORK
ss
DEC 1 - 1906

Next week brings the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie hall. The soloist at the first will be Moriz Rosenthal, who will play Liszt's piano concerto in E flat major. On Saturday afternoon Timothee Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin in F sharp minor by Gustav Strube. Mr. Strube is one of the first violins of the orchestra, who has already won reputation as a composer.

The symphonies for the two concerts are both unfamiliar. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's No. [illegible] in E flat major. This is the work that [illegible] for the Austrian composer his recognition as a considerable figure in modern music. Under Dr. Karl Muck, the Boston orchestra's new conductor, this symphony had its first performance in Austria, in Graz, in 1886. Dr. Muck was also the first to give the symphony in Berlin, in 1894.

The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be Glazounoff's fifth, a brilliant work, full of Russian feeling. It was first played in New York in 1898 by the Philharmonic orchestra under Anton Seidl.

The two programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

[illegible] "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
[illegible] in E flat major for pianoforte, No. 1, Liszt
Symphony in E flat major, No. 7.....Bruckner

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

[illegible]ture to "The Betrothed of the Czar," Rimsky-Korsakoff
[illegible] in F sharp minor, for violin and or[illegible].....Strube
[illegible].....Glabounoff

On Friday evening will come the second

WILLY HESS.
Soloist at Boston Orchestra Concert.

concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, who will play Beethoven's Concerto in D Major for the violin. In order to keep his programme within [illegible] of a reasonable endurance Dr. Muck has confined the rest of it to two numbers. The first will be Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Juan," which is probably, from the popular point of view at least, the finest work this extraordinary composer has ever written. Dr. Muck conducts it con amore, for having been for several years past a colleague of Richad Strauss in the Berlin opera, he is particularly well fitted to follow the composer's wishes in the music. The final number will be Glazounoff's coldly flandy barbaric fifth symphony, a work which, while not so well known in America as the fourth and the sixth, is regarded by connoisseurs as being the most Russian of modern Russian music. It is a whirl of great technical difficulties and demands a virtuoso band, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is.

NEW YORK EV'G POST
ess

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concert next Thursday evening Bruckner's seventh symphony will be played, preceded by Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, and the first Liszt concerto to be played by Mr. Rosenthal. At the Saturday afternoon concert two Russian works will be played—Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar" and Glazounoff's fifth symphony. The soloist is to be Mr. Timothée Adamowsky, who will play a violin concerto by Mr. [illegible] of the Boston Orchestra.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT. DEC

A SYMPHONY BY BRUCKNER

A CURIOUS EXPERIENCE AT YESTERDAY'S CONCERT

The Exceptional Mood of the Audience—The Music as It Is, and the Circumstances of Bruckner's Career and His Traits Have Transfigured It—The Concerts of the New Week and the New Month—Musical News

For an hour and ten minutes yesterday afternoon, the audience at the Symphony concert listened to Bruckner's seventh symphony, first with signs of restlessness, then with obvious tokens of weary indifference. Dr. Muck had shifted the symphony from the end to the head of the programme, and there was no escape if the listeners would have their Rosenthal, Liszt and Beethoven that were to come. The long, first movement palpably failed to warm their interest. The second fell like a pall. So far there had been only restlessness and, after either movement, a few faint and scattered handclaps. For the rest of the symphony, there was plain boredom. The house rustled incessantly; there was the buzz of low whispers; the programme book, from the first to the last page became comfort and diversion; the general atmosphere of the hall was somnolent; the house looked what it felt. Audiences at the Symphony concerts show each week more or less liking for the several numbers of a programme. It must be long since they have shown such frank indifference toward any music and such utter weariness of it as they showed yesterday with Bruckner's symphony.

Bruckner still has his champions even here in Boston, though his own Vienna is four thousand miles away, and the battles between his partisans and those of Brahms seem only a little less historical than those of the followers of Gluck and Piccini in the Paris of Louis XVI. These local champions will shrug their shoulders, lift their brows and say, "It was only a Friday-afternoon audience." Perhaps Bruckner will fare better tonight, but, after all, is there such a great gulf fixed between the musical understanding and appreciation of the two audiences? Often it is hard to detect it in their general attitude toward any particular number of a given programme. Moreover, was the audience yesterday, whatever its musical quality, much to blame for its disposition toward Bruckner's symphony? Musical information is a good and usually an interesting thing—even a continuous hour and ten minutes of it. Some of us must have it of necessity, others of us think they ought to have it; others still count it as a personal and convenient adornment of their walk and conversation. Information there certainly was in Bruckner's symphony—information of many kinds. But the imparting of knowledge of the music that has been written is not the sole or even the main purpose of symphony concerts. Their first and their chief end is to give pleasure—æsthetic pleasure indeed, the pleasure of beauty, fancy, power and skill appealing through tones to the ear, the imagination and the emotions, a very high and fine sort of pleasure truly, but pleasure none the less. From Bach to Mahler and Reger that pleasure has taken many forms and will take many more, but whatever its guise and shape, pleasure it remains. Did Bruckner's music give that pleasure; and if it failed to do so, was not the audience justified in its indifference to it?

Suppositious cases are notoriously futile in argument; but suppose, for example, that one Anton Bruckner, otherwise unknown, had dispatched to Dr. Muck a small bale of manuscript containing a symphony in E-major numbered seven. It is not suppositious to say that the conductor would have examined it with the utmost care, understanding and sympathy. If it seemed to him interesting in itself and likely to stir the interest of his hearers, its length was a trifle. No one complains of the dimensions of some symphonies that are as long; in the intrinsic interest of them such a detail vanishes. Because the music of this unknown Bruckner raised many and singularly uncouth difficulties of performance was equally trifling. It is the business of a conductor and an orchestra to conquer them. But when he discovered—to take only the shortcomings of the music that Bruckner's partisans admit—its lack of any large plan and unity; its loose and clumsy architecture in mass and detail; its page upon page of pedantic trivialities elaborated with endless pains while the music as a whole flags and gropes; the essentially episodic quality of much that it contains, its recurring awkwardness, banality and emptiness—when he considered these things might he not presumably have hesitated over performance of the music. He would feel as many listeners felt yesterday the beauty and the significance of Bruckner's melodies, the imagination that plays intermittently in the development of them, the individuality and poignancy of some of his instrumental combinations, the curiously passionless and detached imagination that lay behind. Would these qualities have offset in this suppositious case all the shortcomings of this seventh symphony by this unknown Bruckner, and brought it to performance? Dr. Muck is eminently objective; he has been steadily apt thus far in the taking of the music that he plays for exactly what it is. The more reason, therefore, for suspecting that this symphony of the imaginary and unknown Bruckner would have been baled up again and returned?

There is no imaginary or unknown Bruckner. There is rather a Bruckner whose music the circumstances of his career and the traits of his life have glorified and transfigured out of its real semblance. Piccini survives because he and Gluck in Marie Antoinette's Paris pursued an operatic duel in which partisans of the one and the other eagerly and bitterly took sides. The Opéra is preparing to revive one of his pieces this winter as a historico-musical curiosity, as a survival of a famous musical quarrel. Meanwhile, Gluck's [illegible] live of the [illegible]lves. In a [illegible]ucknor may [illegible] [illegible]er than Piccini [illegible] operatically—in [illegible]ilar way Bruckner and his music ag[illegible]n a later musical warfare that be[illegible]t the champions of Brahms and Wagner [illegible] the Vienna of the seventies and the eighties. The partisans of Wagner and the decriers of Brahms chose to thrust forward Bruckner's symphonies as their exemplar in absolute music, and storms of controversy beat upon them. Living, he suffered cruelly under the conflict. Now that he is dead, that contest is presumed to give his music interest and importance. It has made for it in some quarters something very like a cult. The quarrel over Brahms and Bruckner has become the symphonic parallel to the operatic quarrel over Gluck and Piccini. We must hear the other part, boredom of no boredom, and we must feel as men in Austria and Germany, where they still take new music with intense partisanship, felt in the bitter controversies of a quarter of a century ago. Who does, who can? There are no such warming heats for us of Boston in 1906 when we listen to Bruckner's music. We hear it in its coldness and its baldness.

Bruckner lived a life that began in poverty; that continued long in struggle; that was tortured first by the neglect of his symphonies and then by the fierce controversies over them and him; almost to the end of it he knew little happiness. He was singularly simple-minded, pure of heart, detached from the world, absorbed in his music and the visions he was fain to make it impart. He was a good man—good to what Vienna thought queerness. Often he was a piteous figure; almost always in that Vienna of the seventies and eighties he was pathetically incongruous. But what after all have these circumstances, moving as they may be, to do with the qualities or the impression of his music. We do not try Beethoven's music by the circumstances of his life. Do those of Bruckner's give his its moments of noble thought and utterance, of poignant beauty, of almost unearthly exaltation of mood? Or do they give its wastes of barren and empty pedantry, of passionless monotony, of broken and futile groping? They give neither the virtues nor the shortcomings, but they glamor both. Simple-mindedness is not the way to the achievement of so intricate a thing as a modern symphony, nor does it invite the puissant utterance of the modern orchestra. Purity of heart is truly a blessing, but it is not the way to the passion and the power that we ask of modern music, unless it be itself a passion of purity and Bruckner was, and his music remains passionless. Of Mr. Rosenthal and of Liszt and Beethoven, it will be time to write on Monday.

H. T. P.

EAGLE
[illegible]ium, N
DEC - 1 1906

That Paderewski is not coming to America this winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony Concerts, as was announced last fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him.

[illegible] Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n
ress
[illegible]a, N. Y.
DEC - 1

Paderewski is not coming to America this winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last fall, for the reason that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. Last summer, when Mrs. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw Mr. Paderewski at his home in Morges, Switzerland, the symphony was finished with the exception of the instrumentation of the last movement. In doing this work Paderewski discovered that he would have to make a great many changes. He sent word to Mr. Ellis that to hear the symphony produced for the first time by the greatest orchestra in the world was his great ambition, and if he came to America without it he would have absolutely no heart in his concerts and could not possibly do himself justice. It is now settled that Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the season of 1907-8 the great pianist will give about 100 concerts in this country under the management of C. A. Ellis, of Boston.

[81]

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM

DE

String, Wood Winds and Brasses.

"MADAM BUTTERFLY" finishes half its engagement at the Garden Theatre to-night. Owing to the cross-continent tour laid out by Mr. Henry W. Savage, there will be only three more weeks in which to enjoy the fascinating music and poetic atmosphere of this Puccini opera in English.

Victor Herbert and his orchestra will conclude their fall series of concerts at Daly's Theatre to-morrow night. Every number of the programme will be a composition by Mr. Herbert, and he will make one of his rare appearances as a soloist upon the 'cello. The singer will be Miss Blanche Duffield, soprano.

The first of the popular Sunday concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House tomorrow will be given with the co-operation of several operatic stars and with a most attractive programme. The stars in question will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, the young American soprano, who made such a remarkable impression on the occasion of her debut on Monday; Mme. Louise Homer, the favorite contralto; Mr. Carl Burrian, the famous tenor of the Dresden Opera House, and Mr. Steiner.

No better proof can be found of the profound impression which Pierne's "Children's Crusade" has made in Germany than the fact that several German cities are bringing it out this year and that twenty have put on their programme for next year. This is a rare tribute to a modern French composer. The first German performance was given in Augsburg in April this year. Musical conductors and critics attended from all parts of Germany.

The enthusiasm of the audience was reflected in the comments of the German press. One of the leading musical journals of Leipzig declared that the work was one of the most important in the field of modern oratorio music, and welcomed its advent in Germany. The comments from Munich, Nuremberg, Stuttgart, Frankfort and Augsburg were unanimous in according the highest merit to the work.

The Oratorio Society of New York will bring out the work at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, December 4. The society's chorus of three hundred will be augmented by a chorus of two hundred children from the public schools of New York, carefully chosen and thoroughly drilled. Add the New York Symphony orchestra and Frank Damrosch will have under his baton some [redacted]

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 6, and Saturday afternoon, December 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E flat, No. 7. This work has had so few performances that it comes practically as a novelty. It is the Seventh Symphony, which finally gave Bruckner, after long years of waiting, recognition as one of the great composers of his time.

It will be particularly interesting to hear Dr. Muck's interpretation of it because he is not only an admirer of Bruckner and his music, but he gave the first performance of this symphony in Austria, while he was conductor of the Styrian Society in Graz in 1886, and in Berlin in 1894 at one of the royal concerts.

The symphony for Saturday evening is Glazounoff's No. 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society under Anton Seidl, in the spring of 1898, and it has since been performed in one of the concerts of the Russian Orchestra.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Moriz Rosenthal, and on Saturday afternoon Timothée Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra.

Recitals for the [redacted] Jones, contralto, at Mendelssohn Hall, Tuesday evening; Simon Buchhalter, pianist, Mendelssohn Hall, Wednesday evening; Leandro Campanari, violinist, at Mendelssohn Hall, on Thursday afternoon; Francis MacMillan, violinist, at Carnegie Hall, on Friday evening, assisted by the New York Symphony.

ess

ess

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Brooklyn programme for next Friday includes R. Strauss's "Don Juan," Beethoven's violin concerto, and Glazounoff's fifth symphony.

blished: London, 1881; Ive[redacted]

ss

Next week brings the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie hall. The soloist at the first will be Moriz Rosenthal, who will play Liszt's piano concerto in E flat major. On Saturday afternoon Timothee Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin in F sharp minor by Gustav Strube. Mr. Strube is one of the first violins of the orchestra, who has already won reputation as a composer.

The symphonies for the two concerts are both unfamiliar. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's No. 7, in E flat major. This is the work that won for the Austrian composer his recognition as a considerable figure in modern music. Under Dr. Karl Muck, the Boston orchestra's new conductor, this symphony had its first performance in Austria, in Graz, in 1886. Dr. Muck was also the first to give the symphony in Berlin, in 1894.

The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be Glazounoff's fifth, a brilliant work, full of Russian feeling. It was first played in New York in 1898 by the Philharmonic orchestra under Anton Seidl.

The two programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

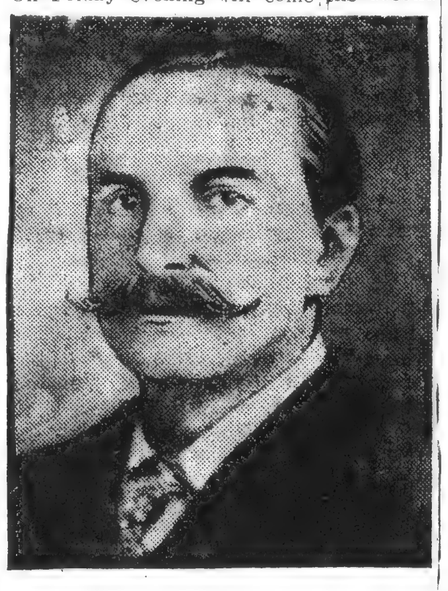
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Concerto in E flat major for pianoforte, No. 1, Liszt
Symphony in E flat major, No. 7.....Bruckner

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F sharp minor, for violin and orchestra.....Strube
Symphony No. 5.....Glabounoff

ess

On Friday evening will come the second



WILLY HESS.
Soloist at Boston Orchestra Concert.

concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, who will play Beethoven's Concerto in D Major for the violin. In order to keep his programme within the limits of a reasonable endurance. Dr. Muck has confined the rest of it to two numbers. The first will be Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Juan," which is probably, from the popular point of view at least, the finest work this extraordinary composer has ever written. Dr. Muck conducts it con amore, for having been for several years past a colleague of Richad Strauss in the Berlin opera, he is particularly well fitted to follow the composer's wishes in the music. The final number will be Glazounoff's brilliantly barbaric fifth symphony, a work which, while not so well known in America as the fourth and the sixth, is regarded by connoisseurs as being the most Russian of modern Russian music. It is a whirl of great technical difficulties and demands a virtuoso band, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is.

ess

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concert next Thursday evening Bruckner's seventh symphony will be played, preceded by Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, and the first Liszt concerto to be played by Mr. Rosenthal. At the Saturday afternoon concert two Russian works will be played—Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar" and Glazounoff's fifth symphony. The soloist is to be Mr. Timothée Adamowsky, who will play a violin concerto by Mr. Strube, a member of the Boston Orchestra.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 1, 1906

A SYMPHONY BY BRUCKNER

A CURIOUS EXPERIENCE AT YESTERDAY'S CONCERT

The Exceptional Mood of the Audience—The Music as It Is, and the Music as the Circumstances of Bruckner's Career and His Traits Have Transfigured It—The Concerts of the New Week and the New Month—Musical News

For an hour and ten minutes yesterday afternoon, the audience at the Symphony concert listened to Bruckner's seventh symphony, first with signs of restlessness, then with obvious tokens of weary indifference. Dr. Muck had shifted the symphony from the end to the head of the programme, and there was no escape if the listeners would have their Rosenthal, Liszt and Beethoven that were to come. The long, first movement palpably failed to warm their interest. The second fell like a pall. So far there had been only restlessness and, after either movement, a few faint and scattered handclaps. For the rest of the symphony, there was plain boredom. The house rustled incessantly; there was the buzz of low whispers; the programme book, from the first to the last page became comfort and diversion; the general atmosphere of the hall was somnolent; the house looked what it felt. Audiences at the Symphony concerts show each week more or less liking for the several numbers of a programme. It must be long since they have shown such frank indifference toward any music and such utter weariness of it as they showed yesterday with Bruckner's symphony.

Bruckner still has his champions even here in Boston, though his own Vienna is four thousand miles away, and the battles between his partisans and those of Brahms seem only a little less historical than those of the followers of Gluck and Piccini in the Paris of Louis XVI. These local champions will shrug their shoulders, lift their brows and say, "It was only a Friday-afternoon audience." Perhaps Bruckner will fare better tonight, but, after all, is there such a great gulf fixed between the musical understanding and appreciation of the two audiences? Often it is hard to detect it in their general attitude toward any particular number of a given programme. Moreover, was the audience yesterday, whatever its musical quality, much to blame for its disposition toward Bruckner's symphony? Musical information is a good and usually an interesting thing—even a continuous hour and ten minutes of it. Some of us must have it of necessity, others of us think they ought to have it; others still count it as a personal and convenient adornment of their walk and conversation. Information there certainly was in Bruckner's symphony—information of many kinds. But the imparting of knowledge of the music that has been written is not the sole or even the main purpose of symphony concerts. Their first and their chief end is to give pleasure—æsthetic pleasure indeed, the pleasure of beauty, fancy, power and skill appealing through tones to the ear, the imagination and the emotions, a very high and fine sort of pleasure truly, but pleasure none the less. From Bach to Mahler and Reger that pleasure has taken many forms and will take many more, but whatever its guise and shape, pleasure it remains. Did Bruckner's music give that pleasure; and if it failed to do so, was not the audience justified in its indifference to it?

Supposititious cases are notoriously futile in argument; but suppose, for example, that one Anton Bruckner, otherwise unknown, had dispatched to Dr. Muck a small bale of manuscript containing a symphony in E-major numbered seven. It is not supposititious to say that the conductor would have examined it with the utmost care, understanding and sympathy. If it seemed to him interesting in itself and likely to stir the interest of his hearers, its length was a trifle. No one complains of the dimensions of some symphonies that are as long; in the intrinsic interest of them such a detail vanishes. Because the music of this unknown Bruckner raised many and singularly uncouth difficulties of performance was equally trifling. It is the business of a conductor and an orchestra to conquer them. But when he discovered—to take only the shortcomings of the music that Bruckner's partisans admit—its lack of any large plan and unity; its loose and clumsy architecture in mass and detail; its page upon page of pedantic trivialities elaborated with endless pains while the music as a whole flags and gropes; the essentially episodic quality of much that it contains, its recurring awkwardness, banality and emptiness—when he considered these things might he not presumably have hesitated over performance of the music. He would feel as many listeners felt yesterday the beauty and the significance of Bruckner's melodies, the imagination that plays intermittently in the development of them, the individuality and poignancy of some of his instrumental combinations, the curiously passionless and detached imagination that lay behind. Would these qualities have offset in this supposititious case all the shortcomings of this seventh symphony by this unknown Bruckner, and brought it to performance? Dr. Muck is eminently objective; he has been steadily apt thus far in the taking of the music that he plays for exactly what it is. The more reason, therefore, for suspecting that this symphony of the imaginary and unknown Bruckner would have been baled up again and returned?

There is no imaginary or unknown Bruckner. There is rather a Bruckner whose music the circumstances of his career and the traits of his life have glorified and transfigured out of its real semblance. Piccini survives because he and Gluck in Marie Antoinette's Paris pursued an operatic duel in which partisans of the one and the other eagerly and bitterly took sides. The Opera is preparing to revive one of his pieces this winter as a historico-musical curiosity, as a survival of a famous musical quarrel. Meanwhile, Gluck's operas live as of themselves. In a somewhat similar way, though Bruckner may rank among symphonists far higher than Piccini among operamakers—in a similar way Bruckner and his music fight in a later musical warfare that between the champions of Brahms and Wagner in the Vienna of the seventies and the eighties. The partisans of Wagner and the deniers of Brahms chose to thrust forward Bruckner's symphonies as their exemplar in absolute music, and storms of controversy beat upon them. Living, he suffered cruelly under the conflict. Now that he is dead, that contest is presumed to give his music interest and importance. It has made for it in some quarters something very like a cult. The quarrel over Brahms and Bruckner has become the symphonic parallel to the operatic quarrel over Gluck and Piccini. We must hear the other part, boredom or no boredom, and we must feel as men in Austria and Germany, where they still take new music with intense partisanship, felt in the bitter controversies of a quarter of a century ago. Who does, who can? There are no such warming heats for us of Boston in 1906 when we listen to Bruckner's music. We hear it in its coldness and its baldness.

Bruckner lived a life that began in poverty; that continued long in struggle; that was tortured first by the neglect of his symphonies and then by the fierce controversies over them and him; almost to the end of it he knew little happiness. He was singularly simple-minded, pure of heart, detached from the world, absorbed in his music and the visions he was fain to make it impart. He was a good man—good to what Vienna thought queerness. Often he was a piteous figure; almost always in that Vienna of the seventies and eighties he was pathetically incongruous. But what after all have these circumstances, moving as they may be, to do with the qualities or the impression of his music. We do not try Beethoven's music by the circumstances of his life. Do those of Bruckner's give his its moments of noble thought and utterance, of poignant beauty, of almost unearthly exaltation of mood? Or do they give its wastes of barren and empty pedantry, of passionless monotony, of broken and futile groping? They give neither the virtues nor the shortcomings, but they glamor both. Simple-mindedness is not the way to the achievement of so intricate a thing as a modern symphony, nor does it invite the puissant utterance of the modern orchestra. Purity of heart is truly a blessing, but it is not the way to the passion and the power that we ask of modern music, unless it be itself a passion of purity and Bruckner was, and his music remains passionless. Of Mr. Rosenthal and of Liszt and Beethoven, it will be time to write on Monday.

H. T. P.

/ / + / /

ess

That Paderewski is not coming to America this winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony Concerts, as was announced last fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n

ress

e

Paderewski is not coming to America this winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last fall, for the reason that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. Last summer, when Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw Mr. Paderewski at his home in Morges, Switzerland, the symphony was finished with the exception of the instrumentation of the last movement. In doing this work Paderewski discovered that he would have to make a great many changes. He sent word to Mr. Ellis that to hear the symphony produced for the first time by the greatest orchestra in the world was his great ambition, and if he came to America without it he would have absolutely no heart in his concerts and could not possibly do himself justice. It is now settled that Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the season of 1907-8 the great pianist will give about 100 concerts in this country under the management of C. A. Ellis, of Boston.

[81]

...n, N. Y
DEC - 1 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come here for its second concert this season on Friday evening, playing at the Baptist Temple (Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society), and having Prof. Willy Hess, its concert-master for soloist instead of Mme. Samaroff, the pianist. Prof. Hess will play with the orchestra the Beethoven Concerto in D major, Op. 61, which has three movements. Last season he played the "Largo" at one of the Symphony concerts and won all hearers by the breadth of his conception and the beauty of his playing. He is an artist of the highest rank and one of the great living masters of the violin. The symphony, by Glazounoff, will be played for the first time. It is his B flat major, No. 5, Op. 55. The Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after Lenau), Op. 20, by Richard Strauss, will open the programme, and thus it will be seen that director Dr. Karl Muck has joined numbers of varied interest in a harmonious whole. The list in order is:

Tone poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), op. 20 ..... Richard Strauss
Concerto in D major for violin, op 61.... Beethoven
Symphony in B flat major, No. 5, op 55:.. Glazounoff
(First time.)

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. TRIBUNE
From
Address
Date DEC 2 1906

This week brings the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, the first one being on next Thursday evening, December 6, and the second one on next Saturday afternoon, December 8, in Carnegie Hall. The soloists at the first concert will be Moris Rosenthal, who will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major, No. 1, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Timothée Adamowski, who will play a new concerto for violin in F sharp minor, by Gustav Strube. Mr. Strube, as is generally known in New York, is one of the first violins of the orchestra, who has already won reputation as a composer. This concerto was finished a year ago, and was played in Boston and Philadelphia.

On Thursday evening the symphony will be Brückner's No. 7, in E flat major. This is the work that won for the Austrian composer his tardy recognition. Its performance should be particularly interesting, because Dr. Muck knows personally the wishes of the composer. Under Dr. Muck the symphony had its first performance in Austria, in Graz, in 1886. The composer was present at the rehearsal and at the first concert. Dr. Muck was also the first to give this symphony in Berlin, at one of the royal concerts in 1894. The work may be counted as a novelty here. It was played in Boston once in the winter of 1886-'87 under Mr. Gericke.

The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be Glazounoff's Fifth. It was first played in New York in the spring of 1898 by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Anton Seidl, and has since appeared on the programmes of the Russian Society. The two programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 6.

Overture, "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven
Concerto in E flat major for pianoforte, No. 1.....Liszt
Symphony in E flat major, No. 7.....Bruckner

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 8.

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F sharp minor for violin and orchestra.Strube
Symphony No. 5.....Glazounoff

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK WORLD
ss DEC 2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, will give a concert at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night when it will perform Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 Overture. The soloist will be Rosenthal, who will play Liszt's First Concerto.

On Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar." Adamowski will be the soloist, playing a violin concerto by Gustav Strube, a member of this orchestra.

* * *

NEW YORK TIMES
ss DEC 2 1906

That Paderewski is not coming to America this Winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last Fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. Last Summer, when Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw Mr. Paderewski at his home, in Morges, Switzerland, the symphony was finished with the exception of the instrumentation of the last movement. In doing this work Mr. Paderewski discovered that he would have to make a great many changes. It is now settled that Mr. Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the season of 1907-8 the great pianist will give about one hundred concerts in this country under the management of Mr. C. A. ... of Boston.

N. Y. ...
DEC 2 - 1906

Musical Notes.

THE coming week offers music lovers an unusually brilliant and varied series of entertainments. Three foreign soloists who have been attracting much favorable comment abroad by their work make their American debut in New York during the week, and the two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will serve to make the series of musical entertainments the more notable.

The first Boston Symphony concert will be given next Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. The sympony will be Bruckner's No. 7, in E flat major. This is the work which won for the Austrian composer the tardy recognition of his countrymen and the critics of the Continent. Under Dr. Muck the symphony should be particularly interesting, as it was under him that it had its first performance in Vienna. Other features of the Thursday evening programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Lenore No. 3," and the concerto in E flat major by Liszt. The second concert will be given Saturday afternoon. The symphony is to be Glazounoff's Fifth. It was first played in New York in the Spring of 1898 by the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Anton Seidl.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEW YORK PRESS
Address
Date DEC 2 1906

This week brings the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, on Thursday evening, Dec. 6, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 8, in Carnegie Hall. The soloist at the first concert will be Moriz Rosenthal, who will play Liszt's concerto in E-flat major, No. 1; at the second Timothee Adamowski, who will play a new concerto for violin in F sharp minor, by Gustav Strube, is one of the first violins of the orchestra, and has won recognition as a composer. Under the generous policy of Higginson, which is to encourage the men of the orchestra to write, important additions to the literature of music have been added to the world's store, not least among them being the compositions of Charles Martin Loeffler.

The symphonies played at both concerts should arouse much interest, for both are unfamiliar. Bruckner's symphony in E-flat major, which will be heard on Thursday, will be practically new to New Yorkers, as it has not been heard here in many years. Its last performance in Boston before last week took place in the winter of 1886-87 under Gericke. The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be Glazounoff's Fifth, a brilliant work full of Russian feeling. It was played first in New York in the spring of 1898 by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Seidl, and has appeared since on the programmes of the Russian Society. Here are the two programmes in full: Thursday evening, Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3; Liszt's piano concerto in E-flat major, and Bruckner's symphony in E-flat major, No. 7. Saturday afternoon, Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar," Strube's violin concerto in F-sharp minor, and Glazounoff's Symphony No. 5.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK TIMES.
ss DEC 2 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

This week brings the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, the first one being on next Thursday evening, Dec. 6, and the second one on next Saturday afternoon, Dec. 8, in Carnegie Hall. The soloist at the first concert will be Moriz Rosenthal, who will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major, No. 1, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Timothée Adamowski, who will play a new concerto for violin in F sharp minor by Gustav Strube. Mr. Strube is one of the first violins of the orchestra who has already won reputation as a composer.

The symphonies for the two concerts are unfamiliar. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's No. 7, in E flat major. This is the work that won for the Austrian composer his tardy recognition as one of the great figures in modern music. Its performance should be particularly interesting because under Dr. Muck the symphony had its first performance in Austria, in Graz, in 1886. The composer was present at the rehearsal and at the first concert. Dr. Muck was also the first to give this symphony in Berlin at one of the royal concerts in 1894.

It was played in Boston once in the Winter of 1886-7, under Mr. Gericke. The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be Glazounoff's Fifth, a brilliant work, full of Russian feeling. It was first played in New York in the Spring of 1898 by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Anton Seidl, and has since appeared on the programmes of the Russian Society. The two programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Concerto in E flat major for pianoforte, No. 1.....Liszt
Symphony in E flat major, No. 7.....Bruckner

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F sharp minor for violin and orchestra.....Strube
Symphony No. 5.....Glazounoff

MUSICAL MATTERS

Rosenthal Plays With Symphony Orchestra.

Tucker's Sunday Concerts Begin Today in Chickering Hall.

Coming Recitals by Gadski, Eames and Others.

The celebrated pianist, Moriz Rosenthal, was the soloist of the seventh Symphony program, making his first appearance here after an absence of about eight years. He played Liszt's E-flat major concerto. The other numbers were Bruckner's E major symphony and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. The wonder-pianist, in selecting the Liszt concerto, had opportunity not only to show his technical skill in dazzling colors, but also to charm by a poetic exploitation of the familiar number, in which the tonal beauty of his work was of a quality that made a potent appeal to one's imagination. It was not by the tremendous power shown at times that he gained the greatest appreciation, but by the marvelous octave runs, trills long sustained, and exquisite arabesques at lightning speed which he fairly showered upon the concerto.

The dynamic contrasts were clearly set forth, the fleetness of his fingers did not cloud the beautiful quality and clearness of his tones and all his arpeggios and runs were smooth and even. And allied to the air of authority in musical utterance Rosenthal's demeanor is as modest as can be imagined, and with but the slightest suggestion of enthusiasm. The latter his audience supplied in abundance, recalling him several times to the platform.

The orchestral accompaniment was of the highest order, Liszt proving no more difficult to Dr Muck's forces than did Bruckner, whose symphony came first. This massive work takes more than one hour in performance, and is generally austere in style, strongly suggestive of Wagner's influence in some of its fortissimo modulations and filled with complex instrumentation.

Much originality in treatment is shown in the adagio, the solemnity of the themes being preserved skilfully in each band choir, the crescendos in particular calling for special praise on account of the clear management of the instrumental combinations. The scherzo is peculiar, being rather heavy in effect, though there are some light spots in it. There is much that is tempestuous in the finale. The interpretation was satisfactory, of course, but the work was rather too ponderous and severe in character to arouse much interest. The "Leonore" overture was delightfully played.

The orchestra will be away this week

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK SUN
ss DEC 2 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second pair of concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. The programme for the evening entertainment will consist of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Liszt's E flat piano concerto, with Moriz Rosenthal as the soloist, and Bruckner's E flat symphony No. 7. On Saturday afternoon the list will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar," Gustav Strube's violin concerto in F sharp minor, and Glazounoff's fifth symphony.

NEW YORK DAILY NEWS
ess DEC - 2 1906

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, December 6th and Saturday afternoon, December 8th. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's, in E flat major, No 7. The symphony for Saturday evening is Glazounoff's, No 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society, under Anton Seidl, in the Spring of 1898. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Moriz Rosenthal, and on Saturday afternoon, Timothee Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the violinists of the orchestra.

ROSENTHAL, PIANIST, AT SYMPHONY.

Plays Liszt's Concerto in E Flat Major Brilliantly, but with Self-Consciousness and Too Little Feeling

By Kent Perkins.

It was an Austrian night to a certain degree at the seventh Symphony concert of the season last evening, for the symphony was No. 7 in E major by Anton Bruckner, who was born in a little Austrian village and lived and died in Vienna; the soloist was Moritz Rosenthal, the famous Austrian pianist, who played Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major No. 1, and the final piece on the program was the No. 3 overture to "Leonore" by Beethoven, who was so largely identified with the Austrian capital and died there.

But the music was not Austrian, as we speak of Russian, Swedish or Hungarian compositions. It was glorified melody, crystalized harmony—music written by great masters for all time and for all countries, and as if with that loftier ideal in view it was voiced by the Symphony players under Dr. Muck's inspiring leadership.

Symphony a Novelty.

The Bruckner Symphony had not been heard in Boston for so many years that it was a new production to most of last night's audience. Written by a man born of a peasant family of school teachers, reared in villages with one church each, Catholic ones, in whose schools he learned little save music, himself a school master who is reputed to have had a romance in his long life of poverty and struggle, this symphony possesses a depth and sweep and power of emotion that are extraordinary.

It was written towards the close of his life, to be sure, and after Bruckner had been long an ardent admirer of Wagner, but there are no patent Wagnerisms in its clear, straight messages to the heart. Its most striking characteristics, besides its emotional power, are its clarity and beauty of melody and harmony. It is the expression of a simple peasant's feeling, of the heart of a man who knew little and cared less of science or art or sociology or the intrigues of the courts of kings, perhaps, but it is the outpouring of a soul in tune with the infinite and of a master who knew music to the core, even if he had little other knowledge.

Born of a Sensitive Nature.

It is the voice of a sensitive and refined nature. It suggests and is capable of no programme explanation. It might have been inspired by a landscape in which there is one small village with one church spire and a background of hills, but in that church there is worship and an organ and in that village there is the life of the world.

It's most appealing movement, the second, an adagio that has been foolishly called a prophetic dirge for Wagner, who died many months after it was written, is solemn, but its solemnity is uplifting and not funereal. Its sadness is mellowed with hope; it is not crushed with despair. It is the sort of panorama of melancholy that one feels when night creeps over the hills, its coming terrors softened by a glorious sunset. It is like the "tears, idle tears, that rise in the heart and gather in the eyes while gazing on the happy Autumn fields and thinking of the days that are no more."

The orchestra and Dr. Muck gave to the Symphony their best art. The audience received it quietly.

Rosenthal's playing of the Liszt concerto was received in uproarious fashion. His brilliant, dashing rendering of the piece, particularly the care-free nonchalance with which he romped over the keyboard in the closing presto, were well calculated to rouse enthusiasm, and they did. "Behold what a marvelous feat I am performing and how easily I do it!" He suggests too much the smirk of the daring circus performer and too little of the artist who is striving only to carry a message to his hearers.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
ess DEC - 2 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Carl Muck, give two concerts this week at Carnegie Hall, one on Thursday, December 6, and the other on Saturday, December 8. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 6.

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Concerto in E-flat major for Pianoforte, No. 1..Liszt
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 7.....Bruckner

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 8.

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F-sharp minor, for Violin and Orchestra.....Strube
Symphony No. 5.....Glazounoff

NEW YORK HERALD
ess DEC 2 1906

Two concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall this week, one on next Thursday evening, the other on Saturday afternoon. Mr. Moritz Rosenthal will be the soloist at the first concert and will play the Liszt E flat Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, the programme prepared by Dr. Carl Muck including also Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3.

On Saturday afternoon the all-Russian programme consists of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture "The Betrothed of the Tsar," Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, and Strube's C sharp major Violin Concerto, [illegible] the last [illegible]

[82]

...n, N. Y.
DEC - 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come here for its second concert this season on Friday evening, playing at the Baptist Temple (Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society), and having Prof. Willy Hess, its concert-master for soloist instead of Mme. Samaroff, the pianist. Prof. Hess will play with the orchestra the Beethoven Concerto in D major, Op. 61, which has three movements. Last season he played the "Largo" at one of the Symphony concerts and won all hearers by the breadth of his conception and the beauty of his playing. He is an artist of the highest rank and one of the great living masters of the violin. The symphony, by Glazounoff, will be played for the first time. It is his B flat major, No. 5, Op. 55. The Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after Lenau), Op. 20, by Richard Strauss, will open the programme, and thus it will be seen that director Dr. Karl Muck has joined numbers of varied interest in a harmonious whole. The list in order is:

Tone poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), op. 20 ..... Richard Strauss
Concerto in D major for violin, op 61.... Beethoven
Symphony in B flat major, No. 5, op 55.. Glazounoff
(First time.)

Musical Notes.

THE coming week offers music lovers an unusually brilliant and varied series of entertainments. Three foreign soloists who have been attracting much favorable comment abroad by their work make their American debut in New York during the week, and the two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will serve to make the series of musical entertainments the more notable.

The first Boston Symphony concert will be given next Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. The sympony will be Bruckner's No. 7, in E flat major. This is the work which won for the Austrian composer the tardy recognition of his countrymen and the critics of the Continent. Under Dr. Muck the symphony should be particularly interesting, as it was under him that it had its first performance in Vienna. Other features of the Thursday evening programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Lenore No. 3," and the concerto in E flat major by Liszt. The second concent will be given Saturday afternoon. The symphony is to be Glazounoff's Fifth. It was first played in New York in the Spring of 1898 by the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Anton Seidl.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. TRIBUNE
rom
ddress
ate

This week brings the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, the first one being on next Thursday evening, December 6, and the second one on next Saturday afternoon, December 8, in Carnegie Hall. The soloists at the first concert will be Moriz Rosenthal, who will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major, No. 1, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Timothée Adamowski, who will play a new concerto for violin in F sharp minor, by Gustav Strube. Mr. Strube, as is generally known in New York, is one of the first violins of the orchestra, who has already won reputation as a composer. This concerto was finished a year ago, and was played in Boston and Philadelphia.

On Thursday evening the symphony will be Brückner's No. 7, in E flat major. This is the work that won for the Austrian composer his tardy recognition. Its performance should be particularly interesting, because Dr. Muck knows personally the wishes of the composer. Under Dr. Muck the symphony had its first performance in Austria, in Graz, in 1886. The composer was present at the rehearsal and at the first concert. Dr. Muck was also the first to give this symphony in Berlin, at one of the royal concerts in 1894. The work may be counted as a novelty here. It was played in Boston once in the winter of 1886-'87 under Mr. Gericke.

The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be Glazounoff's Fifth. It was first played in New York in the spring of 1898 by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Anton Seidl, and has since appeared on the programmes of the Russian Society. The two programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 6.

Overture, "Leonore" No. 3..... Beethoven
Concerto in E flat major for pianoforte, No. 1..... Liszt
Symphony in E flat major, No. 7..... Bruckner

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 8.

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar"..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F sharp minor for violin and orchestra. Strube
Symphony No. 5..... Glazounoff

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. WORK WOR...
ss

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, will give a concert at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night when it will perform Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 Overture. The soloist will be Rosenthal, who will play Liszt's First Concerto.

On Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture.

"The Betrothed of the Tsar." Adamowski will be the soloist, playing a violin concerto by Gustav Strube, a member of this orchestra.

* * *

NEW YORK TIME
ess
DEC

That Paderewski is not coming to America this Winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced lsst Fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. Last Summer, when Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw Mr. Paderewski at his home, in Morges, Switzerland, the symphony was finished with the exception of the instrumentation of the last movement. In doing this work Mr. Paderewski discovered that he would have to make a great many changes. It is now settled that Mr. Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the season of 1907-8 the great pianist will give about one hundred concerts in this country under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis of Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om
ddress
ate
DEC 2 1906

This week brings the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, on Thursday evening, Dec. 6, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 8, in Carnegie Hall. The soloist at the first concert will be Moriz Rosenthal, who will play Liszt's concerto in E-flat major, No. 1; at the second Timothee Adamowski, who will play a new concerto for violin in F sharp minor, by Gustav Strube, is one of the first violins of the orchestra, and has won recognition as a composer. Under the generous policy of Higginson, which is to encourage the men of the orchestra to write, important additions to the literature of music have been added to the world's store, not least among them being the compositions of Charles Martin Loeffler.

The symphonies played at both concerts should arouse much interest, for both are unfamiliar. Bruckner's symphony in E-flat major, which will be heard on Thursday, will be practically new to New Yorkers, as it has not been heard here in many years. Its last performance in Boston before last week took place in the winter of 1886-87 under Gericke. The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be Glazounoff's Fifth, a brilliant work full of Russian feeling. It was played first in New York in the spring of 1898 by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Seidl, and has appeared since on the programmes of the Russian Society. Here are the two programmes in full: Thursday evening, Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3; Liszt's piano concerto in E-flat major, and Bruckner's symphony in E-flat major, No. 7. Saturday afternoon, Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar," Strube's violin concerto in F-sharp minor, and Glazounoff's Symphony No. 5.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK TIMES.
s

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

This week brings the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, the first one being on next Thursday evening, Dec. 6, and the second one on next Saturday afternoon, Dec. 8, in Carnegie Hall. The soloist at the first concert will be Moriz Rosenthal, who will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major, No. 1, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Timothée Adamowski, who will play a new concerto for violin in F sharp minor by Gustav Strube. Mr. Strube is one of the first violins of the orchestra who has already won reputation as a composer.

The symphonies for the two concerts are unfamiliar. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's No. 7, in E flat major. This is the work that won for the Austrian composer his tardy recognition as one of the great figures in modern music. Its performance should be particularly interesting because under Dr. Muck the symphony had its first performance in Austria, in Graz, in 1886. The composer was present at the rehearsal and at the first concert. Dr. Muck was also the first to give this symphony in Berlin at one of the royal concerts in 1894.

It was played in Boston once in the Winter of 1886-7, under Mr. Gericke. The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be Glazounoff's Fifth, a brilliant work, full of Russian feeling. It was first played in New York in the Spring of 1898 by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Anton Seidl, and has since appeared on the programmes of the Russian Society. The two programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3..... Beethoven
Concerto in E flat major for pianoforte, No. 1..... Liszt
Symphony in E flat major, No. 7..... Bruckner

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar"..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F sharp minor for violin and orchestra..... Strube
Symphony No. 5..... Glazounoff

SUNDAY GLOBE—DECEMBER 2, 1906.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Rosenthal Plays With Symphony Orchestra.

Tucker's Sunday Concerts Begin Today in Chickering Hall.

Coming Recitals by Gadski, Eames and Others.

The celebrated pianist, Moriz Rosenthal, was the soloist of the seventh Symphony program, making his first appearance here after an absence of about eight years. He played Liszt's E-flat major concerto. The other numbers were Bruckner's E major symphony and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. The wonder-pianist, in selecting the Liszt concerto, had opportunity not only to show his technical skill in dazzling colors, but also to charm by a poetic exploitation of the familiar number, in which the tonal beauty of his work was of a quality that made a potent appeal to one's imagination. It was not by the tremendous power shown at times that he gained the greatest appreciation, but by the marvelous octave runs, trills long sustained, and exquisite arabesques at lightning speed, which he fairly showered upon the concerto.

The dynamic contrasts were clearly set forth, the fleetness of his fingers did not cloud the beautiful quality and clearness of his tones and all his arpeggios and runs were smooth and even. And allied to the air of authority in musical utterance Rosenthal's demeanor is as modest as can be imagined, and with but the slightest suggestion of enthusiasm. The latter his audience supplied in abundance, recalling him several times to the platform.

The orchestral accompaniment was of the highest order, Liszt proving no more difficult to Dr Muck's forces than did Bruckner, whose symphony came first. This massive work takes more than one hour in performance, and is generally austere in style, strongly suggestive of Wagner's influence in some of its fortissimo modulations and filled with complex instrumentation.

Much originality in treatment is shown in the adagio, the solemnity of the themes being preserved skilfully in each hand choir, the crescendos in particular calling for special praise on account of the clear management of the instrumental combinations. The scherzo is peculiar, being rather heavy in effect, though there are some light spots in it. There is much that is tempestuous in the finale. The interpretation was satisfactory, of course, but the work was rather too ponderous and severe in character to arouse much interest. The "Leonore" overture was delightfully played.

The orchestra will be away this week

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK
ss

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second pair of concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. The programme for the evening entertainment will consist of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Liszt's E flat piano concerto, with Moriz Rosenthal as the soloist, and Bruckner's E flat symphony No. 7. On Saturday afternoon the list will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar," Gustav Strube's violin concerto in F sharp minor, and Glazounoff's fifth symphony.

EW YORK DAILY NEWS
ess

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, December 6th and Saturday aftenoon, December 8th. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's, in E flat major, No 7.

The symphony for Saturday evening is Glazounoff's, No 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society, under Anton Seidl, in the Spring of 1898. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Moriz Rosenthal, and on Saturday afternoon, Timothee Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the violinists of the orchestra.

BOSTON AMERICAN—DECEMBER 2, 1906.

ROSENTHAL, BIG PIANIST, AT SYMPHONY.

Plays Liszt's Concerto in E Flat Major Brilliantly, but with Self-Consciousness and Too Little Feeling

By Kent Perkins.

It was an Austrian night to a certain degree at the seventh Symphony concert of the season last evening, for the symphony was No. 7 in E major by Anton Bruckner, who was born in a little Austrian village and lived and died in Vienna; the soloist was Moritz Rosenthal, the famous Austrian pianist, who played Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major No. 1, and the final piece on the program was the No. 3 overture to "Leonore" by Beethoven, who was so largely identified with the Austrian capital and died there.

But the music was not Austrian, as we speak of Russian, Swedish or Hungarian compositions. It was glorified melody, crystalized harmony—music written by great masters for all time and for all countries, and as if with that loftier ideal in view it was voiced by the Symphony players under Dr. Muck's inspiring leadership.

Symphony a Novelty.

The Bruckner Symphony had not been heard in Boston for so many years that it was a new production to most of last night's audience. Written by a man born of a peasant family of school teachers, reared in villages with one church each, Catholic ones, in whose schools he learned little save music, himself a school master who is reputed to have had a romance in his long life of poverty and struggle, this symphony possesses a depth and sweep and power of emotion that are extraordinary.

It was written towards the close of his life, to be sure, and after Bruckner had been long an ardent admirer of Wagner, but there are no patent Wagnerisms in its clear, straight messages to the heart. Its most striking characteristics, besides its emotional power, are its clarity and beauty of melody and harmony. It is the expression of a simple peasant's feeling, of the heart of a man who knew little and cared less of science or art or sociology or the intrigues of the courts of kings, perhaps, but it is the outpouring of a soul in tune with the infinite and of a master who knew music to the core, even if he had little other knowledge.

Born of a Sensitive Nature.

It is the voice of a sensitive and refined nature. It suggests and is capable of no programme explanation. It might have been inspired by a landscape in which there is one small village with one church spire and a background of hills, but in that church there is worship and an organ and in that village there is the life of the world.

It's most appealing movement, the second, an adagio that has been foolishly called a prophetic dirge for Wagner, who died many months after it was written, is solemn, but its solemnity is uplifting and not funereal. Its sadness is mellowed with hope; it is not crushed with despair. It is the sort of panorama of melancholy that one feels when night creeps over the hills, its coming terrors softened by a glorious sunset. It is like the "tears, idle tears, that rise in the heart and gather in the eyes while gazing on the happy Autumn fields and thinking of the days that are no more."

The orchestra and Dr. Muck gave to the Symphony their best art. The audience received it quietly.

Rosenthal's playing of the Liszt concerto was received in uproarious fashion. His brilliant, dashing rendering of the piece, particularly the care-free nonchalance with which he romped over the keyboard in the closing presto, were well calculated to rouse enthusiasm, and they did.

"Behold what a marvelous feat I am performing and how easily I do it!"

He suggests too much the smirk of the daring circus performer and too little of the artist who is striving only to carry a message to his hearers.

THE BOSTON TELEGRAPH
ess

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Carl Muck, give two concerts this week at Carnegie Hall, one on Thursday, December 6, and the other on Saturday, December 8. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 6.

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3..... Beethoven
Concerto in E-flat major for Pianoforte, No. 1.. Liszt
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 7..... Bruckner

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 8.

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F-sharp minor, for Violin and Orchestra ..... Strube
Symphony No. 5..... Glazounoff

NEW YORK HERAL
ess

Two concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall this week, one on next Thursday evening, the other on Saturday afternoon. Mr. Moritz Rosenthal will be the soloist at the first concert and will play the Liszt E flat Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, the programme prepared by Dr. Carl Muck including also Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3.

On Saturday afternoon the all-Russian programme consists of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture "The Betrothed of the Tsar," Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, and Strube's C sharp minor Violin Concerto. In the last mentioned number Mr. Timothée Adamowski, a member of the orc... soloist.

[82]

...STON, DECEMBER 2, 1906.

...art Playing of Liszt's Concerto for the Piano.

...programme of the seventh concert ... Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. ... conductor, given last night in ...phony Hall, was as follows:

...ony in E major, No. 7.....Bruckner
...concerto in E flat major, No. 1.....Liszt
...e to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

Dr. Muck is to be thanked heartily for ... courage in putting a symphony by ...on Bruckner on the programme and ...he manner in which he conducted it. ... shrewdness was as great as his ...courage, for he put the symphony first ...in the order of pieces. Had he put it ...ast, each movement no doubt would ...have aided in clearing the hall before ...the appointed time. Any serious sym...phony should come first, when the ears ...and the spirits of the hearers are un...jaded. Especially is this true of a sym...phony that is performed for the first ...time, or is unfamiliar. Mr. Gericke pro...duced Bruckner's Seventh in Boston in ... to the great consternation of nine...tenths of the hearers, if we may believe ...the contemporaneous reports. Since then ...we have heard the third, fourth, fifth ...and unfinished ninth of this extraordi...nary composer, but as yet there is no ...devoted band of Brucknerites in Boston.

If the overture by Beethoven had ...come first and then Mr. Rosenthal's ...performance of the concerto, the great...er part of the audience would no doubt ...have sat courteously through the first ...movement, possibly through the second, ...and then exodus would have come after ...revelations.

Dr. Muck is a discriminative, not a ...fanatical, admirer of Bruckner. He was ...the first to conduct a performance of ...the symphony in Austria, at Graz, when ...the composer was present. He also first ...conducted the work in Berlin.

A conductor who wishes all his selec...tions to be trumps, who thinks first of ...the applause that may follow a perform...ance, will not choose a symphony by ...Bruckner, whose time has not yet ar...rived, if it will ever come, as far as the ...great musical public is concerned in any ...land. Many orchestral players find no ...pleasure in their task. Critics are in...clined to shake portentously the head. ...The courage of Dr. Muck is the more ...conspicuous because in Boston there is ...no disposition to set Bruckner's music ...against Brahms', and the devotion of ...Bruckner to Wagner is to us a matter ...of not the slightest importance.

Furthermore, an indifferent public ...in this country not well acquainted ...with Bruckner's symphonies has been ...easily persuaded to believe that they ...are all dull or as the music of a ...madman. Some have repeated idly the ...remark of a German about this very ...symphony. He described it as "the ...confused dream of an orchestral play...er unstrung by reason of 20 rehearsals ...of 'Tristan and Isolde.'" They have ...repeated it and smiled in a superior ...manner, though they may never have ...heard the symphony.

If it be the duty of a critic to find ...out first of all that which is good in ...a work of art and at the same time to ...inquire in what respects this work of ...art is to be distinguished from others, ...what is to be said of this colossal com...position that enchants for a moment ...and bores for minutes; that raises the ...hearer to the high heavens and then ...quickly drops him into the slough of ...despond; that makes him now wonder ...at an unsurpassable flight of imagina...tion and now at futile repetitions of ...insignificant detail; now wonder at ...an eloquence that reminds one of ...Beethoven and now at music that is ...little above the chatter of a magpie? ...How could a man who conceived the ...exposition of the first theme of the first ...movement, the pathetic and impressive ...adagio with that haunting melody of ...unearthly beauty given to the violins—...a melody that Beethoven might well ...have put in his slow movement of the ...Ninth Symphony—the climax of the ...piece in this same adagio, the Titanic ...scherzo—how could a man who thus ...showed the rarest genius have so wo...fully lacked the faculty of self-criticism ...which would have led him to strive after ...more logical continuity of musical ...thought and to throw out whole pages ...inconsequential and tiresome detail? ...This fatal lack of proportion in Bruck...ner's music is more to be deplored than ...the passing reminiscences of passages ...easily found in works of Wagner and ...Beethoven.

There are pages in this symphony, as ...in other symphonies of this singular ...genius, which are of elemental and over...whelming grandeur, pages of a beauty ...that is not of this earth and can be ex...pressed only in music, pages that put ...Bruckner for a moment—alas, only for a ...moment—by the side of the immortals. ...And so there are wonderful, Aeschylean ...lines to be found, radiantly grand, in the ...incomprehensible verbiage of William ...Blake's prophetic books. So, too, there ...are lines in Blake's "Songs of Inno...

...OSTON TRAVELER ...ECEMBER 3, 1906.

Musical Events

FOR the seventh concert of the Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck offered Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, Liszt's E-flat Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture. Mr. Moritz Rosenthal was the soloist. It required considerable courage on the part of the leader to put the Bruckner number in his programme. It's not a popular selection, and the chances are it never will be. It's too long, over an hour in length, and its flashes of brilliancy are altogether too few and too far between. As a study for the musician, it is doubtless all right, but for the average musical audience the work is too deep. It was well placed at the beginning of the concert.

Rosenthal has never been heard to better advantage in this city than Friday night in the Liszt concerto. It was a better rendition of the composition been heard. It was delightful and bordered on the sensational. ...playing of the orchestra was fully ...of the pianist. After a truly ...finale the pianist was four ...in the most enthusiastic ...

...Beethoven number ... to a concert ...

BY PHILIP HALE

...cence" that are suggested by certain melodic thoughts of the childlike composer who struggled for years as a humble school teacher and organist in Austrian villages and towns.

Mr. Rosenthal is a pianist who excites the warmest respect as well as unbounded admiration. He is a thinker, not merely a virtuoso beyond compare. His rounded nature and his knowledge of the arts, literature, science, the world enter into the dazzling brilliance of his performance of Liszt's concerto and glorify it. The pianist's imagination reconstructs the romantic years of Liszt and vitalizes all that which might otherwise seem to be of a long forgotten and antiquated period. Liszt wrote the concerto for himself. He unconsciously wrote it also for Mr. Rosenthal. I have never heard such an amazingly brilliant and at the same time such a truly poetic performance of this fascinating work.

To speak of Mr. Rosenthal's fabulous mechanical proficiency would be impertinent toward him and the reader, for this proficiency was acknowledged long ago. He had purposed to play Chopin's concerto in E minor, but in this he was anticipated. It would have been a delight to hear him in the work of Chopin, but it is a matter of general congratulation that we were all allowed to know his conception of the concerto by Liszt. One might grow eloquent over the poesy of his mechanism, its ineffable clearness, the lucid reasonableness of its flestness, but the pianist's broad and heroic view of the work as a whole and the impressiveness of his presentation of that view are still more memorable.

The performance of the orchestra was of the highest standard, and Dr. Muck was equally the sympathetic friend and interpreter of Bruckner, Liszt and Beethoven.

SUNDAY POST, DECEMBER 2, 1906.

BRUCKNER'S SEVENTH SYMPHONY PLEASED

Public interest ran high over yesterday's symphony concert at Symphony Hall, partly on account of Bruckner's seventh symphony, with which Dr. Muck has won laurels abroad, but mainly over the first appearance of Mr. Rosenthal in Boston during his present tour.

Dr. Muck did wonders in his interpretation, and all that could be said for the composer was said.

Bruckner's musical works are slowly attaining recognition in the musical world, but it is a question whether, with their exceptional faults and virtues, they will ever be a complete success.

The opening chords of the concerto were struck with brusque authority, the more lyric themes of the first and second parts were declaimed, not sung, and through it all one felt that the virtuoso was hungering for what was to come.

But with the nervous tapping of the triangle at the beginning of the allegretto, Moritz' eyes began to gleam in a demoniac manner. He took up the frolicsome figure with the flute and toyed with it. His hands joyfully gambolled and caracolled over the piano, and from that time on things went with incredible dash and elan.

The strongest orchestral fortissimo seemed incapable of "fazing" him, and there was the absolute conviction that had there been three more orchestras he would have outdid 'em all. His nerves must have been electric batteries, and surely those finegrs and wrists can be nothing but tempered steel!

As the last crashing chord sounded through the hall he rose, elated and supreme, and bowed to the frantic applause.

Mr. Rosenthal showed himself in this concerto as the agile, all-conquering tuoso, nothing more.

NEW YORK SUN
DEC 2 1906

Timothée Adamowski, second concertmeister, will be the solo performer at the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday. He will play for the first time in this city a new violin concerto in F sharp minor by Gustav Strube. Those who amuse themselves at Bar Harbor in the mornings by watching the tennis matches on the Swimming Club courts know Mr. Strube as the conductor of the orchestra there. Music lovers here recall him as an earnest composer.

He is a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of its violinists. His "Fantastic Overture" was played here on March 20, 1904, and his first violin concerto on December 16, 1897, by Franz Kneisel and the Boston orchestra, Emil Paur conducting.

The Boston Journal
DECEMBER 3, 1906.

DR. MUCK REVIVES BRUCKNER SYMPHONY

The seventh Symphony concert was made notable, and in a certain sense interesting, by Dr. Muck's resurrecting of Bruckner's symphony in E major after a sleep that nearly approached that of Rip Van Winkle. It arose from its slumbers as ponderous and certainly better understood than in those earlier days, when it staggered audiences and critics alike. It no longer seems wild and fantastically noisy, for Richard Strauss and Mahler and the rest of the "moderns" have taken care of that. It is still extraordinary, however, in its almost incredible mixture of beauty and baldness, nobility and nothingness. That the man who could write the fascinating middle portion of the first movement, the almost supernatural loveliness of most of the adagio and the savage jocosity of the scherzo could also produce the dull and formless scrappiness, the twaddling melange of the entire last movement is not explained and cannot be. The only plausible theory is that Bruckner was for most of the time a highly educated and respectable maker of routine music, across whose mind some strange influence flashed occasional moments of genius. Was it Wagner or was it Beethoven? Both appear strongly in the best pages of the symphony, not in imitation, be it understood, but as if the real thoughts of those masters had somehow filtrated through the brain of a devoted disciple. The performance was on a magnificent plane of thought and virtuosity, as fine in its way as anything Dr. Muck has yet attained.

Then came Moritz Rosenthal, he of the amazing technique, with Liszt's pianoforte concerto in E flat major. It was a performance of the most scintillating brilliancy, yet warm, rich and as highly idealized as the glittering thing permits. There is little of poetry or the calmer sort of romance in the work; it should be given at a white heat and with all possible power and bravura, and that Rosenthal contributed every necessary qualification to its playing goes without saying. Yet for some reason his phenomenal performance left the audience comparatively cold; tyros and medeocrities in number have won far more in the way of recalls than did this master of the pianoforte.

The performance of Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 overture, with which the long concert ended, was stirring, but not exceptionally fine. Indeed, it has been given with more classic beauty many times by this orchestra.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
DECEMBER 3, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.
Bruckner. Symphony in E major, No. 7.
Liszt. Piano Concerto in E flat.
Soloist, Mr. Moritz Rosenthal.
Beethoven. Leonora Overture, No. 3.

Let no one suppose that it was a short concert! It lasted two full hours, and had it not been for Rosenthal and the Liszt Paprika it would have been a fatigued audience that departed from the hall at 10 p.m. It was a deed of heroism to play the Bruckner symphony and Dr. Muck has shown thereby that he is not one of those conductors who seeks merely the applause of his audience, but that he is endeavoring to educate and broaden the public taste. Find fault with the Bruckner seventh symphony as we may, it is yet our duty to hear it and to study it, as one of the peculiar musical developments of modern times.

How much temporary harm an unjust or biased musical critic of prominence can do! Not all of Hanslick's brutal antagonism has been able to keep Bruckner's symphonies out of the repertoire; but he was able to torture the composer and make his life generally miserable. How much this was the case may be surmised from the fact that once, when Bruckner was presented to the Austrian emperor and that monarch genially asked, "Can I do anything for you?" Bruckner, with a peasant's faith in the omnipotence of the emperor, burst out with,—"Yes, your majesty, if you would only ask Mr. Hanslick not to write about me any more!"

We need not join the Hanslick assaults with rapier and bludgeon when we say that we do not altogether admire the present work. It is music for musicians only and appeals too frequently to the intellect and too seldom to the emotions. Its thematic material is very scanty, for all that it is more than an hour in performance. Dr. Muck was wise in putting it at the beginning of the concert, for not only did he thus force each auditor to stay to the end of the work, but one came to it fresh and unjaded and was thereby better able to follow the tremendous amount of figure development.

Great ability to transform musical figures is not an unmixed good. One sometimes follows this to the exclusion of melodic beauty, of tone-coloring, of emotional expression. Bruckner can turn his themes upside down, can augment and diminish them, can give them backwards, until one is overwhelmed with the ingenuity of the workmanship, but the variety and beauty of thematic material of Beethoven or Brahms are not present. The tone-coloring is not better than the neutral tints of Brahms. Frequent contrasts of the fullest orchestra with unsupported solo phrases, and many combinations of tuba or bass-trombone with the flute, may astonish, but do not charm.

Yet there are occasional climaxes of some fervor, oases in the desert. These were chiefly in evidence in the second (slow) movement, in which the tone-color of the tubas gave a sonorous solemnity. But even here the music would not soothe a heart-ache or cause a tear to flow.

The Scherzo was attractive in its brusquerie, had good contrasts and was clear and coherent. Its striking figure could be easily followed even by the non-musician. The figure aforesaid is closely akin to the "Flying Dutchman" motive, as the brass crescendo and climax at the end of the first movement is an echo of the "Dawn" scene of the second act of "Lohengrin."

In all the work there is no crabbed ugliness, and there is no seeking after dissonance merely for the sake of being original; in this point, at least, Bruckner is above many symphonists of modern days.

The finale is again given over to derivations, inversions, and other conjurings. We suspect that if Bruckner had been less of a contrapuntist he would have been more of a composer. The symphony is remarkable in its school, but we do not enjoy the school. Yet it was good to hear it and to study it, and the public may breathe easier over a heavy task well accomplished. Possibly Dr. Muck shares this feeling. At all events he deserves great credit for a clear and well-balanced performance of a gigantic work.

When Liszt was asked what he meant by his seven-noted figure which begins his E-flat concerto and is so prominent all through it, he sang to its notes—"Das versteht ihr alle nicht"—"That you cannot understand!" But it has become very easy to understand nowadays, and we only wish that Bruckner or Reger or D'Indy were as comprehensible in their figure development. We always consider the E-flat concerto as rather a Hungarian Rhapsody than a true concerto, both because of its very free shape and the prominence given to the solo instrument. Judged by strict rules the Liszt concerto in A is much the better work, but the highly spiced and scintillant E-flat concerto will always be the more popular of the two.

And it had the artist of artists to bring out its glittering effects. There is no pianist alive who has such a marvellous technique as Moritz Rosenthal. In his double trills, his octave work, his clearness and rapidity in runs and scales, in short in every type of wrist-action and finger-work, he seems unapproachable.

And he entered into the spirit of the concerto perfectly. Once in a while his dash caused the orchestra to become winded, but they managed to keep up with him as a whole, and the end of the concerto became a whirlwind.

Great as Rosenthal is in many directions we have never heard him to better advantage. Possibly this was because Bruckner had been a trifle indigestible and the highly-spiced dish came at the most opportune moment. The audience became frenzied in their plaudits and four recalls proved that they appreciated the artist. We cannot imagine a better performance of the "triangle concerto" (as Liszt's enemies called it) than was given on this occasion.

Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 3" (most prosaic name of a most dramatic overture) was finely interpreted. Yet we ought not to forget that this has always been finely conducted at these concerts, and it was impossible to improve upon past performances of the work. There might have been more power in the second trumpet signal of this composition. Both calls were of about the same dynamic force, which did not carry out the idea of the approach of the governor. Louis C. Elson.

[83]

HERALD—BOSTON, DECEMBER 2, 1906.

Brilliant Playing of Liszt's Concerto for the Piano.

The programme of the seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in E major, No. 7.....Bruckner
Piano concerto in E flat major, No. 1.....Liszt
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

Dr. Muck is to be thanked heartily for his courage in putting a symphony by Anton Bruckner on the programme and for the manner in which he conducted it.

His shrewdness was as great as his courage, for he put the symphony first in the order of pieces. Had he put it last, each movement no doubt would have aided in clearing the hall before the appointed time. Any serious symphony should come first, when the ears and the spirits of the hearers are unjaded. Especially is this true of a symphony that is performed for the first time, or is unfamiliar. Mr. Gericke produced Bruckner's Seventh in Boston in 1887, to the great consternation of nine-tenths of the hearers, if we may believe the contemporaneous reports. Since then we have heard the third, fourth, fifth and unfinished ninth of this extraordinary composer, but as yet there is no devoted band of Brucknerites in Boston.

If the overture by Beethoven had come first and then Mr. Rosenthal's performance of the concerto, the greater part of the audience would no doubt have sat courteously through the first movement, possibly through the second, and then exodus would have come after revelations.

Dr. Muck is a discriminative, not a fanatical, admirer of Bruckner. He was the first to conduct a performance of the symphony in Austria, at Graz, when the composer was present. He also first conducted the work in Berlin.

A conductor who wishes all his selections to be trumps, who thinks first of the applause that may follow a performance, will not choose a symphony by Bruckner, whose time has not yet arrived, if it will ever come, as far as the great musical public is concerned in any land. Many orchestral players find no pleasure in their task. Critics are inclined to shake portentously the head. The courage of Dr. Muck is the more conspicuous because in Boston there is no disposition to set Bruckner's music against Brahms', and the devotion of Bruckner to Wagner is to us a matter of not the slightest importance.

Furthermore, an indifferent public in this country not well acquainted with Bruckner's symphonies has been easily persuaded to believe that they are all dull or as the music of a madman. Some have repeated idly the remark of a German about this very symphony. He described it as "the confused dream of an orchestral player unstrung by reason of 20 rehearsals of 'Tristan and Isolde.'" They have repeated it and smiled in a superior manner, though they may never have heard the symphony.

If it be the duty of a critic to find out first of all that which is good in a work of art and at the same time to inquire in what respects this work of art is to be distinguished from others, what is to be said of this colossal composition that enchants for a moment and bores for minutes; that raises the hearer to the high heavens and then quickly drops him into the slough of despond; that makes him now wonder at an unsurpassable flight of imagination and now at futile repetitions of insignificant detail; now wonder at an eloquence that reminds one of Beethoven and now at music that is little above the chatter of a magpie?

How could a man who conceived the exposition of the first theme of the first movement, the pathetic and impressive adagio with that haunting melody of unearthly beauty given to the violins—a melody that Beethoven might well have put in his slow movement of the Ninth Symphony—the climax of the dirge in this same adagio, the Titanic scherzo—how could a man who thus showed the rarest genius have so wofully lacked the faculty of self-criticism which would have led him to strive after more logical continuity of musical thought and to throw out whole pages of inconsequential and tiresome detail?

This fatal lack of proportion in Bruckner's music is more to be deplored than the passing reminiscences of passages easily found in works of Wagner and Beethoven.

There are pages in this symphony, as in other symphonies of this singular genius, which are of elemental and overwhelming grandeur, pages of a beauty that is not of this earth and can be expressed only in music, pages that put Bruckner for a moment—alas, only for a moment—by the side of the immortals. And so there are wonderful, Aeschylaen lines to be found, radiantly grand, in the incomprehensible verbiage of William Blake's prophetic books. So, too, there are lines in Blake's "Songs of Innocence" that are suggested by certain melodic thoughts of the childlike composer who struggled for years as a humble school teacher and organist in Austrian villages and towns.

BY PHILIP HALE

Mr. Rosenthal is a pianist who excites the warmest respect as well as unbounded admiration. He is a thinker, not merely a virtuoso beyond compare. His rounded nature and his knowledge of the arts, literature, science, the world enter into the dazzling brilliance of his performance of Liszt's concerto and glorify it. The pianist's imagination reconstructs the romantic years of Liszt and vitalizes all that which might otherwise seem to be of a long forgotten and antiquated period. Liszt wrote the concerto for himself. He unconsciously wrote it also for Mr. Rosenthal. I have never heard such an amazingly brilliant and at the same time such a truly poetic performance of this fascinating work.

To speak of Mr. Rosenthal's fabulous mechanical proficiency would be impertinent toward him and the reader, for this proficiency was acknowledged long ago. He had purposed to play Chopin's concerto in E minor, but in this he was anticipated. It would have been a delight to hear him in the work of Chopin, but it is a matter of general congratulation that we were all allowed to know his conception of the concerto by Liszt. One might grow eloquent over the poesy of his mechanism, its ineffable clearness, the lucid reasonableness of its fleetness, but the pianist's broad and heroic view of the work as a whole and the impressiveness of his presentation of that view are still more memorable.

The performance of the orchestra was of the highest standard, and Dr. Muck was equally the sympathetic friend and interpreter of Bruckner, Liszt and Beethoven.

BOSTON TRAVELER
DECEMBER 3, 1906.

Musical Events

FOR the seventh concert of the Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck offered Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, Liszt's E-flat Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture. Mr. Moritz Rosenthal was the soloist. It required considerable courage on the part of the leader to put the Bruckner number in his programme. It's not a popular selection, and the chances are it never will be. It's too long, over an hour in length, and its flashes of brilliancy are altogether too few and too far between. As a study for the musician, it is doubtless all right, but for the average musical audience the work is too deep. It was well placed at the beginning of the concert.

Mr. Rosenthal has never been heard to better advantage in this city than Saturday night in the Liszt concerto, nor has a better rendition of the composition been heard. It was delightful, and bordered on the sensational. The playing of the orchestra was fully up to that of the pianist. After a truly wonderful finale the pianist was four times recalled in the most enthusiastic manner.

The delightful Beethoven number provided a fitting close to a concert that will long be treasured by the Symphony audience. It's a grand work, and was well interpreted.

SUNDAY POST, DECEMBER 2, 1906

BRUCKNER'S SEVENTH SYMPHONY PLEASED

Public interest ran high over yesterday's symphony concert at Symphony Hall, partly on account of Bruckner's seventh symphony, with which Dr. Muck has won laurels abroad, but mainly over the first appearance of Mr. Rosenthal in Boston during his present tour.

Dr. Muck did wonders in his interpretation, and all that could be said for the composer was said.

Bruckner's musical works are slowly attaining recognition in the musical world, but it is a question whether, with their exceptional faults and virtues, they will ever be a complete success.

The opening chords of the concerto were struck with brusque authority, the more lyric themes of the first and second parts were declaimed, not sung, and through it all one felt that the virtuoso was hungering for what was to come.

But with the nervous tapping of the triangle at the beginning of the allegretto, Moritz' eyes began to gleam in a demoniac manner. He took up the frolicsome figure with the flute and toyed with it. His hands joyfully gambolled and caracolled over the piano, and from that time on things went with incredible dash and elan.

The strongest orchestral fortissimo seemed incapable of "feazing" him, and there was the absolute conviction that had there been three more orchestras he would have outdid 'em all. His nerves must have been electric batteries, and surely those finegrs and wrists can be nothing but tempered steel!

As the last crashing chord sounded through the hall he rose, elated and supreme, and bowed to the frantic applause.

Mr. Rosenthal showed himself in this concerto as the agile, all-conquering virtuoso, nothing more.

When Liszt was asked what he meant by his seven-noted figure which begins his E-flat concerto and is so prominent all through it, he sang to its notes—"Das versteht ihr alle nicht"—"That you cannot understand!" But it has become very easy to understand nowadays, and we only wish that Bruckner or Reger or D'Indy were as comprehensible in their figure development. We always consider the E-flat concerto as rather a Hungarian Rhapsody than a true concerto, both because of its very free shape and the prominence given to the solo instrument. Judged by strict rules the Liszt concerto in A is much the better work, but the highly spiced and scintillant E-flat concerto will always be the more popular of the two.

And it had the artist of artists to bring out its glittering effects. There is no pianist alive who has such a marvellous technique as Moritz Rosenthal. In his double trills, his octave work, his clearness and rapidity in runs and scales, in short in every type of wrist-action and finger-work, he seems unapproachable.

And he entered into the spirit of the concerto perfectly. Once in a while his dash caused the orchestra to become winded, but they managed to keep up with him as a whole, and the end of the concerto became a whirlwind.

Great as Rosenthal is in many directions we have never heard him to better advantage. Possibly this was because Bruckner had been a trifle indigestible and the highly-spiced dish came at the most opportune moment. The audience became frenzied in their plaudits and four recalls proved that they appreciated the artist. We cannot imagine a better performance of the "triangle concerto" (as Liszt's enemies called it) than was given on this occasion.

Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 3" (most prosaic name of a most dramatic overture) was finely interpreted. Yet we ought not to forget that this has always been finely conducted at these concerts, and it was impossible to improve upon past performances of the work. There might have been more power in the second trumpet signal of this composition. Both calls were of about the same dynamic force, which did not carry out the idea of the approach of the governor. Louis C. Elson.

NEW YORK S[illegible]

Timothée Adamowski, second concertmeister, will be the solo performer at the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday. He will play for the first time in this city a new violin concerto in F sharp minor by Gustav Strube. Those who amuse themselves at Bar Harbor in the mornings by watching the tennis matches on the Swimming Club courts know Mr. Strube as the conductor of the orchestra there. Music lovers here recall him as an earnest composer.

He is a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of its violinists. His "Fantastic Overture" was played here on March 20, 1904, and his first violin concerto on December 16, 1897, by Franz Kneisel and the Boston orchestra, Emil Paur conducting.

The Boston Journal
DECEMBER 3, 1906.

DR. MUCK REVIVES BRUCKNER SYMPHONY

The seventh Symphony concert was made notable, and in a certain sense interesting, by Dr. Muck's resurrecting of Bruckner's symphony in E major after a sleep that nearly approached that of Rip Van Winkle. It arose from its slumbers as ponderous and certainly better understood than in those earlier days, when it staggered audiences and critics alike. It no longer seems wild and fantastically noisy, for Richard Strauss and Mahler and the rest of the "moderns" have taken care of that. It is still extraordinary, however, in its almost incredible mixture of beauty and baldness, nobility and nothingness. That the man who could write the fascinating middle portion of the first movement, the almost supernatural loveliness of most of the adagio and the savage jocosity of the scherzo could also produce the dull and formless scrappiness, the twaddling melange of the entire last movement is not explained and cannot be. The only plausible theory is that Bruckner was for most of the time a highly educated and respectable maker of routine music, across whose mind some strange influence flashed occasional moments of genius. Was it Wagner or was it Beethoven? Both appear strongly in the best pages of the symphony, not in imitation, be it understood, but as if the real thoughts of those masters had somehow filtrated through the brain of a devoted disciple. The performance was on a magnificent plane of thought and virtuosity, as fine in its way as anything Dr. Muck has yet attained.

Then came Moritz Rosenthal, he of the amazing technique, with Liszt's pianoforte concerto in E flat major. It was a performance of the most scintillating brilliancy, yet warm, rich and as highly idealized as the glittering thing permits. There is little of poetry or the calmer sort of romance in the work; it should be given at a white heat and with all possible power and bravura, and that Rosenthal contributed every necessary qualification to its playing goes without saying. Yet for some reason his phenomenal performance left the audience comparatively cold; tyros and medeocrities in number have won far more in the way of recalls than did this master of the pianoforte.

The performance of Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 overture, with which the long concert ended, was stirring, but not exceptionally fine. Indeed, it has been given with more classic beauty many times by this orchestra.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
DECEMBER 3, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.
Bruckner. Symphony in E major, No. 7.
Liszt. Piano Concerto in E flat.
Soloist, Mr. Moritz Rosenthal.
Beethoven. Leonora Overture, No. 3.

Let no one suppose that it was a short concert! It lasted two full hours, and had it not been for Rosenthal and the Liszt Paprika it would have been a fatigued audience that departed from the hall at 10 p.m. It was a deed of heroism to play the Bruckner symphony and Dr. Muck has shown thereby that he is not one of those conductors who seeks merely the applause of his audience, but that he is endeavoring to educate and broaden the public taste. Find fault with the Bruckner seventh symphony as we may, it is yet our duty to hear it and to study it, as one of the peculiar musical developments of modern times.

How much temporary harm an unjust or biased musical critic of prominence can do! Not all of Hanslick's brutal antagonism has been able to keep Bruckner's symphonies out of the repertoire; but he was able to torture the composer and make his life generally miserable. How much this was the case may be surmised from the fact that once, when Bruckner was presented to the Austrian emperor and that monarch genially asked, "Can I do anything for you?" Bruckner, with a peasant's faith in the omnipotence of the emperor, burst out with,—"Yes, your majesty, if you would only ask Mr. Hanslick not to write about me any more!"

We need not join the Hanslick assaults with rapier and bludgeon when we say that we do not altogether admire the present work. It is music for musicians only and appeals too frequently to the intellect and too seldom to the emotions. Its thematic material is very scanty, for all that it is more than an hour in performance. Dr. Muck was wise in putting it at the beginning of the concert, for not only did he thus force each auditor to stay to the end of the work, but one came to it fresh and unjaded and was thereby better able to follow the tremendous amount of figure development.

Great ability to transform musical figures is not an unmixed good. One sometimes follows this to the exclusion of melodic beauty, of tone-coloring, of emotional expression. Bruckner can turn his themes upside down, can augment and diminish them, can give them backwards, until one is overwhelmed with the ingenuity of the workmanship, but the variety and beauty of thematic material of Beethoven or Brahms are not present. The tone-coloring is not better than the neutral tints of Brahms. Frequent contrasts of the fullest orchestra with unsupported solo phrases, and many combinations of tuba or bass-trombone with the flute, may astonish, but do not charm.

Yet there are occasional climaxes of some fervor, oases in the desert. These were chiefly in evidence in the second (slow) movement, in which the tone-color of the tubas gave a sonorous solemnity. But even here the music would not soothe a heart-ache or cause a tear to flow.

The Scherzo was attractive in its brusquerie, had good contrasts and was clear and coherent. Its striking figure could be easily followed even by the non-musician. The figure aforesaid is closely akin to the "Flying Dutchman" motive, as the brass crescendo and climax at the end of the first movement is an echo of the "Dawn" scene of the second act of "Lohengrin."

In all the work there is no crabbed ugliness, and there is no seeking after dissonance merely for the sake of being original; in this point, at least, Bruckner is above many symphonists of modern days.

The finale is again given over to derivations, inversions, and other conjurings. We suspect that if Bruckner had been less of a contrapuntist he would have been more of a composer. The symphony is remarkable in its school, but we do not enjoy the school. Yet it was good to hear it and to study it, and the public may breathe easier over a heavy task well accomplished. Possibly Dr. Muck shares this feeling. At all events he deserves great credit for a clear and well-balanced performance of a gigantic work.

[83]

...n Transcript
...WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Musical Comment

Dr. Muck ended on Saturday the second month of the Symphony concerts, and in it he has subdued much of the complaint about his programmes that was murmuring a few weeks ago. The programmes of the first four concerts he made early last summer in Germany. He knew nothing at that time at first hand of h... public. Each had equal... him. As any wise cond... shaped his programm... familiar classics that ... a medium for the gain... knowledge. In the two... spent in Boston, he ... learned the resources ... his band and the tem... his public, and he ha... his programmes accordi... symphonies—Sinding's, ... Bruckner's—have been ... three concerts. Glazo... new to Boston; Sind... heard for seven yea... for nearly twenty. ... virtuosi—Petschnikoff ... played modern, if more ... In fact, in the last thr... been only three classics ... —Chopin's first concer... to "Oberon" and Beet... nore" overture upon w... bound to prove his skill ... ground for complaint ... the freshness of the las... The worst that can be ... perhaps they have f... rigidly the severe Vien... ture, concerto, symp... hence, however, there ... at the concerts, and s... Mr. Chadwick stands ... in the winter. Mr. Co... have a place, and the ... Debussy and other of ... men. In a word Dr. ... creet man he is, has g... his public and his ba... many programmes. N... the task with a discer... his predecessors were ... quire.

As the concerts go fo... too, very little cause ... some listeners, especi... have professed to feel l... finesse and the euphon... should suffer under the ... and sonority that Dr. ... They have rejoiced—t... deed, help rejoicing—... and spontaneous sono... brought to Sinding's ... tumbling finale of Gl... not this vigor costing ... of its delicacy of tone ... scherzo of Glazounoff ... score of the finer pas... tested both, and it wa... smallest loss. One c... beauties of Bruckner' ... trating or caressing ... his instrumental comb... ed on Saturday like ... visions. The brass of ... voiced now, but its to... sonority. The delica... of orchestra and solo... dom been higher tha... Rosenthal played Lis... Petschnikoff Tschaiko... is the new sonority ... from the orchestra ... symphony with its vi... and the new elasticity ... sian's rhythm and a... to "Oberon" and th... with fresh dramatic ... Muck was overdispo... drop of musical and ... of Beethoven's overt... pression was still of ... and spontaneously u... emotions. As long ... generation can rem... has been a beautiful ... of its beauty is wid... depth of it ampler, ... ter diversifying it ar... ing through it.

Bruckner's sympl... ceived on Saturday ... Friday. The listene... though there were s... and the applause wa... to recalling Dr. Mu... the revival of the sy... hearing of the music ... in the impression th... It struggles under t... that may rest upon ... its salient defects a... that most defeat it... beauty of some of ... ments in their dev... that some of the in... impart to them, is l... iridescence of a vis... ner touches at mor... embodied loveliness ... that only César Franck among modern composers has attained. Franck, however, maintains this ecstasy. The listener may hear Franck's music and be conscious of nothing else. Bruckner not only fails to maintain it; he falls away, and on the instant, into the shallows of finicking pedantry or the wastes of baldness. When he is not winged, he slouches. When he is not the Bruckner of ideal visions, he is Bruckner the peasant of Windhag or the pedagogue of Vienna. The singleness of mind that absorbs him in his visions makes him forget that others beside Bruckners were to hear his music. He bids them at moments into a world of his own creating and that only music could create. Then he misses the clew and leaves them groping and weary. The result is inevitable: the world loses its illusion and they renounce the quest for it.

...Rosenthal's playing of it seemed the other extreme of musical achievement. The music itself sounded like an heroic improvisation, wrought in sustained passion with means that leapt, perfect and sure, to answer the composer's imagination. The concerto may sound, and with reason, like a hard and brilliant showpiece. It may sound, even as Mr. Joseffy makes it, as a soft tapestry of bright and changeful tonal colors. And it may be the heroic rhapsody into which Mr. Rosenthal transforms it. The music glowed as he struck it from the piano. The very rhythms had a passion of motion. The ornaments were as hot flashes of fancy. The melodies were as the spontaneous voice of kindling and transporting feeling. Here ...

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...OST
...ASHINGTON, D.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

It is seldom indeed that any organization for the performance of chamber music has met with such speedy and conclusive success in Washington as that which was the fortune last winter of the Boston Symphony Quartet. This year another series of three concerts is to be given, but in the afternoon instead of the ...

POST
...ASHINGTON, D. C.
...ss

Saint-Saens with Boston Symphony.

Despite the many announcements concerning the coming to this country of Paderewski to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, it was only finally settled the other day that it would be impossible for him to keep his engagement. Pad... announced for the Jan... he orchestra in Washing... anagement at once took ... an adequate substitute ... Polish pianist, and thus ... the public. The outcome ... engagement of Camille ... the coming concert in ... December 4.

BOSTON POST, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1906

Mrs. Muck Delighted With the Shops and Shoppers of the Hub

Dr. Carl Muck, who is to conduct th e Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his wife, at the piano, posed especially for the Post

Mrs. Anita Muck, the accomplished wife of Boston's new Symphony leader, did her first day's shopping in the Hub yesterday.

She brushed elbows with the struggling masses of feminine shopgoers that thronged the busy department stores on Tremont and Washington streets, watched with curious eyes the trim and daintily clad women that lined up before attractive counters in quest of some much-heralded bargains, saw these same trimly-clad females drive away in their carriages or automobiles, took a walk through the Public Garden and up along the boulevard to her hotel on Commonwealth avenue, and then decided that she liked Boston, Boston stores and Boston women.

Mrs. Muck is a handsome women of barely 34 years, rather of the blonde type, with regular features and a most winning presence. She doesn't pretend to be at all musical—neither sings nor plays—but contents herself with the opinion that it is just as well for all the musical talent to be confined to one member of the family.

"Women are the same everywhere," said Mrs. Muck to a Post reporter, "but when it comes to form and style, there is of course a decided difference. As for the American women, I think them a happy medium between the English and the French. Boston women, in particular, remind me greatly of the Parisians.

"They go to extremes in style, however, it seems to me, as do the French. But when it comes to shopping, it appears as if the women of all nations are on a par.

"Your stores remind me more nearly of our Berlin warehouses and bear some resemblance to the big shops on the Strand in London. But all stores are alike and the women of Boston act just the same before a bargain counter as do the women at home.

"I never saw so many automobiles as I have seen in this city, and, wonder of wonders! your women do not seem in the least afraid to drive them. They must have wonderful courage. In my country we would be helpless without our chauffeurs. And it frightens me almost to see the speed at which they run their cars.

"One custom especially appeals to me here as well calculated to make a stranger feel at home. That is the custom your ladies here have of calling on a visitor first. In Berlin strangers must break the ice. But this custom takes away the feeling of strangeness which overtakes every foreigner, and especially a woman. It is a custom that should be adopted at home, I think."

Mrs. Muck has not visited many of the public buildings yet; but of those she has seen, the public library appeals to her most.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck have visited Symphony Hall, and, while they describe it as somewhat smaller than the one in Berlin, they are enthusiastic in praise of it. The doctor states that its acoustics could not be surpassed.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck intend to do considerable visiting this week, and will take in Harvard and other places of interest, if, as Mrs. Muck says, she can "spare the time from those attractive downtown stores."

...in the orchestration of his new symphony, which he was to have played here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next month, and that the work will not be ready for presentation as expected. It is now settled that Paderewski will bring the symphony to this country next October, when he comes for a series of one hundred concerts.

...presentation by Mr. Muck of Brahms's C minor symphony, No. 1, and the appearance as soloist of Moriz Rosenthal, the distinguished pianist, after an absence of eight years. The symphony, under Mr. Muck's direction, is said to have created something of a sensation in New York three weeks ago. The return of Rosenthal is an event of importance in the musical season, as he is considered one of the few really great pianists in the world. He will play the Liszt concerto in E flat major, and in addition to the Brahms symphony the orchestra is to give the overture to Weber's "Oberon."

Boston Symphony Orchestra to encourage its members to write and two men of decided note have come from its ranks. One is Charles Martin Loeffler, and the other is Gustav Strube. Mr. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin by Mr. Strube. It has been played in Boston and Philadelphia with great success, and is to be played next week in New York. The programme, as a whole, is as follows:

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F-sharp minor for violin.....Strube
Symphony in C minor No. 1.....Brahms

...TRIBU...
...ber 21, 1906

...OPENING QUIET.

...ttended by Physicians, ...erformance from Box.

...on at the Metropolitan opened last ...al mildness, though the house was ...nd Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Farrar, ... Miss Geraldine Farrar, made her ...ppearance as Juliet, were forced to ... the performance. It was possibly ... that both the Juliet and the Romeo ...e) were new singers that the first ...lid. There was a good deal of gen... for the new singers before the ...er, and after the second act Miss ...owered with flowers, but it was a ...one the less. The speculators, who ... seats for the upper regions, were ...om at half prices even before the ...e up, and between acts in the lobby ...king, somehow, the usual festival ...the operatic opening.

... worn out by the strain of the ...atched the performance from his ...t appear in the lobby between the ...ysicians attended him during the ...

...d Mrs. Farrar, there were numerous ...e audience, to whom it was enough ... hailed from Melrose, Mass. Mr. ...any is to go to Boston for two ...son, in spite of his former resolu...ston out of his list. Charles A. ... of the Boston Orchestra, is going ...e company for the engagement at ...atre. It is likely that at that time ...ll make a second début, more en... flowers than last night's. ... was the same inside, except for ... orchestra pit and the conductor, ... water coolers in the lobbies. Both ...favor with the audience. The au..., on the whole, the familiar one; ... strange faces in the boxes. ...d detail from the traffic squad was ...handle the carriages and the limou... very popular as opera coaches this ...venth avenue approach was again ...ar, and the audience was brought ...without a hitch or a delay of any ... difficult task of getting it out ... successfully accomplished. The ...er for the roll of carriages, the ...es of "Words and music of the ...d as far north as the subway sta... the opening was, it yet proclaimed ..." There was no mistaking that.

...ON SECOND CONCERT.

...mowski, As Soloist, With The Orchestra.

...nd concert of the Boston Sym...chestra will be given in the ...next Wednesday evening at 8.15 ...The first concert last month ...at Dr. Muck's success in Bal... ...on a par with that which he ...with wherever the Boston Sym...chestra has played this year. ...tion given to him by the Balti...lic was remarkable. ...o artist will be Mr. Timothee ...ki, one of the most brilliant ...of the Orchestra, and one of ...reat virtuosi now in this coun... has played here before and ...ntroduction. ...lways been the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to encour-

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Musical Comment

Dr. Muck ended on Saturday the second month of the Symphony concerts, and in it he has subdued much of the complaint about his programmes that was murmuring a few weeks ago. The programmes of the first four concerts he made early last summer in Germany. He knew nothing at that time at first hand of his orchestra or his public. Each had equally to come to know him. As any wise conductor would do, he shaped his programmes accordingly — of familiar classics that would serve best as a medium for the gaining of this mutual knowledge. In the two months that he has spent in Boston, he has very swiftly learned the resources and capabilities of his band and the temper and interests of his public, and he has begun to arrange his programmes accordingly. Three modern symphonies—Sinding's, Glazounoff's and Bruckner's—have been played at the last three concerts. Glazounoff's was actually new to Boston; Sinding's had not been heard for seven years, and Bruckner's for nearly twenty. Two of the three virtuosi—Petschnikoff and Rosenthal—have played modern, if more familiar, concertos. In fact, in the last three weeks there have been only three classics on the programmes —Chopin's first concerto, Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture upon which Dr. Muck was bound to prove his skill. Surely there is no ground for complaint over the interest or the freshness of the last three programmes. The worst that can be said of them is that perhaps they have followed a little too rigidly the severe Viennese model of overture, concerto, symphony. Two weeks hence, however, there will be no symphony at the concerts, and a new tone-poem by Mr. Chadwick stands on the list. Later in the winter, Mr. Converse's music is to have a place, and there will be room for Debussy and other of the "new" Frenchmen. In a word Dr. Muck, like the discreet man he is, has preferred to discover his public and his band before he made many programmes. Now he has set about the task with a discernment that some of his predecessors were much slower to acquire.

As the concerts go forward, there seems, too, very little cause for the alarm that some listeners, especially in New York, have professed to feel lest the precision, the finesse and the euphony of the orchestra should suffer under the new vigor, elasticity and sonority that Dr. Muck is giving it. They have rejoiced—they could not, indeed, help rejoicing—in the full-throated and spontaneous sonority that the band brought to Sinding's symphony or to the tumbling finale of Glazounoff's. Yet was not this vigor costing the orchestra a little of its delicacy of tone and rhythm? The scherzo of Glazounoff's symphony and a score of the finer passages in Bruckner's tested both, and it was hard to detect the smallest loss. One of the compensating beauties of Bruckner's music is the penetrating or caressing euphony of some of his instrumental combinations. They sounded on Saturday like the voices of his visions. The brass of the band speaks full-voiced now, but its tones keep their mellow sonority. The delicate euphonic blending of orchestra and solo instrument has seldom been higher than it was when Mr. Rosenthal played Liszt's concerto or Mr. Petschnikoff Tschaikovski's. Moreover, it is the new sonority that Dr. Muck gains from the orchestra that filled Sinding's symphony with its viking voice of passion; and the new elasticity that seized the Russian's rhythm and animated the overture to "Oberon" and the "Leonore" overture with fresh dramatic vitality. Perhaps Dr. Muck was overdisposed to draw the last drop of musical and emotional contrast out of Beethoven's overture; but the whole impression was still of the flinging of it anew and spontaneously upon our ears and our emotions. As long as we of the younger generation can remember our orchestra has been a beautiful thing. Now the range of its beauty is wider, the height and the depth of it ampler. There is more character diversifying it and more vitality coursing through it.

Bruckner's symphony was better received on Saturday than it had been on Friday. The listeners were less restless, though there were still signs of weariness, and the applause was much heartier, even to recalling Dr. Muck, as if in thanks for the revival of the symphony. Yet a second hearing of the music brought little change in the impression that it originally made. It struggles under the severest of burdens that may rest upon any thing of the arts—its salient defects are exactly of the sort that most defeat its salient virtues. The beauty of some of the melodies, of moments in their development, of the color that some of the instrumental combinations impart to them, is of the purity or the iridescence of a vision of the ideal. Bruckner touches at moments an ecstasy of disembodied loveliness, of idealized feeling that only César Franck among modern composers has attained. Franck, however, maintains this ecstasy. The listener may hear Franck's music and be conscious of nothing else. Bruckner not only fails to maintain it; he falls away, and on the instant, into the shallows of finicking pedantry or the wastes of baldness. When he is not winged, he slouches. When he is not the Bruckner of ideal visions, he is Bruckner the peasant of Windhag or the pedagogue of Vienna. The singleness of mind that absorbs him in his visions makes him forget that others beside Bruckners were to hear his music. He bids them at moments into a world of his own creating and that only music could create. Then he misses the clew and leaves them groping and weary. The result is inevitable: the world loses its illusion and they renounce pursuit for it.

...sical accompaniments that least, perhaps, and sure, to answer the composer's imagination. The concerto may sound, and with reason, like a hard and brilliant showpiece. It may sound, even as Mr. Joseffy makes it, as a soft tapestry of bright and changeful tonal colors. And it may be the heroic rhapsody into which Mr. Rosenthal transforms it. The music glowed as he struck it from the piano. The very rhythms had a passion of motion. The ornaments were as hot flashes of fancy. The melodies were as the spontaneous voice of kindling and transporting feeling. Here was romance speaking in its largest, warmest, richest voice. And when it called there was no room for the thought of the mastery of the instrument or of the music by which it spoke and was made alive. Mr. Rosenthal did not read the concerto; he read Liszt's imagination as he wrote; he read the romantic ardor, the heroic sweep, the tonal magnificence of it all. And his reading was re-creation.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

POST

WASHINGTON, D. C.

NOV 29 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

It is seldom indeed that any organization for the performance of chamber music has met with such speedy and conclusive success in Washington as that which was the fortune last winter of the Boston Symphony Quartet. This year another series of three concerts is to be given, but in the afternoon instead of the evening. As last year, they will be given in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel, and the first is scheduled for Wednesday afternoon, December 5, at 4 o'clock.

POST

WASHINGTON, D. C.

NOV 29 1906

Saint-Saens with Boston Symphony.

Despite the many announcements concerning the coming to this country of Paderewski to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, it was only finally settled the other day that it would be impossible for him to keep his engagement. Paderewski was announced for the January concert of the orchestra in Washington and the management at once took steps to secure an adequate substitute for the great Polish pianist, and thus keep faith with the public. The outcome of this was the engagement of Camille Saint-Saens for the coming concert in Washington, on December 4.

Boston Herald, (about) October 17, 1906

A SOUVENIR OF DR. MUCK'S STUDENT DAYS AT LEIPSIC

DR. KARL MUCK AND MR. JOHN LUND.

The Herald publishes today an interesting picture of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, from a photograph taken in his student days at the Leipsic Conservatory of Music in 1878, when he was 20 years old. Dr. Muck is seated at the piano. The student standing is Mr. John Lund, who is now the conductor of Fritzi Scheff's operetta company. Mr. Lund while at Leipsic composed a piano sonata which was played by Dr. Muck at the graduation exercises. The sonata is on the piano rack in the photograph.

Mr. Lund came to the United States with Dr. Damrosch. He went to Buffalo, where he did much for the development of music in that city as conductor of the Buffalo Orchestra Association, of the Orpheus Society, and of festivals of the Musical Association. He has been the conductor of Mme. Scheff's company since she established her operetta company.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BULLETIN

PHILADELPHIA, PA

DEC 1 - 1906

The postponement of Paderewski's appearance in America until next season is said to be due to the fact that he has found it necessary to make many changes in the orchestration of his new symphony, which he was to have played here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next month, and that the work will not be ready for presentation as expected. It is now settled that Paderewski will bring the symphony to this country next October, when he comes for a series of one hundred concerts.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BULLETIN

PHILADELPHIA, PA

DEC 1 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert at the Academy of Music next Monday evening. The program will be made unusually interesting in the presentation by Mr. Muck of Brahms's C minor symphony, No. 1, and the appearance as soloist of Moriz Rosenthal, the distinguished pianist, after an absence of eight years. The symphony, under Mr. Muck's direction, is said to have created something of a sensation in New York three weeks ago. The return of Rosenthal is an event of importance in the musical season, as he is considered one of the few really great pianists in the world. He will play the Liszt concerto in E flat major, and in addition to the Brahms symphony the orchestra is to give the overture to Weber's "Oberon."

N. Y. TRIBUNE.

Nov. 27, 1906

OPERA OPENING QUIET.

Conried, Attended by Physicians, Watches Performance from Box.

The opera season at the Metropolitan opened last night with unusual mildness, though the house was quite sold out, and Mr. and Mrs. [illegible] Farrar, whose daughter, Miss Geraldine Farrar, made her first American appearance as Juliet, were forced to stand up during the performance. It was possibly due to the fact that both the Juliet and the Romeo (Mr. Rousselière) were new singers that the first night was so mild. There was a good deal of genuine enthusiasm for the new singers before the evening was over, and after the second act Miss Farrar was showered with flowers, but it was a quiet opening, none the less. The speculators, who had numerous seats for the upper regions, were glad to sell them at half prices even before the curtain had gone up, and between acts in the lobby there was lacking, somehow, the usual festival atmosphere of the operatic opening.

Mr. Conried, worn out by the strain of the Caruso case, watched the performance from his box and did not appear in the lobby between the acts. Two physicians attended him during the night.

Besides Mr. and Mrs. Farrar, there were numerous Bostonians in the audience, to whom it was enough that the Juliet hailed from Melrose, Mass. Mr. Conried's company is to go to Boston for two weeks this season, in spite of his former resolution to cut Boston out of his list. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Orchestra, is going to take over the company for the engagement at the Boston Theatre. It is likely that at that time Miss Farrar will make a second début, more encumbered with flowers than last night's.

The old house was the same inside, except for a hood over the orchestra pit and the conductor, and added spring water coolers in the lobbies. Both seemed to find favor with the audience. The audience, too, was, on the whole, the familiar one; there were few strange faces in the boxes.

The experienced detail from the traffic squad was there early to handle the carriages and the limousines, which are very popular as opera coaches this season. The Seventh avenue approach was again used, as last year, and the audience was brought into the house without a hitch or a delay of any sort. The more difficult task of getting it out again was also successfully accomplished. The Rialto was gayer for the roll of carriages, the crowds, the cries of "Words and music of the opera!" bellowed as far north as the subway station. Quiet as the opening was, it yet proclaimed the season "on." There was no mistaking that.

NEWS BALTIMORE

Dec 1-06

BOSTON [illegible] CONCERT.

Mr. Adamowski, As Soloist, With The Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock. The first concert last month showed that Dr. Muck's success in Baltimore is on a par with that which he has met with wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played this year. The reception given to him by the Baltimore public was remarkable.

The solo artist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most brilliant violinists of the Orchestra, and one of the real great virtuosi now in this country. He has played here before and needs no introduction.

It has always been the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to encourage its members to write and two men of decided note have come from its ranks. One is Charles Martin Loeffler, and the other is Gustav Strube. Mr. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin by Mr. Strube. It has been played in Boston and Philadelphia with great success, and is to be played next week in New York. The programme, as a whole, is as follows:

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar".....Rimsky-Korsakof
Concerto in F-sharp minor for violin.....Strube
Symphony in C minor No. 1.....Brahms

...n Camera...
... WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Musical Comment

Dr. Muck ended on Saturday the second month of the Symphony concerts, and in it he has subdued much of the complaint about his programmes that was murmuring a few weeks ago. The programmes of the first four concerts he made early last summer in Germany. He knew nothing at that time at first hand of his orchestra or his public. Each had equally to come to know him. As any wise conductor would do, he shaped his programmes accordingly — of familiar classics that would serve best as a medium for the gaining of this mutual knowledge. In the two months that he has spent in Boston, he has very swiftly learned the resources and capabilities of his band and the temper and interests of his public, and he has begun to arrange his programmes accordingly. Three modern symphonies—Sinding's, Glazounoff's and Bruckner's—have been played at the last three concerts. Glazounoff's was actually new to Boston; Sinding's had not been heard for seven years, and Bruckner's for nearly twenty. Two of the three virtuosi—Petschnikoff and Rosenthal—have played modern, if more familiar, concertos. In fact, in the last three weeks there have been only three classics on the programmes—Chopin's first concerto, Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture upon which Dr. Muck was bound to prove his skill. Surely there is no ground for complaint over the interest or the freshness of the last three programmes. The worst that can be said of them is that perhaps they have followed a little too rigidly the severe Viennese model of overture, concerto, symphony. Two weeks hence, however, there will be no symphony at the concerts, and a new tone-poem by Mr. Chadwick stands on the list. Later in the winter, Mr. Converse's music is to have a place, and there will be room for Debussy and other of the "new" Frenchmen. In a word Dr. Muck, like the discreet man he is, has preferred to discover his public and his band before he made many programmes. Now he has set about the task with a discernment that some of his predecessors were much slower to acquire.

As the concerts go forward, there seems, too, very little cause for the alarm that some listeners, especially in New York, have professed to feel lest the precision, the finesse and the euphony of the orchestra should suffer under the new vigor, elasticity and sonority that Dr. Muck is giving it. They have rejoiced—they could not, indeed, help rejoicing—in the full-throated and spontaneous sonority that the band brought to Sinding's symphony or to the tumbling finale of Glazounoff's. Yet was not this vigor costing the orchestra a little of its delicacy of tone and rhythm? The scherzo of Glazounoff's symphony and a score of the finer passages in Bruckner's tested both, and it was hard to detect the smallest loss. One of the compensating beauties of Bruckner's music is the penetrating or caressing euphony of some of his instrumental combinations. They sounded on Saturday like the voices of his visions. The brass of the band speaks full-voiced now, but its tones keep their mellow sonority. The delicate euphonic blending of orchestra and solo instrument has seldom been higher than it was when Mr. Rosenthal played Liszt's concerto or Mr. Petschnikoff Tschaikovski's. Moreover, it is the new sonority that Dr. Muck gains from the orchestra that filled Sinding's symphony with its viking voice of passion; and the new elasticity that seized the Russian's rhythm and animated the overture to "Oberon" and the "Leonore" overture with fresh dramatic vitality. Perhaps Dr. Muck was overdisposed to draw the last drop of musical and emotional contrast out of Beethoven's overture; but the whole impression was still of the flinging of it anew and spontaneously upon our ears and our emotions. As long as we of the younger generation can remember our orchestra has been a beautiful thing. Now the range of its beauty is wider, the height and the depth of it ampler. There is more character diversifying it and more vitality coursing through it.

Bruckner's symphony was better received on Saturday than it had been on Friday. The listeners were less restless, though there were still signs of weariness, and the applause was much heartier, even to recalling Dr. Muck, as if in thanks for the revival of the symphony. Yet a second hearing of the music brought little change in the impression that it originally made. It struggles under the severest of burdens that may rest upon any thing of the arts—its salient defects are exactly of the sort that most defeat its salient virtues. The beauty of some of the melodies, of moments in their development, of the color that some of the instrumental combinations impart to them, is of the purity or the iridescence of a vision of the ideal. Bruckner touches at moments an ecstasy of disembodied loveliness, of idealized feeling that only César Franck among modern composers has attained. Franck, however, maintains this ecstasy. The listener may hear Franck's music and be conscious of nothing else. Bruckner not only fails to maintain it; he falls away, and on the instant, into the shallows of finicking pedantry or the wastes of baldness. When he is not winged, he slouches. When he is not the Bruckner of ideal visions, he is Bruckner the peasant of Windhag or the pedagogue of Vienna. The singleness of mind that absorbs him in his visions makes him forget that others beside Bruckners were to hear his music. He bids them at moments into a world of his own creating and that only music could create. Then he misses the clew and leaves them groping and weary. The result is inevitable: the world loses its illusion and they renounce the quest for it.

... Symphony ... Liszt's concerto ... Mr. Rosenthal's playing of it seemed the other extreme of musical achievement. The music itself sounded like an heroic improvisation, wrought in sustained passion with means that leapt, perfect and sure, to answer the composer's imagination. The concerto may sound, and with reason, like a hard and brilliant showpiece. It may sound, even as Mr. Joseffy makes it, as a soft tapestry of bright and changeful tonal colors. And it may be the heroic rhapsody into which Mr. Rosenthal transforms it. The music glowed as he struck it from the piano. The very rhythms had a passion of motion. The ornaments were as hot flashes of fancy. The melodies were as the spontaneous voice of kindling and transporting feeling. Here was romance speaking in its largest, warmest, richest voice. And when it called there was no room for the thought of the mastery of the instrument or of the music by which it spoke and was made alive. Mr. Rosenthal did not read the concerto; he read Liszt's imagination as he wrote; he read the romantic ardor, the heroic sweep, the tonal magnificence of it all. And his reading was re-creation.

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...OST
...ASHINGTON, D. C.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

It is seldom indeed that any organization for the performance of chamber music has met with such speedy and conclusive success in Washington as that which was the fortune last winter of the Boston Symphony Quartet. This year another series of three concerts is to be given, but in the afternoon instead of the evening. As last year, they will be given in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel, and the first is scheduled for Wednesday afternoon, December 5, at 4 o'clock.

...POST
...ASHINGTON, D. C.
ss

Saint-Saens with Boston Symphony.

Despite the many announcements concerning the coming to this country of Paderewski to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, it was only finally settled the other day that it would be impossible for him to keep his engagement. Paderewski was announced for the January concert of the orchestra in Washington and the management at once took steps to secure an adequate substitute for the great Polish pianist, and thus keep faith with the public. The outcome of this was the engagement of Camille Saint-Saens for the coming concert in Washington, on December 4.

Boston Herald,(about)October 17, 1906

A SOUVENIR OF DR. MUCK'S STUDENT DAYS AT LEIPSIC

DR. KARL MUCK AND MR. JOHN LUND.

The Herald publishes today an interesting picture of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, from a photograph taken in his student days at the Leipsic Conservatory of Music in 1879, when he was 20 years old. Dr. Muck is seated at the piano. The student standing is Mr. John Lund, who is now the conductor of Fritzi Scheff's operetta company. Mr. Lund while at Leipsic composed a piano sonata which was played by Dr. Muck at the graduation exercises. The sonata is on the piano rack in the photograph.

Mr. Lund came to the United States with Dr. Damrosch. He went to Buffalo, where he did much for the development of music in that city as conductor of the Buffalo Orchestra Association, of the Orpheus Society, and of festivals of the Musical Association. He has been the conductor of Mme. Scheff's company since she established her operetta company.

...N. Y. TRIBU
...ress
...e Oct 21, 1906

OPERA OPENING QUIET.

Conried, Attended by Physicians, Watches Performance from Box.

The opera season at the Metropolitan opened last night with unusual mildness, though the house was quite sold out, and Mr. and Mrs. [illegible] Farrar, whose daughter, Miss Geraldine Farrar, made her first American appearance as Juliet, were forced to stand up during the performance. It was possibly due to the fact that both the Juliet and the Romeo (Mr. Rousselière) were new singers that the first night was so mild. There was a good deal of genuine enthusiasm for the new singers before the evening was over, and after the second act Miss Farrar was showered with flowers, but it was a quiet opening, none the less. The speculators, who had numerous seats for the upper regions, were glad to sell them at half prices even before the curtain had gone up, and between acts in the lobby there was lacking, somehow, the usual festival atmosphere of the operatic opening.

Mr. Conried, worn out by the strain of the Caruso case, watched the performance from his box and did not appear in the lobby between the acts. Two physicians attended him during the night.

Besides Mr. and Mrs. Farrar, there were numerous Bostonians in the audience, to whom it was enough that the Juliet hailed from Melrose, Mass. Mr. Conried's company is to go to Boston for two weeks this season, in spite of his former resolution to cut Boston out of his list. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Orchestra, is going to take over the company for the engagement at the Boston Theatre. It is likely that at that time Miss Farrar will make a second début, more encumbered with flowers than last night's.

The old house was the same inside, except for a hood over the orchestra pit and the conductor, and added spring water coolers in the lobbies. Both seemed to find favor with the audience. The audience, too, was, on the whole, the familiar one; there were few strange faces in the boxes.

The experienced detail from the traffic squad was there early to handle the carriages and the limousines, which are very popular as opera coaches this season. The Seventh avenue approach was again used, as last year, and the audience was brought into the house without a hitch or a delay of any sort. The more difficult task of getting it out again was also successfully accomplished. The Rialto was gayer for the roll of carriages, the crowds, the cries of "Words and music of the opera!" bellowed as far north as the subway station. Quiet as the opening was, it yet proclaimed the season "on." There was no mistaking that.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...ULLETIN
...n
...PHILADELPHIA, PA.
...ress
...e Oct 1 - 1906

The postponement of Paderewski's appearance in America until next season is said to be due to the fact that he has found it necessary to make many changes in the orchestration of his new symphony, which he was to have played here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next month, and that the work will not be ready for presentation as expected. It is now settled that Paderewski will bring the symphony to this country next October, when he comes for a series of one hundred concerts.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...ULLETIN
...s ...PHILADELPHIA, PA.
... - 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert at the Academy of Music next Monday evening. The program will be made unusually interesting in the presentation by Mr. Muck of Brahms's C minor symphony, No. 1, and the appearance as soloist of Moriz Rosenthal, the distinguished pianist, after an absence of eight years. The symphony, under Mr. Muck's direction, is said to have created something of a sensation in New York three weeks ago. The return of Rosenthal is an event of importance in the musical season, as he is considered one of the few really great pianists in the world. He will play the Liszt concerto in E flat major, and in addition to the Brahms symphony the orchestra is to give the overture to Weber's "Oberon."

...m
...ress
...e Oct 27 1906

BOSTON SECOND CONCERT.

Mr. Adamowski, As Soloist, With The Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock. The first concert last month showed that Dr. Muck's success in Baltimore is on a par with that which he has met with wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played this year. The reception given to him by the Baltimore public was remarkable.

The solo artist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most brilliant violinists of the Orchestra, and one of the real great virtuosi now in this country. He has played here before and needs no introduction.

It has always been the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to encourage its members to write and two men of decided note have come from its ranks. One is Charles Martin Loeffler, and the other is Gustav Strube. Mr. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin by Mr. Strube. It has been played in Boston and Philadelphia with great success, and is to be played next week in New York. The programme, as a whole, is as follows:

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F-sharp minor for violin.....Strube
Symphony in C minor No. 1.....Brahms

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 2

The second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, with Saint-Saens as the soloist, comes off at the New National next Tuesday afternoon. It is said that the majority of seats have already been sold by subscription, and that but few remain for the casual purchaser. Saint-Saens has made one of the greatest sensations of the American musical world in many years, and there is no doubt that he is not only a great composer, but one of the most remarkable pianists, in spite of his seventy-one years, who has ever come over. Hundreds have been turned away from his concerts in New York, Chicago and Boston. Dr. Muck has yielded to a general request from subscribers and put on his program Beethoven's Symphony in C Minor. His performance of the Brahm's symphony last month stamped him as one of the greatest conductors in the world, and his interpretation of Beethoven's C Minor will be listened to with keen interest. Aside from this the program will include the overture of Weber's "Oberon" and Saint-Saens' Concerto for the pianoforte in G Minor No. 2.

New Willard—Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first of the Boston Symphony Quartet's three Washington concerts takes place in the ballroom of the New Willard next Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock. A large subscription list seems to assure the success of the series from the start. The quartet is composed, as it was last year, of Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Atto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola; Heinrich Warnke, 'cello. Prof. Hess has secured a number of interesting novelties, and his program promises to be delightful. One of these, to be the feature next Wednesday, is a string quartet by Hugo Kaun, which had its first American performance in Boston on the 19th of last month. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker, of Boston. Beside the Kaun quartet, the Beethoven string quartet in G major, and the Dvorak piano quartet in E-flat major will be given. Tickets to be had of T. Arthur Smith at Sanders & Stayman's.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, P
DEC 2 - 1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its concert tomorrow night Weber's "Oberon" overture, Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in E flat major, and Brahms's C minor symphony, the work which caused Von Buelow's flattering remark, "We have at last a tenth symphony!" Whereas the interest of the first concert was the debut of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor here, the first local appearance as soloist of Moriz Rosenthal tomorrow night will give importance and lustre to the second. Rosenthal's recent return to America, after eight years' absence, has been one of the features of the present concert season. He is a technician of surpassing achievement and a man of broad culture, a student of literature and philosophy as well. Philadelphians will have ample opportunity of judging of the quality of this great Roumanian pianist, as Rosenthal will make a second appearance here in December, playing with our own orchestra at the concerts on the 21st and 22d of that month.

First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World JOURNAL
BALTIMORE.
DEC 2 - 1900

ADAMOWSKI SOLOIST

Will Appear At Boston Symphony Concert.

PEABODY RECITAL PROGRAM

Senor Gogorza To Sing At Conservatory—St. Saens To Play Tomorrow.

The most important musical event in Baltimore this week will be the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given Wednesday evening at the Lyric. The performances will be the second of the season's series by the Boston Symphony and will probably be largely attended. At the concert last month Dr. Karl Muck, the new director, was accorded such an enthusiastic reception that it has assured his success and popularity in this city in the future.

Impressive as the new conductor appears at one concert, his artistic stature increases with each subsequent hearing. When it was prophesied by those who knew his work in Germany that his coming to America would be the most important event in the season, there was some skepticism. But in the case of Dr. Muck more is being realized that anyone promised. He has had tremendous receptions, not merely in Baltimore, but in Washington, Philadelphia and New York. His popularity is based on the solid foundation of actual worth. He resorts to no species of sensationalism to win the plaudits of the public.

Mr. Timothy Adamowski, one of the violinists of the orchestra, will be the soloist.

The following program will be given:

Overture to the Betrothed of the Czar. Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F-sharp minor for violin.....Strube
Symphony in C minor No. 1.....Brahms

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 2 - 1900

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. The concert will be notable for two facts. The first of these is that Dr. Muck has chosen for the symphony Brahms' in C minor, No 1, the performance of which under his direction created such an extraordinary sensation in New York three weeks ago. The other fact is the reappearance for the first time in eight years of Moriz Rosenthal. When Dr. Muck gave the performance of this symphony in Boston early in October it was received with cheers by the very conservative audiences that come to the Symphony concerts in Boston. Brahms' music as a rule and as it is generally played, does not excite audiences to such demonstrations of enthusiasm, but in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, November [illegible] was repeated, Dr. Muck getting no less than six recalls at the end of the performance. The program will be as follows:—

Weber, overture "Oberon;" Liszt, concerto for pianoforte in E-flat major, No. [illegible]; Brahms, symphony in C minor, No. 1.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 2 - 1900

That Paderewski is not coming to America this Winter to play a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last Fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. It is now settled that Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907. During the season of 1907-8 the great pianist will give about one hundred concerts in this country under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis of Boston.

[85]

NORTH AMERICAN
PHILADELPHIA, P
DEC 2 - 1900

Moriz Rosenthal, piano virtuoso, is to be the stellar attraction at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of the season at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. This many-sided musical artist is also a profound scholar, a doctor of philosophy and an earnest student of literature and the fine arts. He will illustrate in the Liszt E flat major concerto a technique that is pronounced gigantic, together with a profundity of interpretation all his own.

The orchestra numbers at this concert will be the "Oberon" overture and Brahms' first symphony in C minor. Dr. Muck's rendering of this most complex and mystical of Brahms' creations has already aroused a large measure of enthusiasm in critical Boston and in New York.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, P
DEC 2 - 1900

Boston Symphony Concert Tomorrow

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. The concert will be notable for two facts; the first of these is that Dr. Muck has chosen for the symphony Brahm's in C minor No. 1, the performance which, under his direction, created such an extraordinary sensation in New York three weeks ago. The other fact is the reappearance for the first time in eight years of Moris Rosenthal.

The program for the concert will be as follows:

Weber.....Overture "Oberon"
Liszt.....
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat major, No. 1
Brahms.....Symphony in C minor, No. 1

om HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
ddress
ate DEC 2 -

The decision has been reached that Paderewski, who was reported to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will find it impossible to keep his engagement, and the soloist for the concert at the New National Theater will be Dr. Camille Saint-Saens, the eminent French composer, who will play his own concerto in G minor, No. 2, for pianoforte. The programme for the second concert, December 4, will include, overture to the opera "Oberon," Weber, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Opus 67.

The day following the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place in the New Willard ballroom at 4 o'clock. The following programme will be played: Quartet in G minor, Op. 18, No. 2, Beethoven; quartet in D major, Op. 41, No. 2, Hugo Kaun; quartet for piano, violin, viola, and violoncello, E flat major, Op. 87. The assisting artist will be Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 2 - 1900

Boston Symphony Quartet.

One of the novelties to be played next Wednesday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet is a string quartet by Hugo Kaun, which had its first performance in America at Boston on the 19th of last month. The assisting artist at this concert will be Hiram G. Tucker, of Boston, a pianist most favorably known in that part of the country. The programme will be as follows: Beethoven, string quartet in G major, opus 18, No. 2; Hugo Kaun, string quartet in D major, opus 41, No. 2, and Dvorak, piano quartet in E flat major, opus 87. The concert will take place at 4 o'clock at the New Willard.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The only appearance of the great composer, Saint-Saens, in this city with orchestra will take place next Tuesday, when he will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, at the National Theater, at 4:30 in the afternoon. The programme will be as follows: Weber, overture "Oberon;" Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2; Beethoven, symphony in C minor, No. 5.

n NEW YORK PRESS
ress
e DEC 5 - 1900

Roosevelt Attends Concert.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4.—President Roosevelt attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the National Theatre to-day. He was accompanied by Secretary and Mrs. Taft and Senator and Mrs. Lodge.

AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
DEC 2 - 1900

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening at 8:15. The first concert last month showed that Dr. Muck's success in Baltimore is on a par with that which he has met with wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played this year. The reception given to him by the Baltimore public was magnificent, and the best part of it is that it was wholly deserved. Impressive as this new conductor appears at one concert, his artistic stature increases with each subsequent hearing. When it was prophesied by those who knew his work in Germany that his coming to America would be the most important event in the present season, there was naturally more or less skepticism, because prophesies of that nature are so often made and so seldom realized. But in the case of Dr. Muck more is being realized than anyone promised. He has had tremendous receptions, not only in Baltimore, but in Washington, Philadelphia and New York. His popularity is based on the solid foundation of actual worth, because, as Baltimore has already learned, he resorts to no species of sensationalism to win the plaudits of the public.

One of the most remarkable scenes in the history of the orchestra took place in New York on Saturday afternoon, November 10, at the end of the performance of Brahms' Symphony in C minor. Dr. Muck was recalled six times and was able then to stop the applause only by having the members of the orchestra rise and acknowledge it. There was not a dissenting note in the criticism of the concert, and the critics proclaimed that Brahms' great symphony had really been heard in New York for the first time. The performance had been a revelation and recreation. It is this symphony that Baltimore will hear next Wednesday, and the musical folk of this city will then have a chance to judge whether they agree with Boston and New York.

The solo artist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most brilliant violinists of the orchestra, and one of the real great virtuosi now in this country. He has played here before and needs no introduction. It has always been the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to encourage its members to write, and two men of decided note have come from its ranks. One is Charles Martin Loeffler, and the other is Gustav Strube. Mr. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin by Mr. Strube. It has been played in Boston and Philadelphia with great success, and is to be played next week in New York.

The program as a whole is as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakoff—
Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar."
Strube—
Concerto in F-sharp minor for violin.
Brahms—
Symphony in C minor No. 1.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR
om
WASHINGTON, D. dress
te

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Few tickets are available for sale for the second Boston Symphony concert on next Tuesday afternoon, when Washington is to have its only chance to hear Camille Saint-Saens play one of his own concertos. Saint-Saens has been placed as soloist for this concert at the eleventh hour—as soon as it was finally settled that Paderewski was not to come to America this year.

Whatever may have been the expectations of the distinguished French visitor, it is certain that he has made one of the greatest sensations in the American musical world in many years. American people as a rule thought that his coming to this country would be a chance to honor a composer who has contributed so much to the delights of music. After his debut in New York it was discovered that this man of seventy-one years was a most astonishing pianist, and it is not going too far to say that in the pianist, so far as our public is concerned, the composer has been lost. As M. Saint-Saens' appearances are limited to twenty, all told, he will not be heard again with orchestra in this city.

Dr. Muck has yielded to a general request from the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts, and has put on his program Beethoven's symphony in C minor. The program will consist of Weber's overture, "Oberron;" Saint-Saens' concerto for pianoforte in G minor No. 2, and Beethoven's symphony in C minor No. 5.

om N. Y. TRIBUNE,
ldress
te DEC 5 - 1900

THE DIPLOMATIC CORPS.

[From The Tribune Bureau.]

Washington, Dec. 4.—The German Ambassador and Baroness von Sternburg gave a box party at the Boston Symphony concert this afternoon, having as their guests Mr. White, the American Ambassador to Italy; Miss Edith Root, Mrs. Bacon and Count Hatzfeldt, of the German Embassy staff.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

WASHINGTON, D.

ss

...ational—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert, with Saint-Saens as the soloist, comes off at the National next Tuesday afternoon. It is said that the majority of seats have already been sold by subscription, and that but few remain for the casual purchaser. Saint-Saens has made one of the greatest sensations of the American musical world in many years, and there is no doubt that he is not only a great composer, but one of the most remarkable pianists, in spite of his seventy-one years, who has ever come over. Hundreds have been turned away from his concerts in New York, Chicago and Boston.

Dr. Muck has yielded to a general request from subscribers and put on his program Beethoven's Symphony in C Minor. His performance of the Brahm's Symphony last month stamped his as one of the greatest conductors in the world, and his interpretation of Beethoven's C Minor will be listened to with keen interest. Aside from this the program will include the overture of Weber's "Oberon" and Saint-Saens' Concerto for the pianoforte in G Minor No. 2.

New Willard—Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first of the Boston Symphony Quartet's three Washington concerts takes place in the ballroom of the New Willard next Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock. A large subscription list seems to assure the success of the series from the start. The quartet is composed, as it was last year, of Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Atto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferle, viola; Heinrich Warnke, 'cello. Prof. Hess has secured a number of interesting novelties, and his program promises to be delightful. One of these, to be the feature next Wednesday, is a string quartet by Hugo Kaun, which had its first American performance in Boston on the 19th of last month. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker, of Boston. Beside the Kaun quartet, the Beethoven string quartet in C major, and the Dvorak piano quartet in E-flat major will be given. Tickets to be had of T. Arthur Smith at Sanders & Stayman's.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...ss

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its concert tomorrow night Weber's "Oberon" overture, Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in E flat major, and Brahms's C minor symphony, the work which caused Von Buelow's flattering remark, "We have at last a tenth symphony!" Whereas the interest of the first concert was the debut of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor here, the first local appearance as soloist of Moriz Rosenthal tomorrow night will give importance and lustre to the second. Rosenthal's recent return to America, after eight years' absence, has been one of the features of the present concert season. He is a technician of surpassing achievement and a man of broad culture, a student of literature and philosophy as well. Philadelphians will have ample opportunity of judging of the quality of this great Roumanian pianist, as Rosenthal will make a second appearance here in December, playing with our own orchestra at the concerts on the 21st and 22d of that month.

First Established and Most Complete ...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ADAMOWSKI SOLOIST

Will Appear At Boston Symphony Concert.

PEABODY RECITAL PROGRAM

Senor Gogarza To Sing At Conservatory—St. Saens To Play Tomorrow.

The most important musical event in Baltimore this week will be the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given Wednesday evening at the Lyric. The performances will be the second of the season's series by the Boston Symphony and will probably be largely attended. At the concert last month Dr. Karl Muck, the new director, was accorded such an enthusiastic reception that it has assured his success and popularity in this city in the future.

Impressive as the new conductor appears at one concert, his artistic stature increases with each subsequent hearing. When it was prophesied by those who knew his work in Germany that his coming to America would be the most important event in the season, there was some skepticism. But in the case of Dr. Muck more is being realized that anyone promised. He has had tremendous receptions, not merely in Baltimore, but in Washington, Philadelphia and New York. His popularity is based on the solid foundation of actual worth. He resorts to no species of sensationalism to win the plaudits of the public.

Mr. Timothy Adamowski, one of the violinists of the orchestra, will be the soloist.

The following program will be given:

Overture to the Betrothed of the Czar.
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F-sharp minor for violin.....Strube
Symphony in C minor No. 1.....Brahms

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Moriz Rosenthal as Soloist With Boston Symphony.

PADEREWSKI TO STAY ABROAD

Johanna Gadski to Be Heard at the Next Philadelphia Orchestra Concerts—Symphony by Robert Volkmann.

After eight years' absence from America, Moriz Rosenthal, the pianist, whose wonderful technique was the marvel of masters of the pianoforte, has returned here to appear in concert. His first local engagement is for to-morrow night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, and there is the greatest interest to see and hear him.

At the concert to-morrow evening the principal offering by the orchestra will be Brahms' Symphony in C minor, No. 1, the performance of which, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, created a sensation in New York three weeks ago. The other number on the program is the "Oberon" overture by Weber.

In connection with the Boston Symphony concerts, the definite announcement is made that Paderewski will not be heard this season in America. He was to have been the soloist at the January concert, and he was to have made only eight appearances in this country. It is asserted that his determination to remain abroad is due to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. It is also said that he was much chagrined at a report to the effect that he was to receive a large amount of money as a perquisite for playing exclusively a special make of piano.

Last summer, when C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw Paderewski at his home in Morges, Switzerland, the symphony was finished with the exception of the instrumentation of the last movement. In doing this work Paderewski discovered that he would have to make a great many changes. He sent word that to hear the symphony produced for the first time by the greatest orchestra in the world was his great ambition, and if he came to America without it he would have absolutely no heart in his concerts and could not possibly do himself justice. It is now settled that Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Orchestra. During the season of 1907-08 the great pianist will give about 100 concerts in this country under the management of Ellis.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...ss

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. The concert will be notable for two facts. The first of these is that Dr. Muck has chosen for the symphony Brahms' in C minor, No 1, the performance of which under his direction created such an extraordinary sensation in New York three weeks ago. The other fact is the reappearance for the first time in eight years of Moriz Rosenthal. When Dr. Muck gave the performance of this symphony in Boston early in October it was received with cheers by the very conservative audiences that come to the Symphony concerts in Boston. Brahms' music as a rule and as it is generally played, does not excite audiences to such demonstrations of enthusiasm, but in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, November ... was repeated, Dr. Muck getting no less than six recalls at the end of the performance. The program will be as follows:—

Weber, overture "Oberon;" Liszt, concerto for pianaforte in E-flat major, No. 1; Brahms, symphony in C minor, No. 1.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World

That Paderewski is not coming to America this Winter to play a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last Fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. It is now settled that Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907. During the season of 1907-8 the great pianist will give about one hundred concerts in this country under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, of Boston.

[85]

...ss

Rosenthal With Boston Orchestra.

Moriz Rosenthal, piano virtuoso, is to be the stellar attraction at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of the season at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. This many-sided musical artist is also a profound scholar, a doctor of philosophy and an earnest student of literature and the fine arts. He will illustrate in the Liszt E flat major concerto a technique that is pronounced gigantic, together with a profundity of interpretation all his own.

The orchestra numbers at this concert will be the "Oberon" overture and Brahms' first symphony in C minor. Dr. Muck's rendering of this most complex and mystical of Brahms' creations has already aroused a large measure of enthusiasm in critical Boston and in New York.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...ss

Boston Symphony Concert Tomorrow

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. The concert will be notable for two facts; the first of these is that Dr. Muck has chosen for the symphony Brahm's in C minor No. 1, the performance which, under his direction, created such an extraordinary sensation in New York three weeks ago. The other fact is the reappearance for the first time in eight years of Moriz Rosenthal.

The program for the concert will be as follows:

Weber.....Overture "Oberon"
Liszt a
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat major, No. 1
Brahms.....Symphony in C minor. No. 1

...om

...ddress

...ate

The decision has been reached that Paderewski, who was reported to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will find it impossible to keep his engagement, and the soloist for the concert at the New National Theater will be Dr. Camille Saint-Saens, the eminent French composer, who will play his own concerto in G minor, No. 2, for pianoforte. The programme for the second concert, December 4, will include, overture to the opera "Oberon," Weber, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Opus 67.

The day following the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place in the New Willard ballroom at 4 o'clock. The following programme will be played: Quartet in G minor, Op. 18, No. 2, Beethoven; quartet in D major, Op. 41, No. 2, Hugo Kaun; quartet for piano, violin, viola, and violoncello, E flat major, Op. 87. The assisting artist will be Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Quartet.

One of the novelties to be played next Wednesday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet is a string quartet by Hugo Kaun, which had its first performance in America at Boston on the 19th of last month. The assisting artist at this concert will be Hiram G. Tucker, of Boston, a pianist most favorably known in that part of the country. The programme will be as follows: Beethoven, string quartet in G major, opus 18, No. 2; Hugo Kaun, string quartet in D major, opus 41, No. 2, and Dvorak, piano quartet in E flat major, opus 87. The concert will take place at 4 o'clock at the New Willard.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The only appearance of the great composer, Saint-Saens, in this city with orchestra will take place next Tuesday, when he will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, at the National Theater, at 4:30 in the afternoon. The programme will be as follows: Weber, overture "Oberon;" Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2; Beethoven, symphony in C minor, No. 5.

...n

...ress

...e

Roosevelt Attends Concert.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4.—President Roosevelt attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the National Theatre to-day. He was accompanied by Secretary and Mrs. Taft and Senator and Mrs. Lodge.

...ss

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening at 8:15. The first concert last month showed that Dr. Muck's success in Baltimore is on a par with that which he has met with wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played this year. The reception given to him by the Baltimore public was magnificent, and the best part of it is that it was wholly deserved. Impressive as this new conductor appears at one concert, his artistic stature increases with each subsequent hearing. When it was prophesied by those who knew his work in Germany that his coming to America would be the most important event in the present season, there was naturally more or less skepticism, because prophesies of that nature are so often made and so seldom realized. But in the case of Dr. Muck more is being realized than anyone promised. He has had tremendous receptions, not only in Baltimore, but in Washington, Philadelphia and New York. His popularity is based on the solid foundation of actual worth, because, as Baltimore has already learned, he resorts to no species of sensationalism to win the plaudits of the public.

One of the most remarkable scenes in the history of the orchestra took place in New York on Saturday afternoon, November 10, at the end of the performance of Brahms' Symphony in C minor. Dr. Muck was recalled six times and was able then to stop the applause only by having the members of the orchestra rise and acknowledge it. There was not a dissenting note in the criticism of the concert, and the critics proclaimed that Brahms' great symphony had really been heard in New York for the first time. The performance had been a revelation and recreation. It is this symphony that Baltimore will hear next Wednesday, and the musical folk of this city will then have a chance to judge whether they agree with Boston and New York.

The solo artist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most brilliant violinists of the orchestra, and one of the real great virtuosi now in this country. He has played here before and needs no introduction. It has always been the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to encourage its members to write, and two men of decided note have come from its ranks. One is Charles Martin Loeffler and the other is Gustav Strube. Mr. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin by Mr. Strube. It has been played in Boston and Philadelphia with great success, and is to be played next week in New York.

The program as a whole is as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakoff—
Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar."
Strube—
Concerto in F-sharp minor for violin.
Brahms—
Symphony in C minor No. 1.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...om

...dress

...te

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Few tickets are available for sale for the second Boston Symphony concert on next Tuesday afternoon, when Washington is to have its only chance to hear Camille Saint-Saens play one of his own concertos. Saint-Saens has been placed as soloist for this concert at the eleventh hour—as soon as it was finally settled that Paderewski was not to come to America this year.

Whatever may have been the expectations of the distinguished French visitor, it is certain that he has made one of the greatest sensations in the American musical world in many years. American people as a rule thought that his coming to this country would be a chance to honor a composer who has contributed so much to the delights of music. After his debut in New York it was discovered that this man of seventy-one years was a most astonishing pianist, and it is not going too far to say that in the pianist, so far as our public is concerned, the composer has been lost. As M. Saint-Saens appearances are limited to twenty, all told, he will not be heard again with orchestra in this city.

Dr. Muck has yielded to a general request from the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts, and has put on his program Beethoven's symphony in C minor. The program will consist of Weber's overture, "Oberron;" Saint-Saens' concerto for pianoforte in G minor No. 2, and Beethoven's symphony in C minor No. 5.

...om N. Y. TRIBUNE

...ldress

...ite

THE DIPLOMATIC CORPS.

[From The Tribune Bureau.]

Washington, Dec. 4.—The German Ambassador and Baroness von Sternburg gave a box party at the Boston Symphony concert this afternoon, having as their guests Mr. White, the American Ambassador to Italy; Miss Edith Root, Mrs. Bacon and Count Hatzfeldt, of the German Embassy staff.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR
WASHINGTON, D.
ess
DEC 2 - 1907

Ignace Paderewski is not coming to America this winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. Last summer, when Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw Mr. Paderewski at his home in Morges, Switzerland, the symphony was finished with the exception of the instrumentation of the last movement. In doing this work Mr. Paderewski discovered that he would have to make a great many changes. He sent word to Mr. Ellis that to hear the symphony produced for the first time by the greatest orchestra in the world was his great ambition, and if he came to America without it he would have absolutely no heart in his concerts and could not possibly do himself justice. It is now settled that Mr. Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the season of 1907-8 the great pianist will give about one hundred concerts in this country under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis of Boston.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR
WASHINGTON, D.
s
DEC 2 - 1907

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first of the three concerts which the Boston Symphony Quartet will give in Washington this winter will take place in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel on Wednesday afternoon, December 5, at 4 o'clock. The work of building up a clientele for a string quartet is usually a slow and laborious task. The public demand for chamber music is very limited and it is usually difficult to get it to accept a strange organization. For this reason the patronage given last year in Washington to the Boston Symphony Quartet was all the more gratifying to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from which organization the quartet is drawn. The composition of the quartet is the same as last year, Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, being the leader; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. Prof. Hess has also secured a number of most interesting novelties, and his programs, always models of their kind, promise to be more delightful than ever. One of these novelties will be played next Wednesday afternoon. It is a string quartet by Hugo Kaun, which had its first performance in America in Boston on the 19th of last month. The assisting artist at this concert will be Mr. Hiram G. Tucker of Boston, a pianist most favorably known in that part of the country. The program will include Beethoven's string quartet in G major, opus 18, No. 2; Hugo Kaun's string quartet in D major, opus 41, No. 2, and Dvorak's piano quartet in E-flat major, opus 87.

Tickets for this first concert are on sale at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
DEC 4 - 1907

ROSENTHAL PLAYS HERE

Appears With Boston Orchestra, Giving a Liszt Concerto.

For the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening Doctor Muck had made a programme very different from that of his first concert here and one that showed his own qualities as a conductor in a different aspect. It comprised Weber's "Oberon" overture, Liszt's familiar piano concerto in E flat major, with Moritz Rosenthal as the soloist, and the first symphony of Brahms.

The performance of the symphony was exceedingly fine. It was seriously conceived and expressed with entire lucidity and with a sympathetic freedom that was inspiring. In his reading of Brahms Doctor Muck shows a more modern spirit than he allowed himself to betray in Beethoven. The whole work was admirably played, the lovely slow movement with a wonderful tenderness and lyric charm, and the finale with a splendidly virile effectiveness that won the warmest applause.

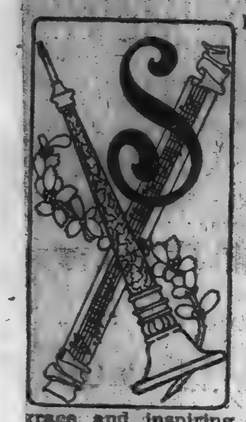
The Weber overture was played with precision and vivacity, without any marked departure from tradition. The concerto, of course, is mainly a display of piano virtuosity, and Rosenthal has all of this that can be required. He plays, as before, with brilliant accuracy, with prodigious power and with astounding agility. Of emotional sentiment there was no indication in this particular performance, and the orchestra properly played in conformity with the manner of the soloist. Rosenthal's skill could not but impress the audience, but he is capable of more valuable work than this. The symphony will efface all other memories of last evening's concert.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 4 - 1907

LOFTY PLANE REACHED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Karl Muck's Talent Shown in Fine Rendering of Brahms' Great Symphony.

ROSENTHAL AT PIANO



SINCE Dr. Karl Muck assumed control over the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scarcely two months ago, this great band of expert musicians has risen to new and loftier heights of artistic interpretation. Dignified formalism and perfunctory precision have given way to the freedom, fluent grace and inspiring vitality of a later school of sentiment and passion. An impressive record of this advancement was made at the Academy of Music last evening, when Dr. Muck gave a reading of Brahms' first symphony, in C minor, that was in the nature of a musical revelation.

This magnificent composition, with its unsparing and often harsh development of intricate themes, has rarely been presented here with such brilliant orchestral effect—never, perhaps, with such keen insight into the mind of the master composer and such gorgeousness of tone color. The performance was an extraordinary disclosure of the romantic possibilities of Brahms' music when adequately and appreciatively played.

Pianist Moriz Rosenthal, the soloist of the occasion, made light of the enormous technical difficulties of the Liszt E flat major concerto—into which, however, he infused little of the poetic passion and haunting charm which other great virtuosi have sought to reveal. There is the weight and authority of genius in Rosenthal's reading, together with extraordinary brilliancy and facility in technique; yet his amazing performance leaves the average auditor almost unmoved.

Under his masterly touch the instrument rages, thunders, ripples in swiftly flowing currents of melody or crashes in impetuous crescendos; but its supreme gift of song is in abeyance or held in check. Admiration of the musical resultant is lost in amazement at the dexterity and technical proficiency of the artist.

This strenuous method, however, is well adapted to Liszt's stormy treatment of the first fateful theme, and its subsequent magnificent development. Rosenthal scored heavily also in the allegro of the final movement, in which passages of appalling difficulty were played with wonderful clarity, with every requirement of the composer amply fulfilled.

The "Oberon" overture, picturesquely rendered, was the opening number of the programme.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
DEC 4 - 1907

SAINT-SAENS PLAYS TO-DAY.

Noted Composer to Appear at New National This Afternoon.

The second concert of the Washington series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place this afternoon at the New National Theater at 4:30. This concert by the orchestra will be of special interest, because of the appearance of Dr. Camille Saint-Saens, the eminent composer-pianist, whose engagement as soloist will be his only one with the orchestra in this city.

The orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck will render the following programme:

Overture—"Oberon" ..... Weber
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2 ..... Saint-Saens
Symphony in C minor, No. 5 ..... Beethoven

Dr. Saint-Saens, although now in his seventy-second year, is said to possess great ability as a pianist, and his coming is looked forward to with the keenest interest.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK WORLD
DEC 5 - 1907

(Special to The World.)

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4.—President Roosevelt this afternoon attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra...

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
DEC 5 - 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given this evening at the Lyric is expected to be one of the most interesting events of the season, both from a social and a musical point of view. The popularity of the concerts given by this organization have each season increased, and at each concert the audience is decidedly representative of the most cultured and aristocratic element of the city. The soloist this evening will be T. Adamowski, the violinist, whose work has been so favorably commented upon, and the program to be given will include the following numbers:

Rimsky-Korsakoff—
Overture, "Betrothed of Tsar."
Strube—
Violin Concerto.
Brahms—
First Symphony.

NEW YORK STAR
DEC 5 - 1907

PRESIDENT AT A CONCERT.

Hears the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Saint Saens.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4.—The President occupied a box this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With him were his son-in-law and daughter, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Secretary of War Taft, and Senator and Mrs. Lodge of Massachusetts.

The President was in the best of humor and applauded the numbers enthusiastically especially the performance of the French composer and pianist, Saint Saëns. He chatted gayly with the members of his party and kept them in constant laughter with his stories and comment. Saint Saëns was recalled many times and always made a low bow to the President's box before he acknowledged the applause of the audience. The French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand occupied a box with Mrs. Slater, Mrs. Williams and Miss Willams. The Baroness von Sternburg, wife of the German Ambassador, occupied another box and had with her Miss Root, Mrs. Robert Bacon and Count von Hatzfeldt.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK
s
DEC 5 - 1907

PRESIDENT AT CONCERT.

Rises in His Box and Bows to Saint-Saens.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4.—A warm welcome was given to Saint-Saens by a large and fashionable audience at the new National Theatre this afternoon, when he appeared jointly with Dr. Carl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

President and Mrs. Roosevelt, Admiral Cowles, the President's brother-in-law, Congressman and Mrs. "Nick" Longworth and Senator and Mrs. Lodge occupied the principal stage box. The Persian and Turkish Ministers headed a contingent from the diplomatic corps. The climax of enthusiasm was reached after Saint-Saens had received three encores.

The great composer bowed first to the President and then to the crowd. Mr. Roosevelt, who had just sent a 27,000-word message to Congress, rose in his box and bowed back at Saint-Saens and the crowd went wild with applause.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 5 - 1907

The Assistant Secretary of War and Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver entertained at dinner last evening in honor of the conductor of the Boston Orchestra and Mrs. Karl Muck. Among their other guests were the German Ambassador and Baroness von Sternburg, the Secretary of War and Mrs. Taft, the Danish Minister, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cummings, Mrs. Bayard, Paul Charlton.

First Established and Most Complete ...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
DEC 5 - 1907

SOCIETY IN WASHINGTON

President And Other Notables At Boston Symphony Concert.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

Washington, Dec. 4.—The President, accompanied by his son-in-law and daughter, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, occupied a box in the National Theatre this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other members of the President's party were the Secretary of War and Mrs. Taft and Senator and Mrs. Lodge, of Massachusetts.

Mrs. Longworth never looked prettier. She wore a gown of mauve broadcloth with a short coat of French pony fur in the same shade. Her hat was a becoming small flat toque of the same fur, with soft, broad drooping feathers on the left side which fell over her back hair, which was dressed low.

The President was enthusiastic over the performance of the great French composer and pianist, Saint Saens, who played his own concerto in G minor.

Other distinguished persons in the boxes were the French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand, who were with Mrs. Hope Slater, Mrs. Williams and Miss Williams, the Baroness von Sternburg, wife of the German Ambassador, who had with her Miss Root, Mrs. Robert Bacon and Count von Hatzfeldt, and Mrs. Augustus N. Eddy, of Chicago. Others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. James Pinchot, Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Newberry, Mr. Justice and Mrs. Harlan, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. J. Y. Taylor, Miss Coyle, Miss Tuckerman and Mrs. James Lowndes.

The Assistant Secretary of War and Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver entertained at dinner this evening in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck. Their other guests were the German Ambassador and Baroness von Sternburg, the Secretary of War and Mrs. Taft, the Danish Minister, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Bayard and Mr. Paul Charlton.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
WB
DEC 5 - 1907

The managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot always worthily replace the great artists whom they announce at the beginning of each season, and who afterward disappoint them, but a certain respect for the rights of the many who subscribe because attracted by the names of great soloists would be welcomed. During the past six years painful changes have been quite common. In no case have substitutions been to the advantage of the public. Many find greater pleasure in the purely orchestral selections than they do in soli, however well performed; but the other class quite properly demand what they have purchased, or its equivalent. On this tour the orchestra had Adamowski with the Strube concerto at one of its New York concerts, but Moritz Rosenthal plays the Liszt E flat at the other. Having but five programmes each season, we can ill afford giving space to even highly respectable art. Mr. Adamowski is an admirable artist, but there are many such. The conductor and the Orchestra are ideal, and soloists who appear with them should be equally distinguished.

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess PHILADELPHIA, PA.
DEC 5 - 1907

SOCIAL AFFAIRS AT WASHINGTON

President and Mrs. Roosevelt Attend Concert—Many Notable People There—Curzon Takes Luncheon at White House.

Special Despatch to "The Press."

Washington, Dec. 4.—President Roosevelt attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the New National this afternoon. There were many distinguished people in the house, among the number being Secretary and Mrs. Taft, Mrs. Lodge, Mr. and Mrs. James Pinchot, Mrs. E. G. N. Slater, Mrs. Eddy, of Chicago, Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Newberry, Justice and Mrs. Harlan, the Misses Harlan, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. J. Y. Taylor, Miss Coyle, Miss Tuckerman and Mrs. James Lownes.

The German Ambassador and Baroness von Sternburg gave a box party at the concert, having as their guests, Ambassador Henry White, Miss Edith Root, Mrs. Bacon and Count Hatfeldt, of the German Embassy staff.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
WASHINGTON, D. C.
ess

That Paderewski is not coming to America this winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. Last summer, when Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw Mr. Paderewski at his home in Morges, Switzerland, the symphony was finished with the exception of the instrumentation of the last movement. In doing this work Mr. Paderewski discovered that he would have to make a great many changes. He sent word to Mr. Ellis that to hear the symphony produced for the first time by the greatest orchestra in the world was his great ambition, and if he came to America without it he would have absolutely no heart in his concerts and could not possibly do himself justice. It is now settled that Mr. Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the season of 1907-8 the great pianist will give about one hundred concerts in this country under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis of Boston.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
WASHINGTON, D. C.
s

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first of the three concerts which the Boston Symphony Quartet will give in Washington this winter will take place in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel on Wednesday afternoon, December 5, at 4 o'clock. The work of building up a clientele for a string quartet is usually a slow and laborious task. The public demand for chamber music is very limited and it is usually difficult to get it to accept a strange organization. For this reason the patronage given last year in Washington to the Boston Symphony Quartet was all the more gratifying to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from which organization the quartet is drawn. The composition of the quartet is the same as last year, Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, being the leader; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. Prof. Hess has also secured a number of most interesting novelties, and his programs, always models of their kind, promise to be more delightful than ever. One of these novelties will be played next Wednesday afternoon. It is a string quartet by Hugo Kaun, which had its first performance in America in Boston on the 19th of last month. The assisting artist at this concert will be Mr. Hiram G. Tucker of Boston, a pianist most favorably known in that part of the country. The program will include Beethoven's string quartet in G major, opus 18, No. 2; Hugo Kaun's string quartet in D major, opus 41, No. 2, and Dvorak's piano quartet in E-flat major, opus 87.

Tickets for this first concert are on sale at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
LODGE

ROSENTHAL PLAYS HERE

Appears With Boston Orchestra, Giving a Liszt Concerto.

For the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening Doctor Muck had made a programme very different from that of his first concert here and one that showed his own qualities as a conductor in a different aspect. It comprised Weber's "Oberon" overture, Liszt's familiar piano concerto in E flat major, with Moritz Rosenthal as the soloist, and the first symphony of Brahms.

The performance of the symphony was exceedingly fine. It was seriously conceived and expressed with entire lucidity and with a sympathetic freedom that was inspiring. In his reading of Brahms Doctor Muck shows a more modern spirit than he allowed himself to betray in Beethoven. The whole work was admirably played, the lovely slow movement with a wonderful tenderness and lyric charm, and the finale with a splendidly virile effectiveness that won the warmest applause.

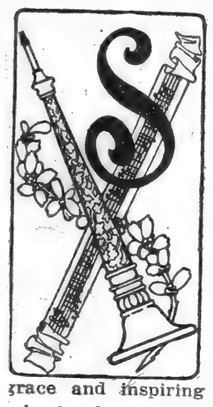
The Weber overture was played with precision and vivacity, without any marked departure from tradition. The concerto, of course, is mainly a display of piano virtuosity, and Rosenthal has all of this that can be required. He plays, as before, with brilliant accuracy, with prodigious power and with astounding agility. Of emotional sentiment there was no indication in this particular performance, and the orchestra properly played in conformity with the manner of the soloist. Rosenthal's skill could not but impress the audience, but he is capable of more valuable work than this. The symphony will efface all other memories of last evening's concert.

...1, PA
DEC 5

LOFTY PLANE REACHED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Karl Muck's Talent Shown in Fine Rendering of Brahms' Great Symphony.

ROSENTHAL AT PIANO



SINCE Dr. Karl Muck assumed control over the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scarcely two months ago, this great band of expert musicians has risen to new and loftier heights of artistic interpretation. Dignified formalism and perfunctory precision have given way to the freedom, fluent grace and inspiring vitality of a later school of sentiment and passion. An impressive record of this advancement was made at the Academy of Music last evening, when Dr. Muck gave a reading of Brahms' first symphony, in C minor, that was in the nature of a musical revelation.

This magnificent composition, with its unsparing and often harsh development of intricate themes, has rarely been presented here with such brilliant orchestral effect—never, perhaps, with such keen insight into the mind of the master composer and such gorgeousness of tone color. The performance was an extraordinary disclosure of the romantic possibilities of Brahms' music when adequately and appreciatively played.

Pianist Moriz Rosenthal, the soloist of the occasion, made light of the enormous technical difficulties of the Liszt E flat major concerto—into which, however, he infused little of the poetic passion and haunting charm which other great virtuosi have sought to reveal. There is the weight and authority of genius in Rosenthal's reading, together with extraordinary brilliancy and facility in technique; yet his amazing performance leaves the average auditor almost unmoved.

Under his masterly touch the instrument rages, thunders, ripples in swiftly flowing currents of melody or crashes in impetuous crescendos; but its supreme gift of song is in abeyance or held in check. Admiration of the musical resultant is lost in amazement at the dexterity and technical proficiency of the artist.

This strenuous method, however, is well adapted to Liszt's stormy treatment of the first fateful theme, and its subsequent magnificent development. Rosenthal scored heavily also in the allegro of the final movement, in which passages of appalling difficulty were played with wonderful clarity, with every requirement of the composer amply fulfilled.

The "Oberon" overture, picturesquely rendered, was the opening number of the programme.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...ALE
DEC 4 - 1906

SAINT-SAENS PLAYS TO-DAY.

Noted Composer to Appear at New National This Afternoon.

The second concert of the Washington series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place this afternoon at the New National Theater at 4:30. This concert by the orchestra will be of special interest, because of the appearance of Dr. Camille Saint-Saens, the eminent composer-pianist, whose engagement as soloist will be his only one with the orchestra in this city.

The orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck will render the following programme:

Overture—"Oberon" ..... Weber
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, ... Saint-Saens
Symphony in C minor, No. 5 ..... Beethoven

Dr. Saint-Saens, although now in his seventy-second year, is said to possess great ability as a pianist, and his coming is looked forward to with the keenest interest.

NE ... D.C.

Mr. Roosevelt at a Concert.

(Special to The World.)

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4.—President Roosevelt this afternoon attended the concert of the Boston Symphony quartet at the New Willard with Secretary and Mrs. Taft and Senator and Mrs. Lodge.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
DEC 5

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given this evening at the Lyric is expected to be one of the most interesting events of the season, both from a social and a musical point of view. The popularity of the concerts given by this organization have each season increased, and at each concert the audience is decidedly representative of the most cultured and aristocratic element of the city. The soloist this evening will be T. Adamowski, the violinist, whose work has been so favorably commented upon, and the program to be given will include the following numbers:

Rimsky-Korsakoff—
Overture, "Betrothed of Tsar."
Strube—
Violin Concerto.
Brahms—
First Symphony.

PRESIDENT AT A CONCERT.

Hears the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Saint Saens.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4.—The President occupied a box this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With him were his son-in-law and daughter, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Secretary of War Taft, and Senator and Mrs. Lodge of Massachusetts.

The President was in the best of humor and applauded the numbers enthusiastically especially the performance of the French composer and pianist, Saint Saëns. He chatted gayly with the members of his party and kept them in constant laughter with his stories and comment. Saint Saëns was recalled many times and always made a low bow to the President's box before he acknowledged the applause of the audience. The French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand occupied a box with Mrs. Slater, Mrs. Williams and Miss Willams. The Baroness von Sternburg, wife of the German Ambassador, occupied another box and had with her Miss Root, Mrs. Robert Bacon and Count von Hatzfeldt.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
s

PRESIDENT AT CONCERT.

Rises in His Box and Bows to Saint-Saens.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4.—A warm welcome was given to Saint-Saens by a large and fashionable audience at the new National Theatre this afternoon, when he appeared jointly with Dr. Carl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

President and Mrs. Roosevelt, Admiral Cowles, the President's brother-in-law, Congressman and Mrs. "Nick" Longworth and Senator and Mrs. Lodge occupied the principal stage box. The Persian and Turkish Ministers headed a contingent from the diplomatic corps. The climax of enthusiasm was reached after Saint-Saens had received three encores.

The great composer bowed first to the President and then to the crowd. Mr. Roosevelt, who had just sent a 27,000-word message to Congress, rose in his box and bowed back at Saint-Saens and the crowd went wild with applause.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES

The Assistant Secretary of War and Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver entertained at dinner last evening in honor of the conductor of the Boston Orchestra and Mrs. Karl Muck. Among their other guests were the German Ambassador and Baroness von Sternburg, the Secretary of War and Mrs. Taft, the Danish Minister, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cummings, Mrs. Bayard, Paul Charlton.

First Established and Most Complete ...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DEC 5

SOCIETY IN WASHINGTON

President And Other Notables At Boston Symphony Concert.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

Washington, Dec. 4.—The President, accompanied by his son-in-law and daughter, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, occupied a box in the National Theatre this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other members of the President's party were the Secretary of War and Mrs. Taft and Senator and Mrs. Lodge, of Massachusetts.

Mrs. Longworth never looked prettier. She wore a gown of mauve broadcloth, with a short coat of French pony fur in the same shade. Her hat was a becoming small flat toque of the same fur, with soft, broad drooping feathers on the left side which fell over her back hair, which was dressed low.

The President was enthusiastic over the performance of the great French composer and pianist, Saint Saens, who played his own concerto in G minor.

Other distinguished persons in the boxes were the French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand, who were with Mrs. Hope Slater; Mrs. Williams and Miss Williams, the Baroness von Sternburg, wife of the German Ambassador, who had with her Miss Root; Mrs. Robert Bacon and Count von Hatzfeldt, and Mrs. Augustus N. Eddy, of Chicago. Others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. James Pinchot, Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Newberry, Mr. Justice and Mrs. Harlan, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. J. Y. Taylor, Miss Coyle, Miss Tuckerman and Mrs. James Lowndes.

The Assistant Secretary of War and Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver entertained at dinner this evening in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck. Their other guests were the German Ambassador and Baroness von Sternburg, the Secretary of War and Mrs. Taft, the Danish Minister, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon-Cumming, Mrs. Bayard and Mr. Paul Charlton.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World

The managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot always worthily replace the great artists whom they announce at the beginning of each season, and who afterward disappoint them, but a certain respect for the rights of the many who subscribe because attracted by the names of great soloists would be welcomed. During the past six years painful changes have been quite common. In no case have substitutions been to the advantage of the public. Many find greater pleasure in the purely orchestral selections than they do in soli, however well performed; but the other class quite properly demand what they have purchased, or its equivalent. On this tour the orchestra had Adamowski with the Strube concerto at one of its New York concerts, but Moritz Rosenthal plays the Liszt E flat at the other. Having but five programmes each season, we can ill afford giving space to even highly respectable art. Mr. Adamowski is an admirable artist, but there are many such. The conductor and the Orchestra are ideal, and soloists who appear with them should be equally distinguished.

ess ... PHILA.
DEC 5 - 1906

SOCIAL AFFAIRS AT WASHINGTON

President and Mrs. Roosevelt Attend Concert—Many Notable People There—Curzon Takes Luncheon at White House.

Special Despatch to "The Press."

Washington, Dec. 4.—President Roosevelt attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the New National this afternoon. There were many distinguished people in the house, among the number being Secretary and Mrs. Taft, Mrs. Lodge, Mr. and Mrs. James Pinchot, Mrs. E. G. N. Slater, Mrs. Eddy, of Chicago; Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Newberry, Justice and Mrs. Harlan, the Misses Harlan, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. J. Y. Taylor, Miss Coyle, Miss Tuckerman and Mrs. James Lownes.

The German Ambassador and Baroness von Sternburg gave a box party at the concert, having as their guests, Ambassador Henry White, Miss Edith Root, Mrs. Bacon and Count Hatfeldt, of the German Embassy staff.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 5 - 1...

PRESIDENT HEARS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Attends Concert With His Daughter and Her Husband.

PLEASED WITH SAINT-SAENS

Boxes Filled With Members of Diplomatic Social Circle and Guests.

The President occupied a box at the second concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. In his party were his son-in-law and daughter, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth; the Secretary of War and Mrs. Taft, and Senator and Mrs. Lodge of Massachusetts. Mrs. Longworth never looked more fascinatingly pretty than she did in her suit of leather color broadcloth, with short, loose coat of leather color pony, with small toque and large muff of the same. Her toque was slightly lifted at the left side and had a bunch of soft feathers covering the side and falling over her back hair, which was dressed low.

The bit of color in the tiny scarlet vest was most becoming to the fair daughter of the President. She has acquired some avoirdupois since she was last seen in public in Washington, which is distinctly becoming to her.

Mrs. Taft wore agown of somber brown, with large brown hat with light feathers, and Mrs. Lodge wore black, with a small black hat, wtih light blue on it.

The President was in good humor and appeared much pleased and very appreciative of the splendid program given by the Symphony Orchestra, and especially the performance of the great French composer and pianist, Saint-Saens.

Other distinguished occupants of the boxes were the French Ambassador and Madame Jusserand with Mrs. Slater, Colonel and Mrs. Williams, and Miss Williams; Mrs. Augustus N. Eddy, of Chicago, with a party; the Turkish Minister and his family, who are all quite musical; the Baroness von Sternburg, wife of the German Ambassador, who had as her guests Miss Root, Mrs. Robert Bacon and Count Hatzfeldt; and Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner, and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Malcolm Kutchi. Others in the audience were Miss Cannon, daughter of the Speaker of the House of Representatives; Mr. and Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Newberry; Mr. Justice and Mrs. Harlan, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. James Lowndes, Miss Tuckerman, Mrs. J. Y. Taylor, Mrs. Gardiner Hubbard and Miss Bell.

...ing Bureau in the World
TIMES
...SHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 5 - 1901

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS AROUSES AUDIENCE TO HIGHEST PITCH

Great French Composer and Pianist, in Conjunction With Boston Symphony Orchestra, Given an Ovation on Initial Appearance in Washington.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in the National Theater before an audience which filled every seat and every inch of standing room. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, was the bright and particular star of the first concert, and while he was still an object of the most intense interest yesterday, he had to give place to the great French composer and pianist, Camille Saint-Saens, the oldest pianist on the concert stage, who was the soloist. The program gave Washington nothing new but the soloist, who made his first appearance in the city. It opened with the great overture to Weber's "Oberon," which, although probably known by heart by every musician in the audience, revealed new beauties under Dr. Muck's magic baton. It has probably never had so interesting a reading as he gave it.

Saint-Saens played his own concerto in G minor. He was most interesting and impressive, and displayed marvelous agility in his fingers. His tone is distinctly clear, cool, and clean, but not of great volume. The orchestra did ... work in accompanying, which ... been mastered by the gifted ... his large experience as con... illimit and vel... n of the ... a superb performance.

concerto which is his greatest one, was of the greatest interest. He aroused the audience to such enthusiasm as a Washington audience has not displayed probably since the early appearance of Paderewski. He was recalled many times and finally was granted the almost unheard of privilege of playing an encore number at a Boston Symphony concert. The audience was guilty of shouts of delight when he seated himself again at the piano. Encores are positively forbidden by the orchestra management, but because of his greatness as a composer, Saint-Saens has caused them to break their record.

Saint-Saens did the same with the Chicago Orchestra which has the same rule. For his encore number he played a dainty waltz of his own, "The Nonchalante," which depicted its title in every phrase, and which was played with marvelous delicacy.

The great symphony in C minor of Beethoven, although heard so many times here, was never heard before as it was given yesterday. Dr. Muck has a charming habit of bringing forth beauties in a well-known work, which were never heard before. Little themes were brought out in the symphony's work yesterday which were constant surprises from the wood winds.

The splendid tribute paid to Dr. Muck when he was first heard here last month was repeated yesterday, after the finish of the symphony which was

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... YORK CITY
Address ...
Date DEC ... 1901

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives ten concerts in New York every winter, and is regarded as almost a local institution. This splendid body of players will be directed by a new conductor this season. Wilhelm Gericke, who wielded its baton so long, has gone home to Vienna, and his place is filled by Doctor Carl Muck, one of the leading spirits of music in Germany. Muck is forty-seven years old, a product of the Leipsic and Salzburg cult in music, a confidant and trusted aid of Cosima Wagner in the portentous Wagnerian festivals at Baireuth. In person he is a slender, sharp-faced, polished-looking German, Machiavellian of cast, and suggesting the velvet-shod iron hand in every pose. But he is a stranger to us as yet, and we are strangers to him. Many of these autocratic foreigners change wonderfully after a few months in the atmosphere of America. Every one of them arrives with the notion that he is bringing light to a nation of savages; but they get over that notion. Many of them go home sadder and wiser men.

After the orchestras, the general public finds its next interest in the solo performers. There is no question that this is to be a season of the greatest activity among them. In the first place, Paderewski is coming back, not for a long tour, but just for a few concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The devotees who love to dissolve themselves in tears, or shudder with indescribable emotions while the high-priest of the keyboard is sending heart-waves across the auditorium from a piano half-hidden in dim, mysterious light, will not have opportunities for their revels. There will be no recitals. Paderewski will play only with orchestra, and it is an open secret that four-fifths of the Paderewski worshipers prefer to hear him without a concert of instruments. They desire him all alone—just him and the piano and the meltings. But it is better to have him with orchestra than not at all. Wherever and whenever he plays the house is full. It matters not what he plays nor how he plays. It is Paderewski; that is enough. All this causes, the famous pianist to sigh many a weary sigh. He is a true artist, and he wishes to have his art appreciated at its real value. But, of course, he needs the money. He is absurdly generous, and though he has made two or three fortunes, he is not a rich man. Since he married the Countess Helene Gorski, however, the money does not flee away so fast. The wife is thrifty, and she has brought system to bear on her husband's charitable inclinations.

...he First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
s ...
DEC 5 - 1901

SAINT-SAENS IN CONCERT.

The Eminent French Composer Appears in Washington as a Pianist.

With a warm-heartedness and enthusiasm characteristic of a Washington audience, Camille Saint-Saens, the eminent French composer and pianist, was given an ovation yesterday afternoon when, during the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he concluded his concerto in G minor. The concert was the second in the series of the orchestra in this city this season, and attracted the usual large audience.

The commendation lavished upon M. Saint-Saens was more hearty than discriminating. Musically speaking, his effort was a distinct disappointment. From the meaningless phrases which began the concerto, through the cheap and meretricious themes which marked the second movement, and then down to the turgid and involved finale, in the conducting of which Dr. Muck labored with honest zeal, there was not a single gleam of inspiration. The concerto was absolutely commonplace, both in its solo and tutti passages, and, in its very dissimilarity, recalled the splendid examples of concerto composition which Beethoven, Chopin, Tschaikowsky, and other masters have bequeathed to us. Nor, as a pianist, can M. Saint-Saens be said to possess an unusual genius. His technique is ample, and, as a matter of fact, the flexibility of his fingers at his age is remarkable. Even as an executant, however, he does not occupy the highest plane of endeavor. He does not even excel in any single characteristic, being thus unlike Rosenthal, who is phenomenally brilliant, or de Pachman, who is tenderness itself, or Paderewski, who has temperament oozing out of his finger tips. Saint-Saens' touch produces a round and full tone, but he sacrifices tenderness for clarity and is almost entirely lacking in tone color. He is, of course, far above the average pianist; but, as compared with the artists whose names stand at the head of piano interpretation, he is not to be considered. Notwithstanding this, his appearance was a matter of considerable musical interest, for he is a composer of international fame. It was quite appropriate, therefore, that he should have been warmly welcomed, and his encore number, which also displayed his limitations, was appreciated.

Perhaps M. Saint-Saens' concerto suffered by being placed in juxtaposition between Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Beethoven's wonderful Fifth Symphony. Never have these two orchestral numbers been rendered more satisfactorily in this city. The overture was given with exquisite taste, and with an evidence of keen appreciation of rhythm, while the symphony was invested throughout with new beauty. It is unnecessary to speak of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from a technical standpoint, because it can always be relied upon to do its work with as near an approach to perfection as human hand and brain can reach. In the interpretation of a composition, however, the personality of the conductor is the prime factor, and in the progress of the concert series Dr. Muck's genuine musical instinct is becoming more and more evident. He is not ultra-conservative, for some innovations in tempo were noticeable, while his regard for color contrasts and for the phrasing which illuminates the composer's ideas is of the highest order. The tonal and themal beauty of the andante movement, over which Beethoven himself lingered lovingly and long, was emphasized in almost reverential fashion, and the majestic finale was given with an inspiring tour de force.

One of the attractive features of the concert was the Executive box, which, in the absence of Mrs. Roosevelt in New York, was occupied by the President, Secretary and Mrs. Taft, Senator and Mrs. Lodge, and Representative and Mrs. Longworth. Mrs. Longworth was becomingly gowned in her favorite russet brown, a short fur jacket of that color, with a toque to correspond, completing her toilet of broadcloth and lace.

The President, Secretary of War, and Senator Lodge all being music lovers, led in the applause that followed the various numbers of the programme.

...aper Cutting Bureau in the World
...SHINGTON, D. C. STAR
...1901

Boston Symphony Quartet Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet at the New Willard yesterday afternoon was well received. The program was excellently varied, containing the Beethoven G major quartet, Op. 18, No. 2; Hugo Kauns D major, Op. 41, No. 2, the three numbers of which displayed scope and were enthusiastically applauded, and Dvorak's E flat major, Op. 87, quartet for piano, violin, viola and violoncello. Mr. H. G. Tucker was the assisting piano artist. Little is left to be said in praise of the first violin, Willey Hess, or of the violoncellist, Heinrich Warnke, and certainly the perfect harmony and precision of attack of the whole quartet show the two other artists, Otto Roth, second violin, and Emile Ferir, viola, to be thoroughly equal to all demands. The quartet is certain to make a distinct place for itself and to usurp many of the honors of the Kneisel

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 5 - 1901

PRESIDENT AT CONCERT

He Hears Camille Saint-Saens' Artistic Performance.

COMPOSER SWAYS AUDIENCE

Work of Venerable French Musician Greeted by Thunderous Applause at His First Appearance in Washington. Rule Against Encores Broken in Response to Prolonged Cheers.

The second Boston Symphony concert at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon was distinctly a virtuoso performance. The soloist of the occasion was Camille Saint-Saens, the great French composer, who, although over seventy years old, is now making his first tour of America.

He appeared yesterday for the first time on any programme in this city, playing the piano part of his most widely known and generally admired concerto, that in G minor. From the moment of his entrance until his final departure from the platform, this venerable musician received an ovation such as has been rarely granted to any performer in this city. The applause was such that the orchestra rule, which has hitherto prevented the granting of any encore by a soloist, was finally withdrawn.

Every Detail Exquisite.

One of the boxes was occupied by the President, Mr. and Mrs. Longworth, Senator and Mrs. Lodge, and Secretary and Mrs. Taft.

The orchestral part of the piece, under Dr. Muck's careful beat, tallied with the solo instrument in a manner which it would be difficult to equal. Every detail of Saint-Saens' work was fine. Each note was a separate entity, clear and beautifully chiseled, and each scale was like a row of pearls. There was no passion, no bravura, no thunderous sound to disturb the placid but perfect utterance of each phrase. Into the niches of this sculptured image fitted the orchestral part without a crevice.

The warm reception accorded him by the audience enthused Saint-Saens, and, despite the limitations his critics have placed upon him, he evinced decided evidences of temperament. Cheers and shouts of approval mingled in the applause, and Saint-Saens responded with a little waltz, "Nonchalante," of his own composition.

The orchestral part of the programme was rendered with a nicety and care for the delicate effects in the score.

Applauded by President.

The President was in the best of humor and applauded the numbers enthusiastically, especially the performance of Saint-Saens. Between the numbers he chatted gayly with the members of his party and kept them in constant laughter with his stories and comment.

Mrs. Longworth looked extremely well in a gown of mauve broadcloth, with a short jacket of French coney fur, with small toque and large muff of the same fur.

The French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand occupied a box with Mrs. Slater, Mrs. Williams, and Miss Williams, and the Baroness von Sternburg, wife of the German Ambassador, occupied another, and had with her Miss Root, Mrs. Robert Bacon, and Count von Hatzfeldt.

...TIMES
s ...
DEC 6 - 1901

Musical Recital and Lecture.

The second lecture recital of the course on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, was given at Association Hall yesterday afternoon (Brooklyn Institute), the programme interpreted being that for to-morrow night at the Baptist Temple. Charles M. Skinner was the lecturer, and Robert Thallon, piano, and William Grafing King, violin, presented the music. Both lecture and music were greatly enjoyed.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PRESIDENT HEARS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Attends Concert With His Daughter and Her Husband.

PLEASED WITH SAINT-SAENS

Boxes Filled With Members of Diplomatic Social Circle and Guests.

The President occupied a box at the second concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. In his party were his son-in-law and daughter, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth; the Secretary of War and Mrs. Taft, and Senator and Mrs. Lodge of Massachusetts. Mrs. Longworth never looked more fascinatingly pretty than she did in her suit of leather color broadcloth, with short, loose coat of leather color pony, with small toque and large muff of the same. Her toque was slightly lifted at the left side and had a bunch of soft feathers covering the side and falling over her back hair, which was dressed low.

The bit of color in the tiny scarlet vest was most becoming to the fair daughter of the President. She has acquired some avoirdupois since she was last seen in public in Washington, which is distinctly becoming to her.

Mrs. Taft wore agown of somber brown, with large brown hat with light feathers, and Mrs. Lodge wore black, with a small black hat, wtih light blue on it.

The President was in good humor and appeared much pleased and very appreciative of the splendid program given by the Symphony Orchestra, and especially the performance of the great French composer and pianist, Saint-Saens.

Other distinguished occupants of the boxes were the French Ambassador and Madame Jusserand with Mrs. Slater, Colonel and Mrs. Williams, and Miss Williams; Mrs. Augustus N. Eddy, of Chicago, with a party; the Turkish Minister and his family, who are all quite musical; the Baroness von Sternburg, wife of the German Ambassador, who had as her guests Miss Root, Mrs. Robern Bacon and Count Hatzfeldt; and Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner, and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Malcolm Kutchi. Others in the audience were Miss Cannon, daughter of the Speaker of the House of Representatives; Mr. and Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Newberry; Mr. Justice and Mrs. Harlan, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. James Lowndes, Miss Tuckerman, Mrs. J. Y. Taylor, Mrs. Gardiner Hubbard and Miss Bell.

...ing Bureau in the World

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives ten concerts in New York every winter, and is regarded as almost a local institution. This splendid body of players will be directed by a new conductor this season. Wilhelm Gericke, who wielded its baton so long, has gone home to Vienna, and his place is filled by Doctor Carl Muck, one of the leading spirits of music in Germany. Muck is forty-seven years old, a product of the Leipsic and Salzburg cult in music, a confidant and trusted aid of Cosima Wagner in the portentous Wagnerian festivals at Baireuth. In person he is a slender, sharp-faced, polished-looking German, Machiavellian of cast, and suggesting the velvet-shod iron hand in every pose. But he is a stranger to us as yet, and we are strangers to him. Many of these autocratic foreigners change wonderfully after a few months in the atmosphere of America. Every one of them arrives with the notion that he is bringing light to a nation of savages; but they get over that notion. Many of them go home sadder and wiser men.

After the orchestras, the general public finds its next interest in the solo performers. There is no question that this is to be a season of the greatest activity among them. In the first place, Paderewski is coming back, not for a long tour, but just for a few concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The devotees who love to dissolve themselves in tears, or shudder with indescribable emotions while the high-priest of the keyboard is sending heart-waves across the auditorium from a piano half-hidden in dim, mysterious light, will not have opportunities for their revels. There will be no recitals. Paderewski will play only with orchestra, and it is an open secret that four-fifths of the Paderewski worshipers prefer to hear him without a concert of instruments. They desire him all alone—just him and the piano and the meltings. But it is better to have him with orchestra than not at all. Wherever and whenever he plays the house is full. It matters not what he plays nor how he plays. It is Paderewski; that is enough. All this causes the famous pianist to sigh many a weary sigh. He is a true artist, and he wishes to have his art appreciated at its real value. But, of course, he needs the money. He is absurdly generous, and though he has made two or three fortunes, he is not a rich man. Since he married the Countess Helene Gorski, however, the money does not flee away so fast. The wife is thrifty, and she has brought system to bear on her husband's charitable inclinations.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS AROUSES AUDIENCE TO HIGHEST PITCH

Great French Composer and Pianist, in Conjunction With Boston Symphony Orchestra, Given an Ovation on Initial Appearance in Washington.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in the National Theater before an audience which filled every seat and every inch of standing room. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, was the bright and particular star of the first concert, and while he was still an object of the most intense interest yesterday, he had to give place to the great French composer and pianist, Camille Saint-Saens, the oldest pianist on the concert stage, who was the soloist. The program gave Washington nothing new but the soloist, who made his first appearance in the city. It opened with the great overture to Weber's "Oberon," which, although probably known by heart by every musician in the audience, revealed new beauties under Dr. Muck's magic baton. It has probably never had so interesting a reading as he gave it.

Saint-Saens played his own concerto in G minor. He was most interesting and impressive, and displayed marvelous agility in his fingers. His tone is distinctly clear, cool, and clean, but not of any great volume. The orchestra did wonderful work in accompanying, which art has been mastered by the gifted conductor in his large experience as conductor of grand opera.

Saint-Saens' scales are limpid and velvety, and his own interpretation of the concerto which is his greatest one, was of the greatest interest. He aroused the audience to such enthusiasm as a Washington audience has not displayed probably since the early appearance of Paderewski. He was recalled many times and finally was granted the almost unheard of privilege of playing an encore number at a Boston Symphony concert. The audience was guilty of shouts of delight when he seated himself again at the piano. Encores are positively forbidden by the orchestra management, but because of his greatness as a composer, Saint-Saens has caused them to break their record.

Saint-Saens did the same with the Chicago Orchestra which has the same rule. For his encore number he played a dainty waltz of his own, "The Nonchalante," which depicted its title in every phrase, and which was played with marvelous delicacy.

The great symphony in C minor of Beethoven, although heard so many times here, was never heard before as it was given yesterday. Dr. Muck has a charming habit of bringing forth beauties in a well-known work, which were never heard before. Little themes were brought out in the symphony's work yesterday which were constant surprises from the wood winds.

The splendid tribute paid to Dr. Muck when he was first heard here last month was repeated yesterday, after the finish of the symphony which was a superb performance.

...he First Established and Most Complete ...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

HERALD

...SHINGTON, D. C.

...s

SAINT-SAENS IN CONCERT.

The Eminent French Composer Appears in Washington as a Pianist.

With a warm-heartedness and enthusiasm characteristic of a Washington audience, Camille Saint-Saens, the eminent French composer and pianist, was given an ovation yesterday afternoon when, during the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he concluded his concerto in G minor. The concert was the second in the series of the orchestra in this city this season, and attracted the usual large audience.

The commendation lavished upon M. Saint-Saens was more hearty than discriminating. Musically speaking, his effort was a distinct disappointment. From the meaningless phrases which began the concerto, through the cheap and meretricious themes which marked the second movement, and then down to the turgid and involved finale, in the conducting of which Dr. Muck labored with honest zeal, there was not a single gleam of inspiration. The concerto was absolutely commonplace, both in its solo and tutti passages, and, in its very dissimilarity, recalled the splendid examples of concerto composition which Beethoven, Chopin, Tschaikowsky, and other masters have bequeathed to us. Nor, as a pianist, can M. Saint-Saens be said to possess an unusual genius. His technique is ample, and, as a matter of fact, the flexibility of his fingers at his age is remarkable. Even as an executant, however, he does not occupy the highest plane of endeavor. He does not even excel in any single characteristic, being thus unlike Rosenthal, who is phenomenally brilliant, or de Pachman, who is tenderness itself, or Paderewski, who has temperament oozing out of his finger tips. Saint-Saens' touch produces a round and full tone, but he sacrifices tenderness for clarity and is almost entirely lacking in tone color. He is, of course, far above the average pianist; but, as compared with the artists whose names stand at the head of piano interpretation, he is not to be considered. Notwithstanding this, his appearance was a matter of considerable musical interest, for he is a composer of international fame. It was quite appropriate, therefore, that he should have been warmly welcomed, and his encore number, which also displayed his limitations, was appreciated.

Perhaps M. Saint-Saens' concerto suffered by being placed in juxtaposition between Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Beethoven's wonderful Fifth Symphony. Never have these two orchestral numbers been rendered more satisfactorily in this city. The overture was given with exquisite taste, and with an evidence of keen appreciation of rhythm, while the symphony was invested throughout with new beauty. It is unnecessary to speak of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from a technical standpoint, because it can always be relied upon to do its work with as near an approach to perfection as human hand and brain can reach. In the interpretation of a composition, however, the personality of the conductor is the prime factor, and in the progress of the concert series Dr. Muck's genuine musical instinct is becoming more and more evident. He is not ultra-conservative, for some innovations in tempo were noticeable, while his regard for color contrasts and for the phrasing which illuminates the composer's ideas is of the highest order. The tonal and themal beauty of the andante movement, over which Beethoven himself lingered lovingly and long, was emphasized in almost reverential fashion, and the majestic finale was given with an inspiring tour de force.

One of the attractive features of the concert was the Executive box, which, in the absence of Mrs. Roosevelt in New York, was occupied by the President, Secretary and Mrs. Taft, Senator and Mrs. Lodge, and Representative and Mrs. Longworth. Mrs. Longworth was becomingly gowned in her favorite russet brown, a short fur jacket of that color, with a toque to correspond, completing her toilet of broadcloth and lace.

The President, Secretary of War, and Senator Lodge all being music lovers, led in the applause that followed the various numbers of the programme.

...per Cutting Bureau in the World

...SHINGTON, D. C.

Boston Symphony Quartet Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet at the New Willard yesterday afternoon was well received. The program was excellently varied, containing the Beethoven G major quartet, Op. 18, No. 2; Hugo Kauns D major, Op. 41, No. 2, the three numbers of which displayed scope and were enthusiastically applauded, and Dvorak's E flat major, Op. 87, quartet for piano, violin, viola and violoncello. Mr. H. G. Tucker was the assisting piano artist. Little is left to be said in praise of the first violin, Willey Hess, or of the violoncellist, Heinrich Warnke, and certainly the perfect harmony and precision of attack of the whole quartet show the two other artists, Otto Roth, second violin, and Emile Ferir, viola, to be thoroughly equal to all demands. The quartet is certain to make a distinct place for itself and to usurp many of the honors of the Kneisel.

...POS
...SHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 5 -

PRESIDENT AT CONCERT

He Hears Camille Saint-Saens' Artistic Performance.

COMPOSER SWAYS AUDIENCE

Work of Venerable French Musician Greeted by Thunderous Applause at His First Appearance in Washington. Rule Against Encores Broken in Response to Prolonged Cheers.

The second Boston Symphony concert at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon was distinctly a virtuoso performance. The soloist of the occasion was Camille Saint-Saens, the great French composer, who, although over seventy years old, is now making his first tour of America.

He appeared yesterday for the first time on any programme in this city, playing the piano part of his most widely known and generally admired concerto, that in G minor. From the moment of his entrance until his final departure from the platform, this venerable musician received an ovation such as has been rarely granted to any performer in this city. The applause was such that the orchestra rule, which has hitherto prevented the granting of any encore by a soloist, was finally withdrawn.

Every Detail Exquisite.

One of the boxes was occupied by the President, Mr. and Mrs. Longworth, Senator and Mrs. Lodge, and Secretary and Mrs. Taft.

The orchestral part of the piece, under Dr. Muck's careful beat, tallied with the solo instrument in a manner which it would be difficult to equal. Every detail of Saint-Saens' work was fine. Each note was a separate entity, clear and beautifully chiseled, and each scale was like a row of pearls. There was no passion, no bravura, no thunderous sound to disturb the placid but perfect utterance of each phrase. Into the niches of this sculptured image fitted the orchestral part without a crevice.

The warm reception accorded him by the audience enthused Saint-Saens, and, despite the limitations his critics have placed upon him, he evinced decided evidences of temperament. Cheers and shouts of approval mingled in the applause, and Saint-Saens responded with a little waltz, "Nonchalante," of his own composition.

The orchestral part of the programme was rendered with a nicety and care for the delicate effects in the score.

Applauded by President.

The President was in the best of humor and applauded the numbers enthusiastically, especially the performance of Saint-Saens. Between the numbers he chatted gayly with the members of his party and kept them in constant laughter with his stories and comment.

Mrs. Longworth looked extremely well in a gown of mauve broadcloth, with a short jacket of French coney fur, with small toque and large muff of the same fur.

The French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand occupied a box with Mrs. Slater, Mrs. Williams, and Miss Williams, and the Baroness von Sternburg, wife of the German Ambassador, occupied another, and had with her Miss Root, Mrs. Robert Bacon, and Count von Hatzfeldt.

...s

Musical Recital and Lecture.

The second lecture recital of the course on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, was given at Association Hall yesterday afternoon (Brooklyn Institute), the programme interpreted being that for to-morrow night at the Baptist Temple. Charles M. Skinner was the lecturer, and Robert Thallon, piano, and William Grafing King, violin, presented the music. Both lecture and music were greatly enjoyed.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 6 - 1900

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Interpreted by Charles M. Skinner. Music by Robert Thallon and William G. King.

The second lecture recital of the course on the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was given at Association Hall yesterday afternoon (Brooklyn Institute), the programme interpreted being that for to-morrow night at the Baptist Temple. Charles M. Skinner, music editor of the Brooklyn Eagle, was the lecturer, and Robert Thallon, piano, and William Grafing King, violin, presented the music, consisting of the matic bits and motifs from the tone-poem, "Don Juan," op. 20, Richard Strauss, for piano, and the concerto in D major, for violin, Beethoven, in which Mr. King played portions of the first movement and the whole of the second, the larghetto movement. Except for slight mention the symphony, B flat major, No. 5, op. 55, Gazounoff, was omitted because of the lack of time, by reason of the fact that the piano was late in arriving.

Strauss has chosen Lenau's version of "Don Juan" for illustration, which makes the hero a sort of Faust, searching for the woman who is to incarnate womanhood, and disgusted because he cannot realize his ideal; and this disgust is "the devil who fetches him." The official programme quotes Wilhelm Mauke's interpretation of the motifs of this tone-poem, but Mr. Skinner told his hearers not to take Mauke's belief too seriously. "for if you look with your ears and keep your eyes shut you can see a good deal for yourself in the music," he said. "Don Juan" would sound as well under a dozen different names, he thought, and this proved its right to exist, for music better expresses emotion than facts. The lecturer and Mr. Thallon had spent anxious hours over the Strauss number trying to fit tone-poem and word-poem together. For Strauss himself has not given a clew to any page of his score. They decided that the opening means longing, "and it is well for you to know this," said Mr. Skinner, "as otherwise you might think it a scene in a boiler shop." The second motif, they concluded, meant one girl; the third, the dashing character of Don Juan; the fourth, a tranquil measure, the second girl; the fifth, conquest; this had a slight suggestion of "Tristan and Isolde"; the sixth, with its diminished chords, disgust; the seventh, the coming of the countess, merges into the eighth, a love duet, then changes into the ninth, the dissolution of love. The tenth introduces "Anna"; the eleventh is a martial phrase; the twelfth noisily protests the recurrence of disgust; the thirteenth in jocund notes indicates a carnival of forgetfulness; the fourteenth is the duel and the fifteenth, the proclamation. The composition should be taken not as an exact reproduction of the scenes of the poem, but in a much broader sense as the expression of the emotion that finds place in human life and the search for the ideal. The discord at the close shows Don Juan's to have been a spoiled life; the noble life ends in harmony. Much was said of Strauss' position among musicians of to-day, and it was shown how far he has departed from the old style of writing.

The concerto was thought to stand at a great distance from the Strauss music. The violin part is pure melody with no double stopping. Beethoven allows the introduction of a cadenza, after the fashion of the time. Ysaye said he would like always to stop at this passage and say "Ladies and gentlemen—Here Beethoven finishes."

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 6 - 1900

LECTURE RECITAL ON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

The second lecture recital of the course on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was given at Association Hall yesterday afternoon (Brooklyn Institute), the programme interpreted being that for tomorrow night at the Baptist Temple. Charles M. Skinner, musical editor of the Brooklyn "Eagle," was the lecturer, and Robert Thallon, piano, and William Grafing King, violin, presented the music, consisting of thematic bits and motifs from the tone-poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, Richard Strauss, for piano, and Concerto in D major, for violin, Beethoven, in which Mr. King played portions of the first movement and the whole of the second, the larghetto movement. Except for slight mention, the symphony, B flat major, No. 5, Op. 5, Gazounoff, was omitted because of the lack of time, by reason of the fact that the piano was late in arriving.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 6 - 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Concert at the New Willard Ballroom Yesterday a Success.

Yesterday afternoon at the New Willard ballroom a gratefully large and appreciative audience welcomed the Boston Symphony Quartet in their first concert of this season's series.

The personnel of the quartet is the same as last year. Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first violin and leader; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violincello. Mr. H. G. Tucker was the assisting artist at the piano.

For years the Washington public has made the most of their few opportunities to recognize the best of music in the grand operas, and for the past two years managements offering master works minus libretto and stage accessories as given by the Symphony Orchestra have been generously supported, and now the number of the clientele for a strong quartet augurs well for the musical advancement in Washington.

The Beethoven Quartet given yesterday afternoon is not often heard. Mr. Hess' wonderfully warm tone in the serious adagio-cantabile made a most pronounced contrast to the following scherzo, which is in the lightest vein of the moody composer. Hugo Kaun, whose quartet was played for the first time in this city, has had a life of adventurous struggle and of plucky and continuous warfare against circumstances in which he has emerged the victor.

Born in Berlin in 1863, he came to America at the age of twenty with more compositions than wealth. His conditions were even worse here than abroad, when Theodore Thomas recognized his worth and gave many of his orchestral works with the Chicago Orchestra. Mr. Kaun is at present living in Germany, and composes in many different fields. The Kaun Quartet is novel in form, having three instead of four movements, the first opening with a short fugue, followed by a scherzo, and ending in a well-rounded slow movement. The concluding slow movement being decidedly German in its construction, is most beautiful, and rises to a dramatic climax. The Dvorak Quartet, especially in the forte passages, seemed empty after the rich harmonization of Kaun. In the lento there were some passages of interest, but the allegro moderato grazioso was the most effective of all the movements. Mr. Tucker displayed good technique, appropriate spirit, carefully blending in the ensemble.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
DEC 6 - 1900

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET PLEASES

Delightful Concert Opens Series to Be Given at New Willard.

The season of the Boston Symphony Quartet had an auspicious opening yesterday afternoon in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel, where it gave its first concert. The hall was filled with a music-loving audience, which was greatly appreciative of the pronounced improvement in the ensemble work of the quartet since last season. The quartet is composed of the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Willy Hess; Otto Roth, second violin; Emil Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. H. G. Tucker, pianist, of Boston, assisted the quartet.

The program was an extremely interesting one, and included the Beethoven quartet in G major, opus 18, No. 2; Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, opus 41, No. 2, and the Dvorak quartet in E flat major, opus 87. The Beethoven quartet, for all who were in early enough to hear it, was, as it is always apt to be, the gem of the program. It was beautifully done, with very carefully worked out details in the ensemble work, and with much color.

The novelty was the Kaun quartet, which is full of melody and pathos, as well as technical difficulties and originality. The Dvorak work, abounding in the strange harmonies with which his works abound, was most impressive and infectious. Mr. Tucker's playing was quite satisfactory.

Their next concert will be given in the same place December 28.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD.
DEC 6 - 1900

MUSIC

The Second Concert Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The depressing weather apparently kept few subscribers from attending last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric, but they took less enthusiasm with them than they did one month since, when Dr. Muck made his debut. This lack of demonstrative appreciation could be partially attributed to meteorological conditions, but still more to the fact that the programme had not created a strong advance interest. Rimsky-Korsakoff is a great talent, but he is comparatively unknown to American music lovers. His "Sheherazada," with its sensational instrumental setting, was performed by Mr. Gericke, astounding musicians, but only slightly impressing lay listeners. Mr. Strube was an unknown quantity to most of us, and Brahms attracts some and leaves others cold. Altogether, the selections were not calculated to arouse keen anticipation, but the performance of them should have found warm responsiveness, for it was in every respect live art, full of pulsating emotional significance. The programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera "The Betrothed of the Tsar".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F sharp minor, for violin and orchestra.....Strube
1. Allegro assai.
2. Reverie: Adagio.
3. Passacaglia: Andantino grazioso.
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op 68.....Brahms
1. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
2. Andante sostenuto.
3. Un poco allegretto e grazioso. L'istesso tempo.
4. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff overture bears the hallmark of its composer's genius for instrumental color, and it is besides beautiful music, although not distinguished by new thematic material. It is a decidedly interesting piece, and Dr. Muck read it most lucidly, each choir of the orchestra and each member of the several choirs contributing just a proper quota of tone to the ensemble in the changing conditions.

Mr. Strube's Concerto would be a fine work if the third movement were omitted. The first two numbers are natural and at the same time original music, and Mr. Strube handles the orchestra with a master hand. In the last movement he casts natural rhythm and musical sense overboard, and is promptly a musical wreck. Mr. Adamowski played the Concerto absolutely clearly and artistically, leaving nothing to be regretted in the performance, and Dr. Muck accompanied the violinist with consummate control and adaptability.

The C-minor Symphony of Brahms is less marred by the mannerisms which he later cultivated than is any other of his works in this form. It is Beethovinish, but it is natural music, and has the right to appeal to our senses without apology. Dr. Muck's control of the orchestra in this Symphony was simply marvelous. He painted with a camel's-hair brush of the finest kind. Nothing more perfect could be imagined than the adjustment of its instrumental balance and the vivid clearness with which the lines of Brahms' tonal picture were drawn.

GLOBE

NOTES OF THE M

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

ANTON BRUCKNER, like Dr. Johnson, is better known than his works. Probably the great majority of the audience that heard the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night knew more or less about the eccentric Viennese professor who set out "to do for the symphony what Wagner had done for the opera" (whatever that may mean), and in pursuit of his end emulated Beethoven by planning nine symphonies, though he did not live to complete the ninth. But probably very few of those present had ever heard one of his compositions performed before. Indeed, they have been rarely played in this country. Back in the eighties Theodore Thomas, Walter Damrosch, and Mr. Gericke experimented with them here and in Boston, and Mr. Thomas did not abandon them after he went to Chicago. Mr. Gericke gave one symphony, in Boston season before last, and Mr. Scheel gave one in Philadelphia the other day. It was reserved, however, for Dr. Muck to come to this country with something of a Bruckner enthusiasm, which found expression in the production of the composer's seventh, and most famous, symphony at the concerts of the Boston Orchestra in Boston last week, and at the concert last night in New York.

With admirable caution Dr. Muck so ordered the programme of all of these concerts that the symphony stood first, with Rosenthal in Liszt's E flat piano concerto and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture as a bait to keep the audience seated in case the symphony proved a bore. And in Boston the bait was needed. It is credibly reported that the fashionable Friday afternoon audience was so bored with the Seventh Symphony that it almost forgot its Bostonian decorum. In Paris or Berlin (the assertion is made) the same audience would have hissed roundly Bruckner and all his works.

The New York audience last night took more kindly to the hour and ten minutes of Bruckner. There was no lack of applause after any of the first three movements of the symphony, and at the close there were several hearty recalls for Dr. Muck, though much of this enthusiasm was in gratitude, no doubt, for the devoted and brilliant interpretation by the conductor and his men.

In the opinion of most listeners, the symphony itself must have maintained the general reputation of Bruckner's music. Long, garrulous, pedantic it sounded, broken here and there in its sluggish flow by a moment of exalted beauty or an orchestral climax of thrilling power. It no longer has the special glamour of the newest thing in music—that gives an interest quite apart from intrinsic worth to a composition by Vincent d'Indy or Richard Strauss. Twenty years ago it was "music of the future." To-day its future seems to lie for the most part behind it.

For the rest of the concert, Mr. Rosenthal played the Liszt concerto as he played it here last month, with sensational brilliancy and power, and the orchestra finished the programme with a broadly dramatic performance of the "Leonore" overture. In these the audience found its reward for sitting through the symphony.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
DEC 7 - 1900

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

HOW MAJOR HIGGINSON MAY BE GENEROUS TO HIS TOWN.

With a Few More Audiences Like Last Night's at Carnegie Hall, the Bostonian Maecenas Could Have His "Yacht" and Enjoy His "Symphony" Too—An Hour of Anton Bruckner's Sad Life and Its Lessons—Conried's Air Ballet as the Flying Squadron in To-night's War of the Two "Fausts"—The Two Campanaris in One Hall.

If Henry L. Higginson, the musical Maecenas of Boston, ever yields to the tearful entreaties of his managerial trio, Charles Ellis, Frederick Comee and William Walter, and allows the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra to pay more frequent visits to New York, who can say what the result may be? Certainly Mr. Higginson will no longe be able to repeat his famous boast, "The Symphony is my private yacht." He will be called on for no $20,000 yearly subsidy. For another five New York concerts like last evening's event, at Carnegie Hall, would pay his most princely deficit. They are turning New Yorkers away. The box office opened with eleven seats to sell.

It was a case of "come early or stand up" through so portentous an opening number as Anton Brückner's E major symphony. This work the Thomas Orchestra rushed to a solitary hearing in town twenty years ago, placing it last in a long bill, while New Yorkers, as usual, ran early away. The rival Damrosch orchestra of that period had anticipated it with Bruckner's D minor. Dr. Muck's revival of the welltempered major dirge was a labor of love as well as knowledge. The Seventh Symphony, with a bass tuba quartet that was more Bach than Bayreuth, sang requiem not for Wagner but for his disciple who wrote it. The scherzo might have been Beethoven retouched by Tschaikowsky, and the three other parts were only as solemn as any composer could be who loved buoyant "Rheingold" harmonies and melodiously contrapuntal "Meistersinger." The hour and five minutes it took to play was a wonderfully good lesson for a musical city of dreadful night which employs prima donna millionaires to sing diamond-backed opera to a parterre all gold and a block wide.

Bruckner, as the few know who ransacked last night's outer darkness for Mr. Comee's friends, the exiled programme boys, was a man chosen from music's "other half." What use to prattle to-day of Europe's musical atmosphere when such a man of heaven-sent gifts was permitted literally to live on air. What a warning to read how he was left to teach an Austrian school for the ghastly compensation of 75 cents a month, was left for years to starve body and soul, and for a life time to know no human love and to gain the slightest artistic recognition at the close? A powerful human document were Mr. Philip Hale's seventeen close-printed pages on this victim of unsought enmity with Brahms and unsubmerged plunge in the Wagner sea.

Dr. Muck's increasing hold on the public was shown when the entire house remained to hear him conduct Beethoven's overture to "Leonora" No. 3. For the first time the conductor had a rival in the person of the most brilliant solo performer of the year, Moritz Rosenthal, and his most admirably chosen concerto, the Liszt E-flat, which opened Rosenthal's first American tour in Boston eighteen years ago.

Herr Rosenthal's greatest difficulty is that our audiences are still getting acquainted with a man only three times our visitor in a score of years. His personality, his modest hair and bent shoulders, are not yet a part of every music-lover's stock of mental pictures. But he has arrived in a golden year and he was recalled last evening till he had to explain by gesture that encores are not allowed.

[88]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
GLE
Brooklyn N. Y.

2D SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Interpreted by Charles M. Skinner. Music by Robert Thallon and William G. King.

The second lecture recital of the course on the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was given at Association Hall yesterday afternoon (Brooklyn Institute), the programme interpreted being that for to-morrow night at the Baptist Temple. Charles M. Skinner, music editor of the Brooklyn Eagle, was the lecturer, and Robert Thallon, piano, and William Grafing King, violin, presented the music, consisting of thematic bits and motifs from the tone-poem, "Don Juan," op. 20, Richard Strauss, for piano, and the concerto in D major, for violin, Beethoven, in which Mr. King played portions of the first movement and the whole of the second, the larghetto movement. Except for slight mention the symphony, B flat major, No. 5, op. 55, Gazounoff, was omitted because of the lack of time, by reason of the fact that the piano was late in arriving.

Strauss has chosen Lenau's version of "Don Juan" for illustration, which makes the hero a sort of Faust, searching for the woman who is to incarnate womanhood, and disgusted because he cannot realize his ideal; and this disgust is "the devil who fetches him." The official programme quotes Wilhelm Mauke's interpretation of the motifs of this tone-poem, but Mr. Skinner told his hearers not to take Mauke's belief too seriously, "for if you look with your ears and keep your eyes shut you can see a good deal for yourself in the music," he said. "Don Juan" would sound as well under a dozen different names, he thought, and this proved its right to exist, for music better expresses emotion than facts. The lecturer and Mr. Thallon had spent anxious hours over the Strauss number trying to fit tone-poem and word-poem together. For Strauss himself has not given a clew to any page of his score. They decided that the opening means longing, "and it is well for you to know this," said Mr. Skinner, "as otherwise you might think it a scene in a boiler shop." The second motif, they concluded, meant one girl; the third, the dashing character of Don Juan; the fourth, a tranquil measure, the second girl; the fifth, conquest; this had a slight suggestion of "Tristan and Isolde"; the sixth, with its diminished chords, disgust; the seventh, the coming of the countess, merges into the eighth, a love duet, then changes into the ninth, the dissolution of love. The tenth introduces "Anna"; the eleventh is a martial phrase; the twelfth noisily protests the recurrence of disgust; the thirteenth in jocund notes indicates a carnival of forgetfulness; the fourteenth is the duel and the fifteenth, the proclamation. The composition should be taken not as an exact reproduction of the scenes of the poem, but in a much broader sense as the expression of the emotion that finds place in human life and the search for the ideal. The discord at the close shows Don Juan's to have been a spoiled life; the noble life ends in harmony. Much was said of Strauss' position among musicians of to-day, and it was shown how far he has departed from the old style of writing.

The concerto was thought to stand at a great distance from the Strauss music. The violin part is pure melody with no double stopping. Beethoven allows the introduction of a cadenza, after the fashion of the time. Ysaye said he would like always to stop at this passage and say "Ladies and gentlemen—Here Beethoven finishes."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 1 - 1901

LECTURE RECITAL ON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

The second lecture recital of the course on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was given at Association Hall yesterday afternoon (Brooklyn Institute), the programme interpreted being that for tomorrow night at the Baptist Temple. Charles M. Skinner, musical editor of the Brooklyn "Eagle," was the lecturer, and Robert Thallon, piano, and William Grafing King, violin, presented the music, consisting of thematic bits and motifs from the tone-poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, Richard Strauss, for piano, and Concerto in D major, for violin, Beethoven, in which Mr. King played portions of the first movement and the whole of the second, the larghetto movement. Except for slight mention, the symphony, B flat major, No. 5, Op. 5, Gazounoff, was omitted because of the lack of time, by reason of the fact that the piano was late in arriving.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
WASHINGTON, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Concert at the New Willard Ballroom Yesterday a Success.

Yesterday afternoon at the New Willard ballroom a gratefully large and appreciative audience welcomed the Boston Symphony Quartet in their first concert of this season's series.

The personnel of the quartet is the same as last year. Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first violin and leader; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violincello. Mr. H. G. Tucker was the assisting artist at the piano.

For years the Washington public has made the most of their few opportunities to recognize the best of music in the grand operas, and for the past two years managements offering master works minus libretto and stage accessories as given by the Symphony Orchestra have been generously supported, and now the number of the clientele for a strong quartet augurs well for the musical advancement in Washington.

The Beethoven Quartet given yesterday afternoon is not often heard. Mr. Hess' wonderfully warm tone in the serious adagio-cantabile made a most pronounced contrast to the following scherzo, which is in the lightest vein of the moody composer. Hugo Kaun, whose quartet was played for the first time in this city, has had a life of adventurous struggle and of plucky and continuous warfare against circumstances in which he has emerged the victor.

Born in Berlin in 1863, he came to America at the age of twenty with more compositions than wealth. His conditions were even worse here than abroad, when Theodore Thomas recognized his worth and gave many of his orchestral works with the Chicago Orchestra. Mr. Kaun is at present living in Germany, and composes in many different fields. The Kaun Quartet is novel in form, having three instead of four movements, the first opening with a short fugue, followed by a scherzo, and ending in a well-rounded slow movement. The concluding slow movement being decidedly German in its construction, is most beautiful, and rises to a dramatic climax. The Dvorak Quartet, especially in the forte passages, seemed empty after the rich harmonization of Kaun. In the lento there were some passages of interest, but the allegro moderato grazioso was the most effective of all the movements. Mr. Tucker displayed good technique, appropriate spirit, carefully blending in the ensemble.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET PLEASES

Delightful Concert Opens Series to Be Given at New Willard.

The season of the Boston Symphony Quartet had an auspicious opening yesterday afternoon in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel, where it gave its first concert. The hall was filled with a music-loving audience, which was greatly appreciative of the pronounced improvement in the ensemble work of the quartet since last season. The quartet is composed of the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Willy Hess; Otto Roth, second violin; Emil Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. H. G. Tucker, pianist, of Boston, assisted the quartet.

The program was an extremely interesting one, and included the Beethoven quartet in G major, opus 18, No. 2; Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, opus 41, No. 2, and the Dvorak quartet in E flat major, opus 87. The Beethoven quartet, for all who were in early enough to hear it, was, as it is always apt to be, the gem of the program. It was beautifully done, with very carefully worked out details in the ensemble work, and with much color.

The novelty was the Kaun quartet, which is full of melody and pathos, as well as technical difficulties and originality. The Dvorak work, abounding in the strange harmonies with which his works abound, was most impressive and infectious. Mr. Tucker's playing was quite satisfactory.

Their next concert will be given in the same place December 20.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD.
DEC 6 - 1901

MUSIC

The Second Concert Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The depressing weather apparently kept few subscribers from attending last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric, but they took less enthusiasm with them than they did one month since, when Dr. Muck made his debut. This lack of demonstrative appreciation could be partially attributed to meteorological conditions, but still more to the fact that the programme had not created a strong advance interest. Rimsky-Korsakoff is a great talent, but he is comparatively unknown to American music lovers. His "Sheherazada," with its sensational instrumental setting, was performed by Mr. Gericke, astounding musicians, but only slightly impressing lay listeners. Mr. Strube was an unknown quantity to most of us, and Brahms attracts some and leaves others cold. Altogether, the selections were not calculated to arouse keen anticipation, but the performance of them should have found warm responsiveness, for it was in every respect live art, full of pulsating emotional significance. The programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera "The Betrothed of the Tsar".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in F sharp minor, for violin and orchestra.....Strube
1. Allegro assai.
2. Reverie: Adagio.
3. Passacaglia: Andantino grazioso.
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op 68.....Brahms
1. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
2. Andante sostenuto.
3. Un poco allegretto e grazioso. L'istesso tempo.
4. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff overture bears the hallmark of its composer's genius for instrumental color, and it is besides beautiful music, although not distinguished by new thematic material. It is a decidedly interesting piece, and Dr. Muck read it most lucidly, each choir of the orchestra and each member of the several choirs contributing just a proper quota of tone to the ensemble in the changing conditions.

Mr. Strube's Concerto would be a fine work if the third movement were omitted. The first two numbers are natural and at the same time original music, and Mr. Strube handles the orchestra with a master hand. In the last movement he casts natural rhythm and musical sense overboard, and is promptly a musical wreck. Mr. Adamowski played the Concerto absolutely clearly and artistically, leaving nothing to be regretted in the performance, and Dr. Muck accompanied the violinist with consummate control and adaptability.

The C-minor Symphony of Brahms is less marred by the mannerisms which he later cultivated than is any other of his works in this form. It is Beethovinish, but it is natural music, and has the right to appeal to our senses without apology. Dr. Muck's control of the orchestra in this Symphony was simply marvelous. He painted with a camel's-hair brush of the finest kind. Nothing more perfect could be imagined than the adjustment of its instrumental balance and the vivid clearness with which the lines of Brahms' tonal picture were drawn.

Cutting Bureau

NOTES OF THE M

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

ANTON BRUCKNER, like Dr. Johnson, is better known than his works. Probably the great majority of the audience that heard the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night knew more or less about the eccentric Viennese professor who set out "to do for the symphony what Wagner had done for the opera" (whatever that may mean), and in pursuit of his end emulated Beethoven by planning nine symphonies, though he did not live to complete the ninth. But probably very few of those present had ever heard one of his compositions performed before. Indeed, they have been rarely played in this country. Back in the eighties Theodore Thomas, Walter Damrosch, and Mr. Gericke experimented with them here and in Boston, and Mr. Thomas did not abandon them after he went to Chicago. Mr. Gericke gave one symphony in Boston season before last, and Mr. Scheel gave one in Philadelphia the other day. It was reserved, however, for Dr. Muck to come to this country with something of a Bruckner enthusiasm, which found expression in the production of the composer's seventh, and most famous, symphony at the concerts of the Boston Orchestra in Boston last week, and at the concert last night in New York.

With admirable caution Dr. Muck so ordered the programme of all of these concerts that the symphony stood first, with Rosenthal in Liszt's E flat piano concerto and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture as a bait to keep the audience seated in case the symphony proved a bore. And in Boston the bait was needed. It is credibly reported that the fashionable Friday afternoon audience was so bored with the Seventh Symphony that it almost forgot its Bostonian decorum. In Paris or Berlin (the assertion is made) the same audience would have hissed roundly Bruckner and all his works.

The New York audience last night took more kindly to the hour and ten minutes of Bruckner. There was no lack of applause after any of the first three movements of the symphony, and at the close there were several hearty recalls for Dr. Muck, though much of this enthusiasm was in gratitude, no doubt, for the devoted and brilliant interpretation by the conductor and his men.

In the opinion of most listeners, the symphony itself must have maintained the general reputation of Bruckner's music. Long, garrulous, pedantic it sounded, broken here and there in its sluggish flow by a moment of exalted beauty or an orchestral climax of thrilling power. It no longer has the special glamour of the newest thing in music—that gives an interest quite apart from intrinsic worth to a composition by Vincent d'Indy or Richard Strauss. Twenty years ago it was "music of the future." To-day its future seems to lie for the most part behind it.

For the rest of the concert, Mr. Rosenthal played the Liszt concerto as he played it here last month, with sensational brilliancy and power, and the orchestra finished the programme with a broadly dramatic performance of the "Leonore" overture. In these the audience found its reward for sitting through the symphony.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
7 - 1901

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

HOW MAJOR HIGGINSON MAY BE GENEROUS TO THIS TOWN.

With a Few More Audiences Like Last Night's at Carnegie Hall, the Bostonian Maecenas Could Have His "Yacht" and Enjoy His "Symphony" Too—An Hour of Anton Bruckner's Sad Life and Its Lessons—Conried's Air Ballet as the Flying Squadron in To-night's War of the Two "Fausts"—The Two Campanaris in One Hall.

If Henry L. Higginson, the musical Maecenas of Boston, ever yields to the tearful entreaties of his managerial trio, Charles Ellis, Frederick Comee and William Walter, and allows the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra to pay more frequent visits to New York, who can say what the result may be? Certainly Mr. Higginson will no longe be able to repeat his famous boast, "The Symphony is my private yacht." He will be called on for no $20,000 yearly subsidy. For another five New York concerts like last evening's event, at Carnegie Hall, would pay his most princely deficit. They are turning New Yorkers away. The box office opened with eleven seats to sell.

It was a case of "come early or stand up" through so portentous an opening number as Anton Bruckner's E major symphony. This work the Thomas Orchestra rushed to a solitary hearing in town twenty years ago, placing it last in a long bill, while New Yorkers, as usual, ran early away. The rival Damrosch orchestra of that period had anticipated it with Bruckner's D minor. Dr. Muck's revival of the welltempered major dirge was a labor of love as well as knowledge. The Seventh Symphony, with a bass tuba quartet that was more Bach than Bayreuth, sang requiem not for Wagner but for his disciple who wrote it. The scherzo might have been Beethoven retouched by Tschaikowsky, and the three other parts were only as solemn as any composer could be who loved buoyant "Rheingold" harmonies and melodiously contrapuntal "Meistersinger." The hour and five minutes it took to play was a wonderfully good lesson for a musical city of dreadful night which employs prima donna millionaires to sing diamond-backed opera to a parterre all gold and a block wide.

Bruckner, as the few know who ransacked last night's outer darkness for Mr. Comee's friends, the exiled programme boys, was a man chosen from music's "other half." What use to prattle to-day of Europe's musical atmosphere when such a man of heaven-sent gifts was permitted literally to live on air. What a warning to read how he was left to teach an Austrian school for the ghastly compensation of 75 cents a month, was left for years to starve body and soul, and for a life time to know no human love and to gain the slightest artistic recognition at the close? A powerful human document were Mr. Philip Hale's seventeen close-printed pages on this victim of unsought enmity with Brahms and unsubmerged plunge in the Wagner sea.

Dr. Muck's increasing hold on the public was shown when the entire house remained to hear him conduct Beethoven's overture to "Leonora" No. 3. For the first time the conductor had a rival in the person of the most brilliant solo performer of the year, Moritz Rosenthal, and his most admirably chosen concerto, the Liszt E-flat, which opened Rosenthal's first American tour in Boston eighteen years ago.

Herr Rosenthal's greatest difficulty is that our audiences are still getting acquainted with a man only three times our visitor in a score of years. His personality, his modest hair and bent shoulders, are not yet a part of every music-lover's stock of mental pictures. But he has arrived in a golden year and he was recalled last evening till he had to explain by gesture that encores are not allowed.

NEW YORK MAIL
DEC 7 1906

BRUCKNER MUSIC BY BOSTON MEN

Dr. Karl Muck and the Orchestra Play Sixty-Six Minute Symphony by Austrian Composer.

Anton Bruckner's symphony in E major, No. 7, occupied the first one hour and six minutes of last evening's Boston Symphony orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall.

Twenty years ago Theodore Thomas conducted this symphony at a Philharmonic concert, and Mr. Otto Weil, now of the Metropolitan opera house but then Mr. Thomas's librarian, recalls that it took six minutes longer under Thomas than under Dr. Karl Muck last night. In any case, the symphony must have been new to nearly all of yesterday's Carnegie hall auditors. Bruckner is in fact one of the least known of modern composers, so far as American music lovers are concerned.

His name comes up every little while in German and Austrian programmes and his works still excite controversy, one party exalting them to a very high level, another declaring them wanting in the elements of artistic immortality. After hearing Bruckner's seventh symphony last night, one is tempted to rejoice anew that Richard Wagner did not, after attaining his matured style, try to write symphonies—for they would surely have borne a strong family likeness to this of Bruckner's, and would as certainly have been twice too long.

Bruckner, who died in 1896 in Vienna, was an eccentric but lovable man, a learned and devoted musician. Good humored caricaturists liked to depict his close-shaven head, his opened neckband, sans collar; his preposterously short trousers, which exposed his stockings, but Bruckner, who came of Austrian peasant stock and never had an extra florin all his life, didn't mind their banter.

To tell of his poverty, his sordid hardships, his unconquerable will to create music, his amiable sociability with cabmen and music students in third-class Viennese restaurants, would take too long, but the reader may sketch the portrait for himself from these notes and be in no danger of exaggerating the man's quaintness, or his sterling goodness.

But what of last night's seventh symphony? Written between 1881 and 1883 by an ardent admirer of Richard Wagner, in a day when the "Wagner question" had the center of the musical stage, it is not strange that Bruckner's score is deeply and obviously indebted to the composer of "Das Rheingold," "Siegfried" and "Die Meistersinger."

It is not strange, but it is a pity, for it is hard to isolate, in this symphony, the real personality of Bruckner. Perhaps it lies in the rather Beethovenish melodic outlines of certain of the themes, and in their treatment, but it is heavily overlaid by the Wagnerian idiom. The finale of the first movement, splendidly virile and effective, forces "Das Rheingold" before the mind; the noble adagio, with its dirge, is Wagnerian in its rich smoothness of scoring; "Die Meistersinger" speaks out of the scherzo, and the finale, with its incessantly changing tonality, reminds one irresistibly of the chromatic Wanderer's music of "Siegfried's" first act.

Logical, beautiful, sumptuously scored, especially for the brass, this Bruckner symphony wears the glittering, golden Wagner collar.

Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra played the symphony superbly, and quite evidently as a labor of love. Certainly the composer would have rejoiced at such an exquisitely shaded yet strong and masculine performance. The audience applauded heartily, though how much for the composition and how much for its interpretation could not be determined.

After the symphony came a brilliant, sparkling presentation of the Liszt E flat piano concerto, with Moriz Rosenthal as soloist. The house gave him a splendid ovation, and from every point of view he deserved it—Liszt's music is not often played with higher potency.

The "Leonore" overture of Beethoven, No. 3, brought the concert to a great finish. Dr. Muck met all desires for musicularity, but without sacrificing tonal beauty and balance. Nothing better than this could be asked.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAM
NEW YORK
From
Address
Date DEC 7 - 1906

BRUCKNER NIGHT FOR BOSTONIANS

Dr. Muck and His Matchless Symphonists Give Great Performance of Work of Wagner's Pupil.

NOT FAMILIAR TO NEW YORK

A symphony by Bruckner held the foremost place upon the profoundly interesting programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall.

The work is unfamiliar to New York audiences, nor is there any likelihood of its ever becoming familiar, but that will be the loss of the general auditor and not of Bruckner or the musicians who interpret him, or the amateur who has learned to love him.

Massive and epic in idea, original and audacious in presentation, courageously working along difficult but still elevated paths, never destined to lead into the sweet pastures and resting places of easy popularity, this remarkable musician will invariably exercise a fascination over the minds of those who are not terrified by a merely superficial austerity. He is as bald perhaps at times, but with the baldness of the mountain tops.

If, as many have imagined, the superb adagio, which forms the second movement of this highly conceived work, is a tribute to the memory of that immortal Baireuth master, whom Bruckner so loved and honored, then it is one of the most enduring and affecting monuments that has as yet been erected to Richard Wagner, and this chiefly because the music of this adagio is fired with that sustained and uplifted eloquence, that unsurpassable dignity of Pindaric utterance which, at his strongest movements, is the speech of Wagner himself.

As for the execution of this entrancing and invasive work, it can only be said that it reached the normality of perfection. Under the stimulation of Dr. Muck, Mr. Gericke's mathematics have become mixed with genial humanism.

Dr. Muck's grip on his audience increases with each performance, and this is because one realizes that he is a master of his difficult craft, and also a clear-eyed and sure-footed guide to whom it is not altogether unsafe to trust, for a while, at least, our tender, artistic and aesthetic consciences.

The awe, the mystery, the subdued pathos, the spiritualized poetry with which certain passages of what may be not inaccurately termed the funeral music in the second movement of the symphony, left an impression not easily or speedily to be effaced.

Mr. Rosenthal was the soloist. We have been deluged with Mr. Rosenthal of late.

A. ST.-J.-B.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
DEC 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Concert Highly Appreciated.

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra had finished Beethoven's overture last night at Carnegie Hall there was more than one in the audience who voiced appreciation by observing that he would gladly remain another hour if Dr. Karl Muck's musicians would continue.

Bruckner's symphony in E major began the programme. At first the audience appeared somewhat indifferent to the poetry of the music, but as the work progressed, and the orchestra aroused itself to the spirit of the theme, the large crowd in the lower seats and the boxes began to attest its approbation by sympathetic little nods, which were as much of a compliment to the director as vigorous applause, and when the orchestra had finished, the heartiness of the congratulatory greeting which [illegible] auditorium attested the [illegible] taken but little [illegible]

The overture by Beethoven also aroused the liveliest interest among the music lovers who were present. It was admirably conducted by Dr. Muck.

Moritz Rosenthal, who played a Liszt concerto, more than ever established himself in the good graces of the New York public. His execution was admirable, his touch sympathetic and his tone producing superb. Time and time again the audience insisted that he come back to bow his acknowledgments to the continued demonstrations of approval, but in spite of the insistence of the concert goers that he should play for them again, he declined to give an encore and, after something like six recalls, was permitted to depart in peace, although it would have

[89]

NEW YORK TIMES
DEC 7 - 1906

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AGAIN

A Fine Performance of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

THE WORK OF UNEVEN MERIT

Moriz Rosenthal the Soloist in Liszt's Concerto—Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture Played.

Dr. Muck made the programme of the first concert of the second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra chiefly to consist of Anton Bruckner's seventh symphony. This occupied the first place on the programme and two-thirds of the allotted time. The rest of the programme was taken up by Mr. Rosenthal, who played Liszt's E flat concerto, and by a performance of Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture. There was a large audience, which listened with amazing patience and interest to Bruckner's long symphony and indicated appreciation of it and of the superb performance it received.

Twenty years ago when Theodore Thomas first played it here, it was not so. On that occasion half the audience filed out of the hall and were lost in outer darkness before the end of it was reached. It was then considered excessively complicated, full of unintelligible counterpoint, forced harmonies, and abstruse elaboration, overheavily orchestrated, and the sixteen brass instruments that were employed in it aroused wonder and consternation. Its composer was regarded as belonging to the extreme left wing, in his Wagnerian tendencies. But the musical public has become inured to many things since then. After Strauss and Mahler and d'Indy, Bruckner seems clear enough, and what he is attempting to convey easy enough to understand.

Bruckner's expositors declare that it was his ambition to carry out Wagner's theories about opera in absolute music, to utilize these theories for orchestral advantage. He was an ardent admirer of Wagner, and put himself among his followers; but what it means to utilize Wagner's dramatic theories in symphonic composition remains a mystery. Those theories concerned the relation between music and action in the lyric drama, and there is no application for them in absolute music, unless it be taken to mean a thematic relationship between two or more movements, an evolution of one theme into others organically related to it, such as Liszt employed, and Schumann before him, and Brahms since. There is but a suggestion of it in the symphony played last night.

Be this as it may, the work stands for itself, and all that Bruckner tried to do and say in it is perfectly intelligible at this day. It is the work of a man with a strong feeling for orchestral color and effects of all sorts, and with a power of manipulating themes that he had under very little control through self-criticism. Of true symphonic development he had little command, and the movements of his symphony seem like an elaborate series of experiments carried out to the most wearisome lengths. Some of them turn out well; many are unfortunate failures; but he never lets one go.

The last movement is hopelessly commonplace in its material, and is as sounding brass, most tiresome. In the others there are impressive moments, passages that are as the large utterance of the early gods; such as the opening measures and certain passages through the slow movement, which has the suggestion of a dirge for the master whom he followed—or was the suggestion an afterthought? But these come in the midst of commonplace or wearisome matter, matter that is perplexing by its juxtaposition. The lack is not merely of continuity of thought, but as well of poverty of the real musical idea. In this, as in other works by Bruckner, we are reminded of the peasant who remained a peasant throughout his life; whose training and culture were never such as to control and direct the current of his inspiration, or to put his great technical learning really at the service of his art.

We see in his symphony the work of a naïve musician, many of whose symphonies he never heard played until long after they were composed, and who, notwithstanding the fame that he gained and the ardent partisans whom he won, remained, in a way, apart and detached from the world of art. The conflict over his music that raged in Vienna and that divided musicians and amateurs into hostile factions, pitting Bruckner as the representative of Wagner against Brahms, means nothing to us now. His affiliations have no bearing upon the disposition with which his music is heard. And such a performance as Dr. Muck gave of it last evening puts it before this public in its most favorable light. He is known as an exponent of Bruckner's music abroad, and has championed it in many places. It was evident that this symphony was an open book to him, and the performance he gave was memorable in its sympathy and its fidelity to the spirit of the work and its technical finish.

The concerto by Liszt was one of the pieces in which Mr. Rosenthal made his re-entry earlier in the season, and which he plays with dazzling brilliancy.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK SUN

BRUCKNER'S SEVENTH PLAYED BY THE BOSTONIANS.

Work Revived Here After Twenty Years Improves on a Second Hearing, but Still Fails to Be Accepted as Great—Superbly Interpreted by Dr. Carl Muck.

In the order of incidents a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came around again last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Anton Bruckner's E major symphony, the seventh of his series; Liszt's E flat piano concerto and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. The solo performer was Moriz Rosenthal. Let him be dismissed at once with the record that he has never played the finale of the concerto faster. For this let us bless him, because it came sooner to an end.

For those who are more interested in creative than in performing musicians the Bruckner symphony was the important matter of the evening. This composition was produced here twenty years ago by the Philharmonic Society under Theodore Thomas in the Metropolitan Opera House. At that time it struck a chill to the hearts of its hearers, many of whom departed from the auditorium after the second movement. Mr. Krehbiel in his "Review of the New York Musical Season" said: "It may be beautiful in twenty-five years; it is not beautiful now." At the same time he took the newspapers of the day to task for their hasty and inconsiderate condemnation of the composition and made note of some striking things in the first movement and moments in the second "approaching grandeur."

Last night this second movement was warmly applauded and at the end of the symphony Dr. Muck, the conductor, was compelled to bow several times in recognition of the continued demonstration of pleasure. In the end he called upon the entire orchestra to rise and acknowledge the favor of the audience. It looked as if Bruckner had come into his own, yet despite the incontrovertible fact that our musical perceptions have widened and deepened in twenty years and that our æsthetic palates have learned to hunger for harmonies that bite and burn, it was impossible to avoid the belief that the applause was rather a tribute to the masterly conquest of tonal difficulties than to the charm of the work itself.

Hardened observers of musical doings are not a little sceptical as to the readiness of large concert audiences to take joy in music conceding so little to the taste for sensuous beauty and demanding so much intellectual application to its intricate development. Bruckner's works have been heard infrequently in New York, which is a city quite unacquainted with the reasons for hostility to this composer so long existent in Austria. The war between the Brucknerites and the "Brahmsianer" is unknown here. Whatever Bruckner has to say to us is heard without prejudice.

Therefore with judicial calm we can say this morning that the general estimate placed on this symphony twenty years ago was in its fundamental marshalling of facts just but that it failed to appreciate the true worth of the work as an intellectual edifice and of the notably lofty and eloquent character of its second movement. The first movement is a remarkable piece of composition. Its thematic matter would be a fortune to some of the tone splashers of to-day, while its superb mastery of the wealth of orchestral counterpoint, the real counterpoint that does not merely find issue in unexpected and shocking assaults upon the ear and upon the analytical faculty of the mind but rather produces new and speaking results out of the meeting of melodic thoughts, is not equalled by any of the much vaunted masters of the Munich dynasty.

As for the second movement, this is indeed an inspiration. Its second theme is one of the most beautiful thoughts to be found in all symphonic literature. The serious fault of this part of the symphony is a want of continence in the development, which is overelaborated so that the repetitions of the subject matter in their original shape are too numerous and consequently weaken the structure. Of the scherzo little can be said in praise. It has originality of style, but it is an ugly style. Here, too, bald repetition, insistent wearisome reiteration of the melodic fragment first pealed by the trumpet is carried to the very verge of inanity. The trio affords welcome relief, but is itself made by force of contrast to appear to be better than it actually is.

The finale is desperately involved and has episodes of ugliness which would delight the mind of Richard Strauss. The recurrence at the end of the pedal point used in the first movement, a pedal point which in harmony and instrumental color bears a dangerous resemblance to that at the beginning of "Rheingold," is a tiresome and meaningless device. There are several passages in the work which tread close upon the heels of Wagner and in the scherzo the echoes of "Die Meistersinger" are not secondary but primary.

If this essay at a cursory review of the composition means anything at all it means that the work is uncommonly uneven in merit, that it has only flashes of inspiration, admirable though they are; that it is laboriously built, is prolix and too frequently plunges into that ocean of discord upon which floats the bark of Strauss. We have had twenty years to grow up to this variety of music, and we still find our ears pleading against the vain arguments of our brains. We strive to convince ourselves that music is winging her flight into realms of new harmonic thought, but we hunger for elemental beauty as we find it in the immortal works of certain masters, though clothed in various garb.

The sincerity of Bruckner, the chastity of his artistic feeling, his profound intellectuality and his firm command of the technics of his art bespeak for him a [illegible] able position among composers. [illegible] it comes to asking us, as his [illegible]

DEC 7 19

BRUCKNER MUSIC BY BOSTON MEN

Dr. Karl Muck and the Orchestra Play Sixty-Six Minute Symphony by Austrian Composer.

Anton Bruckner's symphony in E major, No. 7, occupied the first one hour and six minutes of last evening's Boston Symphony orchestra concert at Carnegie hall.

Twenty years ago Theodore Thomas conducted this symphony at a Philharmonic concert, and Mr. Otto Weil, now of the Metropolitan opera house but then Mr. Thomas's librarian, recalls that it took six minutes longer under Thomas than under Dr. Karl Muck last night. In any case, the symphony must have been new to nearly all of yesterday's Carnegie hall auditors. Bruckner is in fact one of the least known of modern composers, so far as American music lovers are concerned.

His name comes up every little while in German and Austrian programmes and his works still excite controversy, one party exalting them to a very high level, another declaring them wanting in the elements of artistic immortality. After hearing Bruckner's seventh symphony last night, one is tempted to rejoice anew that Richard Wagner did not, after attaining his matured style, try to write symphonies—for they would surely have borne a strong family likeness to this of Bruckner's ,and would as certainly have been twice too long.

Bruckner, who died in 1896 in Vienna, was an eccentric but lovable man, a learned and devoted musician. Good humored caricaturists liked to depict his close-shaven head, his opened neckband, sans collar; his preposterously short trousers, which exposed his stockings, but Bruckner, who came of Austrian peasant stock and never had an extra florin all his life, didn't mind their banter.

To tell of his poverty, his sordid hardships, his unconquerable will to create music, his amiable sociability with cabmen and music students in third-class Viennese restaurants, would take too long, but the reader may sketch the portrait for himself from these notes and be in no danger of exaggerating the man's quaintness, or his sterling goodness.

But what of last night's seventh symphony? Written between 1881 and 1883 by an ardent admirer of Richard Wagner, in a day when the "Wagner question" had the center of the musical stage, it is not strange that Bruckner's score is deeply and obviously indebted to the composer of "Das Rheingold," "Siegfried" and "Die Meistersinger."

It is not strange, but it is a pity, for it is hard to isolate, in this symphony, the real personality of Bruckner. Perhaps it lies in the rather Beethovenish melodic outlines of certain of the themes, and in their treatment, but it is heavily overlaid by the Wagnerian idiom. The finale of the first movement, splendidly virile and effective, forces "Das Rheingold" before the mind; the noble adagio, with its dirge, is Wagnerian in its rich smoothness of scoring; "Die Meistersinger" speaks out of the scherzo, and the finale, with its incessantly changing tonality, reminds one irresistibly of the chromatic Wanderer's music of "Siegfried's" first act.

Logical, beautiful, sumptuously scored, especially for the brass, this Bruckner symphony wears the glittering, golden Wagner collar.

Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra played the symphony superbly, and quite evidently as a labor of love. Certainly the composer would have rejoiced at such an exquisitely shaded yet strong and masculine performance. The audience applauded heartily, though how much for the composition and how much for its interpretation could not be determined.

After the symphony came a brilliant, sparkling presentation of the Liszt E flat piano concerto, with Moriz Rosenthal as soloist. The house gave him a splendid ovation, and from every point of view he deserved it—Liszt's music is not often played with higher potency.

The "Leonore" overture of Beethoven, No. 3, brought the concert to a great finish. Dr. Muck met all desires for muscularity, but without sacrificing tonal beauty and balance. Nothing better than this could be asked.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom

ddress

ite

BRUCKNER NIGHT FOR BOSTONIANS

Dr. Muck and Mis Matchless Symphonists Give Great Performance of Work of Wagner's Pupil.

NOT FAMILIAR TO NEW YORK

A symphony by Bruckner held the foremost place upon the profoundly interesting programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall.

The work is unfamiliar to New York audiences, nor is there any likelihood of its ever becoming familiar, but that will be the loss of the general auditor and not of Bruckner or the musicians who interpret him, or the amateur who has learned to love him.

Massive and epic in idea, original and audacious in presentation, courageously working along difficult but still elevated paths, never destined to lead into the sweet pastures and resting places of easy popularity, this remarkable musician will invariably exercise a fascination over the minds of those who are not terrified by a merely superficial austerity. He is as bald perhaps at times, but with the baldness of the mountain tops.

If, as many have imagined, the superb adagio, which forms the second movement of this highly conceived work, is a tribute to the memory of that immortal Baireuth master, whom Bruckner so loved and honored, then it is one of the most enduring and affecting monuments that has as yet been erected to Richard Wagner, and this chiefly because the music of this adagio is fired with that sustained and uplifted eloquence, that unsurpassable dignity of Pindaric utterance which, at his strongest movements, is the speech of Wagner himself.

As for the execution of this entrancing and invasive work, it can only be said that it reached the normality of perfection. Under the stimulation of Dr. Muck, Mr. Gericke's mathematics have become mixed with genial humanism.

Dr. Muck's grip on his audience increases with each performance, and this is because one realizes that he is a master of his difficult craft, and also a clear-eyed and sure-footed guide to whom it is not altogether unsafe to trust, for a while, at least, our tender, artistic and aesthetic consciences.

The awe, the mystery, the subdued pathos, the spiritualized poetry with which certain passages of what may be not inaccurately termed the funeral music in the second movement of the symphony, left an impression not easily or speedily to be effaced.

Mr. Rosenthal was the soloist. We have been deluged with Mr. Rosenthal of late.

A. ST.-J.-B.

GRAM

Boston Symphony Concert Highly Appreciated.

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra had finished Beethoven's overture last night at Carnegie Hall there was more than one in the audience who voiced appreciation by observing that he would gladly remain another hour if Dr. Karl Muck's musicians would continue.

Bruckner's symphony in E major began the programme. At first the audience appeared somewhat indifferent to the poetry of the music, but as the work progressed, and the orchestra aroused itself to the spirit of the theme, the large crowd in the lower seats and the boxes began to attest its approbation by sympathetic little nods, which were as much of a compliment to the director as vigorous applause, and when the orchestra had finished, the heartiness of the congratulatory greeting which rang through the auditorium attested the delight of the hearers.

The overture by Beethoven also aroused the liveliest interest among the music lovers who were present. It was admirably conducted by Dr. Muck.

Moritz Rosenthal, who played a Liszt concerto, more than ever established himself in the good graces of the New York public. His execution was admirable, his touch sympathetic and his tone producing superb. Time and time again the audience insisted that he come back to bow his acknowledgments to the continued demonstrations of approval, but in spite of the insistence of the concert goers that he should play for them again, he declined to give an encore and, after something like six recalls, was permitted to depart in peace, although it would have taken but little for another outburst of popular approval from the crowd.

[89]

NEW YORK TIMES.

DEC

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AGAIN

A Fine Performance of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

THE WORK OF UNEVEN MERIT

Moriz Rosenthal the Soloist in Liszt's Concerto—Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture Played.

Dr. Muck made the programme of the first concert of the second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra chiefly to consist of Anton Bruckner's seventh symphony. This occupied the first place on the programme and two-thirds of the allotted time. The rest of the programme was taken up by Mr. Rosenthal, who played Liszt's E flat concerto, and by a performance of Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture. There was a large audience, which listened with amazing patience and interest to Bruckner's long symphony and indicated appreciation of it and of the superb performance it received.

Twenty years ago when Theodore Thomas first played it here, it was not so. On that occasion half the audience filed out of the hall and were lost in outer darkness before the end of it was reached. It was then considered excessively complicated, full of unintelligible counterpoint, forced harmonies, and bastruse elaboration, overheavily orchestrated, and the sixteen brass instruments that were employed in it aroused wonder and consternation. Its composer was regarded as belonging to the extreme left wing, in his Wagnerian tendencies. But the musical public has become inured to many things since then. After Strauss and Mahler and d'Indy, Bruckner seems clear enough, and what he is attempting to convey easy enough to understand.

Bruckner's expositors declare that it was his ambition to carry out Wagner's theories about opera in absolute music, to utilize these theories for orchestral advantage. He was an ardent admirer of Wagner, and put himself among his followers; but what it means to utilize Wagner's dramatic theories in symphonic composition remains a mystery. Those theories concerned the relation between music and action in the lyric drama, and there is no application for them in absolute music, unless it be taken to mean a thematic relationship between two or more movements, an evolution of one theme into others organically related to it, such as Liszt employed, and Schumann before him, and Brahms since. There is but a suggestion of it in the symphony played last night.

Be this as it may, the work stands for itself, and all that Bruckner tried to do and say in it is perfectly intelligible at this day. It is the work of a man with a strong feeling for orchestral color and effects of all sorts, and with a power of manipulating themes that he had under very little control through self-criticism. Of true symphonic development he had little command, and the movements of his symphony seem like an elaborate series of experiments carried out to the most wearisome lengths. Some of them turn out well; many are unfortunate failures; but he never lets one go.

The last movement is hopelessly commonplace in its material, and is as sounding brass, most tiresome. In the others there are impressive moments, passages that are as the large utterance of the early gods; such as the opening measures and certain passages through the slow movement, which has the suggestion of a dirge for the master whom he followed—or was the suggestion an afterthought? But these come in the midst of commonplace or wearisome matter, matter that is perplexing by its juxtaposition. The lack is not merely of continuity of thought, but as well of poverty of the real musical idea. In this, as in other works by Bruckner, we are reminded of the peasant who remained a peasant throughout his life; whose training and culture were never such as to control and direct the current of his inspiration, or to put his great technical learning really at the service of his art.

We see in his symphony the work of a naïve musician, many of whose symphonies he never heard played until long after they were composed, and who, notwithstanding the fame that he gained and the ardent partisans whom he won, remained, in a way, apart and detached from the world of art. The conflict over his music that raged in Vienna and that divided musicians and amateurs into hostile factions, pitting Bruckner as the representative of Wagner against Brahms, means nothing to us now. His affiliations have no bearing upon the disposition with which his music is heard. And such a performance as Dr. Muck gave of it last evening puts it before this public in its most favorable light. He is known as an exponent of Bruckner's music abroad, and has championed it in many places. It was evident that this symphony was an open book to him, and the performance he gave was memorable in its sympathy and its fidelity to the spirit of the work and its technical finish.

The concerto by Liszt was one of the pieces in which Mr. Rosenthal made his re-entry earlier in the season, and which he plays with dazzling brilliancy.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK SUN

A SYMPHONY BY BRUCKNER

HIS SEVENTH PLAYED BY THE BOSTONIANS.

Work Revived Here After Twenty Years Improves on a Second Hearing, but Still Fails to Be Accepted as Great—Superbly Interpreted by Dr. Carl Muck.

In the order of incidents a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came around again last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Anton Bruckner's E major symphony, the seventh of his series; Liszt's E flat piano concerto and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. The solo performer was Moriz Rosenthal. Let him be dismissed at once with the record that he has never played the finale of the concerto faster. For this let us bless him, because it came sooner to an end.

For those who are more interested in creative than in performing musicians the Bruckner symphony was the important matter of the evening. This composition was produced here twenty years ago by the Philharmonic Society under Theodore Thomas in the Metropolitan Opera House. At that time it struck a chill to the hearts of its hearers, many of whom departed from the auditorium after the second movement. Mr. Krehbiel in his "Review of the New York Musical Season" said: "It may be beautiful in twenty-five years; it is not beautiful now." At the same time he took the newspapers of the day to task for their hasty and inconsiderate condemnation of the composition and made note of some striking things in the first movement and moments in the second "approaching grandeur."

Last night this second movement was warmly applauded and at the end of the symphony Dr. Muck, the conductor, was compelled to bow several times in recognition of the continued demonstration of pleasure. In the end he called upon the entire orchestra to rise and acknowledge the favor of the audience. It looked as if Bruckner had come into his own, yet despite the incontrovertible fact that our musical perceptions have widened and deepened in twenty years and that our æsthetic palates have learned to hunger for harmonies that bite and burn, it was impossible to avoid the belief that the applause was rather a tribute to the masterly conquest of tonal difficulties than to the charm of the work itself.

Hardened observers of musical doings are not a little sceptical as to the readiness of large concert audiences to take joy in music conceding so little to the taste for sensuous beauty and demanding so much intellectual application to its intricate development. Bruckner's works have been heard infrequently in New York, which is a city quite unacquainted with the reasons for hostility to this composer so long existent in Austria. The war between the Brucknerites and the "Brahmsianer" is unknown here. Whatever Bruckner has to say to us is heard without prejudice.

Therefore with judicial calm we can say this morning that the general estimate placed on this symphony twenty years ago was in its fundamental marshalling of facts just but that it failed to appreciate the true worth of the work as an intellectual edifice and of the notably lofty and eloquent character of its second movement. The first movement is a remarkable piece of composition. Its thematic matter would be a fortune to some of the tone splashers of to-day, while its superb mastery of the wealth of orchestral counterpoint, the real counterpoint that does not merely find issue in unexpected and shocking assaults upon the ear and upon the analytical faculty of the mind but rather produces new and speaking results out of the meeting of melodic thoughts, is not equalled by any of the much vaunted masters of the Munich dynasty.

As for the second movement, this is indeed an inspiration. Its second theme is one of the most beautiful thoughts to be found in all symphonic literature. The serious fault of this part of the symphony is a want of continence in the development, which is overelaborated so that the repetitions of the subject matter in their original shape are too numerous and consequently weaken the structure. Of the scherzo little can be said in praise. It has originality of style, but it is an ugly style. Here, too, bald repetition, insistent wearisome reiteration of the melodic fragment first pealed by the trumpet is carried to the very verge of inanity. The trio affords welcome relief, but is itself made by force of contrast to appear to be better than it actually is.

The finale is desperately involved and has episodes of ugliness which would delight the mind of Richard Strauss. The recurrence at the end of the pedal point used in the first movement, a pedal point which in harmony and instrumental color bears a dangerous resemblance to that at the beginning of "Rheingold," is a tiresome and meaningless device. There are several passages in the work which tread close upon the heels of Wagner and in the scherzo the echoes of "Die Meistersinger" are not secondary, but primary.

If this essay at a cursory review of the composition means anything at all it means that the work is uncommonly uneven in merit, that it has only flashes of inspiration, admirable though they are; that it is laboriously built, is prolix and too frequently plunges into that ocean of discord upon which floats the bark of Strauss. We have had twenty years to grow up to this variety of music, and we still find our ears pleading against the vain arguments of our brains. We strive to convince ourselves that music is winging her flight into realms of new harmonic thought, but we hunger for elemental beauty as we find it in the immortal works of certain masters, though clothed in various garb.

The sincerity of Bruckner, the chastity of his artistic feeling, his profound intellectuality and his firm command of the technics of his art bespeak for him an honorable position among composers. But when it comes to asking us, as his misguided Viennese friends asked their contemporaries, to accept him as the opponent and rival of Brahms we are compelled after all these years to enter a verdict of "Not proven."

From N. Y. TRIBUNE,
Address
Date DEC 7 - 1906

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Muck took occasion at the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night to bring forward Bruckner's Symphony in E major, No. 7. To judge from several announcements put forth by the management, this symphony is one for which the distinguished conductor has stood sponsor in quite a number of musical capitals. It is to be assumed from the zeal which he displayed in conducting it last night, and the superb results which he achieved with his orchestra, that he has an affectionate interest either in the work or the memory of its composer. In one respect he was more circumspect than Mr. Theodore Thomas, who gave the work its first American hearings twenty years ago—in the summer of 1886, at a concert in Chicago, and on November 13 following, at a concert of the Philharmonic Society here. Mr. Thomas placed the symphony at the end of his programme; Dr. Muck at the beginning of his. Twenty years is a long time for anybody to keep a musical composition in mind and a sufficient period for those who heard it at the beginning to be willing to hear it again for the sake of observing whether or not their first impressions would meet with confirmation. Therefore the audience that filled all the stalls and boxes of the large room heard the work from beginning to end, either enjoying or enduring it for full seventy minutes. Twenty years ago this was not the case. There being no promise of other things to follow, a small contingent of the most serious minded audience which New York boasts left the hall after the second movement, and a larger contingent after the third. Only two-thirds of those who came to the concert with curiosity whetted by the name of the new composer and the reports touching the reception of what was then set down as his greatest work remained to the end. Last night the case was different; good manners and a desire to hear the things which were to follow—Rosenthal's performance of Liszt's E flat pianoforte concerto and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore, No. 3"—kept them in their seats, and a praiseworthy spirit led them to bestow a considerable degree of approval upon either the work or its performance, or both. But the applause was neither loud enough nor cordial enough to prevent the thought from arising that possibly the attitude toward the performance on the part of the listeners was akin to that of the Hindoo before his idol—they knew that it was ugly, but felt that it was great. Twenty years ago this reviewer expressed the thought that after a lapse of twenty-five years the public might accept the symphony as beautiful music. Four-fifths of the time has past, twenty years of restless endeavor on the part of the disciples of the amiable and ingenuous old Viennese professor to win acceptance for his message; but its grandeur and its beauty do not seem to be manifest. It is still impossible to discern any plenitude of beautiful thoughts or logical development and symmetrical organic structure in the symphony, or to accept his cyclopean piling up of sections in lieu of the method of the masters. A more eloquent plea than was made for it last night can scarcely be imagined; but we must remain unconverted.

Bruckner's name had appeared but once on a local programme before Mr. Thomas brought this symphony forward. A short time before Mr. Walter Damrosch performed the symphony in D minor at a concert of the Symphony Society. Thereby hangs a tale which might as well be told now. It was at a time when the old rivalry in the pursuit of novelties, which used to enliven the symphony seasons, was still in existence. Both Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Thomas were eager to be first in the field with the new work that had caused considerable noise in two senses in Germany. Mr. Thomas was probably a careless reader. At any rate, he secured what he supposed was the work, and put it in rehearsal in Steinway Hall. At the conclusion of the rehearsal he met a friend who had come to hear the novelty, and remarked to him that he was disappointed in the Bruckner symphony; he could find nothing in it and wondered what the German critics had made so great a commotion about. His friend was a more careful observer of foreign affairs and quietly called his attention to the fact that he had not been rehearsing the new work, but its predecessor in D minor. Meanwhile Mr. Damrosch had also secured the symphony in D minor, and, though he knew it was not the much heralded one, he still considered it worth performing. And so he was the first to introduce Bruckner to New York.

NEW YORK HERALD
DEC 7 - 1906

Boston Orchestra Concert.

Many things combined to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last night memorable. The programme was a fine one. Dr. Karl Muck conducted masterfully, and the soloist, Mr. Moriz Rosenthal, outdid himself at the piano. The audience packed the house and its enthusiasm at times reached the glove splitting mark.

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG
DEC 7 - 1906

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Man ist gewohnt, von den Konzerten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, das nach maßgebendstem fachmännischen Urtheil in der ganzen Welt wenig oder garnicht Seinesgleichen hat, in Superlativen zu berichten. Daher ist man ordentlich um den Ausdruck verlegen, wenn man die Jedem, der musikalisch hören kann, wahrnehmbare Steigerung der gestrigen Leistung dieser Künstlerschaar unter Karl Muck's magischem Dirigentenstabe mit Komparativen der Superlative charakterisiren will. Der Berichterstatter muß sich daher faute de mieux mit der mageren Angabe begnügen, daß die Bostoner gestern ihr Programm mit einer Virtuosität absolvirt haben, wie man sie selbst von diesen Elite-Künstlern seit langen Jahren nicht gehört, einer Virtuosität, an welcher selbst der grüne Neid nichts auszusetzen finden könnte.

Und das Programm allein war schon eine That! Als pièce de résistance wurde Anton Bruckner's siebente Symphonie (E dur) gegeben. Der österreichische Komponist ist Anfang der neunziger Jahre gestorben, ohne selbst im eigenen Vaterlande widerspruchslose Anerkennung gefunden zu haben; hier in New York sind die Werke dieses Tondichters, der an manchen Formenkünstler eine Unzahl melodiöser Einfälle hätte abgeben können, ohne im Geringsten zu verarmen, in geradezu unverantwortlicher Weise vernachlässigt worden. Sind doch zwanzig Jahre verflossen, seitdem die gestern mit so viel Glanz von einem deutschen Gastdirigenten (so muß man ihn angesichts der feststehenden Kürze seines amerikanischen Aufenthalts leider nennen) wiederbelebte 7. Symphonie zum letzten Male in einem New Yorker Konzertsaal zu Gehör gebracht worden ist, und so und so viele andere von den neuen Symphonien Bruckner's sind uns unsere Dirigenten überhaupt schuldig geblieben. Nun, der Beifall, den gestern Dr. Muck errungen, dürfte nicht in tauben Ohren verhallt sein, und man darf annehmen, daß nun allgemach das Versäumte nachgeholt werden wird.

Diese siebente Symphonie Bruckner's ist ein interessantes und kunstvolles Werk. Bruckner-Gegner mögen dagegen einwenden, daß man, wenn auch nicht gerade Wagner-Anklänge, so doch den Wagner-Einfluß hie und da konstatiren kann. Bei den meisten anderen modernen Tonsetzern ist aber dieser Einfluß ebenso unverkennbar. Zugeben muß man ferner, daß die Symphonie nicht dermaßen ein organisches Ganze ist, daß man nicht auch einen oder den anderen der vier Sätze losgelöst von den anderen zum Vortrag bringen könnte. Das ist aber heutzutage, wo sie alle sich mehr oder minder von der starren symphonischen Form befreit haben, kein Vorwurf mehr. Man kann darum seine Freude haben an dem ersten Satz, dem Allegro Moderato, in welchem er die beiden Themen plastisch entwickelt und dann so kunstvoll durcheinander wirkt, in kontrapunktisch gründlicher und wirksamer Arbeit. Das herrliche Adagio sodann, das man einst fälschlich als eine Todtenklage auf Richard Wagner's Hinscheiden aufgefaßt hat — der Komponist selbst nickte schlau dazu mit dem Kopf, bis man ausfand, daß dieser zweite Satz ein Jahr vor Wagner's Tode niedergeschrieben wurde — ist so stimmungsvoll und melodiös, daß es später in Deutschland als Tribut für die Manen des damals soeben verstorbenen Bruckner selbst in diversen Konzertsälen dargeboten wurde. Namentlich die Wirkung der Tuben im Choral ist von wunderbarem Effekt. Das originelle Scherzo vollends ist voll von launigen, burschikosen Einfällen oder vielmehr Eingebungen. Nur im letzten Satz, der etwas wirr und formlos erscheint, verflacht das Interesse merklich. Karl Muck behandelt das Werk mit geradezu liebevoller Hingabe an seine Aufgabe. Man müßte allen seinen farbenprächtigen Nüancen folgen, um den glänzenden Eindruck dieser temperamentvollen, durch und durch künstlerischen Dirigentenleistung wiederzugeben. Namentlich die Leichtflüssigkeit des Farbenspiels im Scherzo, die wunderbare Klarheit der Trompete im ersten Thema dieses Satzes und die grandiose Fortissimo-Klimax der Blechinstrumente im Finale verdient auch in der nothwendigen Kürze dieses Referats Sondererwähnung.

Die andere Orchester-Nummer war die nur so häufig zu Gehör gebrachte Beethoven'sche Leonoren-Ouverture No. 3. Man hielt es daher für ausgeschlossen, daß Muck in diesem Werke noch neue wirksame Lichter aufstecken könnte. Es kam aber wieder einmal anders. Das Trompetensignal, das sonst so obenhin behandelt wird, das klare Herausheben der Oktante und das andauernde Festhalten der Jubelstimmung in der Coda waren ungemein effektvolle Einnüancen.

...Spaltung begeisterten Publikum zu Gehör gespielt. Er spielte es wieder mit der wundervoll variirten Anschlagsnuancen, die ihm zu Gebote stehen, und nahm den Schlußsatz wieder in einem Presto, das eben außer Rosenthal kein lebender Pianist mehr als einige Takte lang durchführen kann. Daß der Jubel des Publikums unter sothanen Umständen schier kein Ende nehmen wollte — er wurde mindestens ein Dutzendmal herausgerufen — versteht sich von selbst. Zu einer reglementswidrigen Zugabe war er trotzdem nicht zu bewegen. Das Haus war völlig ausverkauft und die Beifallsbekundungen schallkräftig.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK WORLD
DEC 7 - 19

SYMPHONY CONCERT TRIUMPH FOR MUCK.

New Conductor Has Vitalized Boston Organization—Rosenthal Also Wins Honors.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is finally appreciated at its true worth by the public of New York, for last night's concert at Carnegie Hall filled this auditorium to its utmost capacity and some demands for seats had to be refused at the box-office. The soloist was Rosenthal, but beyond this fact there was nothing on the programme that was alluring bait for the masses of music lovers. True, last night's list of pieces contained Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, a work that has not been heard in New York for twenty years, but on that occasion, it is recarded, that a great part of the audience filed out of the hall to avoid hearing the end.

It would seem from all indications that Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of this orchestra, has breathed not only new artistic life, but also financial life into this magnificent organization. His conducting last night was again an evidence of his greatness as a leader of musicians and a swayer of audiences. He held his hearers interested through the long Bruckner work, which lasts more than one hour, and he created a furore of enthusiasm by his leading of the well-known Beethoven "Leonore Overture No. 3."

He is a man of few words with his baton, but the orchestra follows every movement and gesture with a perfect, sympathetic understanding of what this forceful man wants. The result is a series of highly interesting readings and wonderfully performed interpretations. The one fear that besets the music lovers is that the German Emperor will not grant Muck further leave of absence after the present season, for Muck is a favorite of the Emperor, and great conductors are scarce.

The Bruckner Symphony proved to be a very long work. But to offset this are its many interesting features of which there are legion, its masterly workmanship and its effectiveness. The slow movement, the meaning of which has been translated into a funeral dirge, is an exquisite bit of writing, full of noble sentiment and equally noble expression. The Scherzo is wonderfully ingenious, and the first movement is scholarly. The finale appeared at first hearing involved but with moments of impressive greatness. It is unquestionably a work that should be heard, and it does more to broaden the public's appreciation of music than the mere repetition of well-known symphonies.

Muck's reading of the Beethoven overture was tremendous. He emphasized the dramatic element in the trumpet call behind the scene, and in the finale he voiced a jubilant spirit that was pulse stirring. The playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was impeccable. It is to-day probably the most magnificent orchestral body of players in the world, a virtuoso assembly of virtuosi.

Moritz Rosenthal was the solo performer, and he played the Liszt E flat concerto in a superb manner. He gave the opening majestic breadth, voiced the sentiment of the middle movement tenderly and took the finale at a breathtaking speed that was rousing. At the conclusion of the work the house fairly rose at him and called him out to bow until his feet must have been as weary as the hands of the applauding ones. It was a superb concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N.Y. EV'G SUN
DEC 8 1906

There is an orchestra war in town, and Karl Muck, at to-day's Boston Symphony matinée, gave battle on Safonoff's own ground with the Russian Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, which he also conducted in Brooklyn last night.

The soloist to-day was to be Timothée Adamowski, in a new concerto for violin in F-sharp minor by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra, just as C. M. Loeffler was formerly.

Under the generous policy of Mr. Higginson to encourage his men to write, some important additions to the literature of music have been added to the world's

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK PRESS
DEC 7 - 1906

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Long Neglected Symphony Heard.

Neglected by local organizations for twenty years, Bruckner's Symphony in E major, No. 7, was revived last night in Carnegie Hall by Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1888 Theodore Thomas, as conductor of the Philharmonic Society, produced this gigantic work. That was doomed to be its last performance until happily Dr. Muck, an ardent admirer of Bruckner, was brave enough to put it before the public once more.

Dr. Muck cannot be thanked too warmly for bringing Bruckner's work into notice again, and every lover of music in this city should feel grateful for the opportunity offered through the medium of the Boston orchestra. It is a shameful reflection on musical conditions in New York that the Austrian composer's works have been suppressed, while stuff that is incomparably inferior has been exploited. Hats off to Muck and his men!

The orchestra's programme opened with the Bruckner work, as was becoming. Liszt's much overplayed piano concerto in E flat (a work decidedly inferior to his other concerto) came next, Rosenthal being the virtuoso. The evening ended with a reading of Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3, that was superb—a reading that we have never known surpassed. But, of course, the opening symphony was the chief event of the evening, though Rosenthal's incredibly brilliant performance of the Liszt concerto aroused the greatest outburst of applause.

It is hardly in the nature of Bruckner's seventh symphony, with its inordinate length, to stir up unbridled enthusiasm, particularly when the great majority of listeners were hearing it for the first time. Taking that fact into consideration, it must be said that Dr. Muck's auditors received the composer's message gratefully. Those who were awake to the wealth of real beauty in the work applauded every movement loudly and recalled the conductor several times at the end.

Even Bruckner fanatics cannot deny their idol's evident fault: his tendency to spin his music out into unnecessary lengths; to send his ideas through the mill over and over again. The composer certainly lacked sense of proportion. But one finds so many supreme moments of beauty in Bruckner and his workmanship is always so wonderful that one is compelled to overlook shortcomings because of admiration for the truly inspired portions. We do not know of any other symphonic writer since Beethoven whose polyphony is so glorious in its effect, whose orchestration, while extraordinary in its variety and exceedingly modern, preserves so constantly a beauty that seems almost classical.

The scherzo last night made the most immediate appeal. A wonderfully effective outburst of feeling this—a titanic expression of primeval joy in living. But the noble adagio, a poetic creation of the utmost grandeur, left an indelible impression.

Dr. Muck's reading was ideal. He exposed the emotional and poetic contents of the work with an exquisite attention to significant nuance. He succeeded, too, in building up stunning climaxes. The orchestra under the new conductor's guidance gave out its best.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date DEC 8 - 1906

MUSICAL.

Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony Heard at Concert of the Boston Orchestra.

The second Brooklyn concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred at the Baptist Temple last night with the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, wielding the baton. The soloist was Willy Hess, the leading violinist of the orchestra, who performed with fine skill the Beethoven Concerto in D major, and the programme embraced two orchestral numbers, the Strauss "Don Juan" tone-poem, and the Symphony in B flat, No. 5, Op. 55, by the Russian composer, Glazounoff, which had its first hearing in Brooklyn.

The tone-poem is one of the most noted creations of its composer, who is known in the musical world as an innovator, and the inventor of orchestral effects that have awakened wide discussion. This element of the tone-poem can be appreciated without a handbook, but its ostensible musical meaning cannot. The symphony has the usual four movements, designated as Moderato maestoso; Scherzo; Andante and Alegro maestoso. It is a very satisfying product of modern musical thought, rich in its suggestion of national feeling, and free and broad in its outlook as to the possibilities of music. It re-enforced less important intimations of the fine quality of Glazounoff's work we have had in the past. The symphony was fortunate in being introduced by Dr. Muck with the Boston players, and the listeners were fortunate in hearing such a rendering of the work and of the tone-poem as was given last night.

Evidently the programme did not appeal so widely as these concerts generally do, and the audience was not so large as usual.

[90]

From N. Y. TRIBUNE,
Address
Date DEC 7 - 1906

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Muck took occasion at the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night to bring forward Bruckner's Symphony in E major, No. 7. To judge from several announcements put forth by the management, this symphony is one for which the distinguished conductor has stood sponsor in quite a number of musical capitals. It is to be assumed from the zeal which he displayed in conducting it last night, and the superb results which he achieved with his orchestra, that he has an affectionate interest either in the work or the memory of its composer. In one respect he was more circumspect than Mr. Theodore Thomas, who gave the work its first American hearings twenty years ago—in the summer of 1886, at a concert in Chicago, and on November 13 following, at a concert of the Philharmonic Society here. Mr. Thomas placed the symphony at the end of his programme; Dr. Muck at the beginning of his. Twenty years is a long time for anybody to keep a musical composition in mind and a sufficient period for those who heard it at the beginning to be willing to hear it again for the sake of observing whether or not their first impressions would meet with confirmation. Therefore the audience that filled all the stalls and boxes of the large room heard the work from beginning to end, either enjoying or enduring it for full seventy minutes. Twenty years ago this was not the case. There being no promise of other things to follow, a small contingent of the most serious minded audience which New York boasts left the hall after the second movement, and a larger contingent after the third. Only two-thirds of those who came to the concert with curiosity whetted by the name of the new composer and the reports touching the reception of what was then set down as his greatest work remained to the end. Last night the case was different; good manners and a desire to hear the things which were to follow—Rosenthal's performance of Liszt's E flat pianoforte concerto and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore, No. 3"—kept them in their seats, and a praiseworthy spirit led them to bestow a considerable degree of approval upon either the work or its performance, or both. But the applause was neither loud enough nor cordial enough to prevent the thought from arising that possibly the attitude toward the performance on the part of the listeners was akin to that of the Hindoo before his idol—they knew that it was ugly, but felt that it was great. Twenty years ago this reviewer expressed the thought that after a lapse of twenty-five years the public might accept the symphony as beautiful music. Four-fifths of the time has past, twenty years of restless endeavor on the part of the disciples of the amiable and ingenuous old Viennese professor to win acceptance for his message; but its grandeur and its beauty do not seem to be manifest. It is still impossible to discern any plenitude of beautiful thoughts or logical development and symmetrical organic structure in the symphony, or to accept his cyclopean piling up of sections in lieu of the method of the masters. A more eloquent plea than was made for it last night can scarcely be imagined; but we must remain unconverted.

Bruckner's name had appeared but once on a local programme before Mr. Thomas brought this symphony forward. A short time before Mr. Walter Damrosch performed the symphony in D minor at a concert of the Symphony Society. Thereby hangs a tale which might as well be told now. It was at a time when the old rivalry in the pursuit of novelties, which used to enliven the symphony seasons, was still in existence. Both Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Thomas were eager to be first in the field with the new work that had caused considerable noise in two senses in Germany. Mr. Thomas was probably a careless reader. At any rate, he secured what he supposed was the work, and put it in rehearsal in Steinway Hall. At the conclusion of the rehearsal he met a friend who had come to hear the novelty, and remarked to him that he was disappointed in the Bruckner symphony; he could find nothing in it and wondered what the German critics had made so great a commotion about. His friend was a more careful observer of foreign affairs and quietly called his attention to the fact that he had not been rehearsing the new work, but its predecessor in D minor. Meanwhile Mr. Damrosch had also secured the symphony in D minor, and, though he knew it was not the much heralded one, he still considered it worth performing. And so he was the first to introduce Bruckner to New York.

NEW YORK HERALD
s DEC 7 - 1906

Boston Orchestra Concert.

Many things combined to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last night memorable. The programme was a fine one. Dr. Karl Muck conducted masterfully, and the soloist, Mr. Moriz Rosenthal, outdid himself at the piano. The audience packed the house and its enthusiasm at times reached the glove splitting mark.

NEW YORK
DEC 7 - 1906

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Man ist gewohnt, von den Konzerten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, daß nach maßgebendstem fachmännischen Urtheil in der ganzen Welt wenig oder garnicht Seinesgleichen hat, in Superlativen zu berichten. Daher ist man ordentlich um den Ausdruck verlegen, wenn man die Jedem, der musikalisch hören kann, wahrnehmbare Steigerung der gestrigen Leistung dieser Künstlerschaar unter Karl Muck's magischem Dirigentenstabe mit Komparativen der Superlative charakterisiren will. Der Berichterstatter muß sich daher faute de mieux mit der mageren Angabe begnügen, daß die Bostoner gestern ihr Programm mit einer Virtuosität absolvirt haben, wie man sie selbst von diesen Elite-Künstlern seit langen Jahren nicht gehört, einer Virtuosität, an welcher selbst der grüne Neid nichts auszusetzen finden könnte.

Und das Programm allein war schon eine That! Als pièce de résistance wurde Anton Bruckner's siebente Symphonie (E dur) gegeben. Der österreichische Komponist ist Anfang der neunziger Jahre gestorben, ohne selbst im eigenen Vaterlande widerspruchslose Anerkennung gefunden zu haben; hier in New York sind die Werke dieses Tondichters, der an manchen Formenkünstler eine Unzahl melodiöser Einfälle hätte abgeben können, ohne im Geringsten zu verarmen, in geradezu unverantwortlicher Weise vernachlässigt worden. Sind doch zwanzig Jahre verflossen, seitdem die gestern mit so viel Glanz von einem deutschen Gastdirigenten (so muß man ihn angesichts der feststehenden Kürze seines amerikanischen Aufenthalts leider nennen) wiederbelebte 7. Symphonie zum letzten Male in einem New Yorker Konzertsaal zu Gehör gebracht worden ist, und so und so viele andere von den neuen Symphonien Bruckner's sind uns unsere Dirigenten überhaupt schuldig geblieben. Nun, der Beifall, den gestern Dr. Muck errungen, dürfte nicht in tauben Ohren verhallt sein, und man darf annehmen, daß nun allgemach das Versäumte nachgeholt werden wird.

Diese siebente Symphonie Bruckner's ist ein interessantes und kunstvolles Werk. Bruckner-Gegner mögen dagegen einwenden, daß man, wenn auch nicht gerade Wagner-Anklänge, so doch den Wagner-Einfluß hie und da konstatiren kann. Bei den meisten anderen modernen Tonsetzern ist aber dieser Einfluß ebenso unverkennbar. Zugeben muß man ferner, daß die Symphonie nicht dermaßen ein organisches Ganze ist, daß man nicht auch einen oder den anderen der vier Sätze losgelöst von den anderen zum Vortrag bringen könnte. Das ist aber heutzutage, wo sie alle sich mehr oder minder von der starren symphonischen Form befreit haben, kein Vorwurf mehr. Man kann darum seine Freude haben an dem ersten Satz, dem Allegro Moderato, in welchem er die beiden Themen plastisch entwickelt und dann so kunstvoll durcheinander wirkt, in kontrapunktisch gründlicher und wirksamer Arbeit. Das herrliche Adagio sodann, das man einst fälschlich als eine Todtenklage auf Richard Wagner's Hinscheiden aufgefaßt hat — der Komponist selbst nickte schlau dazu mit dem Kopf, bis man ausfand, daß dieser zweite Satz ein Jahr vor Wagner's Tode niedergeschrieben wurde — ist so stimmungsvoll und melodiös, daß es später in Deutschland als Tribut für die Manen des damals soeben verstorbenen Bruckner selbst in diversen Konzertsälen dargeboten wurde. Namentlich die Wirkung der Tuben im Choral ist von wunderbarem Effekt. Das originelle Scherzo vollends ist voll von launigen, burschikosen Einfällen oder vielmehr Eingebungen. Nur im letzten Satz, der etwas wirr und formlos erscheint, verflacht das Interesse merklich. Karl Muck behandelt das Werk mit geradezu liebevoller Hingabe an seine Aufgabe. Man müßte allen seinen farbenprächtigen Nüancen folgen, um den glänzenden Eindruck dieser temperamentvollen, durch und durch künstlerischen Dirigentenleistung wiederzugeben. Namentlich die Leichtflüssigkeit des Farbenspiels im Scherzo, die wunderbare Klarheit der Trompete im ersten Thema dieses Satzes und die grandiose Fortissimo-Klimax der Blechinstrumente im Finale verdient auch in der nothwendigen Kürze dieses Referats Sondererwähnung.

Die andere Orchester-Nummer war die hier so häufig zu Gehör gebrachte Beethoven'sche Leonoren-Ouverture No. 3. Man hielt es daher für ausgeschlossen, daß Muck in diesem Werke noch neue wirksame Lichter aufstecken könnte. Es kam aber wieder einmal anders. Das Trompetensignal, das sonst so obenhin behandelt wird, das klare Herausheben der Oktante und das andauernde Festhalten der Jubelstimmung in der Coda waren ungemein effektvolle Einzelnuancen.

Als Solist trat Moriz Rosenthal auf und trug wieder das bekannte Es-dur-Konzert von Liszt vor, das er bei seinem diesjährigen ersten Auftreten in New York bereits einem begeisterten Publikum zu Dank gespielt. Er spielte es wieder mit den wundervoll variirten Anschlagsnuancen, die ihm zu Gebote stehen, und nahm den Schlußsatz wieder in einem Presto, das eben außer Rosenthal kein lebender Pianist mehr als einige Takte lang durchführen kann. Daß der Jubel des Publikums unter sothanen Umständen schier kein Ende nehmen wollte — er wurde mindestens ein Dutzendmal herausgerufen — versteht sich von selbst. Zu einer reglementswidrigen Zugabe war er trotzdem nicht zu bewegen. Das Haus war völlig ausverkauft und die Beifallsbekundungen schallkräftig.

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK WORLD
DEC 7 - 1906

SYMPHONY CONCERT TRIUMPH FOR MUCK.

New Conductor Has Vitalized Boston Organization—Rosenthal Also Wins Honors.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is finally appreciated at its true worth by the public of New York, for last night's concert at Carnegie Hall filled this auditorium to its utmost capacity and some demands for seats had to be refused at the box-office. The soloist was Rosenthal, but beyond this fact there was nothing on the programme that was alluring bait for the masses of music lovers. True, last night's list of pieces contained Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, a work that has not been heard in New York for twenty years, but on that occasion, it is recarded, that a great part of the audience filed out of the hall to avoid hearing the end.

It would seem from all indications that Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of this orchestra, has breathed not only new artistic life, but also financial life into this magnificent organization. His conducting last night was again an evidence of his greatness as a leader of musicians and a swayer of audiences. He held his hearers interested through the long Bruckner work, which lasts more than one hour, and he created a furore of enthusiasm by his leading of the well-known Beethoven "Leonore Overture No. 3."

He is a man of few words with his baton, but the orchestra follows every movement and gesture with a perfect, sympathetic understanding of what this forceful man wants. The result is a series of highly interesting readings and wonderfully performed interpretations. The one fear that besets the music lovers is that the German Emperor will not grant Muck further leave of absence after the present season, for Muck is a favorite of the Emperor, and great conductors are scarce.

The Bruckner Symphony proved to be a very long work. But to offset this are its many interesting features of which there are legion, its masterly workmanship and its effectiveness. The slow movement, the meaning of which has been translated into a funeral dirge, is an exquisite bit of writing, full of noble sentiment and equally noble expression. The Scherzo is wonderfully ingenious, and the first movement is scholarly. The finale appeared at first hearing involved but with moments of impressive greatness. It is unquestionably a work that should be heard, and it does more to broaden the public's appreciation of music than the mere repetition of well-known symphonies.

Muck's reading of the Beethoven overture was tremendous. He emphasized the dramatic element in the trumpet call behind the scene, and in the finale he voiced a jubilant spirit that was pulse stirring. The playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was impeccable. It is to-day probably the most magnificent orchestral body of players in the world, a virtuoso assembly of virtuosi.

Moritz Rosenthal was the solo performer, and he played the Liszt E flat concerto in a superb manner. He gave the opening majestic breadth, voiced the sentiment of the middle movement tenderly and took the finale at a breath-taking speed that was rousing. At the conclusion of the work the house fairly rose at him and called him out to bow until his feet must have been as weary as the hands of the applauding ones. It was a superb concert.

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DEC 8 1906

There is an orchestra war in town, and Karl Muck, at to-day's Boston Symphony matinée, gave battle on Safonoff's own ground with the Russian Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, which he also conducted in Brooklyn last night.

The soloist to-day was to be Timothée Adamowski, in a new concerto for violin in F-sharp minor by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra, just as C. M. Loeffler was formerly.

Under the generous policy of Mr. Higginson to encourage his men to write, some important additions to the literature of music have been added to the world's

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.
n NEW YORK PRESS
ress
DEC 7 - 1906

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Long Neglected Symphony Heard.

Neglected by local organizations for twenty years, Bruckner's Symphony in E major, No. 7, was revived last night in Carnegie Hall by Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1886 Theodore Thomas, as conductor of the Philharmonic Society, produced this gigantic work. That was doomed to be its last performance until happily Dr. Muck, an ardent admirer of Bruckner, was brave enough to put it before the public once more.

Dr. Muck cannot be thanked too warmly for bringing Bruckner's work into notice again, and every lover of music in this city should feel grateful for the opportunity offered through the medium of the Boston orchestra. It is a shameful reflection on musical conditions in New York that the Austrian composer's works have been suppressed, while stuff that is incomparably inferior has been exploited. Hats off to Muck and his men!

The orchestra's programme opened with the Bruckner work, as was becoming. Liszt's much overplayed piano concerto in E flat (a work decidedly inferior to his other concerto) came next, Rosenthal being the virtuoso. The evening ended with a reading of Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3, that was superb—a reading that we have never known surpassed. But, of course, the opening symphony was the chief event of the evening, though Rosenthal's incredibly brilliant performance of the Liszt concerto aroused the greatest outburst of applause.

It is hardly in the nature of Bruckner's seventh symphony, with its inordinate length, to stir up unbridled enthusiasm, particularly when the great majority of listeners were hearing it for the first time. Taking that fact into consideration, it must be said that Dr. Muck's auditors received the composer's message gratefully. Those who were awake to the wealth of real beauty in the work applauded every movement loudly and recalled the conductor several times at the end.

Even Bruckner fanatics cannot deny their idol's evident fault; his tendency to spin his music out into unnecessary lengths, to send his ideas through the mill over and over again. The composer certainly lacked sense of proportion. But one finds so many supreme moments of beauty in Bruckner and his workmanship is always so wonderful that one is compelled to overlook shortcomings because of admiration for the truly inspired portions. We do not know of any other symphonic writer since Beethoven whose polyphony is so glorious in its effect, whose orchestration, while extraordinary in its variety and exceedingly modern, preserves so constantly a beauty that seems almost classical.

The scherzo last night made the most immediate appeal. A wonderfully effective outburst of feeling this—a titanic expression of primeval joy in living. But the noble adagio, a poetic creation of the utmost grandeur, left an indelible impression.

Dr. Muck's reading was ideal. He exposed the emotional and poetic contents of the work with an exquisite attention to significant nuance. He succeeded, too, in building up stunning climaxes. The orchestra under the new conductor's guidance gave out its best.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W... om
ldress
ite DEC - 1906

MUSICAL.

Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony Heard at Concert of the Boston Orchestra.

The second Brooklyn concert of the season by the Boston Smyphony Orchestra occurred at the Baptist Temple last night, with the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, wielding the baton. The soloist was Willy Hess, the leading violinist of the orchestra, who performed with fien skill the Beethoven Concerto in D major, and the programme embraced two orchestral numbers, the Strauss "Don Juan" tone-poem, and the Symphony in B flat, No. 5, Op. 55, by the Russian composer, Glazounoff, which had its first hearing in Brooklyn.

The tone-poem is one of the most noted creations of its composer, who is known in the musical world as an innovator, and the inventor of orchestral effects that have awakened wide discussion. This element of the tone-poem can be appreciated without a handbook, but its ostensible musical meaning cannot. The symphony has the usual four movements, designated as Moderato maestoso; Scherzo; Andante and Alegro maestoso. It is a very satisfying product of modern musical thought, rich in its suggestion of national feeling, and free and broad in its outlook as to the possibilities of music. It re-enforced less important intimations of the fine quality of Glazounoff's work we have had in the past. The symphony was fortunate in being introduced by Dr. Muck with the Boston players, and the listeners were fortunate in hearing such a rendering of the work and of the tone-poem as was given last night.

Evidently the programme did not appeal so widely as these concerts generally do, and the audience was not so large as usual.

[90]

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK
Mail.
ss
DEC 8 190

The Boston Symphony orchestra's programme books have expanded mightily since Mr. Philip Hale became their editor. The bound volume for 1905-6, for example, covering the twenty-four Boston concerts, contains 1,804 pages, as against 876 pages in the volume for 1895-6, when Mr. William F. Apthorp was official commentator.

Mr. Hale's versatility and the human interest of which he writes have passed into a proverb in musical circles, and with a fuller index this latest volume would prove even more valuable and useful than it is already. Mr. Hale's information, too, is up to the moment—where else, for example, can one find so full and accurate a statement of Charles M. Loeffler's career as in his notes on "The Devil's Villanelle?" The volume is published by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and its careful statistical tables are the work of F. R. Comee, the assistant manager.

EV'G WORLD
DEC 7 - 1906

Rosenthal Plays Superbly With the Boston Orchestra

ROSENTHAL'S playing of the solo part in Liszt's familiar first piano concerto in E flat major with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night was an inspiring thing. The great audience that packed the auditorium scarcely dared to breathe, so wrought up it was. At the end it paid him such a tribute of applause that the echoes still must be ringing in his ears. One of the best known of musical reviewers violated the unwritten law that imposes silence upon members of the craft and joined in heartily. Willy Hess, the accomplished concert master of the band, was quite as demonstrative. Eight times the Austrian pianist was called out, and a ninth call was barely averted.

Bruckner's seventh symphony, the principal offering last night, is comparatively unknown here. Composed about 1883, it was first performed under Nikisch at Leipsic in 1884. Dr. Karl Muck, the present leader of the Boston Orchestra, gave it a heading at Graz in 1886 and Theodore Thomas, with our own Philharmonic, also played it the same year. It is full of the spirit of Wagner, of whom the composer was a disciple, and is reminiscent of the Master's Ring Music-Dramas. There is a strange forerunning suggestion, too, of a bit of Puccini's "Tosca." Power and beauty are manifest in the well developed themes. Most impressive is the dirge of the adagio. But the work is much too long. Dr. Muck played it in an hour and six minutes, according to one who held a watch. Mr. Thomas, it was said, took six minutes longer.

Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, was the closing number. Most conductors have a loving appreciation of it, but few, if any, have read it better than Dr. Muck. Such delicate shading, such beautiful sentiment, such torrents of force!

Superlatives may scarcely be avoided in writing of this concert. How these splendid musicians did carry through that symphony! And was ever the orchestral part of the concerto better played! In Dr. Karl Muck the Boston Orchestra has a leader who develops its power as well as its precision and strength.

Timothee Adamowski will be the soloist in Strube's violin concerto at F sharp minor at the second of this season's pair of concerts by this orchestra to-morrow afternoon. The symphony will be Glazounoff's fifth, in B flat major, which has never been played here.

SYLVESTER RAWLING.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 8 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

As if to justify his reputation as a worshipper of musical monuments, Dr. Muck last night put the classic and the revolutionary in contrast. He was justified. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple, played Strauss and Glazounoff numbers expertly, sonorously, brilliantly, yes, and sympathetically; but those numbers did not cloud the calm beauty, nor impair the dignity of the Beethoven concerto that was programmed between them, whether or not it gained from the contrast. It is well to give the new music a hearing, but when we have heard it, we are obliged to concede that the world's verdict, though delayed, is right, and that the music which lives is not such as reflects the mere physical or even intellectual activity of the time, but that which is born of poetry and faith.

Dr. Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," is the most modern thing, in spirit and mode, that could be chosen to offset the Beethoven music. Animated, eager, beautiful, great, yet confusingly polyphonic, outrageously cacophonic, it defies form and sequence, and suggests the alliance of great wits to madness. Strauss has mastered orchestral technic and he does wonderful things with strings and reeds and brass, but what does he strive to say with this great and flexile voice? Is he not more concerned with questionings and negations than with declarations? The story he is supposed to illustrate is not the Don Juan of Mozart and Byron, but the gloomy and mystic hero of Lenau's poem, which shows him seeking, not the joy of the moment, but the ideal, as symboliged in Goethe's "ever womanly." A German commentator, whose work is quoted in the analytical programme of the concert, discovers all sorts of fantastical things in the Strauss work, such as the Don's personal appearance, his conquests, his disgusts and the like; but there is little which can be fixed upon as descriptive, save a few of the love passages, the duel and the death. The composer presents the spirit rather than the motion of the story, and in that sense his work is not merely allegorical, but is large and affecting; for in it we find the age-old fret against environment and fate; the questioning, never so keen as now, of the meanings of law and life, and the baffling of hope. The music is rarely morbid, but its meaning is gloomy, although its expression is often despairingly beautiful—so beautiful that although it has neither beginning nor end, in the ancient sense, one would have it flow on for years. The tone jewels are not arranged in fixed forms; they are carelessly and richly heaped where one may sun himself in their splendor. Form, indeed, merely suggests itself out of this chaos of sound, as the ghost-faces, shining in their own green light in the wake of the ship, suggest the naiads, or the drowned, on starless nights in mid-sea. So little of drama, of story, of academic rule, have Dr. Strauss' compositions, that with a few harmonic modulations they might be joined one to the other, and none but the expert would say where the one ended and the other began. The heart in them throbs with fever, sometimes, but the brain in them thinks deeply, and while the soul in them gropes, it none the less aspires. In their moments of sheer loveliness, few, but confessed, these symphonic fragments declare their place among the master works.

The good old Beethoven concerto for violin, plus various cadenzas, was played last night by Willy Hess, concert master, with excellent art, fealty, sweetly, graciously, with a tone not large, but fine, with a worshipful approach to its author. No impressionism here; no vagueness, no reaching toward an object that is beyond the perceptions of mankind. It has the steadiness of the stars; not the fitfulness of the lightnings. It speaks of an age of faith—not of doubt and discontent. The decadence is neither foreshadowed nor imagined.

Yet, is there a decadence? If so, it should be proclaimed by Glazounoff. Nevertheless, his Fifth Symphony, heard here for the first time, is a delight to the ear and of no offense to the understanding. It is big and manful, oftener than introspective, and while it is of Russia, it is of future Russia, not the crime-plagued, desperate nation of to-day, seeking to bring its heavy feet into step with the march of civilization. It were a pity, indeed, if the art of the Slav were to lose its distinctive traits and shape itself to the nicer, tamer art of people less hopefully vitalized. Glazounoff is of the new school of writers who affiliate more or less frankly with the Germans, and therein make the same mistake that is made by American painters who go to France to outdo the Frenchmen. Yet the undertone of melancholy, of pain, that is inseparable from Russian music sounds in his work, as it does in Tschaikowsky's and Rachmaninoff's. Like most of the younger musicians of all schools and lands, he owes much to Wagner and makes few bones of confessing it, for in the first movement of this symphony he not only makes free with the sword motive, familiar to those who have heard the Niebelungen trilogy, but lesser phrases, and bits of instrumentation are freely adapted. This is the more strange because Glazounoff has something of his own to say, and he says it with grace and force and fire, even though it is the pathos of his lot rather than the savagery of his race that he expresses. The scherzo is delightful—piquant, original, fantastic—and the romance of deep and honest charm, for though its melancholy is characteristic, it is at least one bit of Russian poetry that has not been written in tears and blood. The closing allegro is a bit boisterous, but not lacking in felicities of expression and theme. A big audience was generous in its token of approval of programme and players. The third concert of the series will occur on the 11th of January.

...Brook...
DEC

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

As when first performed in 1896, the scherzo in Glazounoff's fifth symphony was the best liked of the four movements as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second concert under Institute auspices at the Baptist Temple last night. If the audience had had its way the scherzo would have been repeated. This was the first time the symphony has been played in Brooklyn. The other movements did not arouse much enthusiasm though there was a stirring coda to the first one. Concertmeister Willy Hess was the soloist last night. His number was Beethoven's concerto in D major. Prof. Hess played the various beautiful passages with skill especially so in the embroiderations. Some portions of this concerto could be blue-penciled and the majority of music lovers would appreciate it. However, Prof. Hess made the most of it with his violin and his work earned him three recalls. Richard Strauss' tone-poem "Don Juan" was the other number on the programme, which was heard here twice last year. There are different ways of interpreting this, the second symphonic poem of Strauss. The second appearance in Brooklyn of Dr. Carl Muck as conductor of the Bostonians only emphasized all the more the complete control he has of these truly excellent musicians. He was heartily greeted and applauded. The audience last night—two-thirds women—was very big, there being few vacant chairs.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 9 - 190

WILLY HESS AS SOLOIST.

Audience Applauds Him and Praises New Russian Symphony.

Second of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, attracted not only the usual subscribers to the Baptist Temple, Friday evening, but a number of others interested in the new features promised. The latter were the introduction of Willy Hess, the orchestra's first violinist, as a solo artist, and the first production here of Glazounoff's fifth symphony in B flat major, Opus 55.

Beethoven's concerto, in D major, Op. 61, which Mr. Hess played with the orchestra; the symphony, and Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," opening the concert, composed its entire programme.

There was unwonted applause from a Brooklyn audience for Mr. Hess's exquisite violin playing. He has not a very big tone, but it is rich, clear as crystal, and produced with rare skill and artistic repose. The smoothness of his bowing, and the finished technical performance were also much appreciated.

The orchestra, with Karl Muck conducting, upheld its part of accompaniment in the artistic and well-nigh perfect manner in which the Boston Orchestra excels. That the new leader has infused a little more warmth and color into the orchestral performances was felt last night, both in the first two numbers, as well as in the remarkable Russian composition which demands of itself great breadth and fullness of expression. The scherzo movement, in strong contrast to other parts, called for exquisite delivery in its pizzicato measures. The composition itself was greatly admired as well as Dr. Muck's interpretation of it.

...NEW YORK
...ess
...DEC 9 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Gustav Strube's New Violin Concerto Pleases the Audience.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon. The programme consisted of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Betrothed of the Tsar," a new violin concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, and Glazounov's fifth symphony. With that happy family spirit which prevails in the Boston orchestra Mr. Strube's concerto was performed by Timothee Adamowski, the second concertmeister, and conducted with devotion by Dr. Carl Muck. Mr. Strube sat at his desk among the first violins, played his own part, and at the end was dragged blushing to the front by Mr. Adamowski to receive the plaudits of an apparently delighted audience.

Mr. Strube's concerto is a very pleasin composition. Its themes are clean cut, melodious and poetic. The developments are made with musical skill, and the solo instrument is always kept in a dominating place. The second movement, the slow one, is especially winning in its grace and tenderness. The solo part, written as it is by a violinist, is very grateful to the performer. It affords sufficient opportunity for technical achievement without making any parade of difficulties, and it is liberal in cantilena passages. Mr. Strube has appeared before this public as a composer on several occasions. His art is dignified, his talent interesting. His music is always good to hear.

Mr. Adamowski played the concerto excellently. His technic was good and his feeling for the work was unmistakable. The orchestra in this and the other parts of the programme was admirable, as it always is.

NEW YORK SUN
...ss
DEC 8 ...

LIVE TOPICS ABOUT TOWN.

In spite of his great success Dr. Karl Muck will not be heard after this season as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His contract with the Royal Opera House in Berlin begins next October and continues for six years.

"When I called to pay my respects to the Kaiser before leaving for the United States," Dr. Muck said the other day, "he said before he gave me his hand, 'Muck, you are going away for only a year, are you not?' I told him I should return next fall. 'Here is my hand on that,' the Kaiser said then. 'Good-by for only a year.'"

...om NEW YORK CI...
...idress ...REVU...
...ate DEC 9 - 1906

Den Brooklynern wurden letzten Freitag durch das Boston Symphonie-Orchester folgende Werke geboten: Glazonnoff's fünfte Symphonie, Strauß' Don Juan und Beethoven's Violin-Konzert mit Konzertmeister Willy Heß als Solisten.

...STAATSZEITU...
...ess ...DEC 8 - 190...

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Heute Nachmittag findet in Carnegie Hall ein Konzert der Bostoner unter Leitung von Dr. Muck und unter solistischer Mitwirkung von Herrn Timothee Adamowski statt.

...m NEW YORK HERALD
...ress ...
...e DEC 9 1906

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Russian music made two-thirds of Dr. Carl Muck's programme at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second matinee concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. There were presented before a large audience Rimsky-Korzakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar," Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony and a violin concerto in F sharp minor by Mr. Gustav Strube, one of the orchestra's first violins. Mr. Timothée Adamowski, also a member of the orchestra, was the soloist.

These Russian compositions have been heard here before. The late Anton Seidl made the Symphony known with the Philharmonic Society, and the overture has been played recently by Mr. Altschuler's orchestra.

The superb playing of the Boston men threw new light on both works yesterday, proving them worthy of more frequent hearing in the local concert room. The scherzo, in the Glazounoff symphony, was especially delightful, a delicate web of intricate instrumentation deftly handled.

Mr. Strube's concerto did not give the impression of distinction save in its middle movement, a graceful and rather plaintive adagio. Scholarly workmanship and warm orchestration were about the only virtues of its first and last sections.

Mr. Adamowski's interpretation of the work rose scarcely above the level of routine. He treated the adagio with some sentiment, but enjoyment of his playing generally was marred by untunefulness in the upper "positions."

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
DECEMBER 9, 1906

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The return of the orchestra from its December trip will be signalized by the performance of two works new to Boston. There will be no soloist this week. The first novelty will be Mr Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra." Mr Chadwick as a musician and composer needs no introduction to Boston, and a new work from his pen will be heard with keenest interest.

The other novelty is the "Variations and Double Fugue on a Jolly Theme" by Georg Schumann. This work had its first performance in America by the New York Symphony orchestra under Walter Damrosch in New York three years ago and was received with such favor that it was repeated at the next concert. The entire program is as follows: Elgar, overture, "In the South"; Arensky, symphonic poem, "Cleopatra"; Georg Schumann, "Variations and Double Fugue on a Jolly Theme"; Wagner, overture, "Rienzi."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess

DEC 8 1906

The Boston Symphony orchestra's programme books have expanded mightily since Mr. Philip Hale became their editor. The bound volume for 1905-6, for example, covering the twenty-four Boston concerts, contains 1,804 pages, as against 876 pages in the volume for 1895-6, when Mr. William F. Apthorp was official commentator.

Mr. Hale's versatility and the human interest of which he writes have passed into a proverb in musical circles, and with a fuller index this latest volume would prove even more valuable and useful than it is already. Mr. Hale's information, too, is up to the moment—where else, for example, can one find so full and accurate a statement of Charles M. Loeffler's career as in his notes on "The Devil's Villanelle?" The volume is published by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and its careful statistical tables are the work of F. R. Comee, the assistant manager.

ss

DEC

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

N. Y.

ss

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

As when first performed in 1896, the scherzo in Glazounoff's fifth symphony was the best liked of the four movements as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second concert under Institute auspices at the Baptist Temple last night. If the audience had had its way the scherzo would have been repeated. This was the first time the symphony has been played in Brooklyn. The other movements did not arouse much enthusiasm though there was a stirring coda to the first one. Concertmeister Willy Hess was the soloist last night. His number was Beethoven's concerto in D major. Prof. Hess played the various beautiful passages with skill especially so in the embroiderations. Some portions of this concerto could be blue-penciled and the majority of music lovers would appreciate it. However, Prof. Hess made the most of it with his violin and his work earned him three recalls. Richard Strauss' tone-poem "Don Juan" was the other number on the programme, which was heard here twice last year. There are different ways of interpreting this, the second symphonic poem of Strauss. The second appearance in Brooklyn of Dr. Carl Muck as conductor of the Bostonians only emphasized all the more the complete control he has of these truly excellent musicians. He was heartily greeted and applauded. The audience last night—two-thirds women—was very big, there being few vacant chairs.

ss

DEC

LIVE TOPICS ABOUT TOWN.

In spite of his great success Dr. Karl Muck will not be heard after this season as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His contract with the Royal Opera House in Berlin begins next October and continues for six years.

"When I called to pay my respects to the Kaiser before leaving for the United States," Dr. Muck said the other day, "he said before he gave me his hand, 'Muck, you are going away for only a year, are you not?' I told him I should return next fall. 'Here is my hand on that,' the Kaiser said then. 'Good-by for only a year.'"

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
DECEMBER 9. 1906.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The return of the orchestra from its December trip will be signalized by the performance of two works new to Boston. There will be no soloist this week. The first novelty will be Mr Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra." Mr Chadwick as a musician and composer needs no introduction to Boston, and a new work from his pen will be heard with keenest interest.

The other novelty is the "Variations and Double Fugue on a Jolly Theme" by Georg Schumann. This work had its first performance in America by the New York Symphony orchestra under Walter Damrosch in New York three years ago and was received with such favor that it was repeated at the next concert. The entire program is as follows: Elgar, overture, "In the South"; Chadwick, symphonic poem, "Cleopatra"; Georg Schumann, "Variations and Double Fugue on a Jolly Theme"; Wagner, overture, "Rienzi."

Den Brooklynern wurden letzten Freitag durch das Boston Symphonie-Orchester folgende Werke geboten: Glazonnoff's fünfte Symphonie, Strauß' Don Juan und Beethoven's Violin-Konzert mit Konzertmeister Willy Heß als Solisten.

ss

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Heute Nachmittag findet in Carnegie Hall ein Konzert der Bostoner unter Leitung von Dr. Muck und unter solistischer Mitwirkung von Herrn Timothee Adamowski statt.

Rosenthal Plays Superbly With the Boston Orchestra

ROSENTHAL'S playing of the solo part in Liszt's familiar first piano concerto in E flat major with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night was an inspiring thing. The great audience that packed the auditorium scarcely dared to breathe, so wrought up it was. At the end it paid him such a tribute of applause that the echoes still must be ringing in his ears. One of the best known of musical reviewers violated the unwritten law that imposes silence upon members of the craft and joined in heartily. Willy Hess, the accomplished concert master of the band, was quite as demonstrative. Eight times the Austrian pianist was called out, and a ninth call was barely averted.

Bruckner's seventh symphony, the principal offering last night, is comparatively unknown here. Composed about 1883, it was first performed under Nikisch at Leipsic in 1884. Dr. Karl Muck, the present leader of the Boston Orchestra, gave it a heading at Graz in 1886 and Theodore Thomas, with our own Philharmonic, also played it the same year. It is full of the spirit of Wagner, of whom the composer was a disciple, and is reminiscent of the Master's Ring Music-Dramas. There is a strange forerunning suggestion, too, of a bit of Puccini's "Tosca." Power and beauty are manifest in the well developed themes. Most impressive is the dirge of the adagio. But the work is much too long. Dr. Muck played it in an hour and six minutes, according to one who held a watch. Mr. Thomas, it was said, took six minutes longer.

Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, was the closing number. Most conductors have a loving appreciation of it, but few, if any, have read it better than Dr. Muck. Such delicate shading, such beautiful sentiment, such torrents of force!

Superlatives may scarcely be avoided in writing of this concert. How these splendid musicians did carry through that symphony! And was ever the orchestral part of the concerto better played! In Dr. Karl Muck the Boston Orchestra has a leader who develops its power as well as its precision and strength.

Timothee Adamowski will be the soloist in Strube's violin concerto at F sharp minor at the second of this season's pair of concerts by this orchestra to-morrow afternoon. The symphony will be Glazounoff's fifth, in B flat major, which has never been played here.

SYLVESTER RAWLING.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

N. Y.

ss

WILLY HESS AS SOLOIST.

Audience Applauds Him and Praises New Russian Symphony.

Second of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, attracted not only the usual subscribers to the Baptist Temple, Friday evening, but a number of others interested in the new features promised. The latter were the introduction of Willy Hess, the orchestra's first violinist, as a solo artist, and the first production here of Glazounoff's fifth symphony in B flat major, Opus 55.

Beethoven's concerto, in D major, Op. 61, which Mr. Hess played with the orchestra; the symphony, and Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," opening the concert, composed its entire programme.

There was unwonted applause from a Brooklyn audience for Mr. Hess's exquisite violin playing. He has not a very big tone, but it is rich, clear as crystal, and produced with rare skill and artistic repose. The smoothness of his bowing, and the finished technical performance were also much appreciated.

The orchestra, with Karl Muck conducting, upheld its part of accompaniment in the artistic and well-nigh perfect manner in which the Boston Orchestra excels. That the new leader has infused a little more warmth and color into the orchestral performances was felt last night, both in the first two numbers, as well as in the remarkable Russian composition which demands of itself great breadth and fullness of expression. The scherzo movement, in strong contrast to other parts, called for exquisite delivery in its pizzicato measures. The composition itself was greatly admired as well as Dr. Muck's interpretation of it.

om

ldress

te

n

ress

e DEC 9 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Gustav Strube's New Violin Concerto Pleases the Audience.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon. The programme consisted of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Betrothed of the Tsar," a new violin concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, and Glazounov's fifth symphony. With that happy family spirit which prevails in the Boston orchestra Mr. Strube's concerto was performed by Timothee Adamowski, the second concertmeister, and conducted with devotion by Dr. Carl Muck. Mr. Strube sat at his desk among the first violins, played his own part, and at the end was dragged blushing to the front by Mr. Adamowski to receive the plaudits of an apparently delighted audience.

Mr. Strube's concerto is a very pleasin composition. Its themes are clean cut, melodious and poetic. The developments are made with musical skill, and the solo instrument is always kept in a dominating place. The second movement, the slow one, is especially winning in its grace and tenderness. The solo part, written as it is by a violinist, is very grateful to the performer. It affords sufficient opportunity for technical achievement without making any parade of difficulties, and it is liberal in cantilena passages. Mr. Strube has appeared before this public as a composer on several occasions. His art is dignified, his talent interesting. His music is always good to hear.

Mr. Adamowski played the concerto excellently. His technic was good and his feeling for the work was unmistakable. The orchestra in this and the other parts of the programme was admirable, as it always is.

m NEW YORK HERALD

ress

e DEC 9 1906

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Russian music made two-thirds of Dr. Carl Muck's programme at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second matinee concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. There were presented before a large audience Rimsky-Korzakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar," Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony and a violin concerto in F sharp minor by Mr. Gustav Strube, one of the orchestra's first violins. Mr. Timothée Adamowski, also a member of the orchestra, was the soloist.

These Russian compositions have been heard here before. The late Anton Seidl made the Symphony known with the Philharmonic Society, and the overture has been played recently by Mr. Altschuler's orchestra.

The superb playing of the Boston men threw new light on both works yesterday, proving them worthy of more frequent hearing in the local concert room. The scherzo, in the Glazounoff symphony, was especially delightful, a delicate web of intricate instrumentation deftly handled.

Mr. Strube's concerto did not give the impression of distinction save in its middle movement, a graceful and rather plaintive adagio. Scholarly workmanship and warm orchestration were about the only virtues of its first and last sections.

Mr. Adamowski's interpretation of the work rose scarcely above the level of routine. He treated the adagio with some sentiment, but enjoyment of his playing generally was marred by untunefulness in the upper "positions."

EAGLE

ss Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 8 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

As if to justify his reputation as a worshipper of musical monuments, Dr. Muck last night put the classic and the revolutionary in contrast. He was justified. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple, played Strauss and Glazounoff numbers expertly, sonorously, brilliantly, yes, and sympathetically; but those numbers did not cloud the calm beauty, nor impair the dignity of the Beethoven concerto that was programmed between them, whether or not it gained from the contrast. It is well to give the new music a hearing, but when we have heard it, we are obliged to concede that the world's verdict, though delayed, is right, and that the music which lives is not such as reflects the mere physical or even intellectual activity of the time, but that which is born of poetry and faith.

Dr. Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," is the most modern thing, in spirit and mode, that could be chosen to offset the Beethoven music. Animated, eager, beautiful, great, yet confusingly polyphonic, outrageously cacophonic, it defies form and sequence, and suggests the alliance of great wits to madness. Strauss has mastered orchestral technic and he does wonderful things with strings and reeds and brass, but what does he strive to say with this great and flexile voice? Is he not more concerned with questionings and negations than with declarations? The story he is supposed to illustrate is not the Don Juan of Mozart and Byron, but the gloomy and mystic hero of Lenau's poem, which shows him seeking, not the joy of the moment, but the ideal, as symboliged in Goethe's "ever womanly." A German commentator, whose work is quoted in the analytical programme of the concert, discovers all sorts of fantastical things in the Strauss work, such as the Don's personal appearance, his conquests, his disgusts and the like; but there is little which can be fixed upon as descriptive, save a few of the love passages, the duel and the death. The composer presents the spirit rather than the motion of the story, and in that sense his work is not merely allegorical, but is large and affecting; for in it we find the age-old fret against environment and fate; the questioning, never so keen as now, of the meanings of law and life, and the baffling of hope. The music is rarely morbid, but its meaning is gloomy, although its expression is often despairingly beautiful—so beautiful that although it has neither beginning nor end, in the ancient sense, one would have it flow on for years. The tone jewels are not arranged in fixed forms; they are carelessly and richly heaped where one may sun himself in their splendor. Form, indeed, merely suggests itself out of this chaos of sound, as the ghost-faces, shining in their own green light in the wake of the ship, suggest the naiads, or the drowned, on starless nights in mid-sea. So little of drama, of story, of academic rule, have Dr. Strauss' compositions, that with a few harmonic modulations they might be joined one to the other, and none but the expert would say where the one ended and the other began. The heart in them throbs with fever, sometimes, but the brain in them thinks deeply, and while the soul in them gropes, it none the less aspires. In their moments of sheer loveliness, few, but confessed, these symphonic fragments declare their place among the master works.

The good old Beethoven concerto for violin, plus various cadenzas, was played last night by Willy Hess, concert master, with excellent art, fealty, sweetly, graciously, with a tone not large, but fine, with a worshipful approach to its author. No impressionism here; no vagueness, no reaching toward an object that is beyond the perceptions of mankind. It has the steadiness of the stars; not the fitfullness of the lightnings. It speaks of an age of faith—not of doubt and discontent. The decadence is neither foreshadowed nor imagined.

Yet, is there a decadence? If so, it should be proclaimed by Glazounoff. Nevertheless, his Fifth Symphony, heard here for the first time, is a delight to the ear and of no offense to the understanding. It is big and manful, oftener than introspective, and while it is of Russia, it is of future Russia, not the crime-plagued, desperate nation of to-day, seeking to bring its heavy feet into step with the march of civilization. It were a pity, indeed, if the art of the Slav were to lose its distinctive traits and shape itself to the nicer, tamer art of people less hopefully vitalized. Glazounoff is of the new school of writers who affiliate more or less frankly with the Germans, and therein make the same mistake that is made by American painters who go to France to outdo the Frenchmen. Yet the undertone of melancholy, of pain, that is inseparable from Russian music sounds in his work, as it does in Tschaikowsky's and Rachmaninoff's. Like most of the younger musicians of all schools and lands, he owes much to Wagner and makes few bones of confessing it, for in the first movement of this symphony he not only makes free with the sword motive, familiar to those who have heard the Niebelungen trilogy, but lesser phrases, and bits of instrumentation are freely adapted. This is the more strange because Glazounoff has something of his own to say, and he says it with grace and force and fire, even though it is the pathos of his lot rather than the savagery of his race that he expresses. The scherzo is delightful—piquant, original, fantastic—and the romance of deep and honest charm, for though its melancholy is characteristic, it is at least one bit of Russian poetry that has not been written in tears and blood. The closing allegro is a bit boisterous, but not lacking in felicities of expression and theme. A big audience was generous in its token of approval of programme and players. The third concert of the series will occur on the 11th of January.

[91]

om N. Y. TRIBUNE.
dress
te DEC 9 1906

the Boston Symphony Or-
[illegible] was one of the [illegible] worthy achievements of this [illegible] organization. If there had previously been any fear that under Dr. Muck it would lose any of that beauty of tone and nicety of balance which it displayed under Mr. Gericke it must have disappeared. One of the most delightful features of the playing of this orchestra has been the manner in which it has succeeded in disguising ugliness. Mr. Gericke was able to make even Mr. Strauss's portentous personal conflict with fate in "Ein Helden-leben" sound like a prize debate between Princeton and Harvard. Muck accomplished something of the same nature with the stupendous ugliness of certain portions of Bruckner's symphony. From beginning to end there was tonal beauty in the performance. The disagreeable doses were cleverly sugar coated with well conceived gradations of force.

Such an interpretation, however, does not wholly disguise the existence of the ugly passages. It is conceded that a composer may write jarring discords when at the same time he shows us that they have reason for existence. In the quarrel between Alberich and Mime and in the first part of the second act of "Siegfried" Wagner wrote music as ugly as music can be.
Nevertheless we find that the scene demands just such treatment, and when all is said and done what the master has written is still undeniably music. It is not merely instrumental squawks nor vocal bleats.

Bruckner's apologists hold that his ugly points are unavoidable, that they come in the inevitable development, in the logical processes of his counterpoint. This is of course a specious fallacy. Counterpoint is strictly logical only when written in canonic form, which calls for rigorous imitation, interval by interval. Yet Bach contrived to write a goodly number of fugues without producing anything unbeautiful. Some of his fugues may be dull, but none of them is repulsive.

When a composer is writing counterpoint of the free sort employed by the modern symphonist he can evade the so-called logical development of ugliness whenever he chooses so to do. That he does not evade it is proof of a deliberate search after it. We have many composers engaged in that kind of writing to-day. They all plead that they are ahead of their time, and that the future will justify them.

Here criticism is silenced by its own record. Every master of music who has done the unconventional has been ridiculed and censured by the critics, who live in a conventional world and estimate all things by rule. They are the meistersingers of every period and every young Walter who comes before their court is likely to be condemned.
He is indeed fortunate if he find a Hans Sachs.

Therefore wise critics, who have studied the history of music, hesitate before damning any music simply on the ground that it is ugly. What sounds ugly to-day will sound beautiful fifty years hence. But Bruckner's E major symphony has had twenty years of rest. In the meantime local music lovers have been trained to a taste for Tschaikowsky, Brahms and Richard Strauss, three composers differing greatly from one another in style and differing still more greatly from Beethoven and Mozart.

We have listened to the inventions of such writers as D'Indy, Loeffler, Debussy, Bruneau and the rest of the harmonic agony school and we have learned to love music that has a sting in it. We do not any more care for candy for breakfast, candy for luncheon, candy for dinner. And in spite of all this we still find at least two out of the four movements of this E major symphony dull, needlessly involved, bald in idea and tiresome in treatment.

With the old controversy between the devotees of Brahms and the admirers of Bruckner we New Yorkers have no concern. But it may be well to note in passing that Bruckner gets more credit for being a follower of Wagner than he deserves.
He is not a Wagnerian composer in his method and artistic bent. He falls into occasional imitation of Wagner's melodies and harmonies, but he does not conceive melodic roots after the fashion of Wagner, nor does he copy the Bayreuth master in his method of developing them. An effect has been mistaken for a cause.

For example, there is a passage in the scherzo of the E major symphony which runs ridiculously close to the apprentice music in the first act of "Die Meistersinger," but it occurs in a development of the movement. It is plainly a fortuitous imitation.

Bruckner's germinal ideas, his themes, are not like Wagner's at all. His orchestration is not like Wagner's and his characteristic uglinesses are thousands of miles from the warring dissonances which Wagner uses for unmistakable purposes.

Because Brahms built his piano technic partly on foundations laid down by Schumann and perhaps because he composed the slow movement of his C minor symphony in the same form as that in which Schumann composed the adagio of his C major, a form not unknown to writers of piano sonatas and instrumental concertos before the time of either of these musicians, there was cried for the matter of that still is in some [illegible] obit of eclecticism to Brahms and feeble imitation of Beethoven. Bruckner gets credit for being a disciple of Wagner chiefly because he was an ardent adorer of that mighty genius.

Those who can find in the E major symphony anything characteristically Wagnerian in method must admit something of imagination into their reasoning. Bruckner's method of composition, except for its prolixity, is much more like that of Brahms than that of Wagner. But this is rank heresy and an excellent place to stop.

W. J. HENDERSON.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK CLIPPING BUREAU
DEC 9 - 1906

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das gestrige Concert wieder ein großer Erfolg.

Das Programm der Bostoner gestern Nachmittag enthielt zwei russische und einen deutschen Componisten. Merkwürdigerweise schienen gerade die Werke der beiden Russen, Rimsky-Korsakoff und Glazonnoff, ihres blühenden Inhaltes wegen irgendwo anders als im kalten Rußland entstanden zu sein, während das Violin-Concert Strube's, eines der Primgeigen des Orchesters, dessen Wiege in Ballenstedt am lieblichen Harze gestanden hat, in seiner steppenhaften Oede Einen wirklich eisig kalt ließ. Wie kommt dieses Stück in ein solches Programm? Es ist doch etwas Anderes, wenn ein Vereinsdirigent aus persönlicher Rücksicht ein Schmerzenskind eines seiner ersten Tenöre, der es mal nicht lassen konnte, zu komponiren, ans Tageslicht bringt.

Das Strube'sche Concert bietet aber auch gar nichts, was auf Interesse Anspruch machen kann, es wäre denn vielleicht die kurze Einleitung zum zweiten Satz und in klanglicher Hinsicht, die eine oder andere Variation des Finales, welches der Componist, um originell zu sein, im 7/4 Takt geschrieben hat.

Wie sagt doch Weingartner? „Bald werden wir nur noch Compositionen im 19/23 Takt erleben." Herr Timotheus Adamowski mühte sich redlich um den Erfolg des Werkes ab; Herr Strube, der sich zweimal mit verbeugen durfte, hat Ursache, ihm dankbar zu sein.

Doch nun ein ander Bild. Eine wahre Herzerquickung waren die Ouverture zu „Die Zarenbraut" von Rimsky-Korsakoff und die fünfte Symphonie von Glazonnoff. Beide Werke, die hier lange nicht gehört wurden, zeigen viel innere Verwandtschaft. In beiden Werken wurde einmal wieder der Beweis erbracht, daß in dem Rahmen der alten Form noch viel Neues und Schönes geschaffen werden kann. Beide Werke enthalten gesunde Melodik und scharfe thematische Gegensätze. In der Ouverture überraschte namentlich der hochpoetische Schluß, welcher wie ein inniger Liebesgruß verklingt. Die Symphonie von Glazonnoff, welcher übrigens seine Studien bei Rimsky-Korsakoff machte, ist ein hochbedeutendes Werk, an dem man seine helle Freude haben kann. Gleich der erste Satz hebt frisch an mit einem Horn-Thema, welches sich nachher in genialer Weise mit dem lyrischen Gegenspiel vereinigt. Das Scherzo, eine Art Elfenmusik, ist von bestrickendem Klangreize und wurde so entzückend gespielt, daß nach dem stürmischen Erfolg gerne ein da capo, wie es nach dem Scherzo von Tschaikowsky's „Vierten" gewöhnlich geschieht, erwartet wurde. Der dritte Satz, eine Romanze, schwimmt förmlich in Wohllaut und ist dabei von derselben durchsichtigen Klarheit, wie die beiden vorhergehenden Sätze. Kurz vor dem Schluß ertönen ein paar ernste Posaunenaccorde, welche aber drohendem Gewölk gleich, sich verziehen, um dem köstlichsten Sonnenlicht wieder Raum zu geben. Im letzten Satz geht es recht wild her, wie bei einer ausgelassenen Gesellschaft. Wenn dieses Finale inhaltlich nicht ganz an die drei ersten Sätze hinanreicht, so bietet es doch in rythmischer Hinsicht so viel Interessantes, daß man ihm gerne bis zu dem glänzenden Schlusse zuhört.

Die Ausführung der drei Werke war mustergiltig, wie wir es ja seit Jahren von den Bostonern gewohnt sind.

H. S.

BOSTON TRAVELER. DECEMBER 8, 1906.

The return of the Symphony Orchestra from its December trip will be signalized by the performance of two works which are new to Boston. There will be no soloist at the public rehearsal on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The first novelty will be Mr. Chadwick's Symphonic Poem "Cleopatra." Mr. Chadwick as a musician and composer needs no introduction to Boston, and a new work from his pen will be heard with keenest interest by the music lovers of this city. The other novelties are the "Variations and [illegible] on a Jolly Theme" by [illegible] Schumann.

No symphony stands on the programme of the next pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, and there will be no soloist. Four numbers make the list—Elgar's overture, "In the South"; Chadwick's tone-poem, "Cleopatra"; Georg Schumann's "Variations on a Jolly Theme" and the overture to Wagner's opera, "Rienzi." Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem was first played at a Worcester festival a year or two ago; but it is new to Boston. Schumann's variations are also unknown here, and Elgar's brilliant descriptive overture has been played but twice—by Mr. Gericke at a pair of concerts last season. Perhaps the overture to "Rienzi" is for the joy of the brass choir whom Dr. Muck has released from long repression.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK HERALD
NEW JERSEY EDITION
DEC 8 - 1906

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There was another large audience in the Baptist Temple last evening to greet the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and an admirable programme was rendered. Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" was the first number, and the symphony was Glazounoff's B flat major symphony No. 5, four movements, which was given for the first time in Brooklyn.

Professor Willy Hess was the soloist of the evening, playing Beethoven's concerto in D major for the violin, three movements.

NEW YORK PRESS
DEC 9 1906

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck Again Proves High Worth

At his fourth New York appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall Dr. Karl Muck added another link to the chain of evidence that is proving him not only one of the most satisfying leaders in the chronicles of Higginson's organization, but one of the finest orchestral interpreters, considered from every point of view, who ever have visited this country. The programme yesterday contained one novelty, a violin concerto in F sharp minor by Strube, which was played by that admirable member of the symphony orchestra, Timothee Adamowski. But a final contribution, Glazounoff's symphony in B flat major, No. 5, proved to be the climax of the programme by reason of the wonderful reading it received from Muck and his men.

It is doubtful that this work of the Russian composer will hold its own in the constantly growing mass of music piling up in the world's archives. One finds too much in it that depends on the musical idiom of other composers—on the trenchant thematic and harmonic language of Wagner in particular, and on that master's richly sonorous orchestration. Scandinavian influences, too, are discerned, and even Verdi, the melodious, peeps out of the coil. Little that is truly Russian in character makes itself noticed except in the fourth and last movement.

But if Glazounoff's symphony carries no profound message it must be acknowledged that, played with such technical finish as it received yesterday, and interpreted by an analyst who lifts out every poetic suggestion with the most exquisite attention to details, as Dr. Muck did, the work makes a superb effect. What sumptuous sonorities, what impassioned rhythmical pulse!

The new violin concerto, written by one of the orchestra's first violins, made no deep impression, though the second movement, an Adagio, proved melodically appealing. The composer seems to have talent and ability, but so far his powers are not sufficiently co-ordinated. As a whole, the composition seems scrappy—as if a tangle of ideas (borrowed largely from other men) had been thrown into a pot and set boiling.

Adamowski played like a musician. His expressive tone, excellent finger technique and expert bowing stood him in good stead, the latter particularly in the lively ending of the last movement. Strube, with signs of great embarrassment, left his desk mate in the last row of the first violins to share the applause with Adamowski. The opening number on the programme was Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar."

SUNDAY HERALD DECEMBER 9, 1906

COMING CONCERTS.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, in Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, will take place on next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The orchestral pieces will be the overture to "Der Freischuetz," Schubert's unfinished symphony, Schumann's symphony in B flat major, No. 1, Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto, will sing an aria from "Samson and Delilah" and a group of songs.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Chickering Hall, Monday evening, the 17th. The programme will include Brahm's quartet in B flat major, op 67, Saint-Saens' sonata in F major for piano and cello, op. 123 (first time here), Schubert's piano quintet in A major, op. 114. Dr. Otto Neitzel, pianist, and Mr. K. [illegible] bass, will assist.

om N. Y. TRIBUNE.
dress
te DEC 9 - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Carnegie Hall.

Music is many moods to many men. The adventures of an individual soul at the concert yesterday afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are the adventures of an individual soul. And yet they are criticism, too. From a wilderness of skyscrapers, one journeys till Copley Square and the Library confront him, and knows a great peace. So after a week it may be of much strenuous music, or the noises of Herald Square, or just the full pounding of strife or ambition, came this concert with its dominant note of repression, and one knew the great peace again. A little fanciful is it to talk of the soul's adventures in Carnegie Hall? Should one dissect the new concerto by Gustav Strube for violin and orchestra, or analyze the symphony? The soul when on adventure bent forgets to analyze! Later, perhaps, one recalls that the concerto, played by Timothée Adamowski (the band furnished thus both composer and soloist), was for two of its three movements written and performed with repression for a motto. A certain rarefied quality, lovely if a trifle exoetic, was its chief charm. The last movement, in odd 7-4 rhythm, seemed merely clever. The first number on the programme was the overture to Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar," and the symphony was Glazounoff's 5th. The programme said this was played for the first time in New York. The "First time in New York" should have been placed after the concerto. The Philharmonic, under Anton Seidl, played the symphony first in America March 5, 1898. Here again, under Dr. Muck, there was repression: there was power, sonority, the large design, but no attempt to reach the sky, nothing bizarre, noisy, "big." And the lights and shadows of tracery, the wealth of lovely detail made manifest by the band, were a world for adventures in themselves. So the great audience thought, who listened in a perfect hush. But at the close they just descended to the simple prose of applause, and the adventure ended, as most adventures do—on the sidewalk, where it was cold and the dust blew.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK TIMES
DEC 9 - 1906

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

A Russian Overture and Symphony—Adamowski in Strube's Concerto.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, the Russians had a hearing, and Dr. Muck took another opportunity, as he had at the evening concert, to show that reports of his disinclination toward works of modern composers were not to be taken literally. Rimsky Korsakoff's overture to his opera, "The Betrothed of the Czar," and Glazunoff's fifth symphony were the orchestral works performed. Between them came a violin concerto by Mr. Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra, played by Mr. Timothee Adamowski, another member.

The overture and the symphony are both agreeable works, of a kind that can be listened to, at not too frequent intercals, with pleasure, and that show more of the tunefulness of the modern Russian school than the uncompromising nationalism and ruggedness that they are credited with. The opera is described as one in which the librettist has luxuriated in operatic horrors, but the overture gives no warning of them. It contains simple and lucid development of tunes that, if they are taken from the opera, can scarcely be the expression of any of its baleful incidents. They are developed without abstruse or anxious complication, and in the orchestration the composer has sought more for their clear presentation than for a richly set palette of color.

Glazunoff's fifth symphony was played here by Anton Seidl as conductor of the Philharmonic Society, a short time before his death, in 1898. Mr. Safonoff played the sixth with the same organization two seasons ago, and others of his compositions have been given here by the Russian orchestra, his name having appeared on their programmes frequently last month when his "Dance Scene" was given, but most notably two years ago, when it was attached to his "Stenka Raziné," a symphonic poem of characteristic Russian rudeness and strength. Glazunoff is one of the most fertile of the contemporaneous Russians, and his music is too facile, too easily produced. There is more substantial matter in this fifth symphony than in the sixth; and there is the skill of a master of orchestration and a musician accomplished in the technical resources of his art, in thematic elaboration and formal structure. He must have tunes that win their way speedily, even if he helps himself with charming frankness, from Verdi or Wagner. His first movement is the best, the most valuable in its ideas and their treatment; it "sounds," and it makes an immediate and agreeable impression. The scherzo is a pretty piece of aerial orchestration, but it is suspiciously thin in substance. In the third movement there is an ingenious reminiscence from the first; and in the fourth a falling to upon Russian melody and effectively broken and syncopated rhythms. The symphony was played with splendid spirit and finesse, and Dr. Muck, after the scherzo, made his men rise and bow.

Mr. Strube's name is also familiar here from performances that Mr. Gericke has given of his productions; and it is a most commendable thing to encourage the talent that the ranks of the orchestra contain. This second concerto does not seem so spontaneous in its musical ideas as music of Mr. Strube's that has been heard here before, but it is dignified and serious music, not concerned chiefly with displaying the performer's skill, though there is plenty of opportunity for that in it. It is dedicated to Mr. Adamowski, and he played it with obvious enthusiasm and conviction, yet not always with complete mastery of its technical difficulties, especially in intonation. Mr. Strube was made to rise and bow to the public that applauded him heartily.

om
dress
te DEC 9 1906

The performance of Bruckner's E major symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday night was one of the most noteworthy achievements of this admirable organization. If there had previously been any fear that under Dr. Muck it would lose any of that beauty of tone and nicety of balance which it displayed under Mr. Gericke it must have disappeared. One of the most delightful features of the playing of this orchestra has been the manner in which it has succeeded in disguising ugliness. Mr. Gericke was able to make even Mr. Strauss's portentous personal conflict with fate in "Ein Heldenleben" sound like a prize debate between Princeton and Harvard. Muck accomplished something of the same nature with the stupendous ugliness of certain portions of Bruckner's symphony. From beginning to end there was tonal beauty in the performance. The disagreeable doses were cleverly sugar coated with well conceived gradations of force.

Such an interpretation, however, does not wholly disguise the existence of the ugly passages. It is conceded that a composer may write jarring discords when at the same time he shows us that they have reason for existence. In the quarrel between Alberich and Mime and in the first part of the second act of "Siegfried" Wagner wrote music as ugly as music can be. Nevertheless we find that the scene demands just such treatment, and when all is said and done what the master has written is still undeniably music. It is not merely instrumental squawks nor vocal bleats.

Bruckner's apologists hold that his ugly points are unavoidable, that they come in the inevitable development, in the logical processes of his counterpoint. This is of course a specious fallacy. Counterpoint is strictly logical only when written in canonic form, which calls for rigorous imitation, interval by interval. Yet Bach contrived to write a goodly number of fugues without producing anything unbeautiful. Some of his fugues may be dull, but none of them is repulsive.

When a composer is writing counterpoint of the free sort employed by the modern symphonist he can evade the so-called logical development of ugliness whenever he chooses so to do. That he does not evade it is proof of a deliberate search after it. We have many composers engaged in that kind of writing to-day. They all plead that they are ahead of their time, and that the future will justify them.

Here criticism is silenced by its own record. Every master of music who has done the unconventional has been ridiculed and censured by the critics, who live in a conventional world and estimate all things by rule. They are the meistersingers of every period and every young Walter who comes before their court is likely to be condemned. He is indeed fortunate if he find a Hans Sachs.

Therefore wise critics, who have studied the history of music, hesitate before damning any music simply on the ground that it is ugly. What sounds ugly to-day will sound beautiful fifty years hence. But Bruckner's E major symphony has had twenty years of rest. In the meantime local music lovers have been trained to a taste for Tschaikowsky, Brahms and Richard Strauss, three composers differing greatly from one another in style and differing still more greatly from Beethoven and Mozart.

We have listened to the inventions of such writers as D'Indy, Loeffler, Debussy, Bruneau and the rest of the harmonic agony school and we have learned to love music that has a sting in it. We do not any more care for candy for breakfast, candy for luncheon, candy for dinner. And in spite of all this we still find at least two out of the four movements of this E major symphony dull, needlessly involved, bald in idea and tiresome in treatment.

With the old controversy between the devotees of Brahms and the admirers of Bruckner we New Yorkers have no concern. But it may be well to note in passing that Bruckner gets more credit for being a follower of Wagner than he deserves. He is not a Wagnerian composer in his method and artistic bent. He falls into occasional imitation of Wagner's melodies and harmonies, but he does not conceive melodic roots after the fashion of Wagner, nor does he copy the Bayreuth master in his method of developing them. An effect has been mistaken for a cause.

For example, there is a passage in the scherzo of the E major symphony which runs ridiculously close to the apprentice music in the first act of "Die Meistersinger," but it occurs in a development of the movement. It is plainly a fortuitous imitation. Bruckner's germinal ideas, his themes, are not like Wagner's at all. His orchestration is not like Wagner's and his characteristic uglinesses are thousands of miles from the warring dissonances which Wagner uses for unmistakable purposes.

Because Brahms built his piano technic partly on foundations laid down by Schumann and perhaps because he composed the slow movement of his C minor symphony in the same form as that in which Schumann composed the adagio of his C major, a form not unknown to writers of piano sonatas and instrumental concertos before the time of either of these musicians, there was—and for the matter of that still is in some quarters—a habit of referring to Brahms as a disciple of Schumann's. He was much more a disciple of Beethoven and Bach. But when by the term disciple commentators intend to convey the notion that he was an imitator they write superficial and foolish criticism. In the same way Bruckner gets credit for being a disciple of Wagner chiefly because he was an ardent adorer of that mighty genius.

Those who can find in the E major symphony anything characteristically Wagnerian in method must admit something of imagination into their reasoning. Bruckner's method of composition, except for its prolixity, is much more like that of Brahms than that of Wagner. But this is rank heresy and an excellent place to stop.

W. J. HENDERSON.

he First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s
DEC 9 - 1906

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das gestrige Concert wieder ein großer Erfolg.

Das Programm der Bostoner gestern Nachmittag enthielt zwei russische und einen deutschen Componisten. Merkwürdigerweise schienen gerade die Werke der beiden Russen, Rimsky-Korsakoff und Glazonnoff, ihres blühenden Inhaltes wegen irgendwo anders als im kalten Rußland entstanden zu sein, während das Violin-Concert Strube's, eines der Primgeigen des Orchesters, dessen Wiege in Ballenstedt am lieblichen Harze gestanden hat, in seiner steppenhaften Oede Einen wirklich eisig kalt ließ. Wie kommt dieses Stück in ein solches Programm? Es ist doch etwas Anderes, wenn ein Vereinsdirigent aus persönlicher Rücksicht ein Schmerzenskind eines seiner ersten Tenöre, der es 'mal nicht lassen konnte, zu komponiren, ans Tageslicht bringt.

Das Strube'sche Concert bietet aber auch gar nichts, was auf Interesse Anspruch machen kann, es wäre denn vielleicht die kurze Einleitung zum zweiten Satz und in klanglicher Hinsicht, die eine oder andere Variation des Finales, welches der Componist, um originell zu sein, im 7/4 Takt geschrieben hat.

Wie sagt doch Weingartner? „Bald werden wir nur noch Compositionen im 19/23 Takt erleben." Herr Timotheus Adamowski mühte sich redlich um den Erfolg des Werkes ab; Herr Strube, der sich zweimal mit verbeugen durfte, hat Ursache, ihm dankbar zu sein.

Doch nun ein ander Bild. Eine wahre Herzerquickung waren die Ouverture zu „Die Zarenbraut" von Rimsky-Korsakoff und die fünfte Symphonie von Glazonnoff. Beide Werke, die hier lange nicht gehört wurden, zeigen viel innere Verwandtschaft. In beiden Werken wurde einmal wieder der Beweis erbracht, daß in dem Rahmen der alten Form noch viel Neues und Schönes geschaffen werden kann. Beide Werke enthalten gesunde Melodik und scharfe thematische Gegensätze. In der Ouverture überraschte namentlich der hochpoetische Schluß, welcher wie ein inniger Liebesgruß verklingt. Die Symphonie von Glazonnoff, welcher übrigens seine Studien bei Rimsky-Korsakoff machte, ist ein hochbedeutendes Werk, an dem man seine helle Freude haben kann. Gleich der erste Satz hebt frisch an mit einem Horn-Thema, welches sich nachher in genialer Weise mit dem lyrischen Gegenspiel vereinigt. Das Scherzo, eine Art Elfenmusik, ist von bestrickendem Klangreize und wurde so entzückend gespielt, daß nach dem stürmischen Erfolg gerne ein da capo, wie es nach dem Scherzo von Tschaikowski's „Vierten" gewöhnlich geschieht, erwartet wurde. Der dritte Satz, eine Romanze, schwimmt förmlich in Wohllaut und ist dabei von derselben durchsichtigen Klarheit, wie die beiden vorhergehenden Sätze. Kurz vor dem Schluß ertönen ein paar ernste Posaunenaccorde, welche aber drohendem Gewölk gleich, sich verziehen, um dem köstlichsten Sonnenlicht wieder Raum zu geben. Im letzten Satz geht es recht wild her, wie bei einer ausgelassenen Gesellschaft. Wenn dieses Finale inhaltlich nicht ganz an die drei ersten Sätze hinanreicht, so bietet es doch in rythmischer Hinsicht so viel Interessantes, daß man ihm gerne bis zu dem glänzenden Schlusse zuhört.

Die Ausführung der drei Werke war mustergiltig, wie wir es ja seit Jahren von den Bostonern gewohnt sind.

H. S.

BOSTON TRAVELER, DECEMBER 8, 1906.

The return of the Symphony Orchestra from its December trip will be signalized by the performance of two works which are new to Boston. There will be no soloist at the public rehearsal on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The first novelty will be Mr. Chadwick's Symphonic Poem "Cleopatra." Mr. Chadwick as a musician and composer needs no introduction to Boston, and a new work from his pen will be heard with keenest interest by the music lovers of this city. The other novelties are the "Variations and Double Fugue on a Jolly Theme" by Georg Schumann.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 8, 1906

No symphony stands on the programme of the next pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, and there will be no soloist. Four numbers make the list—Elgar's overture, "In the South"; Chadwick's tone-poem, "Cleopatra"; Georg Schumann's "Variations on a Jolly Theme" and the overture to Wagner's opera, "Rienzi." Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem was first played at a Worcester festival a year or two ago; but it is new to Boston. Schumann's variations are also unknown here, and Elgar's brilliant descriptive overture has been played but twice—by Mr. Gericke at a pair of concerts last season. Perhaps the overture to "Rienzi" is for the joy of the brass choir whom Dr. Muck has released from long repression.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There was another large audience in the Baptist Temple last evening to greet the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and an admirable programme was rendered. Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" was the first number, and the symphony was Glazounoff's B flat major symphony No. 5, four movements, which was given for the first time in Brooklyn.

Professor Willy Hess was the soloist of the evening, playing Beethoven's concerto in D major for the violin, three movements.

NEW YORK PRES

ss
DEC 9 1906

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck Again Proves High Worth

At his fourth New York appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall Dr. Karl Muck added another link to the chain of evidence that is proving him not only one of the most satisfying leaders in the chronicles of Higginson's organization, but one of the finest orchestral interpreters, considered from every point of view, who ever have visited this country. The programme yesterday contained one novelty, a violin concerto in F sharp minor by Strube, which was played by that admirable member of the symphony orchestra, Timothee Adamovski. But a final contribution, Glazounoff's symphony in B flat major, No. 5, proved to be the climax of the programme by reason of the wonderful reading it received from Muck and his men.

It is doubtful that this work of the Russian composer will hold its own in the constantly growing mass of music piling up in the world's archives. One finds too much in it that depends on the musical idiom of other composers—on the trenchant thematic and harmonic language of Wagner in particular, and on that master's richly sonorous orchestration. Scandinavian influences, too, are discerned, and even Verdi, the melodious, peeps out of the coil. Little that is truly Russian in character makes itself noticed except in the fourth and last movement.

But if Glazounoff's symphony carries no profound message it must be acknowledged that, played with such technical finish as it received yesterday, and interpreted by an analyst who lifts out every poetic suggestion with the most exquisite attention to details, as Dr. Muck did, the work makes a superb effect. What sumptuous sonorities, what impassioned rhythmical pulse!

The new violin concerto, written by one of the orchestra's first violins, made no deep impression, though the second movement, an Adagio, proved melodically appealing. The composer seems to have talent and ability, but so far his powers are not sufficiently co-ordinated. As a whole, the composition seems scrappy—as if a tangle of ideas (borrowed largely from other men) had been thrown into a pot and set boiling.

Adamowski played like a musician. His expressive tone, excellent finger technique and expert bowing stood him in good stead, the latter particularly in the lively ending of the last movement. Strube, with signs of great embarrassment, left his desk mate in the last row of the first violins to snare the applause with Adamowski. The opening number on the programme was Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar."

SUNDAY HERALD DECEMBER 9, 1906

COMING CONCERTS.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, in Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, will take place on next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The orchestral pieces will be the overture to "Der Freischuetz," Schubert's unfinished symphony, Schumann's symphony in B flat major, No. 1. Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto, will sing an aria from "Samson and Delilah" and a group of songs.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Chickering Hall, Monday evening, the 17th. The programme will include Brahm's quartet in B flat major, op 67, Saint-Saens' sonata in F major for piano and 'cello, op. 123 (first time here), Schubert's piano quintet in A major, op. 114. Dr. Otto Neitzel, pianist, and Mr. K. Keller, double-bass, will assist.

om
dress
te DEC 9 - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Carnegie Hall.

Music is many moods to many men. The adventures of an individual soul at the concert yesterday afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are the adventures—of an individual soul. And yet they are criticism, too. From a wilderness of skyscrapers, one journeys till Copley Square and the Library confront him, and knows a great peace. So after a week it may be of much strenuous music, or the noises of Herald Square, or just the full pounding of strife or ambition, came this concert with its dominant note of repression, and one knew the great peace again. A little fanciful is it to talk of the soul's adventures in Carnegie Hall? Should one dissect the new concerto by Gustav Strube for violin and orchestra, or analyze the symphony? The soul when on adventure bent forgets to analyze! Later, perhaps, one recalls that the concerto, played by Timothée Adamowski (the band furnished thus both composer and soloist), was for two of its three movements written and performed with repression for a motto. A certain rarefied quality, lovely if a trifle exoctic, was its chief charm. The last movement, in odd 7-4 rhythm, seemed merely clever. The first number on the programme was the overture to Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar," and the symphony was Glazounoff's 5th. The programme said this was played for the first time in New York. The "First time in New York" should have been placed after the concerto. The Philharmonic, under Anton Seidl, played the symphony first in America March 5, 1898. Here again, under Dr. Muck, there was repression: there was power, sonority, the large design, but no attempt to reach the sky, nothing bizarre, noisy, "big." And the lights and shadows of tracery, the wealth of lovely detail made manifest by the band, were a world for adventures in themselves. So the great audience thought, who listened in a perfect hush. But at the close they just descended to the simple prose of applause, and the adventure ended, as most adventures do—on the sidewalk, where it was cold and the dust blew.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK TIMES

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

A Russian Overture and Symphony—Adamowski in Strube's Concerto.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, the Russians had a hearing, and Dr. Muck took another opportunity, as he had at the evening concert, to show that reports of his disinclination toward works of modern composers were not to be taken literally. Rimsky Korsakoff's overture to his opera, "The Betrothed of the Czar," and Glazunoff's fifth symphony were the orchestral works performed. Between them came a violin concerto by Mr. Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra, played by Mr. Timothee Adamowski, another member.

The overture and the symphony are both agreeable works, of a kind that can be listened to, at not too frequent intercals, with pleasure, and that show more of the tunefulness of the modern Russian school than the uncompromising nationalism and ruggedness that they are credited with. The opera is described as one in which the librettist has luxuriated in operatic horrors, but the overture gives no warning of them. It contains simple and lucid development of tunes that, if they are taken from the opera, can scarcely be the expression of any of its baleful incidents. They are developed without abstruse or anxious complication, and in the orchestration the composer has sought more for their clear presentation than for a richly set palette of color.

Glazunoff's fifth symphony was played here by Anton Seidl as conductor of the Philharmonic Society, a short time before his death, in 1898. Mr. Safonoff played the sixth with the same organization two seasons ago, and others of his compositions have been given here by the Russian orchestra, his name having appeared on their programmes frequently last month, when his "Dance Scene" was given; but most notably two years ago, when it was attached to his "Stenka Razine," a symphonic poem of characteristic Russian rudeness and strength. Glazunoff is one of the most fertile of the contemporaneous Russians, and his music is too facile, too easily produced. There is more substantial matter in this fifth symphony than in the sixth; and there is the skill of a master of orchestration and a musician accomplished in the technical resources of his art, in thematic elaboration and formal structure. He must have tunes that win their way speedily, even if he helps himself with charming frankness, from Verdi or Wagner. His first movement is the best, the most valuable in its ideas and their treatment; it "sounds," and it makes an immediate and agreeable impression. The scherzo is a pretty piece of aerial orchestration, but it is suspiciously thin in substance. In the third movement there is an ingenious reminiscence from the first; and in the fourth a falling-to upon Russian melody and effectively broken and syncopated rhythms. The symphony was played with splendid spirit and finesse; and Dr. Muck, after the scherzo, made his men rise and bow.

Mr. Strube's name is also familiar here from performances that Mr. Gericke has given of his productions; and it is a most commendable thing to encourage the talent that the ranks of the orchestra contain. This second concerto does not seem so spontaneous in its musical ideas as music of Mr. Strube's that has been heard here before, but it is dignified and serious music, not concerned chiefly with displaying the performer's skill, though there is plenty of opportunity for that in it. It is dedicated to Mr. Adamowski, and he played it with obvious enthusiasm and conviction, yet not always with complete mastery of its technical difficulties, especially in intonation. Mr. Strube was made to rise and bow to the public that applauded him heartily.

...EW YORK EV'G POST
ss
DEC 7 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Orchestra Plays Bruckner.

Strange things happen in this town sometimes. Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at Carnegie Hall, the programme of which did not contain a single piece by either Brahms or Richard Strauss! What is more, it included a symphony by Anton Bruckner, whom the Brahmsites of Vienna, headed by Hanslick, did their very best to suppress, making his life a tragedy of hopes deferred. This symphony, the seventh, in E major, was hailed in 1886 by the composer's admirers as the work of a "second Beethoven." To Hanslick it seemed "morbid music, unnaturally inflated, pernicious. Like all the larger works of Bruckner," he continued, "the E major symphony has clever ideas, interesting, nay, beautiful spots—six bars here, eight bars there—but between these flashes of lightning there is impenetrable darkness, leaden heaviness, and feverish exaltation. One of the most respected musicians of Germany, in a letter to me, characterized this symphony as 'the nightmare of an orchestral player, superexcited by twenty Tristan rehearsals.' To me this seems an apt characterization."

If we transpose Hanslick's criticism into the placid key of C major, we may concede that there is a grain of truth in it. Bruckner's worst enemy was not Hanslick, or Brahms, but Anton Bruckner himself. He made his symphonies too long (one of them lasts an hour and a half), and in some of his movements he spoils the best and the good by associating with it much that is mediocre. Had he kept only the best and developed it into short, terse, symphonic poems, lasting not over half an hour, his music would not have had to wait till nearly a decade after his death before receiving the appreciation which is its due; for, with all their faults, his symphonies are certainly more interesting than those of Brahms or than the symphonic poems of R. Strauss.

Bruckner is a victim of the symphonic form, and not the only one. Had he come under the influence of Liszt, "the emancipator of musical form" (as Saint-Saëns has aptly called him) as he came under the influence of Wagner in the matter of orchestration and modulation, his fate would have been different, and he would have been in the front instead of coming into his own so tardily. From one point of view, too much emphasis has been placed on his indebtedness to Wagner. It is true that there is a strong echo of "Rheingold" in his seventh symphony, but it is not such bold enhancation as the adoption of the main theme of the last movement of Beethoven's last symphony in the first symphony of Brahms, who by this connecting link modestly indicated that he was writing the "tenth" symphony. In the use of orchestral colors Bruckner is far ahead of Brahms, who was almost color blind in music. He is also much more interesting than Brahms in his harmonic sequences and modulations. Of these things the seventh symphony affords eloquent proof. Bruckner was the first who transplanted to the symphony the full Bayreuth orchestra. In the adagio of the work played last night he makes ravishing use of the Wagnerian brasses, used softly for coloring and emotional effect; in all modern music there is nothing more impressive and the opinion is becoming widely prevalent in Germany that Bruckner has written the most beautiful adagios since Beethoven.

The scherzo of the seventh symphony also is a masterwork; first and last movements suffer from over-elaboration; but Dr. Muck and his superb orchestra made so much of the beauty climaxes that the audience forgot the dreary stretches. There was cordial applause after each movement, and at the end the conductor was recalled and the whole orchestra had to rise in response to the continued plaudits. Seldom has a symphonic work been so perfectly interpreted here. Now for Bruckner's Ninth!

The only other orchestral work on the programme was the third "Leonore" overture. The soloist was Mr. Moritz Rosenthal, who played the E flat major concerto of Liszt, as it has seldom been played here or anywhere. Brilliant, indescribably brilliant, it was; but it was infinitely more than that. In the whole list of pianoforte concertos there is none superior to Liszt's in charm and originality of melody, piquancy of rhythm, beauty of tone-color and balance of orchestral and pianistic interest—in everything that makes a concerto great; and Mr. Rosenthal, aided by Dr. Muck, brought out all these varied charms so vividly that the audience was wild with delight. The applause which followed must have been a bitter dose to those—there are still a dozen of them, at least—who cannot recognize the soul of Liszt under his brilliant exterior. The times are [illegible] when a piece like this could be damned [illegible] it "the trifle concerto."

to the bitter severely he condemned them. The knowledge of this embittered the last years of his life; and his fate is a warning to others who echo his antiquated opinions.

This evening the Boston orchestra plays at the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn. It would have been too much to neglect both Strauss and Brahms entirely on this visit to Greater New York; so the former is represented by his "Don Juan." Willy Hess plays the Beethoven violin concerto, and the final number is Glazounoff's fifth symphony.

...m
...dress
...te
EV'G WORLD
DEC 10 1906

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon had for its soloist Timothee Adamowski, one of its members, in the violin concerto of Gustave Straube, another musician belonging to this famous band. The composer sat among the first violins and was reluctantly brought to the front to acknowledge the plaudits that followed the presentation of his work. Glazounoff's fifth symphony was the principal offering. Dr. Karl Muck and this superb orchestra, which he is permitting to display its true greatness, rather than the programme, evoked the applause.

...Press Clipping Bureau in the World
POST
...ess
DEC -9 1906

SYMPHONY QUARTET CONCERT.

Programme Rendered Pleasing Through Variety of Its Make-up.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its first concert of the season at the New Willard yesterday afternoon. The personnel of the organization remains unchanged, and the smoothness of the ensemble has been considerably enhanced since last season. The programme was pleasing through the variety in its make-up, being composed of three works, differing vastly in style. They were Beethoven's quartet, in G major, opus 18, No. 2: Hugo Kaun's second quartet, in D major, and Dvorak's piano quartet, in E flat major, opus 87. The assisting artist was H. G. Tucker, a Boston pianist.

The main feature of interest was the Kaun quartet, which was performed for the first time in this city, and which was, in all probability, the first of this composer's works ever given here publicly. The quartet challenges attention at once through the novelty it offers in the succession of its movements. In place of the four movements generally employed in quartets, Mr. Kaun has substituted a fugue, a scherzo, and a slow section, all of which are conceived in the modern German method of composition. The music throughout is wrought scientifically, with a mastery of architectural strength and with a depth of musical utterance which never sinks too deeply into the mire of profundity.

The principal charm of the work, however, is its melodic material, which speaks plaintively and with genuine pathos, in the first and last movements. This quality is all the more remarkable in view of the technical requirements of the fugal movement, which would ordinarily receive a mathematical, rather than a poetical, imprint. The whole work was interesting to a rare degree, and well worthy of repetition at a future concert.

Of the other two numbers the Beethoven quartet will be remembered for the Mozartian ingenuousness of its pages, and the Dvorak composition for the gay color, and the Bohemianism of its first movement. In this number the pianist, Mr. Tucker, found his scope somewhat limited, and it would be unfair to judge of his ability further than to say that he never marred the general outline of the picture by misjudging the proportion belonging to his part of the score. The concert was well attended, nearly every seat in the room being occupied.

...n NEW YORK STAATSZEIT
...ress
DEC 10 1906

Berichtigung.

In das Referat über das Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert im Sonntagsblatt ist infolge des Auslassens zweier Worte der Sinn derart entstellt worden, daß wir den betreffenden Satz nachfolgend korrekt wiedergeben: „Wenn man aber mitunter sich zu erinnern glaubt, daß die Violinen bei den Wiener Philharmonikern auch so klingen, so hat man doch die Gewißheit, daß es eine solche Vereinigung von Holzbläsern in der ganzen Welt nicht giebt."

[93]

...EW YORK WOR...
DEC 9 - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY DULL; FAULT OF PROGRAMME.

Even Timothee (Sic!) Adamowski—Formerly "Tim"—in Violin Concerto Couldn't Relieve Tedium.

Contrary to the prevailing order of things at the Boston Symphony concerts, the matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon proved dull. This was not due to the playing of the men, but to the programme, which had little in it to attract a matinee audience, and as a result the applause, save in an occasional instance, was very feeble.

Dr. Muck constructed the orchestral part of the programme out of Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to the opera "The Betrothed of the Tsar," and Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony. The latter contains a very delightful scherzo and a sentimental though reminiscent andante; also is its first movement thematically, not intensely original. The final allegro is martially brilliant. The entire work hardly impresses the listener as being of serious depth or exalted height.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff overture proved not highly interesting. The novelty was a violin concerto by Strube, one of the members of this orchestra, which was heard for the first time in New York. It was played by Timothee Adamowski—formerly "Tim" in Boston. It can by no stretch of the imagination be called a great work. It is full of empty patches, and its orchestration is not always effective. The first movement sounds tentative, the second is conceived in a sentimental mood and the final portion is the most graceful. Greatness of invention is lacking in the composition. Adamowski played it suavely, with his customary polished manner. The orchestra played well throughout the afternoon, and Dr. Muck held his men under wonderful control; but the concert was dull.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 10, 1906

Musical News

The one hundred and thirty-sixth anniversary of the birth of Beethoven falls next Sunday, and at the following pair of Symphony concerts Dr. Muck seems to be commemorating it in the German fashion with a "Beethoven programme." It comprises the seventh symphony, the overture to "Egmont" and the piano concerto in G-major with Dr. Otto Neitzel to play the solo part. Dr. Neitzel is the German lecturer upon music who is also a skilled pianist, and who is now visiting America. In Chicago, by the way, the orchestra still continues Theodore Thomas's custom [illegible] at the pair of

...aper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 6 - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Splendid Concert at the Lyric Before Large Audience.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Lyric last evening was an ideal performance by the ideal orchestra, under an ideal director. The program itself was also ideal. It was limited to three composers, all modern, and two of them still living. It was a Russo-German program, as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakoff—
Overture to the opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar."

Strube—
Concerto in F-sharp minor, for violin and orchestra.
I. Allegro assai.
II. Reverie: Adagio.
III. Passacaglia: Andantino Grazioso.

Brahms—
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso. L'istesso tempo.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

The Brahms Symphony has been on programs in Baltimore before, but it may well be said that it has really never been played here before. Brahms is often discarded by excellent musical enthusiasts, but only because his music is not properly heard, and, therefore, naturally, is not rightly understood. It was properly heard last evening and most enthusiastically enjoyed. The attention given it was almost breathless, while Dr. Muck conscientiously, carefully, but poetically brought out its bountiful sequences of meaning. He tore away the wooden overcoat in which Brahms is so often shown, and revealed the native beauty of his richly jeweled form.

The Strube Violin Concerto is a splendid work. Modern, but melodious; rich in a significance which taxes the best musical soloists and organizations to present. Adamowski played it in a perfect way, without timidity or affectation, and he achieved a triumph which he attributed generously, but justly, in part, to its modest composer, who was among the first violins in the orchestra, and who was obliged to acknowledge the plaudits of the audience.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff overture was well worthy of its place on the fine program, as well as of the indorsement of such a master as Tschaikowski. Dr. Muck's concerts are all most highly educational, and it will be a great pity [illegible]

THE MANHATTAN
Press Clipping Bureau
ARTHUR CASSOT, Proprietor
2 West 14th Street, N. Y.
NEW YORK PARIS LONDON

Paper Sun
City New York
Date DEC 9 State N Y

PAYING FOR BOSTON MUSIC.

BARS IN THE WAY OF HEARING THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Eighteen Dollar and Ten Dollar Season Tickets Exist in Name Only—Rush Seats That Cost Time and Strength.—Outlook for the Casual New Yorker Cheerless.

BOSTON, Dec. 8.—If a New Yorker, happening to be in Boston some Friday or Saturday during the winter, should decide that he would go and hear the Symphony Orchestra upon its native platform he would receive a surprise amounting to a shock.

If it happened to be Friday afternoon he would in all probability not be able to get a seat for love or money. For that matter the New Yorker, as such, doesn't get anything in Boston for love of himself, he being regarded there with much outward contempt and not a little secret jealousy.

But when even his money—his good money, as he is prone to call it—can't buy him a place in Symphony Hall, that ugly home of beautiful music, his surprise turns to shock. He asks indignant questions and learns the following facts:

Symphony Hall contains something more than 2,500 seats. When the announcement of the season's concerts is published it contains the following paragraph: "Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $18 and $10, according to location." Of course even the New Yorker understands that the concerts are on Saturday nights and the public rehearsals on Friday afternoons.

But what he does not understand is that the price of the tickets is by no means $18 and $10, according to location. The price is whatever a seat will bring more than $18 and $10, those figures representing the minimum price at which two divisions of seats will be sold.

The $18 seats for the rehearsals are sold at auction at Symphony Hall on October 1; the $10 seats for rehearsals are sold in the same way on October 2: the $18 and the $10 seats for the concerts are auctioned off on October 4 and 5. Seats are sold only in the regular order and no more than four seats are sold on one bid.

Probably it is as impartial a method as any of arranging the matter. A good many Boston quirks, which at first strike the stranger as queer, justify themselves on closer investigation.

There is perhaps no more reasonable way of adjusting a scale of prices than by letting the people do it themselves. If certain persons, for the good of the cause, —and the glory of themselves—are willing to pay premiums of from $75 to $300, as on one occasion, who shall say them nay? Even after all these contributors to gain and to glory have been accommodated there are plenty of seats to be had at prices which will average from $1 to $1.50 for each of the twenty-four performances.

There is only one sort of person who is left in a very bad way. This is the one who, like the stray New Yorker, wants to enjoy a single concert.

Suppose he goes to the box office and with cheerful assurance asks for a seat for the Friday afternoon rehearsal. He is told that there are no seats for sale. A box? There are no boxes in Symphony Hall. Well, meekly, can he have standing room? No one is allowed to stand.

It is all true. Every reserved seat in the building is sold for the entire season. Standees are not admitted.

At a ticket broker's downtown there is now and then a seat to be had, some one sending in a season ticket to be, as it were, sublet for the occasion. But so far as the Friday rehearsals are concerned this does not often happen.

Yet, though the man in the box office may neglect to mention it, there are seats to be had, even in fact only at the last moment. They are good seats, too, and dirt cheap.

But one does pay for them all right enough. If not with money, yet with time and strength. Exactly 505 seats, the entire capacity of the second balcony, are reserved for sale as so-called rush seats.

These seats cannot be bought in advance. Those who wish them must be in line when the doors are opened. Each person must have in his or her hand a silver quarter. Nothing else will be accepted. A half dollar for two, or a dollar for four, or two dimes and a nickel for one—none of these will be received. Each person pays for himself and pays with a quarter.

One man holds a bag, into which the quarters are dropped. Another man stands by with a counter, which he presses, clicking for every person admitted.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Orchestra Plays Bruckner.

Strange things happen in this town sometimes. Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at Carnegie Hall, the programme of which did not contain a single piece by either Brahms or Richard Strauss! What is more, it included a symphony by Anton Bruckner, whom the Brahmsites of Vienna, headed by Hanslick, did their very best to suppress, making his life a tragedy of hopes deferred. This symphony, the seventh, in E major, was hailed in 1886 by the composer's admirers as the work of a "second Beethoven." To Hanslick, it seemed "morbid music, unnaturally inflated, pernicious. Like all the larger works of Bruckner," he continued, "the E major symphony has clever ideas, interesting, nay, beautiful spots—six bars here, eight bars there—but between these flashes of lightning there is impenetrable darkness, leaden heaviness, and feverish exaltation. One of the most respected musicians of Germany, in a letter to me, characterizes this symphony as 'the nightmare of an orchestral player, superexcited by twenty Tristan rehearsals.' To me this seems an apt characterization."

If we transpose Hanslick's criticism into the placid key of C major, we may concede that there is a grain of truth in it. Bruckner's worst enemy was not Hanslick, or Brahms, but Anton Bruckner himself. He made his symphonies too long (one of them lasts an hour and a half), and in some of his movements he spoils the best and the good by associating with it much that is mediocre. Had he kept only the best and developed it into short, terse, symphonic poems, lasting not over half an hour, his music would not have had to wait till nearly a decade after his death before receiving the appreciation which is its due; for, with all their faults, his symphonies are certainly more interesting than those of Brahms or than the symphonic poems of R. Strauss.

Bruckner is a victim of the symphonic form, and not the only one. Had he come under the influence of Liszt, "the emancipator of musical form" (as Saint-Saëns has aptly called him) as he came under the influence of Wagner in the matter of orchestration and modulation, his fate would have been different, and he would have been in the front instead of coming into his own so tardily. From one point of view, too much emphasis has been placed on his indebtedness to Wagner. It is true that there is a strong echo of "Rheingold" in his seventh symphony, but it is not such bold annexation as the adoption of the main theme of the last movement of Beethoven's last symphony in the first symphony of Brahms, who by this connecting link modestly indicated that he was writing the "tenth" symphony. In the use of orchestral colors Bruckner is far ahead of Brahms, who was almost color blind in music. He is also much more interesting than Brahms in his harmonic sequences and modulations. Of these things the seventh symphony affords eloquent proof. Bruckner was the first who transplanted to the symphony the full Bayreuth orchestra. In the adagio of the work played last night he makes ravishing use of the Wagnerian brasses, used softly for coloring and emotional effect; in all modern music there is nothing more impressive and the opinion is becoming widely prevalent in Germany that Bruckner has written the most beautiful adagios since Beethoven.

The scherzo of the seventh symphony also is a masterwork; first and last movements suffer from over-elaboration; but Dr. Muck and his superb orchestra made so much of the beauty climaxes that the audiences forgot the dreary stretches. There was cordial applause after each movement, and at the end the conductor was recalled and the whole orchestra had to rise in response to the continued plaudits. Seldom has a symphonic work been so perfectly interpreted here. Now for Bruckner's Ninth!

The only other orchestral work on the programme was the third "Leonore" overture. The soloist was Mr. Moritz Rosenthal, who played the E flat major concerto of Liszt, as it has seldom been played here or anywhere. Brilliant, indescribably brilliant, it was; but it was infinitely more than that. In the whole list of pianoforte concertos there is none superior to Liszt's in charm and originality of melody, piquancy of rhythm, beauty of tone-color and balance of orchestral and pianistic interest—in everything that makes a concerto great; and Mr. Rosenthal, aided by Dr. Muck, brought out all these varied charms so vividly that the audience was wild with delight. The applause which followed must have been a bitter dose to those—there are still a dozen of them, at least—who cannot recognize the soul of Liszt under his brilliant exterior. The times are past when a piece like this could be damned and put aside for years because a Hanslick dubbed it "the triangle concerto." Modern audiences admire nearly everything that Hanslick commends, and the more so the more severely he condemned them. The knowledge of this embittered the last years of his life; and his fate is a warning to others who echo his antiquated opinions.

This evening the Boston orchestra plays at the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn. It would have been too much to neglect both Strauss and Brahms entirely on this visit to Greater New York; so the former is represented by his "Don Juan." Willy Hess plays the Beethoven violin concerto, and the final number is Glazounoff's fifth symphony.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon had for its soloist Timothee Adamowski, one of its members, in the violin concerto of Gustave Straube, another musician belonging to this famous band. The composer sat among the first violins and was reluctantly brought to the front to acknowledge the plaudits that followed the presentation of his work. Glazounoff's fifth symphony was the principal offering. Dr. Karl Muck and this superb orchestra, which he is permitting to display its true greatness, rather than the programme, evoked the applause.

SYMPHONY QUARTET CONCERT.

Programme Rendered Pleasing Through Variety of Its Make-up.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its first concert of the season at the New Willard yesterday afternoon. The personnel of the organization remains unchanged, and the smoothness of the ensemble has been considerably enhanced since last season. The programme was pleasing through the variety in its make-up, being composed of three works, differing vastly in style. They were Beethoven's quartet, in G major, opus 18, No. 2; Hugo Kaun's second quartet, in D major, and Dvorak's piano quartet, in E flat major, opus 87. The assisting artist was H. G. Tucker, a Boston pianist.

The main feature of interest was the Kaun quartet, which was performed for the first time in this city, and which was, in all probability, the first of this composer's works ever given here publicly. The quartet challenges attention at once through the novelty it offers in the succession of its movements. In place of the four movements generally employed in quartets, Mr. Kaun has substituted a fugue, a scherzo, and a slow section, all of which are conceived in the modern German method of composition. The music throughout is wrought scientifically, with a mastery of architectural strength and with a depth of musical utterance which never sinks too deeply into the mire of profundity.

The principal charm of the work, however, is its melodic material, which speaks plaintively and with genuine pathos, in the first and last movements. This quality is all the more remarkable in view of the technical requirements of the fugal movement, which would ordinarily receive a mathematical, rather than a poetical, imprint. The whole work was interesting to a rare degree, and well worthy of repetition at a future concert.

Of the other two numbers the Beethoven quartet will be remembered for the Mozartian ingenuousness of its pages, and the Dvorak composition for the gay color, and the Bohemianism of its first movement. In this number the pianist, Mr. Tucker, found his scope somewhat limited, and it would be unfair to judge of his ability further than to say that he never marred the general outline of the picture by misjudging the proportion belonging to his part of the score. The concert was well attended, nearly every seat in the room being occupied.

Berichtigung.

In das Referat über das Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert im Sonntagsblatt ist infolge des Auslassens zweier Worte der Sinn derart entstellt worden, daß wir den betreffenden Satz nachfolgend korrekt wiedergeben: „Wenn man aber mitunter sich zu erinnern glaubt, daß die Violinen bei den Wiener Philharmonikern auch so klingen, so hat man doch die Gewißheit, daß es eine solche Vereinigung von Holzbläsern in der ganzen Welt nicht giebt."

BOSTON SYMPHONY DULL; FAULT OF PROGRAMME.

Even Timothee (Sic!) Adamowski—Formerly "Tim"—in Violin Concerto Couldn't Relieve Tedium.

Contrary to the prevailing order of things at the Boston Symphony concerts, the matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon proved dull. This was not due to the playing of the men, but to the programme, which had little in it to attract a matinee audience, and as a result the applause, save in an occasional instance, was very feeble.

Dr. Muck constructed the orchestral part of the programme out of Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to the opera "The Betrothed of the Tsar," and Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony. The latter contains a very delightful scherzo and a sentimental though reminiscent andante; also is its first movement thematically, not intensely original. The final allegro is martially brilliant. The entire work hardly impresses the listener as being of serious depth or exalted height.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff overture proved not highly interesting. The novelty was a violin concerto by Strube, one of the members of this orchestra, which was heard for the first time in New York. It was played by Timothee Adamowski—formerly "Tim" in Boston. It can by no stretch of the imagination be called a great work. It is full of empty patches, and its orchestrations is not always effective. The first movement sounds tentative, the second is conceived in a sentimental mood and the final portion is the most graceful. Greatness of invention is lacking in the composition. Adamowski played it suavely, with his customary polished manner. The orchestra played well throughout the afternoon, and Dr. Muck held his men under wonderful control, but the concert was dull.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 10, 1906

Musical News

The one hundred and thirty-sixth anniversary of the birth of Beethoven falls next Sunday, and at the following pair of Symphony concerts Dr. Muck seems to be commemorating it in the German fashion with a "Beethoven programme." It comprises the seventh symphony, the overture to "Egmont" and the piano concerto in G-major with Dr. Otto Neitzel to play the solo part. Dr. Neitzel is the German lecturer upon music who is also a skilled pianist, and who is now visiting America. In Chicago, by the way, the orchestra still continues Theodore Thomas's custom of Beethoven programme at the pair of

aper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Splendid Concert at the Lyric Before Large Audience.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Lyric last evening was an ideal performance by the ideal orchestra, under an ideal director. The program itself was also ideal. It was limited to three composers, all modern, and two of them still living. It was a Russo-German program, as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakoff—
Overture to the opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar."
Strube—
Concerto in F-sharp minor, for violin and orchestra.
I. Allegro assai.
II. Reverie: Adagio.
III. Passacaglia: Andantino Grazioso.
Brahms—
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso. L'istesso tempo.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

The Brahms Symphony has been on programs in Baltimore before, but it may well be said that it has really never been played here before. Brahms is often discarded by excellent musical enthusiasts, but only because his music is not properly heard, and, therefore, naturally, is not rightly understood. It was properly heard last evening and most enthusiastically enjoyed. The attention given it was almost breathless, while Dr. Muck conscientiously, carefully, but poetically brought out its bountiful sequences of meaning. He tore away the wooden overcoat in which Brahms is so often shown, and revealed the native beauty of his richly jeweled form.

The Strube Violin Concerto is a splendid work. Modern, but melodious; rich in a significance which taxes the best musical soloists and organizations to present. Adamowski played it in a perfect way, without timidity or affectation, and he achieved a triumph which he attributed generously, but justly, in part, to its modest composer, who was among the first violins in the orchestra, and who was obliged to acknowledge the plaudits of the audience.

The Rimsky-Kovsakoff overture was well worthy of its place on the fine program, as well as of the indorsement of such a master as Tschaikowski. Dr. Muck's concerts are all most highly educational, and it will be a great pity if he be not allowed to continue his fine work in America from year to year.

THE MANHATTAN
Press Clipping Bureau
ARTHUR CASSOT, Proprietor
2 West 14th Street, N. Y.
NEW YORK PARIS LONDON

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y

PAYING FOR BOSTON MUSIC.

BARS IN THE WAY OF HEARING THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Eighteen Dollar and Ten Dollar Season Tickets Exist in Name Only—Rush Seats That Cost Time and Strength—Outlook for the Casual New Yorker Cheerless.

BOSTON, Dec. 8.—If a New Yorker, happening to be in Boston some Friday or Saturday during the winter, should decide that he would go and hear the Symphony Orchestra upon its native platform he would receive a surprise amounting to a shock.

If it happened to be Friday afternoon he would in all probability not be able to get a seat for love or money. For that matter the New Yorker, as such, doesn't get anything in Boston for love of himself, he being regarded there with much outward contempt and not a little secret jealousy.

But when even his money—his good money, as he is prone to call it—can't buy him a place in Symphony Hall, that ugly home of beautiful music, his surprise turns to shock. He asks indignant questions and learns the following facts:

Symphony Hall contains something more than 2,500 seats. When the announcement of the season's concerts is published it contains the following paragraph: "Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $18 and $10, according to location." Of course even the New Yorker understands that the concerts are on Saturday nights and the public rehearsals on Friday afternoons.

But what he does not understand is that the price of the tickets is by no means $18 and $10, according to location. The price is whatever a seat will bring more than $18 and $10, those figures representing the minimum price at which two divisions of seats will be sold.

The $18 seats for the rehearsals are sold at auction at Symphony Hall on October 1; the $10 seats for rehearsals are sold in the same way on October 2: the $18 and the $10 seats for the concerts are auctioned off on October 4 and 5. Seats are sold only in the regular order and no more than four seats are sold on one bid.

Probably it is as impartial a method as any of arranging the matter. A good many Boston quirks, which at first strike the stranger as queer, justify themselves on closer investigation.

There is perhaps no more reasonable way of adjusting a scale of prices than by letting the people do it themselves. If certain persons, for the good of the cause, —and the glory of themselves—are willing to pay premiums of from $75 to $300, as on one occasion, who shall say them nay? Even after all these contributors to gain and to glory have been accommodated there are plenty of seats to be had at prices which will average from $1 to $1.50 for each of the twenty-four performances.

There is only one sort of person who is left in a very bad way. This is the one who, like the stray New Yorker, wants to enjoy a single concert.

Suppose he goes to the box office and with cheerful assurance asks for a seat for the Friday afternoon rehearsal. He is told that there are no seats for sale. A box? There are no boxes in Symphony Hall. Well, meekly, can he have standing room? No one is allowed to stand.

It is all true. Every reserved seat in the building is sold for the entire season. Standees are not admitted.

At a ticket broker's downtown there is now and then a seat to be had, some one sending in a season ticket to be, as it were, sublet for the occasion. But so far as the Friday rehearsals are concerned this does not often happen.

Yet, though the man in the box office may neglect to mention it, there are seats to be had, even in fact only at the last moment. They are good seats, too, and dirt cheap.

But one does pay for them all right enough. If not with money, yet with time and strength. Exactly 505 seats, the entire capacity of the second balcony, are reserved for sale as so-called rush seats.

These seats cannot be bought in advance. Those who wish them must be in line when the doors are opened. Each person must have in his or her hand a silver quarter. Nothing else will be accepted. A half dollar for two, or a dollar for four, or two dimes and a nickel for one—none of these will be received. Each person pays for himself and pays with a quarter.

One man holds a bag, into which the quarters are dropped. Another man stands by with a counter, which he presses, click-click, for every person admitted.

It is very seldom indeed that all the 500 rush seats are not sold out. Sometimes when there is to be a famous soloist, there would be several hundred more persons in line than there are seats, if it were not that the management sends out somebody to count up and to warn the excess that there is no hope for them. This is a matter of no more than common humanity, since the rush seaters have to wait outside in the cold, not being allowed even in the lobby until they are to be admitted to the hall.

Many women wait in line thus for two or three hours in order to have the advantage of these 25-cent seats. They bring their camp stools and books, wear their warmest clothes and, more than likely, their most Christian scientific principles and stick it out, in fair weather and foul, the whole season through.

The rush seat is a feature peculiar to the Friday afternoon rehearsal. All of the seats for the Saturday night concerts are included in the auction sales at the opening of the season.

The deadhead is practically unknown at the Symphony concerts. There are only two free seats in the entire house. These are known as guests' seats, and are generally given to the soloist for the use of his or her friends.

There have been instances of distinguished dramatic or musical stars visiting Boston and, very naturally, expecting to receive reciprocal courtesies from the Symphony Orchestra people. When these personages were offered the two seats and were informed that they could have no more they have sometimes taken offence at what seemed to them a stingy spirit. Yet these two seats are the only ones, except the 25-cent rush seats, not sold in advance for the entire season.

In spite of which record, the orchestra does not begin to pay expenses.

...ORK STAATS ZEITUNG

DEC 9 - 1906

Theater und Musik.

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Auf dem Programm des gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall abgehaltenen Konzerts des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters standen zwei Nummern russischer Musik, die Ouverture zur „Verlobung des Zaren" von Rimsky-Korsakoff und die 5. Symphonie von Glazounoff. An russischer Musik leiden wir in New York wahrhaftig keinen Mangel, ja es droht uns seitens der russischen Symphonie-Gesellschaft eine wahre Sündfluth an russischen Harmonien, und auch Herr Safonoff ist — wie könnte es anders sein? — als ein Apostel der Musik des Zarenreiches anzusehen. Im Uebrigen haben wir gegen die musikalischen Moskowiter nichts einzuwenden, wenn sie uns mit so erfreulichen Gaben kommen, wie es gestern bei den Bostonern der Fall gewesen ist.

Die genannte Ouverture ist ein liebliches Ding. Die Erfindung ist zart und die Durchführung reizvoll. Die Themen nähern sich dem russischen Volkston, was bekanntlich kein Nachtheil ist, und der Schluß verschwimmt in zart verklärten Farben. Instrumentirt ist das Stück, das wir lieber ein Idyll als eine Ouverture nennen würden, mit exquisiter Technik. Dr. Muck hielt das Musikstück in den einfachsten Linien und die Wirkung war eine prächtige. Das herrliche Orchester erklang gestern wieder wie ein einziges Instrument — dieser Vergleich, der den Reiz der Neuheit wohl nicht für sich in Anspruch nehmen kann, ist noch der charakteristischste, um die unvergleichliche Fusion und Präcision dieses Klangkörpers auszudrücken.

Als zweite Nummer stand ein Violin-Concert des im Bostoner Orchester mitwirkenden Herrn Strube auf dem Programm, das dem Violinvirtuosen Timothée Adamowski gewidmet ist und von diesem unter Begleitung des Orchesters gestern zu Gehör gebracht wurde. Das fleißig und unter Aufwendung ehrlichen Wollens und respektablen technischen Könnens gearbeitete Werk hat uns und wohl auch der Mehrheit des Publikums keine Freude bereitet. Die Themata entbehren einer gewissen Prägnanz nicht, namentlich dem ersten Thema des dritten Satzes ist eine gewisse Eleganz eigen, aber es fehlt an klarer Form und an durchsichtiger Durchführung. Das kommt und verschwindet, ohne zur Geltung gelangt zu sein und verliert sich in unfruchtbaren Grübeleien und weitläufigen Spekulationen. Ueberall tritt die Sucht nach neuartigen Klangeffekten unerfreulich zu Tage. Wir gestehen offen, daß wir gestern wiederholt den Faden verloren haben, d. h. den Irrwegen der wirren Thematik nicht folgen konnten. Namentlich der dritte Satz kommt über ein unruhiges, gequältes Modduliren und [illegible] nicht hinaus; er hält uns [illegible] bis zum Schluß

Der Beifall klang nach dieser Nummer nicht einmüthig, doch konnten die Herren Adamowski und Strube wiederholt für die Beifallsbezeugungen danken.

Der Glanz des gestrigen Konzerts ging von der Glazounoff'schen Symphonie aus. Wir haben dieses Komponisten Fünfte in ihrer kraftvollen und heiteren, Gemüth und Phantasie anregenden Individualität stets für ein reizvolles Werk gehalten, und der Eindruck war auch gestern nach mehrjähriger Pause ein höchst erfreulicher. Der russische Nationaleinfluß ist in diesem Werk kaum bemerkbar; höchstens daß im ersten Satz ein kleinrussisches Motiv schüchtern auftaucht. Dagegen hört man häufig Wagner durch, nicht nur in der Farbenmischung, sondern auch in deutlichen Anklängen an bekannte, allgemein geläufige Leitmotive aus dem „Ring." Pikant sind die Takte des dritten Satzes, welche an die "Celeste Aida" aus Verdi's Oper anklingen. Der wie freudig erregte und bewegte erste Satz ist voll Frohsinns und in der Durchführung erfreuen reizende humoristische Schlaglichter und geistreiche Aperçus. Das Scherzo klingt wie huschende Irrlichter oder Elfenreigen. Das zweite, etwas grimmig thuende Thema ist originell, die dritte, an das Volksthümliche anklingende Melodie bringt leuchtende Klangkombinationen. Im Anfangs frohgemuthen dritten Satz, dem langsamen der Symphonie, tritt unvermittelt wie ein memento mori ein düsteres Thema auf (Posaunen und Trompeten). Im Finale verdichten sich diese Stimmen zu einer förmlichen Aktion, einer Attacke, aber der Schluß schlägt mit prachtvollem Schwung in einen triumphirenden Gesang um, der in eitel Glanz und Wonne endet. Der Held hat gesiegt.

Aber ungeachtet der wirksamen Komposition ist dieser Held gestern Dr. Muck und das Bostoner Orchester. Dr. Muck entwickelte ungeahnte Poesie und schien förmlich in der Farbenpracht des Orchesters zu schwelgen. Und dieser Dirigent wurde uns als eine Art Asket geschildert! Er gliederte das Werk so übersichtlich, daß man förmlich mitlesen konnte wie in einem vertrauten Buch. Alle Stimmen der großen Orchesterharfe meldeten sich gestern zu frischem Leben und entfalteten sich, wo es Noth that, deutlich und beseelt. Muck hat das richtige Verhältnis zwischen den einzelnen Gruppen hergestellt, das Blech schien uns bei den Bostonern noch nie so pompös als gestern. Man vergißt bei diesen Elitespielern thatsächlich, daß man mit dem kritischen Seccirmesser basirt. Man hat auch keinen Augenblick die Empfindung: „Jetzt tritt das Blech ein", „Dr. Muck winkt jetzt den Holzbläsern", etc., — es kommt alles so selbstverständlich, unauffällig.

Der Gesang der Geigen und Celli schien uns gestern im dritten Satz besonders beseelt. Wenn man aber mitunter sich zu erinnern glaubt, daß die Violinen bei den Wiener Philharmonikern auch so klingen, hat man doch die Gewißheit, daß es eine solche Vereinigung in der ganzen Welt nicht giebt.

Und nun möchten wir an Dr. Muck noch das Ersuchen richten, keine so kurzen Programme aufzustellen. Nichts ist ärgerlicher als ein Zuviel bei musikalischen Genüssen, aber bei den Bostonern will man auf seine Rechnung kommen. Das Konzert, das nach halb drei Uhr anfing, war um vier Uhr schon zu Ende. Ueberfütterung ist unangenehm, aber auch der karge Wirth, der den Appetit seiner Gäste unterschätzt, ist nicht zu loben. H.

NEW YORK EV'G POST

ss

DEC 11 1906

Plans have been completed for the trip to the Middle West which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make next month. The orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck as its conductor, will leave Boston on Sunday evening, January 27. The cities to be visited are Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati. One of the soloists will be Rudolph Ganz; another, Timothée Adamoski, who gave such an admirable performance of the Strube violin concerto at Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon.

THE MANHATTAN
Press Clipping Bureau
ARTHUR CASSOT, Proprietor
2 West 14th Street, N. Y.
NEW YORK PARIS LONDON

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date State N Y

DEC 1 1906

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon had for its soloist Timothee Adamowski, one of its members, in the violin concerto of Gustave Straube, another musician belonging to this famous band. The composer sat among the first violins and was reluctantly brought to the front to acknowledge the plaudits that followed the presentation of his work. Glazounoff's fifth symphony was the principal offering. Dr. Karl Muck and this superb orchestra, which he is permitting to display its true greatness, rather than the programme, evoked the applause.

First Established ... Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

GLOBE

Musical Notes.

CONCERTS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this town are usually associated with better music than Dr. Muck presented at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. First came Rimsky-Korsakoff's blameless but unimportant overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar." Then followed a new violin concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra, played by his colleague, Timothée Adamowski. It is undoubtedly commendable in the Boston orchestra to encourage the talent of those of its members who aspire to be composers, and in Boston there is a distinct demand for the annual appearance of Mr. Adamowski as a soloist. But would it not be wise to restrict these purely family festivals, so to say, to the comfortable hearthstone in Symphony Hall, and not exploit them in chilly New York and other towns out among the spokes of the universe?

Mr. Strube is esteemed in Boston as a composer of merit. If he attains equal recognition elsewhere it must be through some other work than this concerto, which sounded tame and dull enough. It was not, however, presented in a strong light by Mr. Adamowski, whose appearance as a solo violinist is not justified by his tone, which is thin; or his technique, which is insecure. So much of the concert seemed a waste of time for players and audience alike. Glazounoff's B flat symphony, which completed the programme, came as a relief. If its melodic material is no great credit to Glazounoff, some of it is to Wagner and Verdi. Thanks to them and the skillful orchestration, the symphony is agreeable to hear. But had anything else preceded it, one might question whether even the symphony would have seemed worth playing.

BOSTON JOURNAL
DECEMBER 15, 1906

The first of the Symphony's Pension Fund concerts will be given on Sunday evening, Dec. 30. The full orchestra will be used and Dr. Muck will conduct. Particular interest will surround this concert because the program will consist entirely of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama.

For his ninth program Dr. Muck has arranged one entirely of works by Beethoven. It is in the sense of commemoration of the birthday of the master, Beethoven having been born on Dec. 16, 1770. The assisting artist will be Dr. Otto Neitzel, who will play the concerto for piano in G major, No. 4, opus 58. The orchestral numbers will be the Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" ... in A major, No. 7.

THE SYMPHONY QUARTET.

More than ordinary interest surrounds the third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Chickering Hall next Monday evening, by reason of the appearance as assisting artist of Dr. Otto Neitzel of Cologne. Dr. Neitzel is known in Germany as the "Supreme Court in matters musical." It will be, however, as a pianist that he will first be heard here on Monday night with the Boston Symphony Quartet, and on next Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. An echo of the recent Saint-Saens concert here will be found in the sonata for piano and violoncello in F major, op. 123, which Dr. Neitzel and Mr. Warnke will play.

Cutting Bureau in the World.

EVG. TELEGRAM

DEC 10 1906

Boston Symphony Orc...

THREE numbers. That was all Conductor Muck, of the Boston Symphony, allowed his Saturday afternoon audience. Perhaps brevity is the soul of enjoyment as well as of wit; at any rate, no adjective would fit Saturday's concert so snugly as "enjoyable." It was a consistently made—almost an inspired—programme, the purpose of which seemed to show how music can allure, delight and disarm even the intellectual concert goer, and make him stand and deliver his soul to pure melody and melting harmony.

It took no great musical understanding to feel the charm of all the numbers. They were understandable and enjoyable at the first hearing. The younger Russian school furnished two, Rimsky Korsakoff, an overture to his melodramatic opera "The Betrothed of the Tsar," and Glozovnoff, his fifth symphony, in B flat major. For the soloist's piece there was Gustave Strube's concerto for violin, in F sharp minor. All were practically novelties, the Glozovnoff symphony being played for the first time, the others having been given but once or twice for American listeners. Each one was well worth while. Conductor Muck proves steadily that he has a discerning eye and a wide knowledge of what ought to be heard out of the thousands of modern compositions that are clamoring for performance.

In this "ought to be heard" class the Glazounoff symphony certainly comes. It is broad, finely and far from tritely melodic, splendid in form, judged according to the classic model, yet full of the romantic, sensorial appeal that is the modern demand. The opening theme, a simple harmonic melody, suggests, in the mood it inspires by its simplicity, the Beethoven Fifth Symphony. This strain is splendidly developed. The scherzo is dainty and fairylike, the andante impressive, with its organlike harmonies, and the finale, allegro maestosa, a wild, furious, bacchanalian orgy of Oriental harmonies, abrupt and startling rhythms and syncopations. There is a notable consistency and logic in the way the symphony is developed as a whole and brought to a climax.

The Rimsky-Karsakoff is thoroughly pleasing, especially because of the clever way the main cantabile theme and the dainty secondary are contrasted. The piece will find a place beside the same composer's favorite "Schirizode" tone picture.

Of Gustave Strube's concerto, it can be said that it thoroughly deserved the enthusiastic reception accorded it by a discriminating audience, which demanded that the composer appear twice. It is a work for the moderates, yet reaches far enough into the new harmonies and key relations to have a color and individuality of its own. It shows here and there the fondness for consecutive major thirds and the Greek modes that characterizes the symbolist composers. The close is especially effective—three brief cadence chords following a brilliant and exciting spicatto contrapuntal variation on the passacaglia theme that opens the last movement. This electrifies the listeners. Timothée Adamowski presented the concerto ably and sympathetically.

Dr. Muck was at his best and the orchestra played splendidly. Fear might be entertained for the right eye of Kapellmeister Willy Hess. Some day, in a moment of excitement the sharp point of that baton with which Dr. Muck gets his effects out of his men will go too far. There were dangerous moments Saturday.

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET BOSTON, MASS.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1906

Dr. Muck, Wagner and the Pension Fund

The Symphony Orchestra gives the first concert of the current season for the increase of its pension fund on Sunday evening, Dec. 30, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck is to conduct and the programme is to consist wholly of music by Wagner, viz.—the overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristam," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" and "Siegfried's Apotheosis" from "Götterdämmerung." Mr. Wood in London once made a programme of overtures and nothing else—thirteen in all. Dr. Muck has approximated the feat within the limits of Wagner by his seven overtures, almost in chronological order and all that Wagner wrote to his operas and music-dramas. The experiment is curious and interesting. Since we have had no opera here for two years and are likely to have none next spring, any Wagner concert has its especial interest. If Dr. Muck is a specialist at all, he is such in Wagner's music, and the recollection of his playing of the "Faust" overture at his first concert here is still stirring. At this concert for the pension fund, moreover, the larger public outside the subscribers to the Symphony concerts will have its first opportunity to hear Dr. Muck since he made his reputation here, and it has given many signs of curiosity about him. As for the pension fund, the fostering of it is not half the obligation the subscribers to the concerts owe to the ninety-six men that give them weekly pleasure.

When the 505 shows that 505 persons have passed in, the bar falls and not another soul—or at least not another body can pass. The 505 already in rush pell mell up the stairs, tripping on their skirts, panting and puffing and finally scrambling madly into their seats, which as a matter of fact are quite as good as those in the balcony below them.

It is very seldom indeed that all the 505 rush seats are not sold out. Sometimes when there is to be a famous soloist, there would be several hundred more persons in line than there are seats, if it were not that the management sends out somebody to count up and to warn the excess that there is no hope for them. This is a matter of no more than common humanity, since the rush seaters have to wait outside in the cold, not being allowed even in the lobby until they are to be admitted to the hall.

Many women wait in line thus for two or three hours in order to have the advantage of these 25-cent seats. They bring their camp stools and books, wear their warmest clothes and, more than likely, their most Christian scientific principles and stick it out, in fair weather and foul, the whole season through.

The rush seat is a feature peculiar to the Friday afternoon rehearsal. All of the seats for the Saturday night concerts are included in the auction sales at the opening of the season.

The deadhead is practically unknown at the Symphony concerts. There are only two free seats in the entire house. These are known as guests' seats, and are generally given to the soloist for the use of his or her friends.

There have been instances of distinguished dramatic or musical stars visiting Boston and, very naturally, expecting to receive reciprocal courtesies from the Symphony Orchestra people. When these personages were offered the two seats and were informed that they could have no more they have sometimes taken offence at what seemed to them a stingy spirit. Yet these two seats are the only ones, except the 25-cent rush seats, not sold in advance for the entire season.

In spite of which record, the orchestra does not begin to pay expenses.

DEC 9 - 1906

Theater und Musik.

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Auf dem Programm des gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall abgehaltenen Konzerts des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters standen zwei Nummern russischer Musik, die Ouverture zur „Verlobung des Zaren" von Rimsky-Korsakoff und die 5. Symphonie von Glazounoff. An russischer Musik leiden wir in New York wahrhaftig keinen Mangel, ja es droht uns seitens der russischen Symphonie-Gesellschaft eine wahre Sündfluth an russischen Harmonien, und auch Herr Safonoff ist — wie könnte es anders sein? — als ein Apostel der Musik des Zarenreiches anzusehen. Im Uebrigen haben wir gegen die musikalischen Moskowiter nichts einzuwenden, wenn sie uns mit so erfreulichen Gaben kommen, wie es gestern bei den Bostonern der Fall gewesen ist.

Die genannte Ouverture ist ein liebliches Ding. Die Erfindung ist zart und die Durchführung reizvoll. Die Themen nähern sich dem russischen Volkston, was bekanntlich kein Nachtheil ist, und der Schluß verschwimmt in zart verklärten Farben. Instrumentirt ist das Stück, das wir lieber ein Idyll als eine Ouverture nennen würden, mit exquisiter Technik. Dr. Muck hielt das Musikstück in den einfachsten Linien und die Wirkung war eine prächtige. Das herrliche Orchester erklang gestern wieder wie ein einziges Instrument — dieser Vergleich, der den Reiz der Neuheit wohl nicht für sich in Anspruch nehmen kann, ist noch der charakteristischste, um die unvergleichliche Fusion und Präcision dieses Klangkörpers auszudrücken.

Als zweite Nummer stand ein Violin-Concert des im Bostoner Orchester mitwirkenden Herrn Strube auf dem Programm, das dem Violinvirtuosen Timothée Adamowski gewidmet ist und von diesem unter Begleitung des Orchesters gestern zu Gehör gebracht wurde. Das fleißig und unter Aufwendung ehrlichen Wollens und respektablen technischen Könnens gearbeitete Werk hat uns und wohl auch der Mehrheit des Publikums keine Freude bereitet. Die Themata entbehren einer gewissen Prägnanz nicht, namentlich dem ersten Thema des dritten Satzes ist eine gewisse Eleganz eigen, aber es fehlt an klarer Form und an durchsichtiger Durchführung. Das kommt und verschwindet, ohne zur Geltung gelangt zu sein und verliert sich in unfruchtbaren Grübeleien und weitläufigen Spekulationen. Ueberall tritt die Sucht nach neuartigen Klangeffekten unerfreulich zu Tage. Wir gestehen offen, daß wir gestern wiederholt den Faden verloren haben, d. h. den Irrwegen der wirren Thematik nicht folgen konnten. Namentlich der dritte Satz kommt über ein unruhiges, gequältes Moduliren und Irrlichterisiren nicht hinaus; er hält uns in ewiger Erregung, um uns zum Schluß unbefriedigt zu entlassen.

Herr Adamowski [illegible] sehr beachtenswerthen, [illegible] auch nicht unfehlbaren Technik [illegible] machen; sein Handgelenk namentlich zeigt staunenswerthe Durchbildung. Manches klang gestern unrein und verwischt, Vieles gelang aber prächtig. Sein Ton ist nicht groß, aber einschmeichelnd. Trotzdem der Künstler eine Legato-Phrase gut zu spinnen versteht, haftet seinem Spiel doch etwas Unbeseeltes, Akademisches an. Es fehlt die innere Wärme und daher fühlt man sich keinen Moment mitgerissen. Herr Adamowski erschien uns gestern in erster Linie als Techniker, da stellt er allerdings seinen Mann.

Der Beifall klang nach dieser Nummer nicht einmüthig, doch konnten die Herren Adamowski und Strube wiederholt für die Beifallsbezeugungen danken.

Der Glanz des gestrigen Konzerts ging von der Glazounoff'schen Symphonie aus. Wir haben dieses Komponisten Fünfte in ihrer kraftvollen und heiteren, Gemüth und Phantasie anregenden Individualität stets für ein reizvolles Werk gehalten, und der Eindruck war auch gestern nach mehrjähriger Pause ein höchst erfreulicher. Der russische Nationaleinfluß ist in diesem Werk kaum bemerkbar; höchstens daß im ersten Takt ein kleinrussisches Motiv schüchtern auftaucht. Dagegen hört man häufig Wagner durch, nicht nur in der Farbenmischung, sondern auch in deutlichen Anklängen an bekannte, allgemein geläufige Leitmotive aus dem „Ring." Pikant sind die Takte des dritten Satzes, welche an die "Celeste Aida" aus Verdi's Oper anklingen. Der wie freudig erregte und bewegte erste Satz ist voll Frohsinns und in der Durchführung erfreuen reizende humoristische Schlaglichter und geistreiche Aperçus. Das Scherzo klingt wie huschende Irrlichter oder Elfenreigen. Das zweite, etwas grimmig thuende Thema ist originell, die dritte, an das Volksthümliche anklingende Melodie bringt leuchtende Klangkombinationen. Im Anfangs frohgemuthen dritten Satz, dem langsamen der Symphonie, tritt unvermittelt wie ein memento mori ein düsteres Thema auf (Posaunen und Trompeten). Im Finale verdichten sich diese Stimmen zu einer förmlichen Aktion, einer Attacke, aber der Schluß schlägt mit prachtvollem Schwung in einen triumphirenden Gesang um, der in eitel Glanz und Wonne endet. Der Held hat gesiegt.

Aber ungeachtet der wirksamen Komposition war dieser Held gestern Dr. Muck und das Bostoner Orchester. Dr. Muck entwickelte ungeahnte Poesie und schien förmlich in der Farbenpracht des Orchesters zu schwelgen. Und dieser Dirigent wurde uns als eine Art Asket geschildert! Er gliederte das Werk so übersichtlich, daß man förmlich mitlesen konnte wie in einem vertrauten Buch. Alle Stimmen der großen Orchesterharfe meldeten sich gestern zu frischem Leben und entfalteten sich, wo es Noth that, deutlich und beseelt. Muck hat das richtige Verhältnis zwischen den einzelnen Gruppen hergestellt, das Blech schien uns bei den Bostonern noch nie so pompös als gestern. Man vergißt bei diesen Elitespielern thatsächlich, daß man mit dem kritischen Seccirmesser dasitzt. Man hat auch keinen Augenblick die Empfindung: „Jetzt tritt das Blech ein", „Dr. Muck winkt jetzt den Holzbläsern", etc., — es kommt alles so selbstverständlich, unauffällig.

Der Gesang der Geigen und Celli schien uns gestern im dritten Satz besonders beseelt. Wenn man aber mitunter sich zu erinnern glaubt, daß die Violinen bei den Wiener Philharmonikern auch so klingen, hat man doch die Gewißheit, daß es eine solche Vereinigung in der ganzen Welt nicht giebt.

Und nun möchten wir an Dr. Muck noch das Ersuchen richten, keine so kurzen Programme aufzustellen. Nichts ist ärgerlicher als ein Zuviel bei musikalischen Genüssen, aber bei den Bostonern will man auf seine Rechnung kommen. Das Konzert, das nach halb drei Uhr anfing, war um vier Uhr schon zu Ende. Ueberfütterung ist unangenehm, aber auch der karge Wirth, der den Appetit seiner Gäste unterschätzt, ist nicht zu loben. H.

Metropolitan Opera House

DEC 11 1906

Plans have been completed for the trip to the Middle West which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make next month. The orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck as its conductor, will leave Boston on Sunday evening, January 27. The cities to be visited are Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati. One of the soloists will be Rudolph Ganz; another, Timothée Adamoski, who gave such an admirable performance of the Strube violin concerto at Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon.

THE MANHATTAN
Press Clipping Bureau
ARTHUR CASSOT, Proprietor
2 West 14th Street, N. Y.
NEW YORK PARIS LONDON

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date State N Y

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon had for its soloist Timothee Adamowski, one of its members, in the violin concerto of Gustave Straube, another musician belonging to this famous band. The composer sat among the first violins and was reluctantly brought to the front to acknowledge the plaudits that followed the presentation of his work. Glazounoff's fifth symphony was the principal offering. Dr. Karl Muck and this superb orchestra, which he is permitting to display its true greatness, rather than the programme, evoked the applause.

[illegible] First Established [illegible]
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

Musical Notes.

CONCERTS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this town are usually associated with better music than Dr. Muck presented at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. First came Rimsky-Korsakoff's blameless but unimportant overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar." Then followed a new violin concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra, played by his colleague, Timothée Adamowski. It is undoubtedly commendable in the Boston orchestra to encourage the talent of those of its members who aspire to be composers, and in Boston there is a distinct demand for the annual appearance of Mr. Adamowski as a soloist. But would it not be wise to restrict these purely family festivals, so to say, to the comfortable hearthstone in Symphony Hall, and not exploit them in chilly New York and other towns out among the spokes of the universe?

Mr. Strube is esteemed in Boston as a composer of merit. If he attains equal recognition elsewhere it must be through some other work than this concerto, which sounded tame and dull enough. It was not, however, presented in a strong light by Mr. Adamowski, whose appearance as a solo violinist is not justified by his tone, which is thin; or his technique, which is insecure. So much of the concert seemed a waste of time for players and audience alike. Clazounoff's B flat symphony, which completed the programme, came as a relief. If its melodic material is no great credit to Glazounoff, some of it is to Wagner and Verdi. Thanks to them and the skillful orchestration, the symphony is agreeable to hear. But had anything else preceded it, one might question whether even the symphony would have seemed worth playing.

BOSTON JOURNAL-
DECEMBER 15, 1906

The first of the Symphony's Pension Fund concerts will be given on Sunday evening, Dec. 30. The full orchestra will be used and Dr. Muck will conduct. Particular interest will surround this concert because the program will consist entirely of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama.

For his ninth program Dr. Muck has arranged one entirely of works by Beethoven. It is in the sense of commemoration of the birthday of the master, Beethoven having been born on Dec. 16, 1770. The assisting artist will be Dr. Otto Neitzel, who will play the concerto for piano in G major, No. 4, opus 58. The orchestral numbers will be the Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" [illegible] in A major, No. 7.

THE SYMPHONY QUARTET.

More than ordinary interest surrounds the third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Chickering Hall next Monday evening, by reason of the appearance as assisting artist of Dr. Otto Neitzel of Cologne. Dr. Neitzel is known in Germany as the "Supreme Court in matters musical." It will be, however, as a pianist that he will first be heard here on Monday night with the Boston Symphony Quartet, and on next Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. An echo of the recent Saint-Saens concert here will be found in the sonata for piano and violoncello in F major, op. 123, which Dr. Neitzel and Mr. Warnke will play.

Cutting Bureau in the World

[illegible]

[illegible]

DEC 15 1906

Boston Symphony Orc

THREE numbers. That was all Conductor Muck, of the Boston Symphony, allowed his Saturday afternoon audience. Perhaps brevity is the soul of enjoyment as well as of wit; at any rate, no adjective would fit Saturday's concert so snugly as "enjoyable." It was a consistently made—almost an inspired—programme, the purpose of which seemed to show how music can allure, delight and disarm even the intellectual concert goer, and make him stand and deliver his soul to pure melody and melting harmony.

It took no great musical understanding to feel the charm of all the numbers. They were understandable and enjoyable at the first hearing. The younger Russian school furnished two, Rimsky Korsakoff, an overture to his melodramatic opera "The Betrothed of the Tsar," and Glozovnoff, his fifth symphony, in B flat major. For the soloist's piece there was Gustave Strube's concerto for violin, in F sharp minor. All were practically novelties, the Glozovnoff symphony being played for the first time, the others having been given but once or twice for American listeners. Each one was well worth while. Conductor Muck proves steadily that he has a discerning eye and a wide knowledge of what ought to be heard out of the thousands of modern compositions that are clamoring for performance.

In this "ought to be heard" class the Glazounoff symphony certainly comes. It is broad, finely and far from tritely melodic, splendid in form, judged according to the classic model, yet full of the romantic, sensorial appeal that is the modern demand. The opening theme, a simple harmonic melody, suggests, in the mood it inspires by its simplicity, the Beethoven Fifth Symphony. This strain is splendidly developed. The scherzo is dainty and fairylike, the andante impressive, with its organlike harmonies, and the finale, allegro maestosa, a wild, furious, bacchanalian orgy of Oriental harmonies, abrupt and startling rhythms and syncopations. There is a notable consistency and logic in the way the symphony is developed as a whole and brought to a climax.

The Rimsky-Karsokoff is thoroughly pleasing, especially because of the clever way the main cantabile theme and the dainty secondary air contrasted. The piece will find a place beside the same composer's favorite "Schirizode" tone picture.

Of Gustave Strube's concerto, it can be said that it thoroughly deserved the enthusiastic reception accorded it by a discriminating audience, which demanded that the composer appear twice. It is a work for the moderates, yet reaches far enough into the new harmonies and key relations to have a color and individuality of its own. It shows here and there the fondness for consecutive major thirds and the Greek modes that characterizes the symbolist composers. The close is especially effective—three brief cadence chords following a brilliant and exciting spicatto contrapuntal variation on the passacaglia theme that opens the last movement. This electrifies the listeners. Timothée Adamowski presented the concerto ably and sympathetically.

Dr. Muck was at his best and the orchestra played splendidly. Four might be entertained for the right eye of Kapellmeister Willy Hess. Some day, in a moment of ex itement the sharp point of that baton with which Dr. Muck gets his effects out of his men will go too far. There were dangerous moments Saturday.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET BOSTON MASS.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1906

Dr. Muck, Wagner and the Pension Fund

The Symphony Orchestra gives the first concert of the current season for the increase of its pension fund on Sunday evening, Dec. 30, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck is to conduct and the programme is to consist wholly of music by Wagner, viz.—the overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" and "Siegfried's Apotheosis" from "Götterdämmerung." Mr. Wood in London once made a programme of overtures and nothing else—thirteen in all. Dr. Muck has approximated the feat within the limits of Wagner by his seven overtures, almost in chronological order and all that Wagner wrote to his operas and music-dramas. The experiment is curious and interesting. Since we have had no opera here for two years and are likely to have none next spring, any Wagner concert has its especial interest. If Dr. Muck is a specialist at all, he is such in Wagner's music, and the recollection of his playing of the "Faust" overture at his first concert here is still stirring. At this concert for the pension fund, moreover, the larger public outside the subscribers to the Symphony concerts will have its first opportunity to hear Dr. Muck since he made his reputation here, and it has given many signs of curiosity about him. As for the pension fund, the fostering of it is not half the obligation the subscribers to the concerts owe to the ninety-six men that give them weekly pleasure.

[94]

THE MANHATTAN
Press Clipping Bureau
ARTHUR CASSOT, Proprietor
2 West 14th Street, N. Y.
NEW YORK PARIS LONDON

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y

A SERMON ON CONDUCTORS.

WHAT IS THE SECRET OF THEIR ART?

Results Achieved by Dr. Muck and Mr. Campanini Without Display—Wagner's Theory of the Art of Conducting the Accepted Doctrine of Genuine Artists.

Felix Weingartner, the eminent conductor of orchestras in various countries, put forth some years ago a pamphlet on his own art. This brochure has been subjected to some revision and curtailment, and is now set before readers of musical literature in English by the old and historic firm of Breitkopf & Härtel. Weingartner has on several occasions proved himself to be a serious thinker about music and musicians, and his little book on the "Symphony Since Beethoven" has commanded wide attention.

The present volume arrives at a happy moment. America has just made the acquaintance of two eminently sane and masterful conductors, and their presence is singularly timely. For two or three seasons musical thought in this community has been in a ferment anent the doings of visiting conductors. The true mission of our oldest and most dignified orchestral organization has been relegated to obscurity, while the institution has figured as a parade field for bâton manœuvres.

The evil of the practice has remained after the practice itself has resulted in the engagement of a permanent conductor. The inflation of salaries caused by all the undue pother about manners of shaking a stick has compelled the society to pay its new conductor an extraordinary amount. On the heels of the contract with this director comes a sudden and almost shocking departure of the organization from its long established traditions. It now makes little journeys into the world and gives concerts in theatres or permits itself to be hired to assist at a prima donna's concert.

The casual observer will hardly be blamed if he fancies that the organization is seeking for means to meet its increased expenses. Now the prima donna conductor is an obstacle in the way of appreciation of good music and of good musical performance. For that reason he is an evil. Hence it is a good thing that the Philharmonic Society has engaged Wassili Safonoff for three years. In that time he will cease to be a novelty. Men and women will no longer sit spellbound under the marvellous feat of conducting without a baton. They will demand of Mr. Safonoff artistic insight and masterful analysis. They will require of him interpretation, not gesticulation. In this way justice will be done to Mr. Safonoff, whose conducting of an orchestra does not consist simply of the manner of waving his hands. He is more of a man than the sensationalists would have us believe. Probably no one will rejoice more than he if the public comes to measure him at his real worth.

Before the settlement on this fortunate continent of this distinguished disseminator of Russian music we had French, German and British conductors, all expected to astonish us by making the Philharmonic Society play in new ways. Well, we were astonished all the way up and down the scale, yet it would now give most Philharmonic subscribers as much trouble to name the visiting conductors whom they have seen as it would to name the Presidents of the United States. They have come like shadows and so departed.

Meanwhile two other conductors have come to America without flourish of trumpets, without advertised invitation to consider their beat and be wise, without passionate press agents' proclamations of queer histories or cold old crimes or deeds that persist in rising up to be unforgotten. Yet these two conductors ought to be kept in this country. If they have other engagements they ought to be kept here by force. One of them is Carl Muck of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the other is Cleofante Campanini of the Manhattan Opera House.

Dr. Muck was well known to those who make it their business to keep track of musical affairs in Europe. His method of conducting, however, was unknown to all save a few, and they had their doubts as to the public attitude toward it. Dr. Muck's outward and visible signs are of the most simple and unpicturesque sort. His gestures are few and elementary. There is

A man of slender, elegant, aristocratic figure, of clean cut, scholarly face and of cultured manner stands before the orchestra, and while directing it with the certainty of an authority and the command of a master so effaces his personality that he becomes a perfectly transparent medium between the audience and the music. This is the highest achievement possible to the manner of conducting. If no other qualities were to be found in Dr. Muck's art, this alone would be enough to insure it a welcome from those who are weary of finding a gorgeously decorated curtain of Monsieur This or Herr That hung between them and Beethoven or Brahms.

The doubts as to the attitude of the musical public in regard to this sort of conducting have been scattered to the four winds. There is more than one public in this little town. There is a public for ground and lofty tumbling and there is a public for sane art. There is a public which shrieks its throat to tatters every time Caruso or Bond sings a high note and there is a public which values the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet above all tenors.

This latter is the musical public, and its taste can be trusted to arrive at just verdicts. It has pronounced most emphatically in favor of Dr. Muck, the man with the continent style and the splendid results. No one of the music lovers who have spent most of their lives in observing musical doings was deceived by the applause which followed Dr. Muck's reading of Bruckner's E major symphony. That applause was not an expression of gratitude to old Bruckner for projecting into the world his troublous music, but to Dr. Muck for his clear, lucid and euphonious reading of the composition.

The audience was quick to recognize the nature of the achievement and it conveyed its satisfaction in no doubtful terms. Dr. Muck's triumph on this occasion was more notable than at his début, though at the first concert the applause was more enthusiastic. But at that time the hearers were moved by the beautiful music of Brahms. It was music which they all knew and loved, and they rejoiced at an interpretation such as they had not heard in many a long day.

Dr. Muck is said to be a great favorite of the German Emperor, and it is reported that the monarch of all he surveys will not permit the conductor to remain in this country more than one season. Few of us have credited the Kaiser with so much musical appreciation, though all of us are acquainted with his sharp estimates of the worth of men. It is a pity that orchestral conductors cannot be forcibly detained, but Muck will probably have to go back in June. If we did find a way to hold him the War Lord might make it a pretext for international conflict. Wars have been waged for much less worthy objects.

Cleofante Campanini has the misfortune to conduct in an opera house. Operatic audiences bestow but little attention on the art of the conductor except in the field of the Wagner drama. They are prone to complain of him if he permits the orchestra to play so loudly as at times to drown some of the sweet tones of their favorite singers. That, however, is about as far as they usually go. When tempi are taken so fast that singers cannot keep up with the orchestra, or when they are taken so slowly that not even the bellows of an organ would supply wind enough for the vocal phrases, the audience rarely knows what is the matter.

When it comes to the finer details of operatic conducting, to the phrasing, the minor dynamics and the niceties of tonal balance, they are quite lost on the miscellaneous assemblies which gather to worship singers. But the singers themselves know when they have a good conductor behind them. They of all people know how easily their most admirable art may be made to go for naught by incorrect treatment of the orchestral accompaniment. How Mr. Hammerstein's singers must bless Mr. Campanini! How Mr. Ancona must have loved him after "Finch' han dal vino" on Wednesday night!

But there is no need to let temptation draw the commentator into detailed account of the conductor's achievement in "Don Giovanni." It has already had its meed of praise. It was masterly and it gave delight to lovers of that wonderful score which, after all, only musical enthusiasts appreciate.

Mr. Campanini has a keen sense of the contour of every orchestral phrase. He lets nothing run to dead flatness. His orchestra plays in curves. Its utterance is filled with pulsating life. Yet in such a work as "Don Giovanni," where it acts almost wholly as an accompanist, it never dominates the scene. It provides the tonal atmosphere. It is an ocean of beautiful color on which the voices float like ships. It is never turbulent. It never drowns the singers except in occasional fortes.

All this is what we have a right to expect. But how often do we get it? This younger brother of our once adored tenor should be made to settle down here and become an American citizen. We need him. If we had nothing else for which to thank Mr. Hammerstein, we should have to convey to him our gratitude for bringing over this admirable conductor.

Republics are notoriously ungrateful. Publics are eminently superficial. Yet in some strange way and by secret processes publics arrive intuitively at correct verdicts. Wagner was holding men and women enthralled while critics were still snarling about his innovations. Commentators of various degrees of insanity or inanity are still grovelling in the mud of the Shakespeare-Bacon controversy, while the world is worshipping an accepted individuality and enjoying masterpieces.

Musical publics in European cities are far more sophisticated than those of the United States. Furthermore, there is nothing more easy than to fool people about the art of conducting. Let the conductor only make a sufficient display and there will be thousands ready to declare that he is achieving wonders which they do not hear. They behold the labor and they argue the result into existence.

Nevertheless in the long run such men as Nikisch, Von Bülow, Weingartner, Seidl, Campanini and Muck come to their own in the United States just as surely as they do in Europe. It may take longer, but the end is inevitable. The outcome, however, would be swifter and the verdict more influential if the public would give more attention to the art of conducting. We ought to bring ourselves to understand thoroughly just what it is that a conductor does and not permit ourselves to be deluded into believing that by some mysterious exercise of personal magnetism he improvises on an instrument composed of thinking human beings the general plan of the reading and all the correlated details which we hear at a performance.

The real work of the conductor is not done at the performance, but at the rehearsals. It is true that in the performance the director of an orchestra can by his own communicative enthusiasm inspire his men with ardor, but he cannot on the spur of the moment inform them that he desires a certain phrasing or accent. Nor would it be to the purpose if he could, for every nuance in the playing of an orchestral composition must be fitted accurately into a general plan prepared beforehand in the mind of the conductor. Otherwise the effects are not designed but merely fortuitous, hence not art but accident.

The first duty of a conductor is to analyze the composition to be interpreted. By means of this analysis he arrives at a comprehension of the design of the composer and an understanding of the structure and content of the work. Having formed his conception of the music before him and of the effect which its composer designed it to have, he next maps out the plan of a presentation which shall according to his idea convey this effect to his hearers.

His first search is for the correct tempi. Wagner, whose little book on the art of conducting, published in 1869, disturbed all Europe and in connection with the great composer's own practice in directing performances revolutionized the time beater's art, declared that the conductor's whole duty lay in the choice of the right tempo, for if he found that all the rest would unfold itself to him naturally.

The various points of expression necessary to the correct utterance of a melody would stand forth in authoritative state before the mind of the musician who had found the melody's real character. This character must ever be disguised if the pace of the performance be wrong.

It is for this reason that critics harp so much on the topic of tempo. It is useless for them to proceed with a detailed discussion of a conductor's reading of any score or part of a score if his tempo be radically wrong. In that case nothing else can be right.

But when the tempo has been found the conductor must hunt the melody through every bar of the score, up and down the page, from flutes to double basses and back again, and then he must so plan his reading that the orchestra shall always keep that melody in the ears of the audience.

Orchestral melody is not necessarily the same as vocal. An orchestra is a singer of a hundred voices. The melody is sometimes one voiced, sometimes polyphonic. But while it ranges through the various combinations of harmony, counterpoint and instrumental coloring, the conductor must never let go of it. Wagner relates how his eyes were opened by hearing a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony under Habeneck. He declared that Habeneck was not a genius, nor yet a man of much temperament. But by persistent study of this symphony he had found Beethoven's melody, the great central song of the composition, and he had made his orchestra play that.

Neither Habeneck nor any other conductor who has come after him can bring about such a result except by careful, patient and detailed rehearsal. Every phrase in the work must be studied with the players so that they shall get precisely the right balance of tone and the nice gradation of increasing or diminishing force to bring out the "melos," as Wagner called it, and keep the performance vital from beginning to end.

What [illegible] conductor can possibly do is to recall to the players something of what he has rehearsed with them. By a look here, a nod there, a warning hand raised at this point or a pantomimic invitation at that, he can remind his men that now he desires that rehearsed sforzando in the violas, now that pressure on the 'cello part, now a shade less force in the first violins and now a free and full utterance from the trombones.

But if he has not rehearsed these effects before the concert he will not get them, and his reading will not be a reading at all, but merely a dead, flat enunciation of the notes as set down on the printed page.

In short, a conductor is a performer who plays on an instrument called an orchestra. In order that he may play well he must study his music and practise it. When he can perform it not only beautifully, but in such a way that the audience is compelled to think only of the music and not at all of the conductor, he reaches an ideal of the highest type.

This is the true art of conducting. That performance which invites an audience to regard a composition merely as a medium for the display of a conductor's idiosyncrasies is pure charlatanry.

W. J. HENDERSON.

DAILY ADVERTISER.

DECEMBER 15, 1906

MUSICAL NOTES.

For his ninth programme Dr. Muck has arranged one entirely of works by Beethoven. It is in the sense of commemoration of the birthday of the Master, Beethoven having been born on Dec. 16, 1770. The assisting artist will be Dr. Otto Neitzel, who will play the concerto for piano in G major, No. 4, opus 58. The orchestral numbers will be the Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the Symphony in A major, No. 7.

More than ordinary interest surrounds the third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Chickering Hall next Monday evening, by reason of the appearance as assisting artist of Dr. Otto Neitzel of Cologne.

The first of the Symphony's pension fund concerts will be given on Sunday evening, Dec. 30. The full orchestra will be used and Dr. Muck will conduct. Particular interest will surround this concert because the programme will consist entirely of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama.

BOSTON AMERICAN,

DECEMBER 16, 1906.

The first of the Symphony pension fund concerts will be given on Sunday evening, December 30. The full orchestra will be used and Dr. Muck will conduct. Particular interest will surround this concert, because the programme will consist entirely of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama. As is generally known, Dr. Muck's standing as an interpreter of Wagner's music is very high and his readings are regarded as authoritative in the full sense of the word. The sale of tickets will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, on next Friday morning, December 21. In the meantime mail orders addressed to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, will be received and filled prior to the public sale.

For his ninth programme, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dr. Muck has arranged one entirely of the works of Beethoven. It is in the sense of commemoration of the birthday of the master, Beethoven having been born on December 16, 1770. The assisting artist will be Dr. Otto Neitzel, who will play the concerto for piano in G major, No. 4, opus 58. The orchestral numbers will be the overture to Gotthe's "Egmont" and the Symphony in A major, No. 7.

SUNDAY POST,

DECEMBER 16, 1906

The first of the Symphony's pension fund concerts will be given on Sunday evening, Dec. 30. The full orchestra will be used, and Dr. Muck will conduct. Particular interest will surround this concert, because the programme will consist entirely of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama. As is generally known, Dr. Muck's standing as an interpreter of Wagner's music is very high and his readings are regarded as authoritative in the full sense of the word. The sale of tickets will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, on next Friday morning, Dec. 21. In the mean time mail orders addressed to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, will be received.

* * * *

More than ordinary interest surrounds the third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Chickering Hall tomorrow evening by reason of the appearance as assisting artist of Dr. Otto Neitzel of Cologne. It will be as a pianist that he will be first heard here, on Monday night with the Boston Symphony Quartet, and on next Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * * *

THE MANHATTAN
Press Clipping Bureau
ARTHUR CASSOT, Proprietor
2 West 14th Street, N. Y.
NEW YORK PARIS LONDON

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y

A SERMON ON CONDUCTORS.

WHAT IS THE SECRET OF THEIR ART?

Results Achieved by Dr. Muck and Mr. Campanini Without Display—Wagner's Theory of the Art of Conducting the Accepted Doctrine of Genuine Artists.

Felix Weingartner, the eminent conductor of orchestras in various countries, put forth some years ago a pamphlet on his own art. This brochure has been subjected to some revision and curtailment, and is now set before readers of musical literature in English by the old and historic firm of Breitkopf & Härtel. Weingartner has on several occasions proved himself to be a serious thinker about music and musicians, and his little book on the "Symphony Since Beethoven" has commanded wide attention.

The present volume arrives at a happy moment. America has just made the acquaintance of two eminently sane and masterful conductors, and their presence is singularly timely. For two or three seasons musical thought in this community has been in a ferment anent the doings of visiting conductors. The true mission of our oldest and most dignified orchestral organization has been relegated to obscurity, while the institution has figured as a parade field for bâton manœuvres.

The evil of the practice has remained after the practice itself has resulted in the engagement of a permanent conductor. The inflation of salaries caused by all the undue pother about manners of shaking a stick has compelled the society to pay its new conductor an extraordinary amount. On the heels of the contract with this director comes a sudden and almost shocking departure of the organization from its long established traditions. It now makes little journeys into the world and gives concerts in theatres or permits itself to be hired to assist at a prima donna's concert.

The casual observer will hardly be blamed if he fancies that the organization is seeking for means to meet its increased expenses. Now the prima donna conductor is an obstacle in the way of appreciation of good music and of good musical performance. For that reason he is an evil. Hence it is a good thing that the Philharmonic Society has engaged Wassili Safonoff for three years. In that time he will cease to be a novelty. Men and women will no longer sit spellbound under the marvellous feat of conducting without a baton. They will demand of Mr. Safonoff artistic insight and masterful analysis. They will require of him interpretation, not gesticulation. In this way justice will be done to Mr. Safonoff, whose conducting of an orchestra does not consist simply of the manner of waving his hands. He is more of a man than the sensationalists would have us believe. Probably no one will rejoice more than he if the public comes to measure him at his real worth.

Before the settlement on this fortunate continent of this distinguished disseminator of Russian music we had French, German and British conductors, all expected to astonish us by making the Philharmonic Society play in new ways. Well, we were astonished all the way up and down the scale, yet it would now give most Philharmonic subscribers as much trouble to name the visiting conductors whom they have seen as it would to name the Presidents of the United States. They have come like shadows and so departed.

Meanwhile two other conductors have come to America without flourish of trumpets, without advertised invitation to consider their beat and be wise, without passionate press agents' proclamations of queer histories or cold old crimes or deeds that persist in rising up to be unforgotten. Yet these two conductors ought to be kept in this country. If they have other engagements they ought to be kept here by force. One of them is Carl Muck of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the other is Cleofante Campanini of the Manhattan Opera House.

Dr. Muck was well known to those who make it their business to keep track of musical affairs in Europe. His method of conducting, however, was unknown to all save a few, and they had their doubts as to the public attitude toward it. Dr. Muck's outward and visible signs are of the most simple and unpicturesque sort. His gestures are few and elementary. There is nothing to say.

A man of slender, elegant, aristocratic figure, of clean cut, scholarly face and of cultured manner stands before the orchestra, and while directing it with the certainty of an authority and the command of a master so effaces his personality that he becomes a perfectly transparent medium between the audience and the music. This is the highest achievement possible to the manner of conducting. If no other qualities were to be found in Dr. Muck's art, this alone would be enough to insure it a welcome from those who are weary of finding a gorgeously decorated curtain of Monsieur This or Herr That hung between them and Beethoven or Brahms.

The doubts as to the attitude of the musical public in regard to this sort of conducting have been scattered to the four winds. There is more than one public in this little town. There is a public for ground and lofty tumbling and there is a public for sane art. There is a public which shrieks its throat to tatters every time Caruso or Bondi sings a high note and there is a public which values the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet above all tenors.

This latter is the musical public, and its taste can be trusted to arrive at just verdicts. It has pronounced most emphatically in favor of Dr. Muck, the man with the continent style and the splendid results. No one of the music lovers who have spent most of their lives in observing musical doings was deceived by the applause which followed Dr. Muck's reading of Bruckner's E major symphony. That applause was not an expression of gratitude to old Bruckner for projecting into the world his troublous music, but to Dr. Muck for his clear, lucid and euphonious reading of the composition.

The audience was quick to recognize the nature of the achievement and it conveyed its satisfaction in no doubtful terms. Dr. Muck's triumph on this occasion was more notable than at his début, though at the first concert the applause was more enthusiastic. But at that time the hearers were moved by the beautiful music of Brahms. It was music which they all knew and loved, and they rejoiced at an interpretation such as they had not heard in many a long day.

Dr. Muck is said to be a great favorite of the German Emperor, and it is reported that the monarch of all he surveys will not permit the conductor to remain in this country more than one season. Few of us have credited the Kaiser with so much musical appreciation, though all of us are acquainted with his sharp estimates of the worth of men. It is a pity that orchestral conductors cannot be forcibly detained, but Muck will probably have to go back in June. If we did find a way to hold him the War Lord might make it a pretext for international conflict. Wars have been waged for much less worthy objects.

Cleofante Campanini has the misfortune to conduct in an opera house. Operatic audiences bestow but little attention on the art of the conductor except in the field of the Wagner drama. They are prone to complain of him if he permits the orchestra to play so loudly as at times to drown some of the sweet tones of their favorite singers. That, however, is about as far as they usually go. When tempi are taken so fast that singers cannot keep up with the orchestra, or when they are taken so slowly that not even the bellows of an organ would supply wind enough for the vocal phrases, the audience rarely knows what is the matter.

When it comes to the finer details of operatic conducting, to the phrasing, the minor dynamics and the niceties of tonal balance, they are quite lost on the miscellaneous assemblies which gather to worship singers. But the singers themselves know when they have a good conductor behind them. They of all people know how easily their most admirable art may be made to go for naught by incorrect treatment of the orchestral accompaniment. How Mr. Hammerstein's singers must bless Mr. Campanini! How Mr. Ancona must have loved him after "Finch' han dal vino" on Wednesday night!

But there is no need to let temptation draw the commentator into detailed account of the conductor's achievement in "Don Giovanni." It has already had its meed of praise. It was masterly and it gave delight to lovers of that wonderful score which, after all, only musical enthusiasts appreciate.

Mr. Campanini has a keen sense of the contour of every orchestral phrase. He lets nothing run to dead flatness. His orchestra plays in curves. Its utterance is filled with pulsating life. Yet in such a work as "Don Giovanni," where it acts almost wholly as an accompanist, it never dominates the scene. It provides the tonal atmosphere. It is an ocean of beautiful color on which the voices float like ships. It is never turbulent. It never drowns the singers except in occasional fortes.

All this is what we have a right to expect. But how often do we get it? This younger brother of our once adored tenor should be made to settle down here and become an American citizen. We need him. If we had nothing else for which to thank Mr. Hammerstein, we should have to convey to him our gratitude for bringing over this admirable conductor.

Republics are notoriously ungrateful. Publics are eminently superficial. Yet in some strange way and by secret processes publics arrive intuitively at correct verdicts. Wagner was holding men and women enthralled while critics were still snarling about his innovations. Commentators of various degrees of insanity or inanity are still grovelling in the mud of the Shakespeare-Bacon controversy, while the world is worshipping an accepted individuality and enjoying masterpieces.

Musical publics in European cities are far more sophisticated than those of the United States. Furthermore, there is nothing more easy than to fool people about the art of conducting. Let the conductor only make a sufficient display and there will be thousands ready to declare that he is achieving wonders which they do not hear. They behold the labor and they argue the result into existence.

Nevertheless in the long run such men as Nikisch, Von Bülow, Weingartner, Seidl, Campanini and Muck come to their own in the United States just as surely as they do in Europe. It may take longer, but the end is inevitable. The outcome, however, would be swifter and the verdict more influential if the public would give more attention to the art of conducting. We ought to bring ourselves to understand thoroughly just what it is that a conductor does and not permit ourselves to be deluded into believing that by some mysterious exercise of personal magnetism he improvises on an instrument composed of thinking human beings the general plan of the reading and all the correlated details which we hear at a performance.

The real work of the conductor is not done at the performance, but at the rehearsals. It is true that in the performance the director of an orchestra can by his own communicative enthusiasm inspire his men with ardor, but he cannot on the spur of the moment inform them that he desires a certain phrasing or accent. Nor would it be to the purpose if he could, for every nuance in the playing of an orchestral composition must be fitted accurately into a general plan prepared beforehand in the mind of the conductor. Otherwise the effects are not designed but merely fortuitous, hence not art but accident.

The first duty of a conductor is to analyze the composition to be interpreted. By means of this analysis he arrives at a comprehension of the design of the composer and an understanding of the structure and content of the work. Having formed his conception of the music before him and of the effect which its composer designed it to have, he next maps out the plan of a presentation which shall according to his idea convey this effect to his hearers.

His first search is for the correct tempi. Wagner, whose little book on the art of conducting, published in 1869, disturbed all Europe and in connection with the great composer's own practice in directing performances revolutionized the time beater's art, declared that the conductor's whole duty lay in the choice of the right tempo, for if he found that all the rest would unfold itself to him naturally.

The various points of expression necessary to the correct utterance of a melody would stand forth in authoritative state before the mind of the musician who had found the melody's real character. This character must ever be disguised if the pace of the performance be wrong.

It is for this reason that critics harp so much on the topic of tempo. It is useless for them to proceed with a detailed discussion of a conductor's reading of any score or part of a score if his tempo be radically wrong. In that case nothing else can be right.

But when the tempo has been found the conductor must hunt the melody through every bar of the score, up and down the page, from flutes to double basses and back again, and then he must so plan his reading that the orchestra shall always keep that melody in the ears of the audience.

Orchestral melody is not necessarily the same as vocal. An orchestra is a singer of a hundred voices. The melody is sometimes one voiced, sometimes polyphonic. But while it ranges through the various combinations of harmony, counterpoint and instrumental coloring, the conductor must never let go of it. Wagner relates how his eyes were opened by hearing a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony under Habeneck. He declared that Habeneck was not a genius, nor yet a man of much temperament. But by persistent study of this symphony he had found Beethoven's melody, the great central song of the composition, and he had made his orchestra play that.

Neither Habeneck nor any other conductor who has come after him can bring about such a result except by careful, patient and detailed rehearsal. Every phrase in the work must be studied with the players so that they shall get precisely the right balance of tone and the nice gradation of increasing or diminishing force to bring out the "melos," as Wagner called it, and keep the performance vital from beginning to end.

When the public performance takes place all that a conductor can possibly do is to recall to the players something of what he has rehearsed with them. By a look here, a nod there, a warning hand raised at this point or a pantomimic invitation at that, he can remind his men that now he desires that rehearsed sforzando in the violas, now that pressure on the 'cello part, now a shade less force in the first violins and now a free and full utterance from the trombones.

But if he has not rehearsed these effects before the concert he will not get them, and his reading will not be a reading at all, but merely a dead, flat enunciation of the notes as set down on the printed page.

In short, a conductor is a performer who plays on an instrument called an orchestra. In order that he may play well he must study his music and practise it. When he can perform it not only beautifully, but in such a way that the audience is compelled to think only of the music and not at all of the conductor, he reaches an ideal of the highest type.

This is the true art of conducting. That performance which invites an audience to regard a composition merely as a medium for the display of a conductor's idiosyncrasies is pure charlatanry.

W. J. HENDERSON.

DAILY ADVERTISER.

DECEMBER 15, 1906

MUSICAL NOTES.

For his ninth programme Dr. Muck has arranged one entirely of works by Beethoven. It is in the sense of commemoration of the birthday of the Master, Beethoven having been born on Dec. 16, 1770. The assisting artist will be Dr. Otto Neitzel, who will play the concerto for piano in G major, No. 4, opus 58. The orchestral numbers will be the Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the Symphony in A major, No. 7.

More than ordinary interest surrounds the third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Chickering Hall next Monday evening, by reason of the appearance as assisting artist of Dr. Otto Neitzel of Cologne.

The first of the Symphony's pension fund concerts will be given on Sunday evening, Dec. 30. The full orchestra will be used and Dr. Muck will conduct. Particular interest will surround this concert because the programme will consist entirely of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama.

BOSTON AMERICAN,

DECEMBER 16, 1906.

The first of the Symphony pension fund concerts will be given on Sunday evening, December 30. The full orchestra will be used and Dr. Muck will conduct. Particular interest will surround this concert, because the programme will consist entirely of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama. As is generally known, Dr. Muck's standing as an interpreter of Wagner's music is very high and his readings are regarded as authoritative in the full sense of the word. The sale of tickets will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, on next Friday morning, December 21. In the meantime mail orders addressed to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, will be received and filled prior to the public sale.

For his ninth programme, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dr. Muck has arranged one entirely of the works of Beethoven. It is in the sense of commemoration of the birthday of the master, Beethoven having been born on December 16, 1770. The assisting artist will be Dr. Otto Neitzel, who will play the concerto for piano in G major, No. 4, opus 58. The orchestral numbers will be the overture to Gotthe's "Egmont" and the Symphony in A major, No. 7.

SUNDAY POST,

DECEMBER 16, 1906

The first of the Symphony's pension fund concerts will be given on Sunday evening, Dec. 30. The full orchestra will be used, and Dr. Muck will conduct. Particular interest will surround this concert, because the programme will consist entirely of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama. As is generally known, Dr. Muck's standing as an interpreter of Wagner's music is very high and his readings are regarded as authoritative in the full sense of the word. The sale of tickets will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, on next Friday morning, Dec. 21. In the mean time mail orders addressed to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, will be received.

* * * *

More than ordinary interest surrounds the third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Chickering Hall tomorrow evening by reason of the appearance as assisting artist of Dr. Otto Neitzel of Cologne. It will be as a pianist that he will be first heard here, on Monday night with the Boston Symphony Quartet, and on next Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * * *

SUNDAY HERALD
DECEMBER 16, 1906

Chadwick's "Cleopatra Played Here for the First Time.

The programme of the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, given in Symphony Hall last evening, was as follows:

Overture, "In the South".....Elgar
Symphonic poem, "Cleopatra"....Chadwick
Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.....Georg Schumann
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner

Elgar's overture is intended, as we are told by one of his enthusiastic admirers, to suggest "the joy of living in Italy with its historic past and its present beauty." The overture is entitled "In the South," but, as far as the suggestion and the color of Italy are concerned, the title might be, "In the North" or "In the West." Nor was it necessary for Elgar to journey to Alassio or Moglio. He might as well have remained at Malvern, smoked his pipe and read "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage." When we think today of Italy in orchestral music we remember at once Strauss' "Aus Italien," Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy," the two overtures of Berlioz written for "Benvenuto Cellini." We do not at once associate Elgar's music with Italy, its history or its beauty.

The overture is often gorgeous and the performance last night was also gorgeous. Brilliant as the latter was, it could not disguise the fact that the work itself is inherently episodic, nor is the musical body always worthy of the sumptuous and resplendant dress. Thematic invention is seldom striking—even the episode for the solo viola owed its chief charm to the entrancing tone of Mr. Ferir and the ingenuity of the accompaniment; but the weaving of this material is often masterly. Yet there are dreary stretches, especially in the latter half of the overture and the work would gain through judicious excision.

Dr. Muck produced two works that were unknown in Boston. Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem, composed in 1904, and first performed at the Worcester festival of 1905, was suggested by a nobly tragic story and was written in an eminently serious spirit. Schumann's variations, produced in Berlin in 1902, are based on a "Merry Theme" and are deliberately burlesque.

Mr. Chadwick chose a high and mighty subject, that tells of Roman pride, of eastern voluptuousness and magnificence; the portrayal in music of Cleopatra with the suggestion of scenes in which Mark Antony now lords it and now is vassal to the superb capriciousness of Egypt's Queen, with the suggestion of alarums and excursions without and din of battle, and death and love triumphant over death. No composer of operatic or of orchestral music based on this wondrous story has ever written a work of great distinction or of long life. And what play actress from Siddons down has left the tradition of a memorable impersonation of the glowing Serpent of Old Nile?

A symphonic poem or overture entitled "Cleopatra" should be sensuous and heroic; sensuous, not after the fashion of pornographic Massenet with his caterwauling violoncellos, but gloriously sensuous; heroic, not in bombastic fashion, but in thought as well as in flourish. Mr. Chadwick's most successful portion of his work is probably the majestic finale with the simultaneous employment of the themes that typify the lovers. The sensuousness of Cleopatra's soul, body and passion is not so surely characterized as is the summing up in the peroratioin of her death and burial with Antony.

Nor is Mr. Chadwick's martial music adequately typical of Antony's heroic nature, nor is the music that may be supposed to characterize the tumult of battle and the scenes that lead to Antony's self-slaughter convincing or even effective save in a conventional manner. In certain ways the symphonic poem is more modern in its sentiment than are other works of the composer's later period; it is bolder in its harmonic treatment, it is freer, it is richer in color. Mr. Chadwick has written songs that have true sensuousness, that are erotic in the higher meaning of the word. It is unfortunate that he has not painted Cleopatra with amorous gusto. It is also unfortunate that his martial music has not a more imposing form, one that might recall the Roman standards which haunted De Quincey in his opium dreams. There is grace in the opening pages, there is a noble vigor not without beauty in the peroration; but much that intervenes is without true sensuous or heroic distinction.

Georg Schumann's Variations, as I have said, is a frankly burlesque piece. It is a joke, and a long-winded one. So afraid was the composer that he should be taken seriously and praised only for technical skill or abused for certain pages of cacophony that he prints more than once in his score over a theme or at the beginning of a variation "Burlesque." In like manner Artemus Ward occasionally wrote after his remarks: "N. B. This is a goak," or "This is sarcasum." Schumann's music is often ingeniously made and it is an excellent piece to exhibit the remarkable virtuosity of the orchestra. It is, however, music for which there should be little sympathy.

It might serve to amuse the idle where there is touching of beer glasses with fervent "Prosits," where tobacco smoke is thick, where laughter is of the hair-trigger order. As a joke, it is too long and often too heavy, so that after all, perhaps it is serious enough for a symphony concert, with a seriousness that approaches dulness.

The overture to "Rienzi," with its circus pomp, brought an end to a concert with a singularly arranged programme.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Music by Mr. Chadwick and Georg Schumann—A Tone-Poem That Misses the Fascination and the Flame of Cleopatra, but That Warms Mr. Chadwick's Powers—The Jest That Failed, with an Anglo-American Audience in Schumann's Burletta

The deliberate intention, if there was any, in Dr. Muck's programme for the Symphony Concert yesterday, was not so clear as the happy result. It began with Elgar's large-voiced and warmly-colored overture of Italian impressions, "In the South." It continued with Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, "Cleopatra" and Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," both played for the first time in Boston; while for ending Wagner's early overture to "Rienzi" was snatched into perilous distinction from the brass bands and the music halls. In such a list there was none of the continuity of mood and style that Dr. Muck has seemed to seek oftenest in his programmes. There was none either of the more gentle persuasion with which his predecessor used to lead his audiences from one number to another. Georg Schumann's piece is clever and amusing burlesque; Mr. Chadwick's music would be tonal picturing of a fascination that none might resist and of the intense passions that it bred; Elgar's overture is tonal impressionism, and Wagner's overture—well, the last time we heard its cavorting thunders it stood between the turn of the "premier magicians of the world" and the feats of a "queen of the slack wire" in an English music-hall and a thoughtful conductor put on white kid gloves (though it was August) to lead it. The spice of sharp contrast could hardly have been keener in the four numbers, and in the whole effect it proved savory. Unexplainable the programme certainly is; interesting and with an unusual piquancy for a symphony concert, it certainly was. And to be interesting, after all, is the chief end of programme-making, while Dr. Muck seems to like on occasion the interest of the unexpected.

There was distinctly such interest in Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem. Some of his later music, especially in the more academic forms, has seemed a little dry, labored, cold and unimaginative. The warm vigor and the masculine and continent imagination of his earlier work were dulled in them. Now his venture into the freer form of the symphonic poem and into music with clear delineative intent has quickened his powers again. Perhaps, too, there was a spur in the evasive Egyptian queen that he chose for suggestion in his music. She is near two thousand years old now, and in all that time she has evaded all, save one, of the artists who have tried to mirror her in verse or in tones in marble or on canvas, through the momentary reflections of acting. She has escaped the composers as steadily as has Francesca of the garden at Rimini. Is there a Cleopatra of marble or of canvas that has not come, gone and been forgotten? (What if Sargent should try to paint her, sister as she is to the veiled Astarte of desire in our Library!) In a few verses poet after poet has exhausted his imagination with her. Prose, even French prose, may not vibrate to her fascinations. One only has seized them, and her, and the passions that they bred in the strong Roman—Shakspeare in the one of his plays that is all flame. And for three hundred years there has been no actress to play this Cleopatra and leave a glowing memory behind. The Egyptian still baffles and still tempts all the arts, and in our day Mr. Shaw has taken the last and the most modern revenge of the defeated pursuer. He mocks at her ironically. He turns her into travesty.

And vainly, like so many in so many arts, Mr. Chadwick pursues this evasive fascination. No more than all the rest can he individualize Cleopatra. Grant the title, to which we have a right as a clew in a tone-poem, and there is no mistaking Liszt's Tasso, Tchaikovsky's Francesca or Strauss's Don Quixote. Their spiritual and emotional lineaments, their moods and their passions, the characteristic atmosphere of them are in the music. Mr. Chadwick gives his titular clew and the listening imagination springs to it. The tone-poem proceeds. There is music of vague and troubling sensuous suggestion; there is music of languid and exotic passion warming into pulsing glow; there is music of amorous pride and elation, of the woe of love and its despair; there is the glorification of great passion as it thrills in a great memory of the world. Side by side with Cleopatra in the music Antony marches, longs, loves, dies. The music is all tonal suggestion, tonal picture, sometimes nearly tonal narrative, but what more does it gain than the voice of passion as it glimmers, rises, glows and falls into shadows of fate and the darkness of despair, when the woman was as the breath and the man as the wind of their loves? Mr. Chadwick's Cleopatra and Antony might be any such pair of poetry, legend and the visions of centuries; their passion any such passion that as the composer broods upon it impels to musical expression. The fascination and the flame of Cleopatra alike evade him though the imaginative hearer may feel him seeking them now in undulating and iridescent harmonies, now in biting or the languorous suggestions of rhythm; now in throbbing melodic curves that shiver with their own intensity. It is long since Mr. Chadwick has written music of such imaginative suggestion and order of imagination. A composer of his discernment would naturally resort to no cheap and easy devices of Oriental color and impression. But never once, unless perhaps for a passing moment at the beginning, does the listening imagination answer and say "This is Cleopatra." The net of tones adroitly woven, fittingly colored as it is, will not hold her. And one such glimpse of her were worth all the musical imagination and polyphonic skill with which Mr. Chadwick binds her to her Antony.

Georg Schumann's variations were as perilous in their very different kind. They are intended as musical and instrumental humor—not very spontaneous indeed, but still humor, and the usual fate of such ventures befell them. Sir Arthur Sullivan used to tell his friends how he used to put little instrumental quips into the orchestral parts of his operettas at the Savoy. At the rehearsals the conductor used to smile as he signalled for them. For a few performances even the player who was making them showed his amusement in his eyes. Then each grew accustomed to them as to a family joke; but the audiences that came fresh to them night after night never showed the smallest token of responsive mirth. Did they notice this instrumental jesting? Sir Arthur doubted it; or, if they did, they had a truly British shame of their amusement. What was music that it should turn humorous and witty? What were the instruments that made it, that they should be frankly "guying" each other? What were the rules of music-making that they should be travestied. Music was a heavenly maid, and all those fetiches that we English-speaking folk love, even at operetta, and instinctively at a Symphony concert. Poor Sullivan was content with flitting instants of instrumental wit and musical travesty. And Schumann writes a burlesque that is at least fifteen minutes long and that keeps its vein of parody almost from the beginning. He had his reward. A smileless audience listened with a distinct air of those that are puzzled and tapped its hands mildly at the end. A few smiled covertly, half ashamed of their amusement. In vain the bassoons chortled, the double basses cavorted, the bright strings played tricks on themselves; instrument mocked at instrument and form made merry at its own expense. With ironic solemnity the quavering horns and the muttering tuba mocked out a funeral march. The whole band flung itself into a delicious travesty of orchestral excitement—"agitato con furioso," palpitating chords of the diminished seventh, and all that. There was much humor, though some of it was a little heavy and obvious; it poked fun oftenest as a jolly theme in jolly variations, rather than in light merriment and ironic wit. There is genuine virtuosity in its kind in the writing and the playing of such music. It was fun—and nothing else—to hear, if the listener loved music enough to make sport of it[illegible] he might of his intimates. But for m[illegible] that listened she was still a "heaven[illegible] maid," and such celestial beings noto[illegible] ously lack humor.

H. T. P[illegible]

BOSTON AMERICAN—DECEMBER 16, 1906.

POPULAR MUSIC PIN-NIC NIGHT AT SYMPHONY.

"Cleopatra" Tone Poem by Chadwick and a Joke Piece Rouse Enthusiasm.

BIG ORCHESTRA PLAYS WITH INSPIRING ZEST

By Kent Perkins.

With a program that was distinctly "popular" in comparison with most of its predecessors under Dr. Muck, with music that was warmed by the sun of Italy and thrilled by the passion of Egypt's hapless queen in contrast to a murky Boston night, the eighth Symphony concert of the season was one of the most joyful for the audience as a whole that has ever been heard in the hall.

The glow of Italian life was turned on in Elgar's concert overture, "In the South." The love and glory and despair of Antony and Cleopatra were embodied in George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," which was heard here for the first time.

The interest of novelty furnished by this production was supplanted and enhanced in jovial fashion by a sort of musical joke-fest under the title of "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" by Georg Schumann, of Berlin, which had never been played before in Boston. The popular tone of the concert was maintained to the last by Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, which brought the evening's harmonic pic-nic to a close.

The orchestra seemed to enjoy the relief from a certain inevitable weight of responsibility and seriousness that comes from a heavy classic program and without losing a whit its fidelity to perfect art entered into the festive joys of the music with a dash and an abandon that were unusual even since the inspiration of Dr. Muck first gave it a freer rein.

The resistless march of the Roman legions in Elgar's overture and the plaintive pastoral song that might have been piped by a shepherd seated on the fallen capital of a column, whose ancient fellows supported a crumbling architrave nearby, were portrayed with splendid power and appealing retrospective melancholy.

Chadwick's "Cleopatra" proved to be a composition possessing a strong individuality with a beautiful, undulating opening that pictured the barge of Cleopatra as it moved sensuously to her meeting with Antony. The theme of the Roman hero was inspiringly martial, while that of the queen glowed with the warm blood of Egypt. The development of the motives and the harmonic envelope of the music ideas were skillfully worked out and abounded with tonal beauty and strong emotional force. The composition itself and the work of the orchestra roused genuine and vigorously expressed enthusiasm.

The joke-piece by Schumann was clever, and was played by the orchestra with truly comic zest.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER

Eighty-Fi[illegible] DECEMBER 15, 1906. Established 1825.

Published daily, except Sunday by COMPANY 74-76-78 Summer Street.

For his ninth programme for the Symphony orchestra next week Dr. Muck has arranged one entirely of works by Beethoven. It is in the sense of commemoration of the birthday of the master, Beethoven having been born on Dec. 16, 1770. The assisting artist will be Dr. Otto Neitzel, who will play the concerto for piano in G major, No. 4, opus 58. The orchestral numbers will be the overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the Symphony in A major, No. 7.

[illegible]

THE first of the Symphony's Pension Fund concerts will be given on Sunday evening, Dec. 30. The full orchestra will be used, and Dr. Muck will conduct. Particular interest will surround this concert because the programme will consist entirely of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama. As is generally known, Dr. Muck's standing as an interpreter of Wagner's music is very high and his readings are regarded as authoritative, in the full sense of the word.

The sale of tickets will open at the box-office, Symphony Hall, on next Friday morning, Dec. 21. In the meantime mail orders addressed to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, will be received and as is the general custom, they will be filled prior to the opening of the public sale.

More than ordinary interest surrounds the third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Chickering Hall next Monday evening, by reason of the appearance as assisting artist of Dr. Otto Neitzel of Cologne. Dr. Neitzel is known in Germany as the "Supreme court in matters muscal." However that may be, there is no question that he is a man of extraordinary and versa[illegible] talent.

[96]

...BER 16, 1906
...AY GLOBE—

MUSICAL MATTERS

Novelties Played at the Symphony Concerts.

First Appearance Here of Otto Neit...—Lyceum Course.

Handel and Haydn Oratorios—Pension Fund.

Dr Muck offered two novelties for the eighth program of the Symphony season, Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," and George Schumann's variations and double fugue on a "Merry Theme." The concert began with Elgar's overture, "In the South," and closed with the overture to Wagner's opera, "Rienzi." Mr Chadwick's interesting work is about two years old and was first performed at the Worcester festival last September. The composer got his original impulse for his composition through Plutarch's descriptions of Antony and Cleopatra, and musical illustrations having most direct reference to the fascinating queen of Egypt form the chief part of the poem.

The episodes suggested are the voyage on the Cydnus, the approach of Antony and his army, Cleopatra's love scene, the departure of Antony to meet defeat and death, Cleopatra's lamentation and burial of the two lovers. That Mr Chadwick had skillfully arranged his musical contrasts was shown in the first part of his work, in which the turmoil of marching hosts followed quickly upon the sweet undulating theme allotted the flutes and harp. In the former the heavier instruments showed up admirably in suggesting matters of a martial significance and the beautiful "voyage" theme, and later on the "Cleopatra" theme, were each sung by the orchestra with most delicate effect.

Mr Chadwick's score for the woodwinds and horns was notably pleasing in this section of the poem and the sensuous charm of the Cleopatra music first heard on the cello was a fine bit of musical portraiture of this siren of Egypt. The combination of the two motifs which suggest the hero and heroine of the tragedy was wrought out admirably and the lamentation, which was mournfully voiced at first by the viola and afterward by muted strings and brasses, showed that the composer understood the way to produce striking effects by simple means. The pomp and grandeur of the funeral music, with the blending of the Antony and Cleopatra themes, was shown in broad and effective tonal colors.

The work is one of importance and its delineative nature is so vividly apparent to one familiar with the subject that the "pictures" become very real to the auditor. And Mr Chadwick's interesting study was most eloquently illustrated by the orchestra.

The Schumann burlesque proved to be one of those jolly musical juggles of instrumentation that shows wonderful knowledge of the resources of the modern orchestra in producing laughable effects by odd combinations or by unusual treatment and assignments of melodic material. It was a very pleasing group of variations and the audience thoroughly enjoyed the brilliant performance of the piece. The Elgar overture and the Wagner excerpt were played with splendid verve. All the quaint modulations and boldness of orchestration in the Elgar work were vividly brought out by conductor Muck and his authoritative presentation of the "Rienzi" overture gave addition evidence of his high abilities as an interpreter of the German master's compositions.

For the ninth program Dr Muck has arranged one entirely of the works of Beethoven. It is in the sense of commemoration of the birthday of the master, Beethoven having been born Dec 16, 1770. The assisting artist will be Dr Otto Neitzel, who will play the concerto for piano in G major, No. 4 op 58. The orchestral numbers will be the overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the symphony in A major No. 7.

SYMPHONY QUART...

The third concert of the Boston Symphony quartet in Chickering hall tomorrow evening will be of unusual interest by reason of the appearance as assisting artist of Dr Otto Neitzel of Cologne, who is known in Germany as the "supreme court in matters musical." A composer of more than ordinary gifts, a pianist of the virtuoso rank, and a profound scholar in music, who has the added quality of being able to impart his knowledge to others, Dr Neitzel has long held a peculiar position in Germany.

As musical critic of the Kolnische Zeitung, he wields great power in the musical world of Germany. As a professor in the Cologne conservatory, he has a most honorable position. For the past 20 years Dr Neitzel has made a specialty of lecture recitals on various musical subjects, and these have made him even more famous.

It will be as a pianist that he will be first heard here Monday night with the Symphony quartet. An echo of the re... Saint-Saens concert here will be ... in the sonata for piano and cello ... major, opus 123, which Dr Neitzel ... Mr Warnke will play. The other ... on the program are Beethoven's ... quartet in B-flat major, opus 67, ... Schubert's beautiful "Forellen" for ... violin, viola, cello and double ... The other assisting artist in t... ject will be Mr K. Keller, do...

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first of the Symphony's pension fund concerts will be given Sunday evening, Dec 30. The full orchestra will be used and Dr Muck will conduct. Particular interest will surround this concert because the program will consist entirely of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama, and Dr Muck's standing as an interpreter of Wagner's music is very high. He was the first to conduct the performance of the "Ring" in Russia, whither he went in 1889 with Angelo Neumann's company, and while conductor in Graz he gave the first performance of the unabridged "Die Meistersinger" that had been heard in Austria.

In Prague he gave much Wagner, and he has had general charge of the Wagnerian performances in Berlin for the past several years. In addition to these are his engagements in Covent Garden, London, as German conductor in 1889, and his presence as conductor of "Parsifal" at the last four of the Bayreuth performances.

The sale of tickets will open next Friday morning. In the meantime mail orders addressed to C. A. Ellis, Symphony hall, will be received, and, as is the general custom, they will be filled prior to the opening of the public sale.

The Boston Journal
DECEMBER 17, 1906.

CURIOUS PROGRAM IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme. Emma Eames Recital One of Varied Merit, Some of the Numbers Receiving Warm Applause. Sunday Chamber Concert.

A curious program was set forth for the eighth Symphony concert, a badly assorted group of pieces, two of which had the effect of "killing" the ones next door. It was a mistake to put Elgar's glowing and sonorous "In the South" just before Chadwick's "Cleopatra;" with a light and genial overture preceding it, the serious and ambitious work of our composer would have made a far greater appeal. As it was, comparisons were inevitable, and they were to the advantage of the Englishman.

It has been so often said that Elgar's overture does not suggest the Italy it is supposed to paint in tones, that that may be taken for granted. It does, however, at its first jubilant fanfare speak of the joy of life, and later it breathes semi-melancholy aspiration in a viola theme of haunting beauty. Through all the work is the clear and elegantly tinted workmanship of a man who has great abilities and grave faults —the latter not much here in evidence, however. There are stretches of occasional dulness, but the overture as a whole is interesting. It was read with consummate taste and fire by Dr. Muck and played correspondingly well.

Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem inspired by the "serpent of old Nile" is a nobly conceived work, developed with high musicianship, a keen sense of proportion and an expression of sentiment that never becomes sentimentality. It has beauty in some measure and power in more; it is not crabbed nor unlovely. But with all its obvious fineness and strength, it somehow fails to arouse an enthusiastic response to its call. Its inspiration does not burn; its large ambition does not carry the hearer away. It lacks the convincing force of his earlier overtures, for instance, which, though woven on a plainer musical pattern, were of much greater interest.

Georg Schumann's long-winded jocosity, "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," doubtless furnished more sport for the players than for the audience. The clownish air was tossed around from section to section with a good deal of agility and occasional charm. One hearing of the burlesque, however, ought to suffice any reasonable man for the rest of his natural life.

A sumptuous performance of Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, in which Dr. Muck showed his remarkable ability in building fascinating crescendos into overwhelming climaxes, brought a blaze of glory to the concert's close.

BOSTON HERALD-
DECEMBER 20, 1906.

MUSIC NOTES.

The sale of tickets for the first Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund concert of the season, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, the 30th, will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, tomorrow morning. The programme will comprise seven overtures and preludes by Wagner, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal," and the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods." Dr. Muck will conduct.

A concert will be given this evening in ... Hall by Mme. Anna Hellstrom, prima ... of the Stockholm Royal Opera, ... the Harmoni... Swedish ...

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
DECEMBER 17, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Elgar—Overture, "In the South."
Chadwick—Symphonic Poem, "Cleopatra."
Georg Schumann—Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.
Wagner—Overture, "Rienzi."

It was the loudest concert we have ever heard in Symphony Hall. Kettle-drums, bass-drum and snare-drum held high carnival, while the brasses roared giant melodies. Dr. Muck believes in unity of programmes, and this concert was unified on the plane of fortissimo effects. There was no soloist, which we think is a merit in the concerts of so great an orchestra.

We are always glad of an opportunity to hear an Elgar selection, for he is a composer about whose rank there is yet considerable doubt, and it is interesting to study his scoring, his figure development and his themes, and thus confirm or contradict the opinion as to his greatness. We begin to think him less great than we did at first. We do not place Mahler in the first rank, and we are coming to rank Elgar's orchestral work considerably below Mahler's.

The performance of the work was distinctly more impressive than at its first Boston presentation, a year ago. Dr. Muck gave something of the majesty of ancient Rome to the martial touches of the overture. "In the South" in this case does not give an Atlanta riot, a picture of a lynching, a Tillman speech, or a Vardaman theme, for Elgar confines himself to the south of Italy, but, as regards definite characteristics, it might as well be the south of England, with the exception noted above. The viola melody was finely played and a word of commendation must be added for the horn playing also. But the overture seemed as long as the narration of a travelling friend who buttonholes you and tells you all about his impressions of Italy after his first tour.

Mr. Chadwick's new work was badly placed, coming after so much of modern orchestration. It has gusts of passion and strong contrasts and, of course, many sensuous touches, and the orchestration is that of a master of the modern school; yet we do not rank the composition with the beautiful "Melpomene" overture.

We are glad that Dr. Muck chose Mr. Chadwick as the American composer to whom to pay his first honor. The conductor read the work with much power and made the most of the sharp contrasts, which were not only between the characters of the military Antony and the amatory Cleopatra, but also between love-making and lamentation, between triumph and sorrow. The union of the two themes at the end was not only a fine climax, but a display of that ingenuity and skill in which Mr. Chadwick excels.

Undoubtedly many of the audience were interested in an instrument that looked like a cabinet organ, which occupied a prominent place in the front of the stage, and was played in this symphonic poem. It was a Celesta, invented in 1886 by Auguste Mustel of Paris. It is an instrument like a glass harmonica, in which plates of steel are struck with hammers as in a piano action. These steel plates are placed over boxes of wood which act as resonators or sounding-boards.

It gives a tone of much sweetness, and, combined with the reed tone of cabinet organ, it has a tone-quality of its own, sweeter and softer than that of the Glockenspiel. Tschaikowsky, Puccini, Leoncavallo and a host of French composers have used the instrument in their scores. Its crystal, bell-like tone is perhaps a trifle sugary, but not ineffective.

Georg Schumann! Georg Schuman! What is your idea of merriment? The melody on which the variations were founded was of the type one often finds in the "Studenten Commers-buch" and suggested what the German calls "hair-ache" rather than happiness and there was certainly "Katzenjammer" in the funeral march and also in the 1st variation, for bassoons. Yet, as regards humor, there is far more of it in a single phrase of the bassoon-work that Brahms wreathed into "Was kommt dort von der Hoeh'," in the "Academic Overture," than one can discern in all these skillful variations.

The second variation, however, was very original and even humorous. It gave the chief figure of the melody to the kettle-drums, which became for the time being the leading instrument of the orchestra! It is very rare to hear this humble instrument used so prominently. Tausch, the successor to Schumann (Schumann, the great, we mean) as conductor at Dusseldorf, once wrote a kettle-drum concerto, but he demanded five kettle-drums, while Schumann, the lesser, here contents himself with three. Meyerbeer also once scored a whole march for four of these instruments, solo, in "Robert le Diable."

The other variations had less to say for themselves, although all were skillful. But the finale was a movement that would have taken a prize in any contrapuntal examination. We do not to be sure laugh very boisterously at a double fugue, but there were some odd combinations and tremendous ingenuity displayed in every part of this intricate finale.

Wagner discarded his "Rienzi" overture as trash. The public does not agree with him and still applauds it to the echo. It has never before received so fiery a reading as that of Saturday. Dr. Muck evidently imitated King Lear, and signalled to the brasses:—

"Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! Rage! Blow!"

And they raged and they blew in a manner that suggested a tonal cyclone. The trombones and heavy brasses are evidently endeavoring to make up for lost time. After all, however, "Rienzi" is in the Meyerbeer vein and its effects are only enhanced by a little extra noise.

...lson.

Boston Transcript
DECEMBER 17, 1906

The two overtures that Dr. Muck and the orchestra played at the Symphony concert could hardly have made sharper contrast. Elgar's "In the South" is tonal impressionism and nothing else. Out of the murk of London in midwinter, Elgar alights in the warmth and sunshine of Italy. The change kindles his imagination, and he flings the elation of it into the beginning and the end of the overture. He has written nothing orchestrally of such ardor and spontaneity. The smell of the lamp in his study at Malvern that besets so much of his music vanishes in the freshness and fragrance of the new Italian air. Overtures, however, must have more than a beginning and an end, even when the composer treats the form as loosely as Elgar does, and he fills his with more impressions the melancholy that is born at moments of this Italian beauty, and the clanging memories of an imperial past. The sadness flows in plaintive orchestral song; the ancient glories march in broad sonorities. They are vivid tonal impressions, but they have not the outflinging ardor of that first and final elation of the south. This mood and the expression of it are the life of Elgar's overture, and conductor and band made it glow. And beside it, though it was at the other end of the programme, stood the blatant, brazen theatrical pomp of the overture to "Rienzi." In it the music does not even smell of the lamp. It smells of the footlights and nothing else. It piles "effect" upon "effect." Blow, ye brasses! the louder the better. Sing, ye strings! the sharper your accent the better. Quaver, ye wood-winds! lest anyone doubt that here is tremulous emotion. Now we go! and then up with the curtain. No cords and pulleys have lifted it. The music has blown it up by its own brazen gusts. Perhaps the playing of it was the final stage in Dr. ...uck's discovery of the sonorities of which ... orchestra is capable.

BOSTON GLOBE-
DECEMBER 18, 1906.

SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Dr Otto Neitzel, the Distinguished German Composer and Pianist, Assists at an Interesting Concert.

Last evening the Boston Symphony quartet gave the third concert of the season in Chickering hall, when two rather familar numbers and one new composition were played by Prof Willy Hess and his associates. The novelty on the program was C. Saint-Saens' sonata for piano and cello in F major played by the famous German lecturer and composer, Dr Otto Neitzel, one of the assisting artists, and Heinrich Warnke, the cellist of the quartet. The sonata on its first performance in Boston was something of a disappointment, for the talent and sympathetic impulses of the two musicians could not lift it to the point of commanding enthusiasm of itself.

The appearance of Dr Neitzel made the concert unusually attractive, the great musical authority being one of the biographers of Saint-Saens and having a special regard for his music. Dr Neitzel was most cordially received, and his contribution to the program was an important factor in the success of the evening.

This sonata of Saint-Saens is comparatively colorless and lacking in vigor or shading. The most engaging and impressive movement is the third, the romanzo, and what recognition which was not given alone for the excellence of the playing of Dr Neitzel and Mr Warnke went in appreciation of this movement. The two musicians, however, faithfully interpreted the composer's work and the concluding movement, allegro, demanded the rare technical precision delicacy which they gave it.

Haydn's quartet in C major was the opening number and in this the even strength and admirably poised spirit of the four artists was again manifested. The beauties of the adagio were drawn with exquisite coloring, and the predominating and modestly assertive influence of Prof Hess was so evident that he is entitled to more than one-fourth the credit for the enjoyment of the number.

In the playing of Schubert's quintet, for piano, violin, viola, cello and double bass, Dr Neitzel was at the piano and K. Keller played the bass. This composition gives the larger opportunities to the violin and the piano, and Prof Hess and Dr Neitzel more than equaled the demands. The effectiveness of the five musicians was delightfully evident in the graceful andante and the robust finale especially.

BOSTON JOURNAL-
DECEMBER 20, 1906.

Pension Fund Concert.

The sale of seats for the first Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund concert, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Dec. 30, will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, tomorrow morning. The program, under the direction of Dr. Muck, will comprise seven overtures and preludes by Wagner, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal." The "Ring" will be represented by the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods."

[97]

DECEMBER 16, 1906
SUNDAY GLOBE—

MUSICAL MATTERS

Novelties Played at the Symphony Concerts.

First Appearance Here of Otto Neitzel—Lyceum Course.

Handel and Haydn Oratorios—Pension Fund.

Dr Muck offered two novelties for the eighth program of the Symphony season, Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," and George Schumann's variations and double fugue on a "Merry Theme." The concert began with Elgar's overture, "In the South," and closed with the overture to Wagner's opera, "Rienzi." Mr Chadwick's interesting work is about two years old and was first performed at the Worcester festival last September. The composer got his original impulse for his composition through Plutarch's descriptions of Antony and Cleopatra, and musical illustrations having most direct reference to the fascinating queen of Egypt form the chief part of the poem.

The episodes suggested are the voyage on the Cydnus, the approach of Antony and his army, Cleopatra's love scene, the departure of Antony to meet defeat and death, Cleopatra's lamentation and burial of the two lovers. That Mr Chadwick had skillfully arranged his musical contrasts was shown in the first part of his work, in which the turmoil of marching hosts followed quickly upon the sweet undulating theme allotted the flutes and harp. In the former the heavier instruments showed up admirably in suggesting matters of a martial significance and the beautiful "voyage" theme, and later on the "Cleopatra" theme, were each sung by the orchestra with most delicate effect.

Mr Chadwick's score for the woodwinds and horns was notably pleasing in this section of the poem and the sensuous charm of the Cleopatra music first heard on the cello was a fine bit of musical portraiture of this siren of Egypt. The combination of the two motifs which suggest the hero and heroine of the tragedy was wrought out admirably and the lamentation, which was mournfully voiced at first by the viola and afterward by muted strings and brasses, showed that the composer understood the way to produce striking effects by simple means. The pomp and grandeur of the funeral music, with the blending of the Antony and Cleopatra themes, was shown in broad and effective tonal colors.

The work is one of importance and its delineative nature is so vividly apparent to one familiar with the subject that the "pictures" become very real to the auditor. And Mr Chadwick's interesting study was most eloquently illustrated by the orchestra.

The Schumann burlesque proved to be one of those jolly musical juggles of instrumentation that shows wonderful knowledge of the resources of the modern orchestra in producing laughable effects by odd combinations or by unusual treatment and assignments of melodic material. It was a very pleasing group of variations and the audience thoroughly enjoyed the brilliant performance of the piece. The Elgar overture and the Wagner excerpt were played with splendid verve. All the quaint modulations and boldness of orchestration in the Elgar work were vividly brought out by conductor Muck and his authoritative presentation of the "Rienzi" overture gave addition evidence of his high abilities as an interpreter of the German master's compositions.

For the ninth program Dr Muck has arranged one entirely of the works of Beethoven. It is in the sense of commemoration of the birthday of the master; Beethoven having been born Dec 16, 1770. The assisting artist will be Dr Otto Neitzel, who will play the concerto for piano in G major, No. 4 op 58. The orchestral numbers will be the overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the symphony in A major No. 7.

SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony quartet in Chickering hall tomorrow evening will be of unusual interest by reason of the appearance as assisting artist of Dr Otto Neitzel of Cologne, who is known in Germany as the "supreme court in matters musical." A composer of more than ordinary gifts, a pianist of the virtuoso rank, and a profound scholar in music, who has the added quality of being able to impart his knowledge to others, Dr Neitzel has long held a peculiar position in Germany.

As musical critic of the Kolnische Zeitung, he wields great power in the musical world of Germany. As a professor in the Cologne conservatory, he has a most honorable position. For the past 20 years Dr Neitzel has made a specialty of lecture recitals on various musical subjects, and these have made him even more famous.

It will be as a pianist that he will be first heard here Monday night with the Symphony quartet. An echo of the recent Saint-Saens concert here will be found in the sonata for piano and cello in F major, opus 123, which Dr Neitzel and Mr Warnke will play. The other works on the program are Beethoven's string quartet in B-flat major, opus 67, and Schubert's beautiful "Forellen" for piano, violin, viola, cello and double bass. The other assisting artist in the quintet will be Mr K. Keller, double bass.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first of the Symphony's pension fund concerts will be given Sunday evening, Dec 30. The full orchestra will be used and Dr Muck will conduct. Particular interest will surround this concert because the program will consist entirely of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama, and Dr Muck's standing as an interpreter of Wagner's music is very high. He was the first to conduct the performance of the "Ring" in Russia, whither he went in 1889 with Angelo Neumann's company, and while conductor in Graz he gave the first performance of the unabridged "Die Meistersinger" that had been heard in Austria.

In Prague he gave much Wagner, and he has had general charge of the Wagnerian performances in Berlin for the past several years. In addition to these are his engagements in Covent Garden, London, as German conductor in 1889, and his presence as conductor of "Parsifal" at the last four of the Bayreuth performances.

The sale of tickets will open next Friday morning. In the meantime mail orders addressed to C. A. Ellis, Symphony hall, will be received, and, as is the general custom, they will be filled prior to the opening of the public sale.

The Boston Journal
DECEMBER 17, 1906.

CURIOUS PROGRAM IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme. Emma Eames Recital One of Varied Merit, Some of the Numbers Receiving Warm Applause. Sunday Chamber Concert.

A curious program was set forth for the eighth Symphony concert, a badly assorted group of pieces, two of which had the effect of "killing" the ones next door. It was a mistake to put Elgar's glowing and sonorous "In the South" just before Chadwick's "Cleopatra;" with a light and genial overture preceding it, the serious and ambitious work of our composer would have made a far greater appeal. As it was, comparisons were inevitable, and they were to the advantage of the Englishman.

It has been so often said that Elgar's overture does not suggest Italy it is supposed to paint in tones, that that may be taken for granted. It does, however, at its first jubilant fanfare speak of the joy of life, and later it breathes semi-melancholy aspiration in a viola theme of haunting beauty. Through all the work is the clear and elegantly tinted workmanship of a man who has great abilities and grave faults —the latter not much here in evidence, however. There are stretches of occasional dulness, but the overture as a whole is interesting. It was read with consummate taste and fire by Dr. Muck and played correspondingly well.

Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem inspired by the "serpent of old Nile" is a nobly conceived work, developed with high musicianship, a keen sense of proportion and an expression of sentiment that never becomes sentimentality. It has beauty in some measure and power in more; it is not crabbed nor unlovely. But with all its obvious fineness and strength, it somehow fails to arouse an enthusiastic response to its call. Its inspiration does not burn; its large ambition does not carry the hearer away. It lacks the convincing force of his earlier overtures, for instance, which, though woven on a plainer musical pattern, were of much greater interest.

Georg Schumann's long-winded jocosity, "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," doubtless furnished more sport for the players than for the audience. The clownish air was tossed around from section to section with a good deal of agility and occasional charm. One hearing of the burlesque, however, ought to suffice any reasonable man for the rest of his natural life.

A sumptuous performance of Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, in which Dr. Muck showed his remarkable ability in building fascinating crescendos into overwhelming climaxes, brought a blaze of glory to the concert's close.

BOSTON HERALD-
DECEMBER 20, 1906.

MUSIC NOTES.

The sale of tickets for the first Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund concert of the season, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, the 30th, will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, tomorrow morning. The programme will comprise seven overtures and preludes by Wagner, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal," and the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods." Dr. Muck will conduct.

A concert will be given this evening in [illegible] Hall by Mme. Anna Hellstrom, prima donna of the Stockholm Royal Opera, assisted by the Harmoni, a Swedish society [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
DECEMBER 17, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Elgar—Overture, "In the South."
Chadwick—Symphonic Poem, "Cleopatra."
Georg Schumann—Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.
Wagner—Overture, "Rienzi."

It was the loudest concert we have ever heard in Symphony Hall. Kettle-drums, bass-drum and snare-drum held high carnival, while the brasses roared giant melodies. Dr. Muck believes in unity of programmes, and this concert was unified on the plane of fortissimo effects. There was no soloist, which we think is a merit in the concerts of so great an orchestra.

We are always glad of an opportunity to hear an Elgar selection, for he is a composer about whose rank there is yet considerable doubt, and it is interesting to study his scoring, his figure development and his themes, and thus confirm or contradict the opinion as to his greatness. We begin to think him less great than we did at first. We do not place Mahler in the first rank, and we are coming to rank Elgar's orchestral work considerably below Mahler's.

The performance of the work was distinctly more impressive than at its first Boston presentation, a year ago. Dr. Muck gave something of the majesty of ancient Rome to the martial touches of the overture. "In the South" in this case does not give an Atlanta riot, a picture of a lynching, a Tillman speech, or a Vardaman theme, for Elgar confines himself to the south of Italy, but, as regards definite characteristics, it might as well be the south of England, with the exception noted above. The viola melody was finely played and a word of commendation must be added for the horn playing also. But the overture seemed as long as the narration of a travelling friend who buttonholes you and tells you all about his impressions of Italy after his first tour.

Mr. Chadwick's new work was badly placed, coming after so much of modern orchestration. It has gusts of passion and strong contrasts and, of course, many sensuous touches, and the orchestration is that of a master of the modern school; yet we do not rank the composition with the beautiful "Melpomene" overture.

We are glad that Dr. Muck chose Mr. Chadwick as the American composer to whom to pay his first honor. The conductor read the work with much power and made the most of the sharp contrasts, which were not only between the characters of the military Antony and the amatory Cleopatra, but also between love-making and lamentation, between triumph and sorrow. The union of the two themes at the end was not only a fine climax, but a display of that ingenuity and skill in which Mr. Chadwick excels.

Undoubtedly many of the audience were interested in an instrument that looked like a cabinet organ, which occupied a prominent place in the front of the stage, and was played in this symphonic poem. It was a Celesta, invented in 1886 by Auguste Mustel of Paris. It is an instrument like a glass harmonica, in which plates of steel are struck with hammers as in a piano action. These steel plates are placed over boxes of wood which act as resonators or sounding-boards.

It gives a tone of much sweetness, and, combined with the reed tone of cabinet organ, it has a tone-quality of its own, sweeter and softer than that of the Glockenspiel. Tschaikowsky, Puccini, Leoncavallo and a host of French composers have used the instrument in their scores. Its crystal, bell-like tone is perhaps a trifle sugary, but not ineffective.

Georg Schumann! Georg Schuman! What is your idea of merriment? The melody on which the variations were founded was of the type one often finds in the "Studenten Commers-buch" and suggested what the German calls "hair-ache" rather than happiness and there was certainly "Katzenjammer" in the funeral march and also in the 1st variation, for bassoons. Yet, as regards humor, there is far more of it in a single phrase of the bassoon-work that Brahms wreathed into "Was kommt dort von der Hoeh'," in the "Academic Overture," than one can discern in all these skillful variations.

The second variation, however, was very original and even humorous. It gave the chief figure of the melody to the kettle-drums, which became for the time being the leading instrument of the orchestra! It is very rare to hear this humble instrument used so prominently. Tausch, the successor to Schumann (Schumann, the great, we mean) as conductor at Dusseldorf, once wrote a kettle-drum concerto, but he demanded five kettle-drums, while Schumann, the lesser, here contents himself with three. Meyerbeer also once scored a whole march for four of these instruments, solo, in "Robert le Diable."

The other variations had less to say for themselves, although all were skillful. But the finale was a movement that would have taken a prize in any contrapuntal examination. We do not to be sure laugh very boisterously at a double fugue, but there were some odd combinations and tremendous ingenuity displayed in every part of this intricate finale.

Wagner discarded his "Rienzi" overture as trash. The public does not agree with him and still applauds it to the echo. It has never before received so fiery a reading as that of Saturday. Dr. Muck evidently imitated King Lear, and signalled to the brasses:—

"Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! Rage! Blow!"

And they raged and they blew in a manner that suggested a tonal cyclone. The trombones and heavy brasses are evidently endeavoring to make up for lost time. After all, however, "Rienzi" is in the Meyerbeer vein and its effects are only enhanced by a little extra noise.

[illegible]lson.

Boston Transcript
DECEMBER 17, 1906

The two overtures that Dr. Muck and the orchestra played at the Symphony concert could hardly have made sharper contrast. Elgar's "In the South" is tonal impressionism and nothing else. Out of the murk of London in midwinter, Elgar alights in the warmth and sunshine of Italy. The change kindles his imagination, and he flings the elation of it into the beginning and the end of the overture. He has written nothing orchestrally of such ardor and spontaneity. The smell of the lamp in his study at Malvern that besets so much of his music vanishes in the freshness and fragrance of the new Italian air. Overtures, however, must have more than a beginning and an end, even when the composer treats the form as loosely as Elgar does, and he fills his with more impressions the melancholy that is born at moments of this Italian beauty, and the clanging memories of an imperial past. The sadness flows in plaintive orchestral song; the ancient glories march in broad sonorities. They are vivid tonal impressions, but they have not the outflinging ardor of that first and final elation of the south. This mood and the expression of it are the life of Elgar's overture, and conductor and band made it glow. And beside it, though it was at the other end of the programme, stood the blatant, brazen theatrical pomp of the overture to "Rienzi." In it the music does not even smell of the lamp. It smells of the footlights and nothing else. It piles "effect" upon "effect." Blow, ye brasses! the louder the better. Sing, ye strings! the sharper your accent the better. Quaver, ye wood-winds! lest anyone doubt that here is tremulous emotion. Now we go! and then up with the curtain. No cords and pullews have lifted it. The music has blown it up by its own brazen gusts. Perhaps the playing of it was the final stage in Dr. Muck's discovery of the sonorities of which the orchestra is capable.

BOSTON GLOBE-
DECEMBER 18, 1906.

SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Dr Otto Neitzel, the Distinguished German Composer and Pianist, Assists at an Interesting Concert.

Last evening the Boston Symphony quartet gave the third concert of the season in Chickering hall, when two rather familar numbers and one new composition were played by Prof Willy Hess and his associates. The novelty on the program was C. Saint-Saens' sonata for piano and cello in F major played by the famous German lecturer and composer, Dr Otto Neitzel, one of the assisting artists, and Heinrich Warnke, the cellist of the quartet. The sonata on its first performance in Boston was something of a disappointment, for the talent and sympathetic impulses of the two musicians could not lift it to the point of commanding enthusiasm of itself.

The appearance of Dr Neitzel made the concert unusually attractive, the great musical authority being one of the biographers of Saint-Saens and having a special regard for his music. Dr Neitzel was most cordially received, and his contribution to the program was an important factor in the success of the evening.

This sonata of Saint-Saens is comparatively colorless and lacking in vigor or shading. The most engaging and impressive movement is the third, the romanzo, and what recognition which was not given alone for the excellence of the playing of Dr Neitzel and Mr Warnke went in appreciation of this movement. The two musicians, however, faithfully interpreted the composer's work and the concluding movement, allegro, demanded the rare technical precision delicacy which they gave it.

Haydn's quartet in C major was the opening number and in this the even strength and admirably poised spirit of the four artists was again manifested. The beauties of the adagio were drawn with exquisite coloring, and the predominating and modestly assertive influence of Prof Hess was so evident that he is entitled to more than one-fourth the credit for the enjoyment of the number.

In the playing of Schubert's quintet, for piano, violin, viola, cello and double bass, Dr Neitzel was at the piano and K. Keller played the bass. This composition gives the larger opportunities to the violin and the piano, and Prof Hess and Dr Neitzel more than equaled the demands. The effectiveness of the five musicians was delightfully evident in the graceful andante and the robust finale especially.

BOSTON JOURNAL-
DECEMBER 20, 1906.

Pension Fund Concert.

The sale of seats for the first Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund concert, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Dec. 30, will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, tomorrow morning. The program, under the direction of Dr. Muck, will comprise seven overtures and preludes by Wagner, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal." The "Ring" will be represented by the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods."

BOSTON HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXX., No. 171.
TUESDAY, DEC. 18, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET CONCERT

Held in Chickering Hall, with Dr. Otto Neitzel of Cologne Pianist.

FIRST PERFORMANCE OF SAINT-SAENS' SONATA

Music Surprisingly Fresh and Youthful, Displaying the Composer's Skill.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony quartet took place last night in Chickering Hall. The quartet was assisted by Dr. Otto Neitzel of Cologne, pianist, who made his first appearance in Boston, and by Mr. K. Keller, double bass. The program was as follows: Haydn's quartet in C major, op. 33, No. 3; Saint-Saens' sonata for piano and 'cello, F major, op. 123 (Messrs. Neitzel and Warnke), and Schubert's piano quintet in A major, op. 114.

The sonata by Saint-Saens was composed about two years ago. It was played last season at least twice in Paris, and in London it was performed with great success by the composer and Mr. Hollman. The music is surprisingly fresh and youthful when it is compared with other works of Saint-Saens' latest period, and it displays his technical skill and his exquisite sense of proportion.

The sonata is in four movements. The opening one is uncommonly melodious, and it is rhythmically spirited. The second movement, a scherzo with variations, is of engrossing interest. The variations are all fascinating, each in its own way. One is distinguished by its fugal treatment, another by a charming canon. Perhaps the most striking of them all is the finale, which in its subdued fleetness and mysterious spirit reminds one of the finale that follows Chopin's "Funeral March." The Romanza was a broad melody for the violoncello with fanciful tracery for the piano. Tschaikowsky, once speaking of one of his own finales, comforted himself by the reflection that nearly all last movements were more or less perfunctory. The finale of this sonata is not open to the reproach; on the contrary, it abounds in esprit. The 'cello part throughout the sonata is of a lyrical nature, and there are no passages merely for technical display.

The piano part has life of its own, and it contains much of harmonic interest. All in all the sonata must be ranked among Saint-Saens' finest chamber compositions. The performance last night was the first in Boston, if not the first in the United States.

Dr. Neitzel is a singularly versatile musician. A student at the Berlin University, he received his degree of Dr. Phil. in 1875 when he was about 23 years old. He studied the piano in Berlin, served as accompanist, conductor, teacher in various cities, and at last made Cologne his dwelling place. There he is connected with the Cologne Conservatory and he has won fame as music critic of the Cologne Newspaper. He has composed three operas which have been performed, a piano concerto which was played early in 1902 at Berlin, when he played the piano part. He has written a life of Saint-Saens and other books, and he has translated recently into German, the libretto of Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande." He came to this country as a lecturer and pianist, and he made his first appearance in New York as a lecturer on Richard Strauss' "Salome."

As Dr. Neitzel will be the pianist at the Symphony concert this week, discussion of his gifts and acquirements may be deferred till next Sunday, yet it may now be said that in both the sonata, in which he was ably seconded by Mr. Warnke, and in the quintet, he showed sound musicianship, fine taste, a sympathetic spirit, a clear and adequate technic and an intimate knowledge of the requirements of ensemble performance.

The quartet of Haydn is not among the most characteristic works of this class by the composer, but the players evidently gave pleasure. The sonata was well received and there was hearty applause after each movement of Schubert's quintet, a work of perennial beauty by reason of its melodic wealth, its harmonic charm, its inherent spontaneity and freshness.

The fourth concert will be given on Monday evening, Jan. 21.

BOSTON TRAVELER DECEMBER 20, 1906.

THE sale of seats for the first Boston Symphony orchestra pension fund concert, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Dec. 30, will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, tomorrow morning. The programme, under the direction of Dr. Muck, will comprise seven overtures and preludes by Wagner, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal." The "Ring" will be represented by the Funeral March from "Dusk of the Gods."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
DECEMBER 18, 1906

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTETTE CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn—Quartette in C major.
Saint-Saens—Sonata for Violoncello and Piano. Op. 123.
Schubert—Quintette for strings and piano. Op. 114.
Pianist, Dr. Otto Nietzel.

Persons who have watched the billboards of Boston recently have seen the picture of a gentleman who leaned his head upon his hand, in deepest thought, as if he were trying to unriddle a Reger sonata or a D'Indy quartette. That is Dr. Otto Neitzel. Doctor of philosophy, for Germany very sensibly does not bestow the title of Doctor of Music. Last night Dr. Neitzel appeared at the piano with the Boston Symphony Quartette. He proved to be a very conscientious chamber-musician, who did not thrust his personality too prominently forward in any of the numbers in which he was concerned, and who played in a manner that showed study and intelligence.

He appeared in the two last numbers of the above programme. The last number was a little-known piano quintette of unusual proportions, for instead of combining a string quartette with the piano, it admitted the contra-bass to the combination. Nor was this a bad scheme, for, although the contra-bass is generally too heavy for the string quartette, it was, in this case, balanced against the piano, and the result was bad, particularly as the pizzicato, a fine contra-bass effect, was much used. It was a quintette written in the pleasant days of Schubert's life, and it has all the melodic charm which is so conspicuously absent from the modern works in chamber-music or in symphonic form. There are no Schuberts alive nowadays.

The performance of the work was admirable. Not only is the first violin, Prof. Willy Hess, an admirable chamber-musician, but Dr. Neitzel also proved himself very thoughtful of the ensemble and careful not to overforce the most powerful instrument in the combination. The contra-bass was also carefully shaded by Mr. Keller, who forebore to use the full power which lay in his heavy-stringed instrument. The ensemble of the important number was therefore excellent, thanks chiefly to these two artists, who seemed to remember Shakespeare's lines—

Oh, it is excellent to have a giant's strength,
But it is terrible to use it like a giant.

The concert began pleasantly enough with Haydn's Quartette, which was given without exaggeration or any attempt to inflate it beyond its own naive domain. Yet the playing of Haydn is not altogether so easy as the general public may suppose. In such a quartette any roughness or imperfection stands revealed as a rift in a lute, or a flaw in a crystal. That there were no such flaws on this occasion stands to the credit of the Boston Symphony Quartette. The brevity of the quartette was also a merit in these days when the modern composer requires an entire ocean to turn around in.

The last named defect was the chief fault of the St. Saens number. Both Mr. Warnke and Dr. Neitzel played conscientiously, but, in spite of some interesting passages, the length of the work was wearisome. There was an unromantic Romanza which contained some fine C string passages which Mr. Warnke played excellently; there was also a brilliant finale in which Dr. Neitzel displayed clear scale and octave work; but one could have borne with a little less of St. Saens' garrulity if one could have had it replaced with a little more Schubert melody, or some Brahms intellectuality. Yet the St. Saens number won much applause, partially, we suppose, because of the desire to compliment the two excellent soloists.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON JOURNAL DECEMBER 22, 1906.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for the first Pension Fund concert, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Dec. 30, has attracted much attention and caused much interesting comment. He will play seven of Wagner's overtures in their chronological order, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and "Parsifal." "The Ring of the Nibelung" will be represented by the Funeral March from "Dusk of the Gods." Chronological programs are not uncommon on the other side, but they are rarely seen in America, and the present one will give students and admirers of Wagner an unusual opportunity to study his musical development as seen in the preludes to his music-dramas. Moreover, such a program is not open to the much-heard criticism which inevitably precedes and follows the putting of Wagner's works on the concert stage.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

Dr. Muck has been forced to change the whole scheme of his program for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He had intended to do two Polish works, an overture by Noskowski and a symphony by Stojowski, but at the last moment it was discovered that the orchestral parts of the former work were not to be had in this country, as they were not even in the Con-

BOSTON TRAVELER, DECEMBER 22, 1906.

The programme which Dr. [illegible] has arranged for the first pension fund concert, which will be given in Symphony Hall on next Sunday evening, Dec. 30, has attracted much attention and caused much interesting comment. He will play seven of Wagner's overtures in their chronological order, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and "Parsifal." "The Ring of the Nibelung" will be represented by the Funeral March from "Dusk of the Gods."

Dr. Muck has been forced suddenly to change the whole scheme of his programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He had intended to do two Polish works, an overture by Noskowski and a symphony by Stojowski, but at the last moment it was discovered that the orchestral parts of the former work were not to be had in this country, as they were not even in the Congressional Library which has an unusually complete collection. Learning this, he decided to defer this programme indefinitely, as his plans for the year will not allow its performance, at any rate, until well on toward the end of the season.

The programme which has been arranged has a flavor of the holiday season.

[98]

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 18, 1906

THE CONCERTS OF YESTERDAY

Dr. Neitzel, the Pianist, Appears with the Symphony Quartet—A New Sonata for Piano and 'Cello by Saint-Saens—Miss Yaw and a Welsh Choir

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, Dr. Otto. Neitzel of Cologne made his first appearance in this city as a pianist. The quartet was also assisted by Mr. K. Keller, double-bass. The programme:

Quartet in C, No. 56.....Haydn
Sonata for Piano and Violoncello, Op. 123..
Saint-Saëns
Quintet, Op. 114.....Schubert

The light and gracious Haydn Quartet was played in a spirited and often brilliant style. The scherzo of this quartet is an interesting specimen of the transition stage between the minuet and the scherzo. It recalls Haydn's remark, "If someone would only try to write a new minuet," an ambition partially fulfilled by Mozart, but actually accomplished by Beethoven. The finale in its folk-song spirit suggests the conclusions which Mr. Hadow draws after laborious research that Haydn was largely inspired by Croatian folk-songs. Another feather in the cap of the folk-lorists of today!

Dr. Neitzel is widely known in Europe for his exceedingly versatile activity in music. Born at Falkenburg, Pomerania, in 1852, he studied at the Joachimsthal Gymnasium and at the University at Berlin, where he took the degree of doctor of philosophy. In the meantime he had continued the study of music with Kullak in piano-playing (he also studied later with Liszt) and with Wuerst and Kiel in composition. At one time director of a music society in Strasburg and also of the town theatre there, he has taught successively in the conservatories of Strasburg, Moscow and Cologne. He now occupies a position at the last-mentioned conservatory besides being musical critic of the Cologne Zeitung. As a pianist he has toured England, Germany and France. He is also well known as an author on musical topics, including an elaborate "Guide to Opera" in three volumes, an interesting, thorough and eminently readable monograph on Saint-Saëns. As a composer Dr. Neitzel has brought out the operas "Angela," "Dido" and "Der alte Dessauer," in addition to other works. Besides his concert engagements in this country, he is lecturing with incredible minuteness of analytic detail on Richard Strauss's much discussed opera "Salomé." The new violoncello sonata by Saint-Saëne is a pitiful contrast to the genuinely classic virtues of its earlier companion in the same form, Op. 32. It is long, labored and dull from the sheer vacuity and futility of its ideas; it is at once garrulous with the long-windness of old age exaggerating the significance of its utterance, and prodigal of treatment and workmanship without a fundamental basis of inspiration. The best movement is undoubtedly the scherzo with variations, although its theme is not distinguished, nor readily characteristic of its author. Much skill of an indisputable order enters into the making of these variations, and the devices of variations in augmentation, in diminution, in fugato and in canon, are all employed freely. The musical substance, however, while sometimes momentarily pleasing, is essentially arid. The finale is undoubtedly brilliant at times. As a pianist, Dr. Neitzel is direct, enthusiastic; his style is sometimes too abrupt, his accents too spasmodic, his technique is occasionally inaccurate. On the other hand, he shows at once his intellectual grasp of music, frequent finesse of expression, his staccato in the scherzo was notable for its lightness and vaporous quality. His rhythms are frank and precise, if somewhat inelastic. From the standpoint of ensemble, he sometimes overpowered the violoncello. In justice to Dr. Neitzel, however, it should be said that the fundamentally uninteresting nature of the Saint-Saëns sonata precludes an accurate or fair opinion on his capabilities as a pianist. Mr. Warnke, be it said, made the most of the difficult and ungrateful 'cello part.

Dr. Neitzel appeared to much greater advantage as a pianist in the perennially beautiful if somewhat redundant Schubert "Trout" quintet, with its engagingly naive variations. Here his tone was both brilliant and supple, his sense of ensemble was better balanced than in the Saint-Saëns sonata, and above all his interpretation revealed the truly Schubertian individuality of the quintet, its unpretentious simplicity, its refreshing melodic beauty and its ineffable poetry. Seldom has a Schubert chamber composition made a more evident appeal to a Boston audience, and this was due to a great extent to the charm and [illegible]

The Boston Post
DECEMBER 23, 1906

The first of the season's Boston Symphony pension fund concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on next Sunday evening, Dec. 30, at 8 o'clock. The object of these concerts is well known, being to increase the endowment fund of the pension institution and thus provide for the old age or sickness of members of the orchestra.

Nothing concerning the orchestra was nearer the heart of Mr. Gericke, and he took infinite pains in the pension fund concerts, approving as he did so heartily of their object. And Mr. Muck is now undertaking the work in the same spirit as his predecessor. He has prepared for the near future some exceedingly exacting programmes which include many novelties and require a vast amount of rehearsing. Despite the fact that the preparation of these works before they come into rehearsal makes him an unusually busy man, he is finding time to prepare a programme for this pension fund concert which will appeal to more than one class of music lovers.

He will play seven overtures and preludes of Wagner in their chronological order, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and "Parsifal," while "The Ring of the Nibelung" will be represented by the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods."

* * * *

BOSTON AMERICAN
DECEMBER 23, 1906.

HERE'S A CHANCE TO LIKE WAGNERIAN MUSIC.

Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund Concert in Symphony Hall Next Sunday Night Gives You the Opportunity

ARE you fond of Wagner's music, yet seldom have a chance to hear it interpreted by skilled musicians under competent leadership? Then go to the Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday night.

Get a ticket to-morrow. Go early to avoid the rush. For Dr. Muck and the artists of the Symphony Orchestra are to give a program entirely made up of selections from Wagner.

You will also have a chance to hear one of the finest orchestras in the world, a chance that comes rarely to those who are not regular Symphony patrons.

The first of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on next Sunday evening, December 30, at 8 o'clock. The concert will be entirely of Wagner's music. The orchestra will play seven overtures and preludes of Wagner in their chronological order, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and "Parsifal," while "The Ring of the Nibelung" will be represented by the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods."

The Symphony concert program of this week will have a flavor of the holiday season. The last two numbers will be excerpts from Liszt's "Christus." The soloist will be Mr. Adamowski, who will play Strube's violin concerto.

BOSTON TRAVELER DECEMBER 24, 1906.

THE ninth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given over to Beethoven numbers, the programme including the Egmont Overture, the fourth concerto for pianoforte and the seventh symphony. Dr. Otto Neitzel was the soloist. The evening proved to be one of rare enjoyment. After hearing the Beethoven selections at Dr. Muck's hands one must place our leader upon a broader platform. He steadily affords evidence that he is no one school man. He may have a big reputation as an interpreter of Wagner, but he is constantly showing that he cannot be called a Wagner conductor or a Brahms conductor, but rather an exceptionally able, all-around conductor, who gives the various schools of music their proper due. Saturday night's concert was exceptionally enjoyable. There was an enthusiasm abroad that was decidedly inspiring. The triple encore which followed Dr. Neitzel's playing of the concerto was well-merited.

The tenth rehearsal and concert scheduled for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week call for Brahms' variations on a theme of Haydn, Strube's violin concerto, and the Shepherds' Song at the Cradle and March of the Three Kings, from Liszt's 'Christus." The last named number is given for the first time. Mr. T. Adamowski is the soloist.

SERMON ON CONDUCTING

WITH DR. MUCK FOR TEXT, EXAMPLE AND PRECEPT

The Traits, the Methods, the Influence and the Results of the Conductor of Our Orchestra, as the Ablest of the New York Reviewers Sees Them—Warm and Sincere Praise for Dr. Muck—What a Conductor Seeks and the Means by Which He Finds It

Meanwhile two conductors have come to America without flourish of trumpets, without advertised invitation to consider their beat and be wise, without passionate press agents' proclamations of queer histories or cold old crimes or deeds that persist in rising up to be unforgotten. Yet these two conductors ought to be kept in this country. If they have other engagements they ought to be kept here by force. One of them is Karl Muck of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the other is Cleofonte Campanini of the Manhattan Opera House.

Dr. Muck was well known to those who make it their business to keep track of musical affairs in Europe. His method of conducting, however, was unknown to all save a few, and they had their doubts as to the public attitude toward it. Dr. Muck's outward and visible signs are of the most simple and unpicturesque sort. His gestures are few and elementary. There is nothing to see. A man of slender, elegant, aristocratic figure, of clean cut, scholarly face and of cultured manner stands before the orchestra, and while directing it with the certainty of authority and the command of a master he so effaces his personality that he becomes a perfectly transparent medium between the audience and the music. This is the highest achievement possible to the manner of conducting. If no other qualities were to be found in Dr. Muck's art, this alone would be enough to insure it a welcome from those who are weary of finding a gorgeously decorated curtain of Monsieur This or Herr That hung between them and Beethoven or Brahms.

The doubts as to the attitude of the musical public in regard to this sort of conducting have been scattered to the four winds. There is more than one public in New York. There is a public for ground and lofty tumbling and there is a public for sane art. There is a public which shrieks its throat to tatters every time Caruso or Bonci sings a high note and there is a public which values the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet above all tenors. This latter is the musical public, and its taste can be trusted to arrive at just verdicts. It has pronounced most emphatically in favor of Dr. Muck, the man with the continent style and the splendid results. No one of the music lovers who have spent most of their lives in observing musical doings was deceived by the applause which followed Dr. Muck's reading of Brucker's E-major symphony. That applause was not an expression of gratitude to old Bruckner for projecting into the world his troublous music, but to Dr. Muck for his clear, lucid and euphonious reading of the composition. The audience was quick to recognize the nature of the achievement and it conveyed its satisfaction in no doubtful terms. Dr. Muck's triumph on this occasion was more notable than at his début, though at the first concert the applause was more enthusiastic. But at that time the hearers were moved by the beautiful music of Brahms. It was music which they all knew and loved, and they rejoiced at an interpretation such as they had not heard in many a long day.

Dr. Muck is said to be a great favorite of the German emperor, and it is reported that the monarch of all he surveys will not permit the conductor to remain in this country more than one season. Few of us have credited the kaiser with so much musical appreciation, though all of us are acquainted with his sharp estimates of the worth of men. It is a pity that orchestral conductors cannot be forcibly detained, but Muck will probably have to go back in June. If we did find a way to hold him the War Lord might make it a pretext for international conflict. Wars have been waged for much less worthy objects.

Publics are eminently superficial. Yet in some strange way and by secret processes publics arrive intuitively at correct verdicts. Wagner was holding men and women enthralled while critics were still snarling about his innovations. Musical publics in European cities are far more sophisticated than those of the United States. Furthermore, there is nothing more easy than to fool people about the art of conducting. Let the conductor only make a sufficient display and there will be thousands ready to declare that he is achieving wonders which they do not hear. They behold the labor and they argue the result into existence. Nevertheless in the long run such men as Nikisch, Bülow, Weingartner, Seidl, Campanini and Muck come to their own in the United States just as surely as they do in Europe. It may take longer, but the end is inevitable. The outcome, however, would be swifter and the verdict more influential if the public would give more attention to the art of conducting. We ought to bring ourselves to understand thoroughly just what it is that a conductor does and not permit ourselves to be deluded into believing that by some mysterious exercise of personal magnetism he improvises on an instrument composed of thinking human beings the general plan of the reading and all the correlated details which we hear at a performance.

The real work of the conductor is not done at the performance, but at the rehearsals. It is true that in the performance the director of an orchestra can by his own communicative enthusiasm inspire his men with ardor, but he cannot on the spur of the moment inform them that he desires a certain phrasing or accent. Nor would it be to the purpose if he could, for every nuance in the playing of an orchestral composition must be fitted accurately into a general plan prepared beforehand in the mind of the conductor. Otherwise the effects are not designed but merely fortuitous, hence not art but accident.

The first duty of a conductor is to analyze the composition to be interpreted. By means of this analysis he arrives at a comprehension of the design of the composer and an understanding of the structure and content of the work. Having formed his conception of the music before him and of the effect which its composer designed it to have, he next maps out the plan of a presentation which shall according to his idea convey this effect to his hearers. His first search is for the correct tempi. Wagner declared that the conductor's whole duty lay in the choice of the right tempo, for if he found that, all the rest would unfold itself to him naturally. The various points of expression necessary to the correct utterance of a melody would stand forth in authoritative state before the mind of the musician who had found the real character of that melody. That character would ever be disguised, if the pace of the performance be wrong. When the tempo has been found the conductor must hunt the melody through every bar of the score, up and down the page, from flutes to double basses and back again, and then he must so plan his reading that the orchestra shall always keep that melody in the ears of the audience. Orchestral melody is not necessarily the same as vocal. An orchestra is a singer of a hundred voices. The melody is sometimes one voiced, sometimes polyphonic. But while it ranges through the various combinations of harmony, counterpoint and instrumental coloring, the conductor must never let go of it. No conductor can bring this great central song to utterance except by careful, patient and de[illegible] rehearsal. Every phrase in the work must be studied with the players so that they shall get precisely the right balance of tone and the nice gradation of increasing or diminishing force to bring out the "melos," as Wagner called it, and keep the performance vital from beginning to end.

When the public performance takes place all that a conductor can possibly do is to recall to the players something of what he has rehearsed with them. By a look here, a nod there, a warning hand raised at this point or a pantomimic invitation at that, he can remind his men that now he desires that rehearsed sforzando in the violas, now that pressure on the 'cello part, now a shade less force in the first violins and now a free and full utterance from the trombones. But if he has not rehearsed these effects before the concert he will not get them, and his reading will not be a reading at all, but merely a dead, flat enunciation of the notes as set down on the printed page. In short, a conductor is a performer who plays on an instrument called an orchestra. In order that he may play well he must study his music and practise it. When he can perform it not only beautifully, but in such a way that the audience is compelled to think only of the music and not at all of the conductor, he reaches an ideal of the highest type. This is the true art of conducting. That performance which [illegible] audience to regard a com[illegible] for the d[illegible]y of a conductor's crasies [illegible] pure [illegible] W. J. Henderson in the New York Sun.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A "Beethoven" Programme and a Notable Performance of His Seventh Symphony—Dr. Muck and the Orchestra at Their Best in the Recreation of a Classic—The Overture to "Egmont" as Delineative Music—Dr. Neitzel Plays Beethoven's Fourth Concerto

An "all-Beethoven," or any other sort of programme, justifies itself when it comes to such performance as Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra gave theirs yesterday. Concerts of the music of a single composer have been rare with our conductors, and the few that one or another of them has arranged have usually served some commemorative purpose. It is by no means certain that Beethoven was born on Dec. 16, 1770; if he was, a routine anniversary of his birth was already five days past; so that a memorial intention hardly lurked in Dr. Muck's programme. Probably the origin of it was much more prosaic. Dr. Neitzel, the pianist of the afternoon, wished to play Beethoven's concerto in G major. The conductor consented, and the pianist's suggestion kindled him to an "all-Beethoven" concert. Except in the concerto, he made, moreover, a programme of very familiar Beethoven. There was no searching among his obscurer overtures, his ballet music or his occasional pieces to find unfamiliar material for it. Perhaps the concerto, which has not been played here for six years, served for that. For the rest the overture to "Egmont" and the seventh symphony sufficed. Little of Beethoven is more familiar, and both stood on Mr. Gericke's programmes only last winter.

Yet the responsive listener heard both yesterday with a keen sense of newness in the music and freshness of impression in himself. It was the Friday afternoon before Christmas; yet few seats were empty, and the audience was alert, eager and at moments rapt. In fact conductor and band were repeating once more the achievement which is one of their justest distinctions and truest glories, the recreation of classics. From the first days of Mr. Gericke even to the latest day of Dr. Muck, it has been their singular virtue among American orchestras, and as some say among the orchestras of Europe as well, to make the old and the familiar vital again. There is nothing, after all, that gathers dust, that stiffens in its bones so quickly as a classic when once it has become such. Year after year it is duly taken down from the shelf, rubbed and oiled a little in its joints, and then displayed to equally stiff-kneed admiration. Behold and judge for yourselves—and you have long known what you ought to recognize and to admire. To be displayed and to be beheld—and nothing more—is the real fate of most classics, musical or any other, and in that fate is the inspiring cause of the very human instinct that often upsprings in most of us, if we are quite honest with ourselves, to kick over the traces of admiration and bolt into weariness or dislike. When, however, some halcyon occasion recreates and revitalizes these classics, and sets in living array, and not in catalogue, the qualities that have made them such; when they rise before our ears (if they happen to be music) and our imaginations as spontaneously and inevitably as life itself, then there is a new and very keen joy in them. There is no question then of displaying or beholding. The performer has felt and the listener feels responsively. It was such a performance that Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave yesterday of the overture to "Egmont" and especially of the seventh symphony, and it made both new and stirring. And they were so in particular because the conductor used no effort to make either sound new by the easy means of a calculated "effect" here, a touch of distortion there, or any of the tricks, honest or dishonest, of elaborate "interpretation." The conductor and his men were as voices that sought but one end—the fullest utterance of the music as it came from Beethoven's hand. So uttered it could not fail of "effects" that would outdo all that the most interpretative of professional "interpreters" could devise. It would be alive again with the beauty, the power, the irresistible compelling quality that have made it lasting.

Praise our ultra-modern "programme-music" as we may; love its freedom of form and its intensity of feeling as some of us do; yield to many of its suggestions as most of us must. Yet has it, after all, gone any further in genuine musical delineation than Beethoven went in the overture to "Egmont" as it was played yesterday? Some of this programme-music does indeed try to state facts, and in the hands of a Richard Strauss almost succeeds. Some of it tries to describe minutely, and again almost succeeds. But the real purpose and achievement of delineative music is the imparting of the impressions that the composer has received from the object that has stirred him to speech. If we are seeking a description of Egmont and his life we turn to Motley or to some other historian of the revolt of the Netherlands, and not to Goethe's tragedy or to Beethoven's music. At bottom they are the one and the other's impression of the man, his life, his time. Goethe has wrought his in verse and Beethoven his in tones, but each has the peculiar trait of a great impression, greatly uttered. The responsive impression stirs in the reader and the listener feels the Egmont that Beethoven or Goethe felt. Look at Velasquez's portraits of the Philips of Spain, who were his sovereigns. Who knows, who cares now whether they are like or unlike the man whom the chamberlains of the court and the grooms of the bedchamber knew? They are the Philips that Velasquez felt, and we feel them, and our children will feel them, as he felt them. The portraits are the perfection of delineation because they do convey an irresistible and abiding impression. The same aim and the same quality dwell in delineative music. Has any that has come since in near a century achieved both more completely than this overture to "Egmont" of 1810?

Thank the muses of "absolute" music, there was no thought of delineation, old or new, in the symphony! There was not even thought, until afterwards, of the surpassing brilliancy, beauty and euphony of tone that the orchestra brought to the performance of it. The ear heard and the imagination felt the brightness of the strings, the liquid purity of the wood winds, the mellow sturdiness of the brass—heard them in rounded phrase, in pointed accent, in adroit shadings, in transparent euphony, heard them as though each instrument were the voice of inspired song—and for the instant took it all for granted. How, so inevitable and spontaneous did it seem, could this seventh symphony be played in any other tones? And the same ears and the same imaginations heard the symphony as a spontaneous and inevitable whole rising measure from measure, shaping itself seemingly by its own will into an idealizing song of the power, the beauty and the glory of rhythm. Recall the lovely persuasion of the introduction luring and exciting the ear into the rhythmic warmth of the allegro; the pulsing song of the slow movement as of rhythm singing itself; the spontaneous leap of the scherzo as though each measure were flashing out of its predecessor, the pause of quiet song as of rhythm subdued to musing; the ecstatic whirl of the finale as of rhythm intoxicated with its own zest. To recall is only to anticipate all these again tonight. Dr. Muck has indeed grasped the symphony as a whole. He has made it the song of rhythm; the "dance-song" of which Nietzsche dreamed and that was written two generations before him. The conductor has [illegible] nothing [illegible] and so memorable since he gave [illegible] first symphony as recreating life. [illegible]

Sunday evening, Dec. 30, in Symphony Hall, a Wagner concert by the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck in aid of its pension fund. The overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser;" the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal," and Siegfried's "Glorification" from "Götterdämmerung" make the programme.

Sunday afternoon, Dec. 30, in Chickering Hall, fifth Sunday [illegible] concert by the Symphony String Quartet, and Mrs. Gertrude Miller Woodruff, soprano.

COMING CONCERTS

"The Messiah" for a Christmas Rite—The Concerts of the New Year—Nordica's Song Recital—Gabrilowitsch and Miss Schnitzer to Return

Since the orchestral parts of a new overture and a new symphony by the Polish composers Noskowski and Stojowski respectively were not immediately obtainable, Dr. Muck has been obliged to rearrange the programme for the tenth pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. As it now stands it comprises Brahms's familiar variations on a theme by Haydn (the Chorale of St. Anthony), the concerto in F-sharp minor for violin by Mr. Strube of the orchestra, and two fragments of Liszt's oratorio, "Christus"—the song of the shepherds at the holy manger and the march of the three holy kings. The song has not been played hitherto by the orchestra, but the march of the kings Mr. Gericke once put upon a Christmas programme. Mr. Adamowski plays the solo part in the concerto as he did when it was new last ye[illegible]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 23, 1906.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Dr Neitzel Soloist at Symphony Concert.

"The Messiah" Tonight by the Handel and Haydn.

Vocal and Instrumental Recitals Promised.

In honor of the memory of Beethoven, who was born in December, 1770, the ninth Symphony program was made up entirely of the great musician's compositions, the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the G major pianoforte concerto and his grand symphony No. 7. The pianist was the distinguished critic, lecturer and pianist, Dr Otto Neitzel, whose recent appearance with the Boston Symphony quartet demonstrated his masterly ability as an interpreter of chamber music. The variety and musical beauty displayed by Beethoven in his numerous compositions enables a conductor to make up a program from the master's works that should silence criticism as to form, and Dr Muck evidently succeeded in his task, for his auditors gave indubitable evidences that the program was thoroughly enjoyable.

In the concerto Dr Neitzel again proved himself the possessor of great interpretative abilities in which the intelligence of the scholar allied with a technique of a high order results in a lofty standard of work. The pianist is very modest, thoroughly in earnest when playing and plainly indicates that his world-wide fame is well deserved. There is no particular need to specify the fine quality of his tone, the dexterity in rapid finger work nor the exquisite coloring and gradations of his performance, for in all the requirements of a virtuoso he evidently is well equipped. He was most heartily applauded at the close of the concerto.

The orchestral work was of a character that calls for naught but praise, and all in all the program probably gave more real enjoyment to the people than any other one of the season. The symphony was a noble performance throughout and in the third movement the joyous spirit of the composition put players and listeners in great good humor, and conductor Muck allowed the orchestra to "run by itself" awhile, evidently entering into the fun of the moment.

Dr Muck had planned to present two novelties on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, an overture by Noskowski, entitled "The Steppe," and a symphony by Stojowski. Unfortunately, the parts for the Noskowski overture were not to be had in this country, even in the library of congress, so it was decided to postpone this "Polish" program indefinitely. The selections this week will be as follows: Brahms' variations on a theme by Josef Haydn, Strube's F sharp minor violin concerto and two excerpts from Liszt's oratorio, "Christus." Timothee Adamowski will be the solo violinist.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first of the season's Boston Symphony orchestra pension fund concerts will be given in Symphony hall next Sunday evening. Thanks to the generous spirit in which Boston has patronized these concerts, the fund has been steadily increasing. With the two concerts each season and the dues from the members of the orchestra, the men who have given this city the best orchestral music in America will soon be on a pension basis as favorable as those which are found in continental orchestras which are maintained by the state.

Nothing concerning the orchestra was nearer the heart of Mr Gericke, and he took infinite pains in the pension fund concerts, approving as he did so heartily of their object. And Dr Muck now is undertaking the work in the same spirit as his predecessor.

The program next Sunday will be made up of seven overtures and preludes of Wagner in their chronological order, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and "Parsifal," while "The Ring of the Nibelung" will be represented by the "Funeral March" from "Dusk of the Gods."

Chronological programs are not uncommon on the other side, but they are rare in America, and the present one will give students and admirers of Wagner an unusual opportunity to study his musical [illegible] as seen in

HERALD

DECEMBER 23, 1906.

BEETHOVEN NIGHT AT THE SYMPHONY

Dangerous One-Composer Experiment Fairly Successfully Tried.

DR. MUCK'S LEADING MASTERLY IN MUCH

Fourth Concerto for the Pianoforte Is Sanely Played by Dr. Neitzel.

BY PHILIP HALE.

Three of Beethoven's compositions formed the programme of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Dr. Muck, which took place last night in Symphony Hall. They were the overture to "Egmont"; the fourth concerto for the pianoforte, and the seventh symphony.

Programmes devoted exclusively to the works of any one composer are dangerous experiments. Few composers can stand the test. In certain German concert halls it has been the custom to announce a "Mozart evening," a "Schumann evening," a "Brahms evening," and so on. One conductor, I remember, had the courage to announce a "Raff evening." Was it not Benjamin Bilse, now at rest—if the indefatigable conductor can rest even in another world?

Nor has the modern composer a marked advantage in this respect over the ancient. Highly colored music frets the nerves more than that which is constantly amiable. Each period has its mannerisms, its formulas of expression and those that surprise for a moment by their novelty, quickly become old-fashioned. New harmonic schemes, daring progressions, vagueness of plan, impressionistic effects, if they are to be appreciated, must be opposed to something that has endured by reason of solid architecture and nobility of thought. As the ingenuous Capt. Goby remarked of life in the West Indies: "A fellow's liver goes to the deuce with hot pickles and sangaree."

Variety Even in Music a Need.

The hearer of music rightly demands a certain variety, as he does in diet and in affection. It is given to very few composers to satisfy each in his own music, this natural want. Beethoven responds best of all to the demand, yet care must be taken in the selection, and he must not be treated with too much respect. The doctrine of plenary inspiration no longer can be applied to any composer.

The fetishist should not be heeded in his worship any more than a madman beating on a drum. Beethoven, as other great composers, wrote music that is perfunctory and dull, not only in his youth, but in his second and even in his third period. To fall down before these works in wonder, love and praise, to go into raptures over the overture to "The Dedication of the House" as over the "Coriolanus" overture," is not an act of reverence; it is an exhibition of a lack of discrimination, and Beethoven himself would be the first to reject the noisy persons, among them aesthetic writers, and say: "Away with them. They know me not."

Then there are the interpreters who will not allow the great works of Beethoven to speak for themselves. They must pry into the hidden meaning, inquire into the symbolism, explain "the message to humanity." There are certain pianists whose friends swear that they have "caught the spirit of Beethoven." There are certain conductors who have invented "original interpretations" of the symphonies and overtures. They stand between the composer and the audience. If the composer threatens to be the dominating personality, they promptly kill him with their sticks.

Fortunately for the Symphony audience last night, the programme was judiciously chosen and neither Dr. Muck nor Dr. Neitzel, who played the piano part of the concerto, is among the discoverers or the improvers of Beethoven's music. Each has listened to the Titan, and not merely told him things.

Dr. Muck's Leading Was Sane.

Dr. Muck did not follow the example of some German conductors—Franz Wuellner was one of them—who in the allegro of the overture, emphasized the stern "Sarabande" chords by deliberately checking the pace, so that the continuity of musical thought was wholly lost, and the passage was turned into a separate chapter without inevitable relationship with what preceded and followed. He obtained the due emphasis without interrupting the flow. His treatment of the coda with the opening muttering and preparation for some great scene, with the turning of anticipation into reality, with the final tumult of jubilation, was masterly.

Yet the performance of the overture, as of the symphony, was constantly elastic, and there was ever the thought of the various melodic figures that should be sung, of the moods that should be suggested, of the one great climax in the expression. In his management of the climax Dr. Muck shows his operatic training. He subordinates passages that to some seem important, but these passages do not, therefore, become unimportant, for they serve in the launching of the chief dramatic stroke, or, as a background, they enhance the effect that escapes those who are passionate in their regard for detail.

...ave out the first theme of the Eroica in the first movement of the symphony as though the composer were improvising tentatively, but with the confirmation of the full orchestra he established the prevailing tempo. His reading of the symphony was one of poetic liberty which did not approach license. However great the freedom in movement, the underlying rhythm was maintained, the controlling thought was vividly presented. In his interpretation of the famous allegretto he steered clear of both the inexorable rigidity that makes the melody square-toed, and of the sentiment that is of close kin to sentimentalism. All in all the performance of the symphony was poetically dramatic and engrossing.

Neitzel Earned His Applause.

Dr. Neitzel chose the concerto in G major, which is now chiefly conspicuous for the rare and unconventional beauty of the second movement and for the occasional hints at the surpassing greatness of Beethoven in the other movements. His performance was thoughtful, but not labored or dryly scholastic. It was sane.

There was no attempt to turn passages of pure formalism into "inspired thought." There was the evident appreciation of the composer's romantic spirit which found full expression in the Andante and in other pages now and then attempted to make its way. Technically, the performance was clean-cut and fluent in the bravura passages, and the phrasing of the melodic sections was rhetorically convincing and artistic. Dr. Neitzel was warmly greeted and liberally applauded.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first of the season's Boston Symphony orchestra pension fund concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on next Sunday evening, Dec. 30, at 8 o'clock. The object of these concerts, as is well known, is to increase the endowment fund of the pension institution and thus provide for the old age or sickness of members of the orchestra. Thanks to the generous spirit in which Boston has patronized these concerts, the fund has been steadily and surely increasing. With the two concerts each season and the dues from the members of the orchestra, the players will soon be on a pension basis as favorable as those which are found in continental orchestras which are maintained by the state. All this helps to assure the esprit de corps which has been peculiarly characteristic of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Nothing concerning the orchestra was nearer the heart of Mr. Gericke, and he took infinite pains in the pension fund concerts, approving heartily their object. Dr. Muck is now undertaking the work in the same spirit.

He will play seven overtures and preludes of Wagner in their chronological order, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhaeuser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and "Parsifal." "The Ring" will be represented by the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods."

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

New York, Monday, December 24, 1906.

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Extraordinary things have been said of Bruckner's seventh symphony, which Dr. Muck recently had the temerity to produce not only in Boston, where the neo-French school of composition is in favor, but also in New York, where musical censors have little or no appreciation for modern contributions to musical literature unless their appeal be immediate and obvious. One critic, for example, put much stress on the "stupendous ugliness" of parts of the Bruckner work. Instead of giving credit to the conductor and his orchestra for bringing forward a long-neglected composition in a way that would have delighted the heart of its creator, the critic praised Muck and his men for their success is disguising its ugliness. It is lamentable enough that the performance of the works of a man long ago acknowledged abroad to be among the great symphonists, should meet with little encouragement in a city which proclaims itself one of the musical centres of the world; but it is still more lamentable that statements so misleading as the assertion that a good deal of Bruckner's music is ugly should find their way into print. We do not question that the average amateur and professional musician not tied to the apron-strings of the classicists would pay little attention to such a criticism. At the same time, an attack of that sort might have influence with persons who have not heard Bruckner's symphony. To be sure, we believe ugliness in music is perfectly justifiable under certain circumstances. Superbly effective examples of cacophonous music are found in Strauss's tone poems. The end justifies the means. But the character of Bruckner's music is so manifestly euphonious, its charm depends so largely on the noble breadth and simplicity of its themes, the beauty of its counterpoint, the grandeur of its harmonies and the radiance of its orchestration, that one stands utterly amazed at a criticism which points out a quality which gives an absolutely erroneous notion of the master's music.

"Wise critics who have studied the history of music," writes Bruckner's detractor, "hesitate before damning any music simply on the ground that it is ugly. What sounds ugly to-day will sound beautiful fifty years hence. But Bruckner's symphony has had twenty years' rest. In the meantime local music-lovers have been trained to a taste for Tschaikowsky, Brahms, and Richard Strauss, three composers differing greatly from one another in style and differing still more greatly from Beethoven and Mozart. We have listened to the inventions of such writers as D'Indy, Loeffler, Debussy, Bruneau and the rest of the harmonic agony school and we have learned to love music that has sting in it. We do not any more care for candy for breakfast, candy for luncheon, candy for dinner. And in spite of all this, we still find two out of the four movements of this E major symphony dull, needlessly involved, bald in idea and tiresome in treatment."

...What does this critic mean by "we"—wise or unwise?—mean by "we"? Is he referring to himself or to the public? If the term "we" is opposed to comprise the musical people of New York, is this not saddling upon them an opinion they have not expressed? "No one of the music-lovers," the writer says in another place, "who have spent most of their lives in observing musical doings was deceived by the applause which followed Dr. Muck's reading of Bruckner's E major symphony. That applause was not an expression of gratitude to old Bruckner for projecting into the world his troublous music, but to Dr. Muck for his clear, lucid and euphonious reading of the composition." Is not this stating a deduction that has not been verified? How can it be assumed that none of the music-lovers believed the applause was for Bruckner, unless all or most of them had been questioned as to their opinions?

It cannot be said the applause that followed the performance of Bruckner's symphony was wildly enthusiastic. Strange would it have been if a composition of this character, a work which lasts more than an hour and demands close attention, had been received with unreserved approval by an audience made up for the most part of persons absolutely unfamiliar with Bruckner's music. Would Brahms's first symphony, one may ask pertinently, have evoked any greater outburst of applause under similar circumstances? That composer's works follow the classical models much more closely than do Bruckner's. But even so, would his symphony have created a deeper impression if the public had had no opportunity to hear it in the last twenty years? It is absurd to argue that because music lovers have been "trained to a taste for Tschaikowsky, Brahms and Strauss" and have listened to the music of D'Indy, Loeffler and Debussy, a lack of appreciation of Bruckner's symphony on first hearing was a strong po nt against it. As a fact, however, there was far more appreciation of the symphony than some would have us believe. Indeed, many music lovers of experience felt that the work made decidedly a more favorable impression than it would have been reasonable to expect under the circumstances. Little doubt that a good portion of the applause was intended to be complimentary to the performance alone; but if some of it was not given in direct "gratitude to old Bruckner for projecting into the world his troublous music," it was meant at least as an expression of thanks to Dr. Muck and his men for producing, with great labor and pains, a composition that deserves to be heard more often, to put it mildly, than once in twenty years. It is safe to say Bruckner's symphony would have received a far different treatment from Dr. Muck's audience if every member of that gathering had felt as did the writer quoted above, which seems to be his assumption.

In spite of this unreasonable opposition to Bruckner he eventually will come into his own in New York, for his music is so rich in big ideas, so interesting in workmanship, so sublime in spirit that it simply cannot be neglected. Music lovers have been "trained to a taste" for other composers, we are told. The process is necessary in the case of all music that is worthy, and Bruckner's is no exception; but how can that end be attained unless brave men, like Dr. Muck, take it upon themselves to do missionary work? And how can we expect such men to toil in that direction without encouragement from those whose duty it should be to fight for, not against, the spreading of musical culture and the expansion of our musical outlook? Say what one may, the musical population of this city is exceedingly narrow in its æsthetic tastes. We seem to be satisfied with hearing repeatedly the old and trite. We like to be up to date in most things; but when it comes to new music we stop our ears lest our minds be poisoned by unfamiliar harmonies and dissonances. Novelties seldom win success here. What wonder, when those who have an opportunity to direct public taste show an opposition amounting almost to bitterness toward all that is best since Wagner! It would be interesting to inquire how much of the music accepted now by the public (and the critics) as worthy of admiration was received favorably by the newspapers when first given. How many of the censors of music, one wonders, who now are attacking Strauss, Bruckner and others, understood Wagner from the beginning? It is a reflection on conditions in New York, we assert, that a work like Pierne's "Children's Crusade" (delightful though it be in its own way) should cause outbursts of "critical" ecstasy, and a piano concerto by Scharwenka (a cheap concoction of obvious effects) elicit words of praise, while a composition of real and compelling beauty, the welling up of true inspiration, should be made the target for vituperation.

MAX SMITH.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 24, 1906

In Beethoven's seventh symphony on Saturday night Dr. Muck and the orchestra matched the performance that they gave of it on Friday afternoon. Curiously, with the more stimulating atmosphere of the evening concert, conductor and men warmed a little slowly to their work, and the first movement lacked the reanimating quality that made the other three rise to spontaneous life. Once under way all went as memorably as it did on Friday and at the end of the scherzo the audience brought the orchestra to its feet and even lingered after the finale to recall the conductor. Dr. Neitzel, in turn, repeated the admirable impression that he made as a continent pianist on Friday. He could not reanimate the first movement of Beethoven's fourth concerto, because the years have stilled it, but he could give it lucidity, transparency and roundness of phrase and an unforced brightness of ornament. The slow movement, which is the secret of the concerto's long life, invited the songful beauty that he gave it, and he touched the finale with a clear and rhythmic brilliance.

H. T. P.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

DECEMBER 24, 1906

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—"Egmont Overture."
Beethoven—Fourth Piano Concerto, in G major. Soloist, Dr. Otto Neitzel.
Beethoven—Seventh Symphony, in A major.

Once upon a time, before Domestic symphonies and keyless "tone-poems" existed, there lived a sturdy musician named Beethoven. He was a thorn in the flesh to the old fogies of his neighborhood and was thought very much of a radical by those who knew him. Many considered him given to dissonances and to freedom of form. But he believed that there should be more of consonance than of dissonance in Music; that there should be more of hope than of dejection, more of good than of evil, more of light than of shadow, in true Art-works.

The concert, on this occasion, was devoted entirely to compositions by this composer, built upon this strange plan. The audience, oddly enough, seemed to be delighted with music which they could understand, and applauded each number with great enthusiasm, forgetting that (according to latter-day authorities) incomprehensibility should ever be the chief charm of Art and that music that does not mystify and puzzle is valueless. There was not one minute of ugly, sour, hopeless pessimism in the entire programme, and the absence of morbidness calls for the severest censure. Does Mr. Beethoven expect us, the rickety neurotics of the 20th century, to be hopeful, or to be healthy? We cannot for a moment entertain such a proposition!

Dr. Muck sometimes runs to extremes in slow tempo, and this was in evidence once or twice in the "Egmont" overture. But the work on the whole received an effective reading, especially in the triumphant fanfares of the end, and in the joyous piccolo whistlings.

The G major concerto always seems to us a more genial and perfect work than the much-vaunted "Emperor" concerto, but pianists almost always perform the latter in preference to this poetic composition. We had the G major concerto given, at this concert, by two doctors of philosophy, one as conductor and one as pianist. Perhaps this was the reason that we did not find quite as much poetry in it as when Baermann and Paur gave it. We may be excused for being a little hyper-critical in this field, for we have two eminent Beethoven pianists (Baermann and Perabo) resident in Boston and when a stranger is imported from Germany to grace our symphony concerts with a Beethoven number, we may reasonably ask—"Warum?"

Nevertheless, if Dr. Nietzel leaned a trifle to the academic side, he was always clear and evidently knew his work in every measure. There was a sweet sense of security in listening to the concerto as it was performed on Saturday and Dr. Neitzel was much applauded. When one bears in mind that he is also an eminent musical critic, an essayist and a lecturer, one is convinced that he must be a species of "Admirable Crichton" in music.

Dr. Neitzel used the original Beethoven cadenzas in this work. One gains and loses by this process. The technique of Beethoven's time was puerile compared with the effects of today, and the few trills and octave passages (they were played with a stiff wrist in Beethoven's time) could scarcely give the impression of virtuosity that one gets from a Rubenstein or even a Moscheles cadenza. Per Contra these cadenzas were most thoroughly in keeping with the work and developed its figures with artistic unity. They were also properly short, while Reinecke, Mrs. Beach and the host of "cadenza-makers" are apt to go to great lengths in their glittering displays. It was in this concerto that Beethoven began to get impatient of the whole cadenza business, as his mark in the finale—"La Cadenza sia corta"—may show. In the next concerto, the "Emperor," he abolishel the solo cadenza and united the orchestra with the piano in the exhibit of technique, in the first movement. Brahms also turned against the cadenza in his last piano concerto, and it is possible that the entire cadenza display may some day be abolished, although it dies hard.

The symphony was gloriously played. Dr. Muck had evidently studied deeply into its effects and the old work became as new because of the virile interpretation. Yet there was no seeking after new meanings, no meretricious "individualization" in the reading. It was simply the manly and healthy Beethoven in a good robust mood. It is the most rhythmic of musical works and the dactyllic pulsation of the first movement and the alternation of dactyl and spondee of the second were firmly adhered to. The second, the slow movement, deserves the highest praise, for Dr. Muck avoided the lachrymose and mournful mood with which some conductors invest it (and which Beethoven expressly contradicted by his "Allegretto" mark), and gave it earnestness and great dignity without a trace of morbidness.

The Scherzo awakened the greatest enthusiasm on the part of the audience, which rather surprised us, for the contents of this are the least powerful of the symphony and the excess of repeats only seems to weaken the movement. But the finale was wonderful. It was given with a dash and vigor that made it very exciting. It was taken at a speed that made it impossible to recognize the details of the figures; it was too rapid for the comfort of even the auditor, not to speak of the orchestral players, but it gave a result that perhaps justified the outline sketch.

Dr. Muck has given us two surprises with works that we supposed had nothing new in store for us,—the Brahms C minor symphony, and this symphony of Beethoven. It will easily be recognized that this is a harder task than to paralyze us with new works of Strauss or Mahler. Yet the "Sinfonia Domestica" is coming soon.

Louis C. Elson.

[100]

The Boston Journal
DECEMBER 24, 1906.

BEETHOVEN NIGHT FOR THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Gives Superb Presentation of Master's Works—Dr. Neitzel Proves Virtuosity.

It was Beethoven night at the Symphony for the ninth concert, with an overture, a symphony and a concerto, the latter played by a distinguished critic and musician who has made himself an authority on all things connected with the great composer and his work. It was, therefore, an evening of refined and sober interest, lacking in musical excitement, perhaps, but worth experiencing now and then to prove that the moderns have all much to learn from the master of them all.

Dr. Muck was in a mood that made Beethoven especially heroic. His reading of the "Egmont" overture was splendidly virile, full of contrasting tones, climactically brilliant and impressive. In the seventh symphony, too, his strong temperament colored richly, but did not spoil the beauty of the work. The exquisite second movement, in particular, was a wonderful exhibition of poetic expression, melodic clarity, appealing tenderness.

Dr. Otto Neitzel, the critic and instructor of Cologne, played the concerto in G major, and interpreted it with a grace and intellectual charm that left no one any just reason for dwelling upon the thought that he was not a resounding virtuoso or a passionate poet of the piano. His reading of the work—not always one of sustained interest—was full of a subtle refinement that never became pedantry, and his technical equipment was ample for the demands made upon it. Altogether his was a sincere and luminous performance, one that might well have been studied by aspirants for pianistic honors.

BOSTON TRAVELER
DECEMBER 27, 1906.

AVERY interesting fact about the Wagnerian programme that Dr. Muck has prepared for the Pension Fund Concert, which will be given in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening, is that it will be the first time that he has ever put any part of "Parsifal" on a concert programme. He hesitated much about putting the Vorspiel to Wagner's sacred festival play on this programme, but he finally decided to do it and thus made the list of Wagnerian Overtures and Preludes complete. Dr. Muck, as is well known, has been conductor of "Parsifal" at the last four Bayreuth festivals, and he is thoroughly imbued with the belief that it is improper to perform any part of this work outside of the theatre for which Wagner intended it. He is one of those who were entirely out of sympathy with the performance of "Parsifal" in this country. To him "Parsifal" is all that Wagner ever intended it to be, a sacred work.

As Dr. Muck is generally considered to be the greatest interpreter of "Parsifal" since the late Hermann Levi, the performance of the prelude will be followed with more than usual interest.

BOSTON JOURNAL
DECEMBER 29, 1906

The last concert of the old year will be that given in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra. The program comprises seven overtures and preludes by Wagner, the operas represented being "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and "Parsifal." As the "Ring" has no preludes, properly speaking, Dr. Muck has chosen as its representative the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods." Excepting the early and almost forgotten operas "Die Feen" and "Das Liebesverbot," all of Wagner's works are represented here in chronological order, the dates being: "Rienzi," 1842; "The Flying Dutchman," 1843; "Tannhauser," 1845; "Lohengrin," 1848; "Tristan and Isolde," 1865; "The Mastersingers," 1868; the "Ring," 1854-1876, and "Parsifal," 1882. Thus the program gives a bird's-eye view of the musical development of the great composer. The program is altogether unusual and interesting and it is a question whether anything like it has ever been given in this country. It is also very important from a musical point of view because of Mr. Muck's prestige as an interpreter of Wagner's music. None of the younger generation of conductors, the generation following Richter and Levi, has been more closely connected with the Wagnerian movement. It was he who gave the first complete performance of "The Mastersingers" in Austria, and it was he who conducted the first performances of the "Ring" in Russia. As is well known, he has conducted the performances of "Parsifal" at the last four Bayreuth festivals. The announcement of a performance of a Wagner music-drama in Berlin under his direction has always meant an overflowing house, so highly is his authority esteemed there.

TRANSCRIPT,
DECEMBER 27, 1906

The Symphony Orchestra's Concert for Itself

Five or six times in a musical year the audiences of the Symphony concerts may pay their compliments to the men of the orchestra. A particular number is particularly well played, as was the scherzo of Beethoven's seventh symphony last Saturday, and the applause is very hearty. The conductor acknowledges it once or twice, and then, as Dr. Muck did last week, calls the men to their feet. Three or four weeks hence there may be another such incident, a third in February, and so onward. They make indeed the only opportunities in the course of the regular concerts in which the public that frequents them may prove its understanding and its appreciation of the share of the men in the excellence of the orchestra. When the reviewers of other cities make those flattering comparisons between our band and the bands of their town, they usually note the superior musicianly quality of the men of our orchestra. Trite as the phrase is, they can call ours nothing else than an orchestra of virtuosi. We in our turn take this distinction for granted. It is rather our way in Boston. "Why should it not be?" we ask complacently. It is this complacence that has hampered a little the two concerts that the men of the orchestra give each year for their pension fund. Their own dues are the foundation of it, while the concerts should add annually a substantial story to the superstructure. It is easy to say that forty-eight concerts in seven months by the Symphony Orchestra are enough. Why should its public come to hear it in two more, unless there is a very eminent conductor, singer or virtuoso or an unusual programme to give them especial interest?

There is no reason, perhaps, beyond the human and impelling one of familiarity, appreciation and liking for the men whom it hears and watches almost weekly and year upon year from October to May. After all, the Symphony Orchestra is no machine that goes of itself, so to say, Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings at Symphony Hall. The conductor aside, it is a body of ninety-odd men, each with his individual traits and excellence, and the sum of them is the quality and the virtue of the orchestra. Week after week the audiences at the Symphony concerts take their pleasure of this quality. Twice a year at the concerts for the pension fund they may directly reciprocate their delight in it. Even at these the men of the orchestra usually make no routine return. They brought Richard Strauss here to conduct at one of the concerts. Eminent singers and instrumentalists have come gladly to their aid. Or, as they did last spring and as they are doing again next Sunday night, they can give our opera-starved public fragments of Wagner's music. This time, however, it is a Wagner concert of a new sort. Rightly from one point of view, Dr. Muck will not tear fragments out of the body of the music-dramas, strip them of setting and action and play them "in concert form." He is willing to conduct in the overtures and the preludes and in purely orchestral fragments like the apotheosis of Siegfried in the last act of "Götterdämmerung." Out of these, in chronological order from "Rienzi" through "Parsifal," he and his men have made their programme—a different Wagner programme from any that has hitherto been played in Boston. As for the outside public to whom the men of the orchestra have no particular interest, the concert brings one of the few opportunities to hear Dr. Muck and in the music in which he has gained most distinction in German opera houses.

H. T. P.

At the Symphony concerts of Jan. 4 and 5, just before the third trip of the orchestra to other cities, it is to play for the first time here the symphony in E minor by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, little of whose music is yet known in Boston.

The programme for the next Sunday chamber concert, at which the Symphony Quartet will appear, is exceptionally promising. It includes the quartet in A major by the young Russian composer, Glière, which "the Kneisels" made known in November and which proved individual and interesting, and a sonata for violin and viola by Leclair, the virtuoso and composer of the eighteenth century—a combination of instruments that we seldom hear nowadays. Mr. Hess plays the violin part and Mr. Férir, the viola.

SUNDAY HERALD
DECEMBER 30, 1906.

Dr. Muck, who will conduct the pension fund concert this evening in Symphony Hall, is widely known and highly esteemed in Europe as a Wagnerian conductor. He gave in Austria the first uncut performance of "The Mastersingers," and he was the first to conduct performances of the "Ring" in Russia. He also conducted a brilliant series of Wagnerian operas at Covent Garden, and he has won additional fame as a conductor of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth. This is with reference to the Wagner programme of tonight.

Miss Emma Cecile Nagel, a young soprano of this city, sang at the Murray Hill [illegible] New York, at the annual entertainment [illegible] New York florists, dealers and [illegible] and Benevolent Association, Dec. 28.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
DECEMBER 29, 1906

The last concert of the old year will be that given in Symphony Hall, tomorrow evening, for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra. The programme comprises seven overtures and preludes by Wagner, the operas represented being "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristand and Isolde," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and "Parsifal." As the "Ring" has no preludes, properly speaking, Dr. Muck has chosen as its representative the Funeral March from "Dusk of the Gods."

[10]

THE BOSTON TRAVELER
Eighty-Fi DECEMBER 29, 1906. Established 18

THE item of chief interest in the next Symphony programme is a symphony by Jean Sibelius, the representative composer of Finland. It is his first symphony, in E minor, and has never been played here. His second symphony in D major, was played by Mr. Gericke on March 11 and 12, 1904. Sibelius was born in 1865, and 20 years later entered the University of Helsinfors to study law. This he soon gave up for music, which he studied first in his native city and later in Berlin and Vienna. This symphony was composed in 1899.

The soloist will be the first 'cellis of the orchestra, Mr. Warnke, who will play Volkmann's concerto for [illegible] instrument.

The last concert of the old year will be that given in Symphony hall, tomorrow evening, for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra. The programme comprises seven overtures and preludes by Wagner, the operas represented being "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Master-singers of Nuremberg," and "Parsifal." As the "Ring" has no preludes, properly speaking, Dr. Muck has chosen as its representative the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods."

BOSTON AMERICAN
DECEMBER 30, 1906.

ADAMOWSKI AS SOLOIST WINS PLAUDITS.

Liszt's "Christus" Music Fails to Rouse Enthusiasm of Symphony Audience.

By Kent Perkins.

It was an "off night" at Symphony Hall in more senses than one last evening. In the first place, Dr. Muck was absent. He was indisposed, not seriously, but sufficiently through trouble with his throat to make it seem wise for him to stay at home and save himself for to-night's Pension Fund Concert. Professor Hess conducted in his place.

Then, too, the programme was a makeshift one. Dr. Muck had planned to have the concert one of Polish music entirely, but it was discovered at the eleventh hour that there was no copy of one of the scheduled compositions in this country; so a new program was thrown together. It began with Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, op. 56 A.

Then came Gustav Strube's violin concerto in F sharp minor, which was performed for the first time last year by Mr. Adamowski, to whom it is dedicated. Mr. Adamowski essayed it again last night. It is a work of marked strength, originality and beauty. The solo violinist played it much more satisfactorily than he did on the first occasion and both he and the composer, who led the orchestra, were called out by enthusiastic plaudits.

Christmas Music by Liszt.

A praiseworthy attempt to give a seasonable tone to the programme was made in the final selection, which consisted of two extracts from Liszt's oratorio "Christus," the "Shepherds' Song at the Manger" and the "March of the Three Holy Kings." But the audience apparently was not in a mood for such music and received it coolly.

Perhaps the people were tired of Christmas as it publicly manifests itself in these days and did not like to be reminded even remotely of the recent past of hurly-burly present-buying and entertainment. Or, possibly, the music was too little like the modern Christmas and the holiday shops.

It is simple, pastoral, devotional, deeply spiritual. It smacks not at all of the material glitter of life. The "Shepherds' Song," which was heard here for the first time, is a beautiful song of men who watch their flocks by night, and is full of adoration for the Divine Babe in the manger, reaching a lofty flight in a hymn-like section that is placed between the purely pastoral portions.

Spiritual Triumph Typified.

The "March of the Three Holy Kings" is stately, without pomposity, and is imbued with an exalted simplicity befitting the journey of the single-minded potentates who followed the wondrous Star, bearing gifts to the lowly King of Kings. There is effulgent glory in the representation of the Star and abundant triumph that typifies the coming spiritual dominion of the King to whom the three were marching, but it is not the grandiose tribute of sound that is paid an earthly potentate and requires a certain amount of devotional sympathy for anything like proper appreciation. the people were little moved.

The orchestra under Professor Hess did excellent work and its interpretation of the music was admirable in every way. Yet the people were moved.

per Post
y New York
ate State N Y

Now that Dr. Muck has taught us to enjoy (with some reserves, to be sure) Bruckner's seventh symphony, we are ready for some of the others. The eighth, unfortunately, lasts an hour and a half, and would therefore practically take up a whole programme. Yet it had a great triumph when played by Nikisch's Berlin Philharmonic. Professor Tiebert wrote that the impression on the audience was overwhelming: "After the scherzo, and after the adagio, a storm of applause swept through the hall such as follows only popular favorites. . . . A man who can invent thoughts like those in the adagio, build up contrasts like those in the scherzo, must be ranked with those [illegible] to whom we look up and whom one does not criticise.

BOSTON, DECEMBER Herald 30th.

SYMPHONY CONCERT CONDUCTED BY HESS

Christmas Music from Liszt's Oratorio "Christus," One Feature.

VIOLIN CONCERTO OF STRUBE HEARD AGAIN

Brahms' Variations on Theme of Haydn One of Numbers on Programme.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Variations on a theme of Haydn....Brahms
Concerto No. 2, in F-sharp minor, for violin.....Strube
Shepherds' Song at the Manger and March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus".....Liszt

Dr. Muck, in consequence of a sore throat, did not conduct the orchestra at the public rehearsal or at the concert last night. Willy Hess led in his place. It is stated positively that Dr. Muck will conduct at the Pension Fund Concert tonight.

The programme was a singular one and the concert, as a whole, was not one of engrossing interest. If the object was to provide cheerful music, with a view to the celebration of Christmas, why should the variations by Brahms have been put on the programme? One of these variations, grazioso, has a quasi-pastoral nature and abiding charm; but however interesting the other variations may be to students and amateur Brahmsites, the music is not associated inevitably with the thought of any festival occasion.

Mr. Strube's violin concerto was performed for the first time a year ago (Dec. 23), when Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the violinist. Mr. Adamowski was the violinist last night, and the composer conducted. The work and the performance evidently gave much pleasure to the audience. The first two movements are frankly melodious and Mr. Strube's harmonic scheme is not so super-refined and searched out as in some of his later orchestral compositions. He steers clear of the commonplace and obvious without too apparent effort, and yet there are many instances of fine musical quality both in the body itself and in the orchestral dress.

There was a time when Mr. Strube seemed intoxicated from immoderate indulgence in the ultra-modern harmonic brew. It was as though he were attempting to out-d'Indy d'Indy in his speech and rhetoric. Yet there was an honesty of purpose with a technical skill that commanded respect even when his "Fantastic Overture" was perplexingly fantastical and not convincing.

The influence of the ultra-moderns was seen in Mr. Strube's rhetoric rather than in the substance of his thought. His ideas were his own. His excursions into fields condemned by stern pedagogues and conventional "lovers of music" as miasmatic did him no harm. On the contrary, he gathered flowers not of evil but of good. In this concerto he has shown a finer discrimination in the use of modern expression. His enthusiasm is under firmer control.

The last movement appeals to the violinist of virtuoso blood and there are some unusual and pleasing orchestral effects, but it falls a little below the level of the movements that precede. Mr. Adamowski, who played throughout with gusto, was especially effective in the opening allegro and in the Reverie. His tone in the purely melodic passages was warm and persuasive, and he phrased with care. While the performance was not wholly flawless, it was romantic and full of life.

The shepherd's song at the manger from Liszt's "Christus" was played here for the first time. The "March of the Three Holy Kings" was produced here by Mr. Gericke Dec. 20, 1902. The story of the composition of this oratorio is a curious one.

Much of the music was written when Liszt was living in the Vatican and also in daily intercourse with the Princess Sayn-Wittgenstein, in religious and sentimental intercourse. Was he sincere when he said that he composed "Christ" as the Saviour was taught to him by "the village priest and the Catholic, apostolic and Roman church"? No doubt he took himself seriously at this period and he had sublime faith—in his own music. How much did the princess have to do with his imitations of old Italian ecclesiastical composers, with his expression of religious pseudo-naivete?

Take this Shepherds' Song for example? It certainly did not deserve the harsh criticism of Hanslick, who could not believe that a composer of dazzling virtuoso music could be sincere in his religious compositions. But Liszt's character was strangly complex, and this naivete that is generally puerile rather than childlike was only one phase of many. The Shepherds' Song is both pastoral and ecclesiastical, but in neither way is there the simplicity of genius, the simplicity of Handel and Gluck. Liszt's shepherds are figuring in tableaux, and there is a brilliant audience with the Princess Carolyn in a box. Or a stereopticon might be used advantageously with both this movement and the March that followed.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

LISZT AND BRAHMS WITHOUT DR. MUCK

A Light Programme with Two Fragments of Liszt's "Christus" and Brahms's "St. Anthony" Variations—The Impulses in the Three—Recitals and Chamber Concerts of Next Week—The January List

A touch of laryngitis kept Dr. Muck from his work at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. He will not conduct at the repetition tonight but—what is more essential—he will take the Wagner concert tomorrow, for the pension fund of the orchestra. As it was, Mr. Strube conducted in his own violin concerto, according to previous plans, while Mr. Hess led in Brahms's variations and in the two fragments from Liszt's "Christus." The audience received him with applause, and he conducted with intelligent understanding and ready skill, but naturally with the reserve of a man who is temporarily taking another's place, and with a curious and seemingly automatic suggestion of Dr. Muck's gestures. The audience was plainly in a mood to be pleased and it gave Mr. Adamowski, who played the violin part in the concerto with justness of execution and feeling, hearty and repeated applause.

Dr. Muck deserved the reward of his first light programme of the year and of the pleasurable concert that it brought. Except "The Song of the Shepherds" from "Christus," all the music upon it was more or less familiar—Brahms's variations on Haydn's theme called of St. Anthony, Mr. Strube's concerto for violin first played, and by Mr. Adamowski, a year ago, and "The March of the Three Holy Kings" for a second excerpt from "Christus." "The Song of the Shepherds," moreover, is by no means taxing—a gentle swelling hymn decked out with what the conventions of music have made pastoral suggestion. There is nothing in it to compare in luminous impression with the moment in "The March of the Kings"—one of the vividest moments in all Liszt's music—when the star appears in the heavens to guide them to the Holy Manger. The melodic idea that brings the clear, steadfast light, the light that was as no other, has the poetry of sound and the instrumental voices that impart it speak with illusion. Call it an "effect," as the detractors of Liszt still call both his calculations and his inspirations, but it is an "effect" that brings an authentic imaginative thrill—the more after the insistent reiteration of the progress of the kings—and a genuine vision. What Liszt saw and felt as he imagined the music comes seemingly to transparent and nearly perfect suggestion. Perhaps indeed the apparition of the star is the one moment of spontaneity in these two excerpts from "Christus." Liszt labored long at the oratorio, and other motives than musical expression spurred him to his toil. He liked in his later years at Rome to think himself a devout and innocently minded Catholic, the Abbé Liszt coming as near as he might to the priesthood of which he had dreamed as a boy. Of course he had religious fervor. He could summon any sort of fervor and transform it sometimes into musical ecstasy. But in his faith he touched this fervor with an individual and childlike simplicity of religious feeling. It remained the faith of an imaginative boyhood that could see in young, naive and trusting vision the Holy Night on the plain of Bethlehem. The manger, the star, the coming of the Magi and emotional content they strive for symbols to him. He saw and believed with the eye of a child and with the powers of a composer who loved orchestral expression he would bring the vision and the faith to equal utterance. Hence perhaps springs the conflict of impressions that these two fragments from "Christus" bring. In idea and emotional content they strive for simplicity and innocence of feeling. Yet in expression they seek a considerable sophistication and calculation of orchestral utterance. No wonder that the listener is perpetually struggling between Liszt the ecstatic pietist and Liszt the expert practitioner of instrumental effects.

In Brahms's more familiar variations, there is seemingly a similar conflict between two impulses. Each repetition of the music seems to make the original theme from Haydn more commonplace and unpromising—until Brahms's imagination and technical inventiveness begin to make it fertile. Then, like Liszt, he seems to be struggling between two purposes. The one is the fascination for him and for the expert listener of experiments, problems, and many venturesome and subtle inventions in the choosing and the development of the variations. The other is the impulse in him as a poet in tones to give those variations emotional appeal, not of the weight and gravity of the Paganini variations, for example, but of a flowing grace and a pervading lyric mood, to show perhaps that even he could write lithe and elegant music with an air of polished spontaneity. Brahms, however, has adjusted his two purposes much more smoothly than has Liszt. The fragments of "Christus" labor. The "St. Anthony" variations, with all their technical subtleties have an air of easy improvisation by a composer who has style at and to his fingertips. Not once do they lose their air of graceful fancy. Mr. Strube and Brahms are far apart, but these variations of the elder and greater man made persuasive preparation for the concerto of the younger. In it is the same smooth jointure of inventive faculty and scholarly skill with lightness of mood, grace of fancy and [illegible] But if we follow [illegible] we must [illegible] the concerto and Mr. Adamowski's playing of it for Monday.

H. T.

Concerts Next Week

The first symphony, in E minor, of Jean Sibelius, the young Finnish composer, is the notable number on the programme of the eleventh pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday next, the last before the orchestra goes on its monthly visit to other cities. The symphony will be played for the first times here, and in another column there is an account of it and of Sibelius himself. The other numbers on the programme are Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," which Mr. Gericke used to play often and Volkmann's grateful and flowing concerto for 'cello in which Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, plays the solo part.

The men of the Symphony Orchestra give a concert on Sunday evening, at eight, in Symphony Hall, for the increase of their pension fund, and a day or two ago we were writing of their and its deserv[illegible]ings. Dr. Muck will conduct and with the exception of one number he has made his programme entirely from the overtures and the preludes to Wagner's operas. He will play them in chronological order, beginning with "Rienzi" (1842); continuing with "The Flying Dutchman" (1843); "Tannhäuser" (1845); "Lohengrin" (1848); "Tristan" (1865), and "The Mastersingers" (1868); and ending with "Parsifal" (1882). The remaining number is Siegfried's glorification from the third act of "Götterdämmerung." Thus does Dr. Muck hold to his belief that fragments should not be torn from the body of Wagner's operas and shifted to the concert room, and thus does he make a Wagner programme such as has never before been made here. At no other time in the course of the season are we likely to hear him so amply as an operatic and a Wagnerian conductor.

A FINNISH COMPOSER

JEAN SIBELIUS AND THE MUSIC THAT HE WRITES

His Symphony That Dr. Muck Is to Play for the First Time Next Week—Sibelius's Career and the Traits and the Range of His Music—How It Reflects Finland and the Finnish Spirit—Its Progress Elsewhere

Though Mr. Gericke put Sibelius's second symphony, in D major, on one of his programmes two years ago, the Finlander will still be an almost unknown composer hereabouts when Dr. Muck plays his first symphony (in E minor) at the next pair of Symphony concerts. For ten years past, however, his music has steadily made its way westward from Finland and Russia. His symphonies, his tone-poems—"Finlandia," "A Saga," and "The Swan of Tuonela"—and his orchestral suites have now an established place in concerts in Germany. Thanks to Mr. Wood's eagerness for new music and for the music of eastern Europe, London has heard some of them and next spring Sibelius himself is to be one of the visiting composer-conductors at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society there. In America, Mr. Thomas, in Chicago, was the first to discover him, and the Russian Symphony Orchestra next played some of his shorter pieces in New York. Mr. Gericke gave him a place in the programmes of our orchestra and early this month at a Philharmonic concert in New York Miss Maud Powell played his concerto for violin. Meanwhile Sibelius has reached the dignity and the interest of a little monograph in English that Breitkop and Härtel published a few weeks ago—"Jean Silbelius: A Finnish Composer," by Rosa Newmarch, the accomplished writer upon Tschaikovsky and other Russian composers. At the beginning is a curiously striking drawing of Sibelius's head with the eyes of a dreamer, the mouth of a man of sensuous feeling and the nose and the chin of a man of vigorous action—a whole face indeed in which sensitiveness and resolution seem to dwell not in struggle, but composedly side by side. Mrs. Newmarch then surveys briefly the racial traits of the Finns and the physical traits of their country and traverses the slow development of literature and the arts among them.

"In the case of Sibelius," she writes, "it is essential to realise that he is the product of two civilisations: the one elemental, remote, the very memory of which was only revived after centuries of oblivion; the other, the most recent independent culture in Europe; the almost miraculous burgeoning of a stem long since accounted sapless and dead. . . . From its earliest origin the folk-music of the Finns seems to have been penetrated with melancholy. 'The Kanteletar'—a collection of lyrics which followed the national epic of 'The Kalevala'—contains one which gives the key-note of the national music. It is not true, says the anonymous singer of this poem, that Vainomöinen made the Kantele out of the jaw of a gigantic pike:

> The Kantele of care is carved,
> Formed of saddening sorrows only;
> Of hard times its arch is fashioned
> And its wood of evil chances.
> All the strings of sorrows twisted,
> All the screws of adverse fortunes;
> Therefore Kantele can never
> Ring with gay and giddy music.
> Hence this harp lacks happy ditties,
> Cannot sound in cheerful measures,
> As it is of care constructed,
> Formed of saddening sorrows only.

"These lines, while they indicate the prevailing mood of the future music of Finland, express also the difference between the Finnish and Russian temperaments. The Finn is more sober in sentiment, less easily moved to extremes of despair or of boisterous glee than his neighbor. The causes of this innate gravity and restrained melancholy of the Finnish temperament are not far to seek. Influences climatic and historical have moulded this hyperborean people into what we now find them. Theirs is the most northern of all civilized countries, and every yard of cultivated soil represents a strenuous conflict with natural conditions. Situated between Sweden and Russia, Finland was for centuries the scene of obstinate struggles between these rival nationalities. Years of hard schooling have thus made the Finns a serious-minded, self-reliant race; not to be compared with the Russians for receptivity or exuberance of temperament, but more laborious, steadier of purpose and possessed of a latent energy which once aroused, is not easily diverted or checked. . . . That the Finns still live as close to Nature as their ancestors, is evident from their literature, which reflects innumerable pictures from this land of granite rocks and many-tinted moorlands; of long sweeps of melancholy fens and ranges of hills clothed with dark pine-forests; the whole enclosed in a silver network of flashing waters—the gleam and shimmer of more than a thousand lakes. The solitude and silence, the familiar landscape, the love of home and country—we find all this in the music of Sibelius."

With this introduction Mrs. Newmarch passes to Sibelius himself. "Jean Sibelius," she writes, whose name—like those of the hand-maidens in 'The Blessed Damozel'—makes in itself a symphony, was born in 1865. He soon abandoned the law for music, studied under Wegelius at the Helsingfors Institute and afterwards visited Berlin and Vienna, in which cities he worked under Becker and Goldmark. Thanks to a Government grant, Sibelius has been able, for some years past, to devote himself to creative work, consequently his output is considerable for a man who has barely reached the prime of life. His works include one choral and two orchestral symphonies; four symphonic poems; two orchestral suites; incidental music to Järnefelt's drama 'Kuolema,' and Adolf Paul's play, 'King Christian II.;' one or two ballads for voice and orchestra and a violin concerto. Among chamber music are a few early efforts, and a pianoforte sonata recently published as Op. 12, besides a number of pianoforte pieces and songs. His opus number has reached 48, and I gather from his own information that several important works still remain in manuscript.

"Sibelius's strong individuality made itself felt at the outset of his career. It was, of course, a source of perplexity to the academic mind. Were the eccentricity and uncouthness of some of his early compositions the outcome of ignorance, or of a deliberate effort to be original at any price? It was, as usual, the public, not the specialists, who found the just verdict. Sibelius's irregularities were, in part, the struggles of a very robust and individual mind to express itself in its own way; but much that seemed weird and wild in his first works was actually the echo of the national spirit and therefore better understood by the public than by the connoisseurs. Genius commonly develops in two ways: either it starts by a comparatively conventional or even imitative phase, and, waxing bolder as it grows, ends by sweeping before it every impediment to liberty of conscience and freedom of utterance, as in the case of Wagner and Strauss. Or it may begin by fierce protest and by throwing to the four winds all the pacta conventa of its art, and eventually settle down in dignity and contentment within its own self-adopted limits of expression. In this category we may place Sibelius. With the advance of years, he has shown an increasing respect for the requirements of conventional form, without, however, becoming conventional in the contemptible sense of the word. The sign of this reaction has been the revision of many of his early works.

"From his novitiate, Sibelius's melody has been stamped with a character of its own. This is due in a measure to the fact that it derives from the folk-music and the rune—the rhythm in which the traditional poetry of the Finns is sung. The inviolable metrical law of the rune makes no distinction between epos and melos. In some of Sibelius's earlier works, where the national tendency is more crudely apparent, the invariable and primitive character of the rune-rhythm is not without influence upon his melody, lending it a certain monotony which is far from being devoid of charm. 'The epic and lyric runes,' says Comparetti, 'are sung to a musical phrase which is the same for every line; only the key is varied every second line, or, in the epic runes, at every repetition of the line by the second voice. The phrase is sweet, simple without emphasis, with as many notes as there are syllables'. Sibelius's melody, at its maturity, is by no means of the short-winded and broken kind, but rather a sustained and continuous cantilena which lends itself to every variety of emotional curve and finds its ideal expression through the medium of the English horn. His harmony—a law unto itself—is sometimes of pungent dissonance, and sometimes has a mysterious, penetrating sweetness, like the harmony of the natural world. In the quaint words of the Finnish critic Flodin: "It goes its own way, which is surely the way of God, if we acknowledge that all good things come from him."

"It seems impossible to hear any one of Sibelius's characteristic works without being convinced that it voices the spirit of an unfamiliar race. His music contains all the essential qualities to which I have referred as forming part and parcel of the Finnish temperament. And yet, I have heard even musicians contend that Sibelius was quite German in style and sentiment and that they listened in vain for the racial note. This is not surprising, for I have also heard Tschaikovsky dismissed as utterly cosmopolitan, and Borodin—of all the racy singers on earth—described as far too French to be Russian! The fact is that in hearing a new work we are often more concerned with what is reminiscent than with what is being said for the first time. The criticism overheard on leaving a concert-room is almost invariably comparative. Yet we must indeed be dull of hearing if we fail to observe in the music of Sibelius an undercurrent of something absolutely novel, and therefore disconcerting: the ground-swell, as it were, of that strong and troubled tide of Finnish sentiment with which so few of us are as yet in touch."

Mrs. Newmarch then describes briefly each of Sibelius's larger compositions and of the symphony that Dr. Muck is to play next week she writes in particular:

"The conciseness and in most cases the brevity of Sibelius's symphonic poems are alike remarkable, and prove that in his case the freer form has not been adopted as an excuse for unbridled loquacity, or incoherent rhapsodizing. Had he only composed such orchestral works as 'The Swan of Tuonela,' 'Finlandia' and even 'A Saga,' much as we should admire their poetical conception, rhythmic vigor and novelty of instrumentation, there would be some justification in questioning whether Sibelius possessed the large structural style and sustained eloquence which alone could entitle him to a place in the front rank of the symphonists.

"The two published symphonies furnish a satisfactory answer not merely to this question, but to one of far wider significance, namely—is the symphony really an obsolete form? The narrowest type of programmist will reply that it is not only obsolete, but dead and buried under an ever-increasing tumulus of modern symphonic poems. Armed with the Sibelius scores, which palpitate with vital energy, we can effectively retort to such an argument: "Les gens que vous tuez se portent assez bien." If these symphonies prove anything, it is that the vision of Ezekiel in the Valley can be perpetually reënacted in the world; that the forms which appear to each succeeding generation as the dry bones of academical tradition can be rearticulated and live again, in beauty and flexibility, if only the breath of genius passes through them. The symphonies of Sibelius are at least as conventional as those of Tchaikovsky and Dvorák. They bear no indication of any literary basis; they are not fettered to the expression of any particular sentiment, heroic, pathetic, pastoral, or even domestic; but they appeal to us and thrill us by the sheer originality, beauty and vigor of the musical idea.

"The first symphony in E minor was composed in 1899. The plan of the work is spacious, Sibelius has something to say and takes his time—a liberal forty minutes—in saying it; its structure is solid, but not heavy, while it contains—especially in the finale—an extraordinary wealth of thematic material. From the melancholy, half-pastoral theme given out by the clarinet in the opening bars, to the brief impressive coda with which the work closes, we are conscious of a sweeping tide of virile power; a sustained flight of inspiration that neither flags, nor takes refuge in padding, nor drops into emotional incoherence. My first impression of the work was the essentially 'plein air' quality of the music. Sibelius's oneness with nature, and that kind of poetical pantheism which is the inheritance of his race, are evident in every page of this symphony. His orchestral combinations, more especially his use of the wood-wind, seem at times direct echoes from the natural world, to the beauty and mystery of which he is peculiarly sensitive. Frequently this music evoked to my vision the color, atmosphere and melancholy grandeur of some masterpiece of Ruysdael. But I must not leave the impression that the symphony is mere landscape painting, such as we find occasionally in the tone-pictures of Smetana or Rimsky-Korsakoff. The vigorous Allegro energico of the first movement would alone contradict this idea; we feel sure that side by side with these reflections from the natural world the entire symphony has some very human and dramatic tale to tell—one of those unrevealed programmes of which we are ever seeking the impalpable solution.

Paper Harpers Weekly
City New York
Date [illegible] Staff

Dr. Karl Muck merits warm praise for placing upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's December concert—the evening one—Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. It is a formidable work—a work of large span, of large and noble ideas, a work that repays prolonged study; also, alas, a work that is often turgid, inchoate, excessively uneven in invention, and far too long. Yet it often sways the imagination, it is large-moulded, and it is incontestably sincere. Why it is so seldom performed in this country is fairly easy to understand. One wishes that it might always engage the activities of such an orchestra as Colonel Higginson's insurpassable band, and of so brilliantly able a conductor as Dr. Muck.

Another, though a minor, experiment was made by Dr. Muck at the matinée concert of the December pair, in the shape of a performance—the first in New York—of a new violin concerto by Mr. Gustav Strube. Mr. Strube is one of the Orchestra's first violins, and other works of his in the larger forms have been heard here. One recalls an earlier violin concerto, performed a decade ago by Mr. Kneisel and the Boston Orchestra; and a Fantastic Overture, performed here a year or two ago. His second concerto is said to be of recent composition; if so, one cannot but declare regret over the fact. If one's memory serves, the concerto of ten years ago was a work of charm and distinction; the Fantastic Overture, though it owed much to that dominating colossus, Richard Strauss, had great vigor and boldness; it did not altogether persuade, but it did not bore. But in this new concerto, Mr. Strube did not do well by his talent. There is no apparent reason why it should ever have been committed to music paper, for it says nothing, and says it at considerable length: it has not even the dubious merit of being effectively derivative. Mr. Strube is too clever a composer to expend his time, and the time of those who are always eager to listen to new music, upon such writing. The solo part was played, let it be recorded, with devotion and apparent enthusiasm by Mr. Timothée Adamowski, to whom it is dedicated.

Dr. Muck's superb accomplishments as a conductor were disclosed under more worthy conditions in the other numbers upon the programmes which he had contrived for his second appearance in New York. These were, in addition to the Bruckner symphony, the overture to Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "The Betrothed of the Czar," and Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony. Dr. Muck's readings of this music were events to be treasured in the mind—full of color, warmth, and plasticity, yet clear, luminous, firmly articulated, consistently digni-

[102]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

LISZT AND BRAHMS WITHOUT DR. MUCK

A Light Programme with Two Fragments of Liszt's "Christus" and Brahms's "St. Anthony" Variations—The Impulses in the Three—Recitals and Chamber Concerts of Next Week—The January List

A touch of laryngitis kept Dr. Muck from his work at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. He will not conduct at the repetition tonight but—what is more essential—he will take the Wagner concert tomorrow, for the pension fund of the orchestra. As it was, Mr. Strube conducted in his own violin concerto, according to previous plans, while Mr. Hess led in Brahms's variations and in the two fragments from Liszt's "Christus." The audience received him with applause, and he conducted with intelligent understanding and ready skill, but naturally with the reserve of a man who is temporarily taking another's place, and with a curious and seemingly automatic suggestion of Dr. Muck's gestures. The audience was plainly in a mood to be pleased and it gave Mr. Adamowski, who played the violin part in the concerto with justness of execution and feeling, hearty and repeated applause.

Dr. Muck deserved the reward of his first light programme of the year and of the pleasurable concert that it brought. Except "The Song of the Shepherds" from "Christus," all the music upon it was more or less familiar—Brahms's variations on Haydn's theme called of St. Anthony, Mr. Strube's concerto for violin first played, and by Mr. Adamowski, a year ago, and "The March of the Three Holy Kings" for a second excerpt from "Christus." "The Song of the Shepherds," moreover, is by no means taxing—a gentle swelling hymn decked out with what the conventions of music have made pastoral suggestion. There is nothing in it to compare in luminous impression with the moment in "The March of the Kings"—one of the vividest moments in all Liszt's music—when the star appears in the heavens to guide them to the Holy Manger. The melodic idea that brings the clear, steadfast light, the light that was as no other, has the poetry of sound and the instrumental voices that impart it speak with illusion. Call it an "effect," as the detractors of Liszt still call both his calculations and his inspirations, but it is an "effect" that brings an authentic imaginative thrill—the more after the insistent reiteration of the progress of the kings—and a genuine vision. What Liszt saw and felt as he imagined the music comes seemingly to transparent and nearly perfect suggestion. Perhaps indeed the apparition of the star is the one moment of spontaneity in these two excerpts from "Christus." Liszt labored long at the oratorio, and other motives than musical expression spurred him to his toil. He liked in his later years at Rome to think himself a devout and innocently minded Catholic, the Abbé Liszt coming as near as he might to the priesthood of which he had dreamed as a boy. Of course he had religious fervor. He could summon any sort of fervor and transform it sometimes into musical ecstasy. But in his faith he touched this fervor with an individual and childlike simplicity of religious feeling. It remained the faith of an imaginative boyhood that could see in young, naive and trusting vision the Holy Night on the plain of Bethlehem. The manger, the star, the coming of the Magi and emotional content they strive for symbols to him. He saw and believed with the eye of a child and with the powers of a composer who loved orchestral expression he would bring the vision and the faith to equal utterance. Hence perhaps springs the conflict of impressions that these two fragments from "Christus" bring. In idea and emotionalcontent they strive for simplicity and innocence of feeling. Yet in expression they seek a considerable sophistication and calculation of orchestral utterance. No wonder that the listener is perpetually struggling between Liszt the ecstatic pietist and Liszt the expert practitioner of instrumental effects.

In Brahms's more familiar variations, there is seemingly a similar conflict between two impulses. Each repetition of the music seems to make the original theme from Haydn more commonplace and unpromising—until Brahms's imagination and technical inventiveness begin to make it fertile. Then, like Liszt, he seems to be struggling between two purposes. The one is the fascination for him and for the expert listener of experiments, problems, and many venturesome and subtle inventions in the choosing and the development of the variations. The other is the impulse in him as a poet in tones to give those variations emotional appeal, not of the weight and gravity of the Paganini variations, for example, but of a flowing grace and a pervading lyric mood, to show perhaps that even he could write lithe and elegant music with an air of polished spontaneity. Brahms, however, has adjusted his two purposes much more smoothly than has Liszt. The fragments of "Christus" labor. The "St. Anthony" variations, with all their technical subtleties have an air of easy improvisation by a composer who has style at and to his fingertips. Not once do they lose their air of graceful fancy. Mr. Strube and Brahms are far apart, but these variations of the elder and greater man made persuasive preparation for the concerto of the younger. In it is the same smooth jointure of inventive faculty and scholarly skill with lightness of mood, grace of fancy and [illegible]. But if we follow our custom we must [illegible] the concerto and Mr. Adamowski's play[illegible] of it for Monday.

H. T.

Concerts Next Week

The first symphony, in E minor, of Jean Sibelius, the young Finnish composer, is the notable number on the programme of the eleventh pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday next, the last before the orchestra goes on its monthly visit to other cities. The symphony will be played for the first times here, and in another column there is an account of it and of Sibelius himself. The other numbers on the programme are Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," which Mr. Gericke used to play often and Volkmann's grateful and flowing concerto for 'cello in which Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, plays the solo part.

The men of the Symphony Orchestra give a concert on Sunday evening, at eight, in Symphony Hall, for the increase of their pension fund, and a day or two ago we were writing of their and its deservings. Dr. Muck will conduct and with the exception of one number he has made his programme entirely from the overtures and the preludes to Wagner's operas. He will play them in chronological order, beginning with "Rienzi" (1842); continuing with "The Flying Dutchman" (1843); "Tannhäuser" (1845); "Lohengrin" (1848); "Tristan" (1865), and "The Mastersingers" (1868); and ending with "Parsifal" (1882). The remaining number is Siegfried's glorification from the third act of "Götterdämmerung." Thus does Dr. Muck hold to his belief that fragments should not be torn from the body of Wagner's operas and shifted to the concert room, and thus does he make a Wagner programme such as has never before been made here. At no other time in the course of the season are we likely to hear him so amply as an operatic and a Wagnerian conductor.

A FINNISH COMPOSER

JEAN SIBELIUS AND THE MUSIC THAT HE WRITES

His Symphony That Dr. Muck Is to Play for the First Time Next Week—Sibelius's Career and the Traits and the Range of His Music—How It Reflects Finland and the Finnish Spirit—Its Progress Elsewhere

Though Mr. Gericke put Sibelius's second symphony, in D major, on one of his programmes two years ago, the Finlander will still be an almost unknown composer hereabouts when Dr. Muck plays his first symphony (in E minor) at the next pair of Symphony concerts. For ten years past, however, his music has steadily made its way westward from Finland and Russia. His symphonies, his tone-poems—"Finlandia," "A Saga," and "The Swan of Tuonela"—and his orchestral suites have now an established place in concerts in Germany. Thanks to Mr. Wood's eagerness for new music and for the music of eastern Europe, London has heard some of them and next spring Sibelius himself is to be one of the visiting composer-conductors at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society there. In America, Mr. Thomas, in Chicago, was the first to discover him, and the Russian Symphony Orchestra next played some of his shorter pieces in New York. Mr. Gericke gave him a place in the programmes of our orchestra and early this month at a Philharmonic concert in New York Miss Maud Powell played his concerto for violin. Meanwhile Sibelius has reached the dignity and the interest of a little monograph in English that Breitkop and Härtel published a few weeks ago—"Jean Silbelius: A Finnish Composer," by Rosa Newmarch, the accomplished writer upon Tschaikovsky and other Russian composers. At the beginning is a curiously striking drawing of Sibelius's head with the eyes of a dreamer, the mouth of a man of sensuous feeling and the nose and the chin of a man of vigorous action—a whole face indeed in which sensitiveness and resolution seem to dwell not in struggle, but composedly side by side. Mrs. Newmarch then surveys briefly the racial traits of the Finns and the physical traits of their country and traverses the slow deviopment of literature and the arts among them.

"In the case of Sibelius," she writes, "it is essential to realize that he is the product of two civilizations: the one elemental, remote, the very memory of which was only revived after centuries of oblivion; the other, the most recent independent culture in Europe; the almost miraculous burgeoning of a stem long since accounted sapless and dead. . . . From its earliest origin the folk-music of the Finns seems to have been penetrated with melancholy. 'The Kanteletar'—a collection of lyrics which followed the national epic of 'The Kalevala'—contains one which gives the key-note of the national music. It is not true, says the anonymous singer of this poem, that Vainomöinen made the Kantele out of the jaw of a gigantic pike:

> The Kantele of care is carved,
> Formed of saddening sorrows only;
> Of hard times its arch is fashioned
> And its wood of evil chances,
> All the strings of sorrows twisted,
> All the screws of adverse fortunes;
> Therefore Kantele can never
> Ring with gay and giddy music,
> Hence this harp lacks happy ditties,
> Cannot sound in cheerful measures,
> As it is of care constructed,
> Formed of saddening sorrows only.

"These lines, while they indicate the prevailing mood of the future music of Finland, express also the difference between the Finnish and Russian temperaments. The Finn is more sober in sentiment, less easily moved to extremes of despair or of boisterous glee than his neighbor. The causes of this innate gravity and restrained melancholy of the Finnish temperament are not far to seek. Influences climatic and historical have moulded this hyperborean people into what we now find them. Theirs is the most northern of all civilized countries, and every yard of cultivated soil represents a strenuous conflict with natural conditions. Situated between Sweden and Russia, Finland was for centuries the scene of obstinate struggles between these rival nationalities. Years of hard schooling have thus made the Finns a serious-minded, self-reliant race; not to be compared with the Russians for receptivity or exuberance of temperament, but more laborious, steadier of purpose and possessed of a latent energy which once aroused, is not easily diverted or checked. . . . That the Finns still live as close to Nature as their ancestors, is evident from their literature, which reflects innumerable pictures from this land of granite rocks and many-tinted moorlands; of long sweeps of melancholy fens and ranges of hills clothed with dark pine-forests; the whole enclosed in a silver network of flashing waters—the gleam and shimmer of more than a thousand lakes. The solitude and silence, the familiar landscape, the love of home and country—we find all this in the music of Sibelius."

With this introduction Mrs. Newmarch passes to Sibelius himself. "Jean Sibelius," she writes, whose name—like those of the hand-maidens in 'The Blessed Damozel'—makes in itself a symphony, was born in 1865. He soon abandoned the law for music, studied under Wegelius at the Helsingfors Institute and afterwards visited Berlin and Vienna, in which cities he worked under Becker and Goldmark. Thanks to a Government grant, Sibelius has been able, for some years past, to devote himself to creative work, consequently his output is considerable for a man who has barely reached the prime of life. His works include one choral and two orchestral symphonies; four symphonic poems; two orchestral suites; incidental music to Järnefelt's drama 'Kuolema,' and Adolf Paul's play, 'King Christian II.;' one or two ballads for voice and orchestra and a violin concerto. Among chamber music are a few early efforts, and a pianoforte sonata recently published as Op. 12, besides a number of pianoforte pieces and songs. His opus number has reached 48, and I gather from his own information that several important works still remain in manuscript.

"Sibelius's strong individuality made itself felt at the outset of his career. It was, of course, a source of perplexity to the academic mind. Were the eccentricity and uncouthness of some of his early compositions the outcome of ignorance, or of a deliberate effort to be original at any price? It was, as usual, the public, not the specialists, who found the just verdict. Sibelius's irregularities were, in part, the struggles of a very robust and individual mind to express itself in its own way; but much that seemed weird and wild in his first works was actually the echo of the national spirit and therefore better understood by the public than by the connoisseurs. Genius commonly develops in two ways: either it starts by a comparatively conventional or even imitative phase, and, waxing bolder as it grows, ends by sweeping before it every impediment to liberty of conscience and freedom of utterance, as in the case of Wagner and Strauss. Or it may begin by fierce protest and by throwing to the four winds all the pacta conventa of its art, and eventually settle down in dignity and contentment within its own self-adopted limits of expression. In this category we may place Sibelius. With the advance of years, he has shown an increasing respect for the requirements of conventional form, without, however, becoming conventional in the contemptible sense of the word. The sign of this reaction has been the revision of many of his early works.

"From his novitiate, Sibelius's melody has been stamped with a character of its own. This is due in a measure to the fact that it derives from the folk-music and the runo—the rhythm in which the traditional poetry of the Finns is sung. The inviolable metrical law of the rune makes no distinction between epos and melos. In some of Sibelius's earlier works, where the national tendency is more crudely apparent, the invariable and primitive character of the rune-rhythm is not without influence upon his melody, lending it a certain monotony which is far from being devoid of charm. 'The epic and lyric runes,' says Comparetti, 'are sung to a musical phrase which is the same for every line; only the key is varied every second line, or, in the epic runes, at every repetition of the line by the second voice. The phrase is sweet, simple without emphasis, with as many notes as there are syllables'. Sibelius's melody, at its maturity, is by no means of the short-winded and broken kind, but rather a sustained and continuous cantilena which lends itself to every variety of emotional curve and finds its ideal expression through the medium of the English horn. His harmony—a law unto itself—is sometimes of pungent dissonance, and sometimes has a mysterious, penetrating sweetness, like the harmony of the natural world. In the quaint words of the Finnish critic Flodin: "It goes its own way, which is surely the way of God, if we acknowledge that all good things come from him."

"It seems impossible to hear any one of Sibelius's characteristic works without being convinced that it voices the spirit of an unfamiliar race. His music contains all the essential qualities to which I have referred as forming part and parcel of the Finnish temperament. And yet, I have heard even musicians contend that Sibelius was quite German in style and sentiment and that they listened in vain for the racial note. This is not surprising, for I have also heard Tschaikovsky dismissed as utterly cosmopolitan, and Borodin—of all the racy singers on earth—described as far too French to be Russian! The fact is that in hearing a new work we are often more concerned with what is reminiscent than with what is being said for the first time. The criticism overheard on leaving a concert-room is almost invariably comparative. Yet we must indeed be dull of hearing if we fail to observe in the music of Sibelius an undercurrent of something absolutely novel, and therefore disconcerting: the ground-swell, as it were, of that strong and troubled tide of Finnish sentiment with which so few of us are as yet in touch."

Mrs. Newmarch then describes briefly each of Sibelius's larger compositions and of the symphony that Dr. Muck is to play next week she writes in particular:

"The conciseness and in most cases the brevity of Sibelius's symphonic poems are alike remarkable, and prove that in his case the freer form has not been adopted as an excuse for unbridled loquacity, or incoherent rhapsodizing. Had he only composed such orchestral works as 'The Swan of Tuonela,' 'Finlandia' and even 'A Saga,' much as we should admire their poetical conception, rhythmic vigor and novelty of instrumentation, there would be some justification in questioning whether Sibelius possessed the large structural style and sustained eloquence which alone could entitle him to a place in the front rank of the symphonists.

"The two published symphonies furnish a satisfactory answer not merely to this question, but to one of far wider significance, namely—is the symphony really an obsolete form? The narrowest type of programmist will reply that it is not only obsolete, but dead and buried under an ever-increasing tumulus of modern symphonic poems. Armed with the Sibelius scores, which palpitate with vital energy, we can effectively retort to such an argument: "Les gens que vous tuez se portent assez bien." If these symphonies prove anything, it is that the vision of Ezekiel in the Valley can be perpetually reënacted in the world; that the forms which appear to each succeeding generation as the dry bones of academical tradition can be rearticulated and live again, in beauty and flexibility, if only the breath of genius passes through them. The symphonies of Sibelius are at least as conventional as those of Tchaikovsky and Dvorák. They bear no indication of any literary basis; they are not fettered to the expression of any particular sentiment, heroic, pathetic, pastoral, or even domestic; but they appeal to us and thrill us by the sheer originality, beauty and vigor of the musical idea.

"The first symphony in E minor was composed in 1899. The plan of the work is spacious, Sibelius has something to say and takes his time—a liberal forty minutes—in saying it; its structure is solid, but not heavy, while it contains—especially in the finale—an extraordinary wealth of thematic material. From the melancholy, half-pastoral theme given out by the clarinet in the opening bars, to the brief impressive coda with which the work closes, we are conscious of a sweeping tide of virile power; a sustained flight of inspiration that neither flags, nor takes refuge in padding, nor drops into emotional incoherence. My first impression of the work was the essentially 'plein air' quality of the music. Sibelius's oneness with nature, and that kind of poetical pantheism which is the inheritance of his race, are evident in every page of this symphony. His orchestral combinations, more especially his use of the wood-wind, seem at times direct echoes from the natural world, to the beauty and mystery of which he is peculiarly sensitive. Frequently this music evoked to my vision the color, atmosphere and melancholy grandeur of some masterpiece of Ruysdael. But I must not leave the impression that the symphony is mere landscape painting, such as we find occasionally in the tone-pictures of Smetana or Rimsky-Korsakoff. The vigorous Allegro energico of the first movement would alone contradict this idea; we feel sure that side by side with these reflections from the natural world the entire symphony has some very human and dramatic tale to tell—one of those unrevealed programmes of which we are ever seeking the impalpable solution.

Paper Harpers Weekly
City New York
Date Sat'y

Dr. Karl Muck merits warm praise for placing upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's December concert—the evening one—Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. It is a formidable work—a work of large span, of large and noble ideas, a work that repays prolonged study; also, alas, a work that is often turgid, inchoate, excessively uneven in invention, and far too long. Yet it often sways the imagination, it is large-moulded, and it is incontestably sincere. Why it is so seldom performed in this country is fairly easy to understand. One wishes that it might always engage the activities of such an orchestra as Colonel Higginson's insurpassable band, and of so brilliantly able a conductor as Dr. Muck.

Another, though a minor, experiment was made by Dr. Muck at the matinée concert of the December pair, in the shape of a performance—the first in New York—of a new violin concerto by Mr. Gustav Strube. Mr. Strube is one of the Orchestra's first violins, and other works of his in the larger forms have been heard here. One recalls an earlier violin concerto, performed a decade ago by Mr. Kneisel and the Boston Orchestra; and a Fantastic Overture, performed here a year or two ago. His second concerto is said to be of recent composition; if so, one cannot but declare regret over the fact. If one's memory serves, the concerto of ten years ago was a work of charm and distinction; the Fantastic Overture, though it owed much to that dominating colossus, Richard Strauss, had great vigor and boldness; it did not altogether persuade, but it did not bore. But in this new concerto, Mr. Strube did not do well by his talent. There is no apparent reason why it should ever have been committed to music paper, for it says nothing and says it at considerable length: it has not even the dubious merit of being effectively derivative. Mr. Strube is too clever a composer to expend his time, and the time of those who are always eager to listen to new music, upon such writing. The solo part was played, let it be recorded, with devotion and apparent enthusiasm by Mr. Timothée Adamowski, to whom it is dedicated.

Dr. Muck's superb accomplishments as a conductor were disclosed under more worthy conditions in the other numbers upon the programmes which he had contrived for his second appearance in New York. These were, in addition to the Bruckner symphony, the overture to Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "The Betrothed of the Czar," and Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony. Dr. Muck's readings of this music were events to be treasured in the mind—full of color, warmth, and plasticity, yet clear, luminous, firmly articulated, consistently digni-

[102]

MUSICAL MATTERS

Symphony Program With One Novelty.

Pension Fund Concert Tonight —Mr Whitney's Song Recital.

Nordica Coming Saturday —Events of the Week.

The only novelty on the Symphony program last week was the "Shepherd's song" from the Liszt oratorio, "Christus." "The March of the Three Holy Kings," an excerpt from the same work; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn and Strube's F-sharp minor concerto for violin completed the selections. Mr Timothee Adamowski was the soloist. The Lisst song and march were in keeping with the spirit of the present season and made the performance of these numbers specially impressive. In the song of the shepherds the composer frequently introduces the pastoral idea by phrases for the wood-wind instruments, the snatches of melody being grave and mysterious in their suggestions of rural simplicity and humble homage of the herders, who visited the manger where the Christ-child lay.

Throughout the work the religious and the pastoral ideas are beautifully blended and the work made a fine contrast for the march which followed, the latter being more brilliant and pompous in its significance. Except for the long preludes by the lighter wood-winds in the "song" and the efficient work of the brass contingent in the march the performances call for no special commendation, which probably would not be the case if another orchestra was under consideration.

When Mr Strube's concerto was first played by Mr Adamowski about one year ago the great merit of the work was quickly recognized, and the performance also was generally considered the most satisfactory of any given by the popular soloist. Then, as last week, the composer directed, and in each case the whole performance was thoroughly enjoyable. Possibly Mr Adamowski has acquired greater ease and confidence in his execution since his former interpretation of the concerto for his work, especially in the reverie and adagio, was a splendid exhibition of sustained power, the violin part is almost continuous, pure intonation and dexterous fingering. The emotional import of the second movement was resonantly set forth, the G string fingering deserving particular mention, and the sweet three-note motif of the first part, and the variations and cadenza in the final movement were each played skilfully and generally without a deviation from the pitch. Composer and soloist were rapturously applauded and recalled after the performance.

The Brahms variations, nine in number, went smoothly. The oboes and bassoons in the third variation were capitally voiced, in the sixth one the difficult passage work of the violins was perfect and the finale was an excellent example of ensemble work.

On account of the illness of Dr Muck the concert master, Prof Willy Hess, directed the orchestra.

The principal number on this week's program will be the E minor symphony by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibeluis. The first cellist of the orchestra will play Volkmann's A minor concerto, and the program will begin with the overture [illegible]

SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

Despite the holiday season, when the [illegible]'s of the public are usually on other [illegible]ts than music, there has been no [illegible] of interest in the pension fund concert of the Symphony orchestra which will be given in Symphony hall this evening. A Wagner program usually attracts the music-loving public, and possibly Dr Muck was guided in making up one by his belief that it is inartistic to "lift" parts from the music-dramas for performance in the concert room. Dr Muck believes that the only parts of the music-dramas proper for concert performance are the overtures and preludes and a few purely instrumental episodes in the works themselves.

In the matter of overtures he has until the present drawn the line at the prelude to "Parsifal." To him, despite Messrs Conried and Savage, "Parsifal" is a sacred festival play" in the full sense of the words, and it has been contrary to his convictions to break what has been a rule with him longer to perform any part of it in concert.

Dr Muck has brought with him from abroad great prestige as an interpreter of Wagner. He gave in Austria the first "uncut" performance of "Die Meistersinger," and he was the first to conduct performances of the "Ring" in [illegible]. The season that he was the Wagnerian conductor at Covent Garden was one of the most brilliant in the history of London opera. This evening's program will be as follows: Overture, "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser"; preludes, "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Meistersinger"; the funeral march from "Gotterdammerung" and the "Parsifal"

DR. MUCK CONSENTS TO GIVE "PARSIFAL" PRELUDE TO-NIGHT

Conductor's Sacrifice of Feelings Adds Interest to Pension Concert; Germaine Schnitzer Again.

By Kent Perkins.

THAT Dr. Muck finally yielded to persuasion and consented to give the prelude to "Parsifal" at to-night's Symphony Pension Fund Concert, adds a lively element of interest to the occasion. The conductor is a devotee of the Wagner-Bayreuth tradition. He feels that "Parsifal" is in reality a solemn "festival play" as its author named it, and in a certain sense "sacred." In consequence he hitherto has frowned upon the idea of giving any of its music in concert, or outside of Bayreuth, for that matter. To make to-night's list of overtures and preludes complete, however, he finally gave in. As the highest living interpreter of Wagner, and in view of his feeling for "Parsifal" his reading of the prelude is awaited with keen anticipation.

Finnish composer, Jan Si[illegible] chief item of interest on the [illegible] program for this week. It is his [illegible] E minor, and was composed in 1899. The soloist will be the first 'cellist of the orchestra, Heinrich Warnke, who will play Volkmann's concerto. The other number on the program is Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

BOSTON HERA[illegible]

Published Every Day in the [illegible]
VOL. CXX., No. 184.

MONDAY, DEC. 31, 19[illegible]

ORCHESTRA PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

Wagnerian Programme of the Symphony Given Before a Large Audience.

The first concert this season in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was a Wagnerian one: Overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhaeuser," preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers" and "Parsifal" and the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods." Dr. Muck conducted.

It is a pleasure to know that the receipts of previous concerts and the contributions of members of the orchestra have increased the benefit fund to such an extent that there will soon be enough for four pensions in case they are needed—absit omen! The interest taken by the public in these concerts is naturally most gratifying to the members of the orchestra. This interest is in turn natural. The orchestra is an institution of which Paris, Berlin or London might well be proud. The concerts given here are the chief features of musical life. They are to Boston what the operatic performances are to New York, and there are Bostonians who would have it thus, preferring chaste enjoyment and moderate vibrations to the worship of personalities and feverish excitement, preferring symphonic lilies and languors to operatic roses and raptures. Inasmuch as the orchestra affords the keenest local musical pleasure and spreads the fame of Boston throughout the land, it is only reasonable and meet that the players should realize in a substantial form the appreciation of the public.

It is a custom—and an excellent one—to abstain from criticism of a concert or other entertainment given for a charitable purpose. Yet a few notes on the programme may not be impertinent. As Dr. Muck is famous in Europe as a conductor of Wagner's operas it was a happy thought to give the general public the opportunity of becoming acquainted with his interpretations. The programme was arranged so that Wagner's changing views concerning the character and function of an overture were clearly observed. Starting with the overture to "Rienzi," a potpourri overture, he did not compose a prelude as a purely tone-and-mood picture until he wrote the one to "Lohengrin." In the prelude to the "Mastersingers" he returned in a way to the potpourri form, but what a contrast between this master work and the blatant "Rienzi," which is distinguished by its debased Meyerbeerism! Even in the prelude to "Parsifal," which is not so fine a work as the prelude to "Lohengrin" in the absolute perfection of expression there is a looking-back toward the potpourri form.

And how Time disposes quietly of all these matters. When Theodore Thomas first played the prelude to "Lohengrin" at his summer concerts in New York hisses were often heard. This simple music was then considered incomprehensible and dangerous. When Thomas produced the overture to "The Mastersingers" in Boston 35 years ago Mr. John S. Dwight wrote: "Save us from more acquaintance with the introduction to the 'Meistersinger'! It is hard, harsh, forced and noisy, ever on the verge of discord (having the ungenial effect of discord, however literally within the rules of counterpoint), . . . This could never have won the prize before any guild, whether of 'old fogy' Philistines or fresh young hearts." Mr. Dwight wrote honestly, and he undoubtedly voiced the opinion of the great majority in Boston at the time. The singular feature of it all is this: that some who now wonder at the dulness of ears in 1871 are [illegible] receptive when listening to ultra-m[illegible] music of today. They have ears and they do not hear.

At all events, a Wagnerian programme nowadays attracts a large audience—an audience of saner enthusiasts than was the case when this music required championship—and the fact has been demonstrated more than once at a pension fund concert. Last evening the hall was filled and many stood. The performance was an unbroken record of brilliance and color, and enthusiasm was as spontaneous at the end as at the beginning of the long programme. The climax of applause came after the overture to "Tannhaeuser," when Dr. Muck had the orchestra rise to respond with him.

BOSTON POST.

DECEMBER 31, 1906

WAGNER GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

By Olin Downs

Symphony Hall was crowded with an enthusiastic audience at the first of the Pension Fund concerts last night. Dr. Carl Muck's announcement of a programme, consisting of all the Wagner overtures and preludes in chronological order, and the funeral march from 'Du Gotterdammerung, excited unusual interest. The audience seemed to appreciate the fact that the programme for once consisted of only the orchestral portions of Wagner's works instead of various scenes sung in a language which but a part of the audience understands.

It is the fashion to sneer at the Rienzi overture, and point it out as the remarkably weak and immature efforts of the master, who was to astonish the world. But Dr. Muck made this a surpassingly brilliant performance, which was the first of a series of triumphs which followed one after another.

"The Flying Dutchman" overture had the appropriate storm and stress, and the "Tannhauser" aroused such enthusiasm that the conductor was obliged to bow his thanks three times, the audience remaining unsatisfied until he had his men arise and acknowledge the applause.

As to the "Tristan" overture, few have the artistic restraint that enabled Dr. Muck, starting from the first longing sigh of the 'cello, to build up that vehement, long-sustained crescendo, which mounted to a climax of unutterable passion, and then subsided in throbs of exhausted emotion.

Like a burst of sunlight came the first measures of the Meistersinger prelude. Many may object to the tempo taken, which was slower than is usual. But if one plays Mendelssohn's Wedding March in the originally intended tempo one will have difficulty in finding a couple lively enough to tread the measure, it is argued. This introduction was intended as an apotheosis of the drama, and if the Meistersingers could not march to it, the dignity of spirit was there, when necessary, and a glorious enthusiasm swept everything before it.

The Funeral March was epic in its breadth and solemnity, and the "Parsifal" prelude, with its atmosphere of deeply religious contemplation, closed the concert.

Paper Inquirer
City Philadelphia
Date DEC [illegible] State Pa

Doctor Muck is preparing the Strauss "Sinfonia Domestica" for its first Boston hearing at one of the February concerts. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the work a feature of one of its New York concerts later in the season. It will be remembered that the work produced a deep impression when given in this city by Mr. Scheel two seasons ago.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date DEC 23 1906 State N. Y.

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 10, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 12. Thursday evening's concert will be devoted to Beethoven, the works chosen being the overture to "Egmont," the concerto for violin, and the Seventh Symphony. Willy Hess will be the soloist. Saturday afternoon the programme will comprise Elgar's overture "In the South," Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra" (first time), Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and the overture to Wagner's "[illegible]"

[103]

BOSTON JOURNAL.
DECEMBER 31, 1906

SUPERB CONCERT IN AID OF PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Gives Entire Program From Wagner—Heard by Notably Enthusiastic Audience in Symphony Hall.

The first of this season's concerts in behalf of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given in Symphony Hall last night, and music of Richard Wagner made up the entire program. The overtures of "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal," together with the funeral march from "Die Gotterdammerung," were played. A great audience was present; it and its notable enthusiasm were evidence enough, if any were needed, that the Master of Bayreuth is still potent in these regions and that his music, when interpreted and played as it should be, is more highly affecting and emotional than that of any other composer.

It is taxing the versatility of any man to make a complete concert of his works, but Wagner measures up to the test as well as any, save, perhaps, Beethoven. And last evening the variety was great, embracing as it did, the early "trash," "Rienzi," the last semi-sacred "Parsifal," and all of the operas between, save three. It showed, if anyone cared to think of such things in the face of the enormous effect of the selections themselves, the absolute change in Wagner's inspiration and style, the development of a man of prodigious brass band effects, into a genius at orchestral coloring, whose equal the world had never seen.

The fact that this was a benefit concert makes any set review out of place. Yet it must in justice be said that no such gloriously-sustained interpretation of Wagner's music has ever been heard here before. Dr. Muck was in heroic mood and the men played as if their very lives depended upon it. The result was a riot of splendor and colossal effects—more marked, perhaps, than any especially exquisite beauty. "The Flying Dutchman" piece excelled for its weird tonal suggestiveness; the "Tannhauser" overture for its impassioned fervor; the "Meistersinger" vorspiel for its jubilant and magnificent spirit and the "Gotterdammerung" death march for the overwhelming majesty of its elegiac power. The "Tristan" overture alone seemed less effective, more monotonously restrained than in other performances.

PROF. HESS WIELDS BATON IN ABSENCE OF DR. MUCK

The program of the tenth Symphony concert at Symphony Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Variations on a theme of Haydn.....Brahms
Concerto No. 2, in F sharp minor, for violin.....Strube
Shepherds' Song at the Manger and March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus".....Lists

Timothee Adamowski was the soloist, and owing to the temporary indisposition of Dr. Muck, Professor Willy Hess conducted with authority and discretion. It cannot be said that the program was especially inspiring. Neither was it especially interesting. The Brahms variations are of pastoral quality with some charm, but the commonplace is dangerously near if not quite attained. The Strube concerto, which was conducted by the composer, was played by Mr. Adamowski in a style that even his most ardent admirers must admit to have been above his usual attainments. The reverie is the most captivating movement of the work, and here it was that the soloist reached his greatest heights, his warmth of tone and vigor of expression being most compelling. Liszt's "Shepherds' Song" was played for the first time at these concerts, and it may well be set down as the last, for despite the life instilled by the orchestra, it remained an exceedingly commonplace composition, in which shepherds were conspicuous by their absence. The march that closed the concert was equally lacking in impressive power.

MRS. WOODRUFF, SOLOIST, WITH SYMPHONY QUARTET

In Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon a big audience assembled to hear the Boston Symphony Quartet and Mrs. Gertrude Miller Woodruff, soprano, give the fifth concert of the season of the Chickering series. The program was excellently selected and the concert was a musical treat. The quartet in A major, op. 2, by E. Gliere, a brilliant work, thrilling with life and feeling, was superbly played. The fine old sonata for violin and viola with pianoforte accompaniment, Mr. Tucker at the piano, was a delight to the ear, and the Haydn quartet in C major pleased as always.

Mrs. Woodruff sang Bachelet's "Chere Nuit," Schutt's "All the Summer Through" and "Twilight Hour," Schubert's "Hark, the Lark," and Sullivan's "Where the Bee Sucks." Her rich soprano was heard to best advantage in the Schutt [illegible]

NDAY GLOBE—
DECEMBER 30, 1906

MUSICAL MATTERS

Symphony Program With One Novelty.

Pension Fund Concert Tonight —Mr Whitney's Song Recital.

Nordica Coming Saturday —Events of the Week.

The only novelty on the Symphony program last week was the "Shepherd's Song" from the Liszt oratorio, "Christus." "The March of the Three Holy Kings," an excerpt from the same work; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn and Strube's F-sharp minor concerto for violin completed the selections. Mr Timothee Adamowski was the soloist. The Liszt song and march were in keeping with the spirit of the present season and made the performance of these numbers specially impressive. In the song of the shepherds the composer frequently introduces the pastoral idea by phrases for the wood-wind instruments, the snatches of melody being grave and mysterious in their suggestions of rural simplicity and humble homage of the herders, who visited the manger where the Christ-child lay.

Throughout the work the religious and the pastoral ideas are beautifully blended and the work made a fine contrast for the march which followed, the latter being more brilliant and pompous in its significance. Except for the long preludes by the lighter wood-winds in the "song" and the efficient work of the brass contingent in the march the performances call for no special commendation, which probably would not be the case if another orchestra was under consideration.

When Mr Strube's concerto was first played by Mr Adamowski about one year ago the great merit of the work was quickly recognized, and the performance also was generally considered the most satisfactory of any given by the popular soloist. Then, as last week, the composer directed, and in each case the whole performance was thoroughly enjoyable. Possibly Mr Adamowski has acquired greater ease and confidence in his execution since his former interpretation of the concerto for his work, especially in the reverie and adagio, was a splendid exhibition of sustained power, the violin part is almost continuous, pure intonation and dexterous fingering. The emotional import of the second movement was resonantly set forth, the G string fingering deserving particular mention, and the sweet three-note motif of the first part, and the variations and cadenza in the final movement were each played skilfully and generally without a deviation from the pitch. Composer and soloist were rapturously applauded and recalled after the performance.

The Brahms variations, nine in number, went smoothly. The oboes and bassoons in the third variation were capitally voiced, in the sixth one the difficult passage work of the violins was perfect and the finale was an excellent example of ensemble work.

On account of the illness of Dr Muck the concert master, Prof Willy Hess, directed the orchestra.

The principal number on this week's program will be the E minor symphony by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibeluis. The first cellist of the orchestra will play Volkmann's A minor concerto, and the program will begin with the over-[illegible]."

SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

Despite the holiday season, when the minds of the public are usually on other matters than music, there has been no lack of interest in the pension fund concert of the Symphony orchestra which will be given in Symphony hall this evening. A Wagner program usually attracts the music-loving public, and possibly Dr Muck was guided in making this one by his belief that it is inartistic to "lift" parts from the music-dramas for performance in the concert room. Dr Muck believes that the only parts of the music-dramas proper for concert performance are the overtures and preludes and a few purely instrumental episodes in the works themselves.

In the matter of overtures he has until the present drawn the line at the prelude to "Parsifal." To him, despite Messrs Conried and Savage, "Parsifal" is a "sacred festival play" in the full sense of the words, and it has been considerably against his convictions to break what has been a rule with him never to perform any part of it in concert.

Dr Muck has brought with him from abroad great prestige as an interpreter of Wagner. He gave in Austria the first "uncut" performance of "Die Meistersinger," and he was the first to conduct performances of the "Ring" in Russia. The season that he was the Wagnerian conductor at Covent Garden was one of the most brilliant in the history of London opera. This evening's program will be as follows: Overtures, "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser"; preludes, "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Meistersinger"; the funeral march from "Gotterdammerung" and the "Parsifal" prelude.

BOSTON AMERICAN, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1906.

DR. MUCK CONSENTS TO GIVE "PARSIFAL" PRELUDE TO-NIGHT

Conductor's Sacrifice of Feelings Adds Interest to Pension Concert; Germaine Schnitzer Again.

By Kent Perkins.

THAT Dr. Muck finally yielded to persuasion and consented to give the prelude to "Parsifal" at to-night's Symphony Pension Fund Concert, adds a lively element of interest to the occasion. The conductor is a devotee of the Wagner-Bayreuth tradition. He feels that "Parsifal" is in reality a solemn "festival play" as its author named it, and in a certain sense "sacred." In consequence he hitherto has frowned upon the idea of giving any of its music in concert, or outside of Bayreuth, for that matter. To make to-night's list of overtures and preludes complete, however, he finally gave in. As the highest living interpreter of Wagner, and in view of his feeling for "Parsifal" his reading of the prelude is awaited with keen anticipation.

A symphony new to [illegible] the Finnish composer, Jan Sibe[illegible] the chief item of interest on the Sym[illegible] program for this week. It is his first, E minor, and was composed in 1890. The soloist will be the first 'cellist of the orchestra, Heinrich Warnke, who will play Volkmann's concerto. The other number on the program is Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

BOSTON HERA[illegible]

Published Every Day in the
VOL. CXX., No. 184.

MONDAY, DEC. 31, 19[illegible]

BOSTON POST,
DECEMBER 31, 1906

ORCHESTRA PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

Wagnerian Programme of the Symphony Given Before a Large Audience.

The first concert this season in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was a Wagnerian one: Overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhaeuser," preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers" and "Parsifal" and the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods." Dr. Muck conducted.

It is a pleasure to know that the receipts of previous concerts and the contributions of members of the orchestra have increased the benefit fund to such an extent that there will soon be enough for four pensions in case they are needed—absit omen! The interest taken by the public in these concerts is naturally most gratifying to the members of the orchestra. This interest is in turn natural. The orchestra is an institution of which Paris, Berlin or London might well be proud. The concerts given here are the chief features of musical life. They are to Boston what the operatic performances are to New York, and there are Bostonians who would have it thus, preferring chaste enjoyment and moderate vibrations to the worship of personalities and feverish excitement, preferring symphonic lilies and languors to operatic roses and raptures. Inasmuch as the orchestra affords the keenest local musical pleasure and spreads the fame of Boston throughout the land, it is only reasonable and meet that the players should realize in a substantial form the appreciation of the public.

It is a custom—and an excellent one—to abstain from criticism of a concert or other entertainment given for a charitable purpose. Yet a few notes on the programme may not be impertinent. As Dr. Muck is famous in Europe as a conductor of Wagner's operas it was a happy thought to give the general public the opportunity of becoming acquainted with his interpretations. The programme was arranged so that Wagner's changing views concerning the character and function of an overture were clearly observed. Starting with the overture to "Rienzi," a potpourri overture, he did not compose a prelude as a purely tone-and-mood picture until he wrote the one to "Lohengrin." In the prelude to the "Mastersingers" he returned in a way to the potpourri form, but what a contrast between this master work and the blatant "Rienzi," which is distinguished by its debased Meyerbeerism! Even in the prelude to "Parsifal," which is not so fine a work as the prelude to "Lohengrin" in the absolute perfection of expression there is a looking-back toward the potpourri form.

And how Time disposes quietly of all these matters. When Theodore Thomas first played the prelude to "Lohengrin" at his summer concerts in New York hisses were often heard. This simple music was then considered incomprehensible and dangerous. When Thomas produced the overture to "The Mastersingers" in Boston 35 years ago Mr. John S. Dwight wrote: "Save us from more acquaintance with the introduction to the 'Meistersinger'! It is hard, harsh, forced and noisy, ever on the verge of discord (having the ungenial effect of discord, however literally within the rules of counterpoint). * * * This could never have won the prize before any guild, whether of 'old fogy' Philistines or fresh young hearts." Mr. Dwight wrote honestly, and he undoubtedly voiced the opinion of the great majority in Boston at the time. The singular feature of it all is this: that some who now wonder at the dulness of ears in 1871 are not receptive when listening to ultra-m[illegible] music of today. They have ears and they do not hear.

At all events, a Wagnerian programme nowadays attracts a large audience—an audience of saner enthusiasts than was the case when this music required championship—and the fac' has been demonstrated more than [illegible]ce at a pension fund concert. Last evening the hall was filled and many stood. The performance was an unbroken record of brilliance and color, and enthusiasm was as spontaneous at the end as at the beginning of the long programme. The climax of applause came after the overture to "Tannhaeuser," when Dr. Muck had the orchestra rise to respond with him.

WAGNER GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

By Olin Downs

Symphony Hall was crowded with an enthusiastic audience at the first of the Pension Fund concerts, last night. Dr. Carl Muck's announcement of a programme, consisting of all the Wagner overtures and preludes in chronological order, and the funeral march from "Du Gotterdammerung, excited unusual interest. The audience seemed to appreciate the fact that the programme for once consisted of only the orchestral portions of Wagner's works instead of various scenes sung in a language which but a part of the audience understands.

It is the fashion to sneer at the Rienzi overture, and point it out as the remarkably weak and immature efforts of the master, who was to astonish the world. But Dr. Muck made this a surpassingly brilliant performance, which was the first of a series of triumphs which followed one after another.

"The Flying Dutchman" overture had the appropriate storm and stress, and the "Tannhauser" aroused such enthusiasm that the conductor was obliged to bow his thanks three times, the audience remaining unsatisfied until he had his men arise and acknowledge the applause.

As to the "Tristan" overture, few have the artistic restraint that enabled Dr. Muck, starting from the first longing sigh of the 'cello, to build up that vehement, long-sustained crescendo, which mounted to a climax of unutterable passion, and then subsided in throbs of exhausted emotion.

Like a burst of sunlight came the first measures of the Meistersinger prelude. Many may object to the tempo taken, which was slower than is usual. But if one plays Mendelssohn's Wedding March in the originally intended tempo one will have difficulty in finding a couple lively enough to tread the measure, it is argued. This introduction was intended as an apothesis of the drama, and if the Meistersingers could not march to it, the dignity of spirit was there, when necessary, and a glorious enthusiasm swept everything before it.

The Funeral March was epic in its breadth and solemnity, and the "Parsifal" prelude, with its atmosphere of deeply religious contemplation, closed the concert.

Paper Inquirer
City Philadelphia
Date DEC State Pa

Doctor Muck is preparing the Strauss "Sinfonia Domestica" for its first Boston hearing at one of the February concerts. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the work a feature of one of its New York concerts later in the season. It will be remembered that the work produced a deep impression when given in this city by Mr. Scheel two seasons ago.

* * *

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N. Y.

DEC [illegible]

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 10, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 12. Thursday evening's concert will be devoted to Beethoven, the works chosen being the overture to "Egmont," the concerto for violin, and the Seventh Symphony. Willy Hess will be the soloist. Saturday afternoon the programme will comprise Elgar's overture "In the South," Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra" (first time), Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi."

[103]

BOSTON JOURNAL-
DECEMBER 31, 1906

SUPERB CONCERT IN AID OF PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Gives Entire Program From Wagner—Heard by Notably Enthusiastic Audience in Symphony Hall.

The first of this season's concerts in behalf of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given in Symphony Hall last night, and music of Richard Wagner made up the entire program. The overtures of "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal," together with the funeral march from "Die Gotterdammerung," were played. A great audience was present; it and its notable enthusiasm were evidence enough, if any were needed, that the Master of Bayreuth is still potent in these regions and that his music, when interpreted and played as it should be, is more highly affecting and emotional than that of any other composer.

It is taxing the versatility of any man to make a complete concert of his works, but Wagner measures up to the test as well as any, save, perhaps, Beethoven. And last evening the variety was great, embracing as it did, the early "trash," "Rienzi," the last semi-sacred "Parsifal," and all of the operas between, save three. It showed, if any one cared to think of such things in the face of the enormous effect of the selections themselves, the absolute change in Wagner's inspiration and style, the development of a man of prodigious brass band effects, into a genius at orchestral coloring, whose equal the world had never seen.

The fact that this was a benefit concert makes any set review out of place. Yet it must in justice be said that no such gloriously-sustained interpretation of Wagner's music has ever been heard here before. Dr. Muck was in heroic mood and the men played as if their very lives depended upon it. The result was a riot of splendor and colossal effects—more marked, perhaps, than any especially exquisite beauty. "The Flying Dutchman" piece excelled for its weird tonal suggestiveness; the "Tannhauser" overture for its impassioned fervor; the "Meistersinger" vorspiel for its jubilant and magnificent spirit and the "Gotterdammerung" death march for the overwhelming majesty of its elegiac power. The "Tristan" overture alone seemed less effective, more monotonously restrained than in other performances.

PROF. HESS WIELDS BATON IN ABSENCE OF DR. MUCK

The program of the tenth Symphony concert at Symphony Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Variations on a theme of Haydn.....Brahm
Concerto No. 2, in F sharp minor, for violin .....Strube
Shepherds' Song at the Manger and March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus" .....Liszt

Timothee Adamowski was the soloist, and owing to the temporary indisposition of Dr. Muck, Professor Willy Hess conducted with authority and discretion. It cannot be said that the program was especially inspiring. Neither was it especially interesting. The Brahms variations are of pastoral quality with some charm, but the commonplace is dangerously near if not quite attained. The Strube concerto, which was conducted by the composer, was played by Mr. Adamowski in a style that even his most ardent admirers must admit to have been above his usual attainments. The reverie is the most captivating movement of the work, and here it was that the soloist reached his greatest heights, his warmth of tone and vigor of expression being most compelling. Liszt's "Shepherds' Song" was played for the first time at these concerts, and it may well be set down as the last, for despite the life instilled by the orchestra, it remained an exceedingly commonplace composition, in which shepherds were conspicuous by their absence. The march that closed the concert was equally lacking in impressive power.

MRS. WOODRUFF, SOLOIST, WITH SYMPHONY QUARTET

In Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon a big audience assembled to hear the Boston Symphony Quartet and Mrs. Gertrude Miller Woodruff, soprano, give the fifth concert of the season of the Chickering series. The program was excellently selected and the concert was a musical treat. The quartet in A major, op. 2, by E. Gliere, a brilliant work, thrilling with life and feeling, was superbly played. The fine old sonata for violin and viola with pianoforte accompaniment, Mr. Tucker at the piano, was a delight to the ear, and the Haydn quartet in C major pleased as always.

Mrs. Woodruff sang Bachelet's "Chere Nuit," Schutt's "All the Summer Through" and "Twilight Hour," Schubert's "Hark, the Lark," and Sullivan's "Where the Bee Sucks." Her rich soprano was heard to best advantage in the Schutt numbers. For next Sunday the Longy Club and Mrs. Mary Desmond, the English contralto, are announced.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms—Variations on a Haydn Theme. Op. 56a.
Strube—Violin Concerto, F-sharp minor, No. 2.
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.
Liszt—Shepherd's Song at the Manger.
Liszt—March of the Three Holy Kings.

Not a very inspiring programme and Dr. Muck was absent, our climate having at last caught him by the throat. Prof. Willy Hess has hitherto only conducted concertos in Boston; last night he conducted everything but the concerto. We notice that the railroad-timetable exactness, with which Mr. Gericke used to begin the concerts is being departed from; on this occasion the concert began at 8.10.

In the first number the beauty of Haydn's theme impressed us more than the variations of it. Yet there was great skill in the work and the leading of the voices was remarkably fluent. In spite of the charm of the sixth and seventh variations the composition scarcely ever became more than interesting. One felt at the end that Brahms could readily have added half-a-dozen more variations if they had been demanded, with as much ease as a grocer's clerk could add a few more pounds of sugar to your purchase; there was too much facility in the composition, but the work was never dry nor dull, and Prof. Hess brought out the points with praiseworthy intelligence.

The Variations did not make a dress parade of the different departments of the orchestra, as is often done in this form of composition, but followed the higher plan of really developing the theme, so that Haydn's thought became very much enlarged and modernized before the end. Nevertheless, as intimated, we found the chief charm in the melody unadorned.

Mr. Strube and Mr. Adamowski are both very popular, with orchestra and with public, and they were welcomed with enthusiasm by both. The concerto is one of Mr. Strube's best compositions. It is modern enough, but it is not exasperatingly ugly, as some of this composer's works strive to be. The Reverie (second movement) is a gem that deserves to be heard frequently. It is much the best number of the work.

The last movement, however, did not grow upon acquaintance. The cadenza, which Mr. Gericke wrote for the work, is an effective display of technique, especially in double-stopping. But we find no adequate reason for the employment of the bizarre rhythmic construction. Tschaikowsky once rebuked a Russian contemporary for using a 5-4 rhythm. Yet Tschaikowsky himself wrote one of the longest 5-4 movements in existence. But that 5-4 rhythm, in the Pathetic Symphony, had something to say; it pictured restlessness and uneasiness, even in the midst of gaiety, while most of the modern irregular rhythms (5-4 or 7-4) are only introduced to show the ingenuity of the composer.

Mr. Strube conducted his own concerto and, of course, with authority. Mr. Adamowski was in his best form, and played with that earnestness and temperament which we find to be his greatest charm. His breadth in the G-string work in the Reverie, his brilliancy in the cadenza, and his surety in every part of the work, carried the concerto to success, and violinist and composer-conductor won a triumph together, being recalled several times.

The selections from Liszt's "Christus" (the two last numbers of the concert) were scarcely as effective as the Bach "Pastorale" from the "Christmas Oratorio," to which we have become accustomed at this season of the year. Yet there is much beauty in each of the selections, in spite of Hanslick's virulent attacks on the work. That eminent German scold held that the master of luxurious instrumentation was trying to blow infantile bagpipes before the Child in the Manger and that the result was a most artificial "naivete," a new form of spiritual over-refinement. He adds that Liszt's "Christus" is an open declaration of musical bankruptcy. He attacks the "Shepherd's Song" with yet fiercer vehemence.

Yet the work lives and is likely to hold its place in the repertoire for a long while to come. Naturally it has considerable oboe pipings. Ever since Handel bleated forth the Calabrian Pifferrari melody as true Christmas music, the composers have given the oboes (and the English horns) full swing in this particular subject. Liszt's picture is, if anything, less conventional than the average.

The concert ended with the March of the three Kings. Every member of the symphony orchestra feels secure when he holds three kings, and they therefore played boldly. The opening pizzicati passages presented the kings very much as stealthy banditti are represented in operatic music, but there was fine melody and excellent orchestration in every part of this march. There was also a certain barbaric splendor that suited the subject well and therefore, even in the teeth of Mr. Hanslick, one may enjoy this brilliant work of that modern composer whose creative fame bids fair to be largely posthumous. Liszt was too great as a pianist to be fairly recognized as a composer during his lifetime, and he was also overshadowed by his chief "protege," Wagner, who held the stage to the exclusion of everybody else, for a full generation.

Mr. Hess conducted the two Liszt's works well, giving evident care to working up those climaxes in which Liszt revelled so frequently.

Louis C. Elson.

---

of the orchestra was interesting from the fact that it was almost entirely made up of Wagner overtures and preludes. The overtures to "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhaeuser," and the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers" and "Parsifal," gave a complete history of Wagner's development of these two forms. "Rienzi" gave a startling illustration of the bombastic, foot-light flavor of the earliest period. The "Flying Dutchman" and the "Tannhaeuser," overtures showed the master at the zenith of his composition in this form. The "Lohengrin" prelude showed the inception of the "Vorspiel" which, because of the composer's theory of musical continuity, was to replace the overture. "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Mastersingers of Nurenberg" showed the zenith of this later form, and "Parsifal" displayed the power of construction and the fertility of invention waning a trifle as old age came on. The only other work of the programme was the Siegfried funeral music.

Dr. Muck conquered his illness sufficiently to conduct the long programme wonderfully, although his fondness for slow tempo was often in evidence. The applause was constant although the enthusiasm reached its height after the "Tannhaeuser" overture, at which the entire orchestra was compelled to rise and bow with the conductor.

The concert was entirely orchestral, yet the audience was the largest yet gathered at a Pension Fund concert.

Such a beneficent concert is not for review, since all the participants are donating their services and all animadversion is excluded, under which circumstances laudation ceases to have its full value. Nevertheless, everybody knows how well our orchestra plays Wagner. Not even New York, in its great operatic performances, has such perfect orchestral interpretations as we enjoy in this little town at the end of the mismanaged branch line of the New York Central railroad.

It is pleasant to see a large audience at each of these Pension Fund concerts. There is a great necessity for such a fund, for our excellent artists being out of the musical labor union (the American Federation of Musicians) are in a sense musical pariahs, and might find difficulty in obtaining employment elsewhere, while under the ban of that powerful organization.

Few persons know how much this means. It means, for example, that there is great difficulty in adequately performing Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," since certain extra artists are necessary and the Federation forbids any of its members from playing with any of our men. This does not apply only to the Symphony concerts, but anywhere else, as this letter may show:

Boston, Mass., Nov. 1, 1906.

Mr. Owen Miller,
Sec'y A. F. of M.,
St. Louis, Mo.

Dear Sir and Brother:

By action of the Directors of Local No. 9, A. F. of M., held on Tuesday, October 30th, Messrs. C. M. Hollander and C. A. Salter were suspended for nonpayment of fines assessed for taking part in an engagement during the past summer with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in violation of our laws. Mr. Hollander's fine was $100.00, Mr. Salter's total fine was $120, $20.00 for the second offense, $100 for the offense proper, this in addition to an old fine of $10.00 standing against him, makes his total fine $130.

By same mail I am sending a notice to Messrs. Weber, Sanger and Ostendorf.

Fraternally yours,
T. C. Kelcher, Secretary.

Under such circumstances it is especially necessary for Boston to help its band of musical outlaws, after their long service in its behalf.

Louis C. Elson.

MUSIC NOTE.

Letters from Mr. Gericke show that after a pleasant sojourn in Switzerland, and a visit to his home in Styria, he is now settled in Vienna.

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date DEC 29 1906 State N.Y.

The principal item of interest on the next Boston Symphony programme, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, January 11, will be an unknown symphony by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, his first in E minor. The music of Sibelius is gradually making its way into the repertory of our large orchestras, and has already attained a vogue on the other side. It will have its first performance in America at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston next Friday and Saturday. Another work which is also, to all intents and purposes, a novelty is Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme." The first number on the programme will be Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala."

Paper Union
City Brooklyn
Date DEC 29 1906 State N.Y.

Dr. Muck has prepared a most interesting set of programmes for the western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be made in the week of January 27. The work of the Orchestra at present is unusually heavy, as some unusually important novelties are being prepared for the Boston concerts. The biggest work which has yet been unheard in Boston is Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which will be played in February. It is probable that the Orchestra will play this at one of its coming concerts in New York, either in Feb-

---

WAGNER PROGRAM

Symphony Concert in Aid of Pension Fund.

Large Audience Enjoys Excerpts From the Music-Dramas.

Wagner was the only composer represented at last evening's concert in Symphony hall, for the benefit of the Symphony orchestra pension fund, the program comprising the following selections from his music-dramas: Overtures, "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" preludes, "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Meistersinger," the funeral march from "Gotterdammerung" and the "Parsifal" prelude. It was quite natural that Dr Muck should decide on a strictly Wagnerian evening of music at this time, for his reputation as a great interpreter of the German master's works is well known, his abilities have already been proven at Symphony concerts this season and the orchestra is familiar with the music.

The audience filled the great hall last evening and it is gratifying to know that the pension fund will be largely increased by this liberality on the part of the public. Dr Muck, who had been ill for the past week, conducted the concert, and throughout the evening the auditors gave demonstrative evidence that they appreciated his skill as a director and enjoyed the work of the orchestra and that the "one-name" program was highly satisfactory despite its severely serious character. The applause was spontaneous and liberally bestowed, especially after the "Tannhauser" number, when the members of the orchestra were obliged to rise and bow at the close of a magnificent performance of the popular overture.

Four of the selections have been played at this season's symphony concerts, "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman," "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," and the repetitions last evening call for no reiteration of praise now, except in a general way, for each number emphasized the fact that Dr Muck's fame in the Wagnerian field is well deserved.

The delicacy of the "Lohengrin" music, the pomp and solemnity of the funeral march, and the quaintness of "Die Meistersinger" prelude, were each brought out vividly by Dr Muck, who, while making no radical departures from accepted traditions, conducted with an air of authority that was very convincing as to the proper interpretation of the selections.

The "Parsifal" selection was given with great impressiveness, the "grail" motif being sung by the violins, and subsequently by the other instruments, with a cadence and beauty of tone that was prominent even in a performance of great merit throughout. The chant of the knights, a fine example of ensemble playing, and the lighter or "temptation" music, were other parts of the prelude calling for special commendation.

Paper Eagle
City Brooklyn
Date State N.Y.
DEC 29 1906

The principal item of interest on the next Boston Symphony programme, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, January 11, will be an unknown symphony by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, his first in E minor. The music of Sibelius is gradually making its way into the repertory of our large orchestras, and has already attained a great vogue on the other side. It will have its first performance in America at the Boston Symphony concerts, in Boston, next Friday and Saturday. Another work which is also, to all intents and purposes, a novelty, is Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme." The first number on the programme will be Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala."

Paper North American
City Philadelphia
Date DEC 30 1906 State Pa

A novelty of more than ordinary interest has been [illegible] by Doctor Muck on the program of the next Boston Symphony concert, [illegible] Monday evening, the Academy on Sibelius's first symphony, January 7. It is Si- Scheel and the in E minor. Mr. have already delphia Orchestra introducing here good work in this Finnish com familiar music by appreciation in and the growth of is very rapid. Sibelius's work him has been erable vogue for The soloist will ed in Germany. orchestra, who Hess, of the concerto for vio the Beethoven ber of the pros remaining num- ture to "Egmon will be the over-

---

Paper American
City New York
Date DEC 30 1906 State N Y

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 10, and on Saturday afternoon, January 12. Thursday evening's concert will be devoted to Beethoven, the works being the overture to "Egmont," the concerto for violin, and the seventh symphony. Willie Hess will be the soloist. Saturday afternoon the programme will comprise Elgar's overture "In the South," Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra," (first time), George Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and the overture to "Rienzi."

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, January 11. The item of chief interest in the programme will be a new quartet by Hugo Kaun, in D major, Op. 48, No. 2. This work has had very considerable success wherever Professor Hess and his colleagues have played it.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date DEC 30 1906 State N Y

Dr. Muck has prepared an interesting set of programmes for the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be made in the week of January 27. The work of the orchestra at present is unusually heavy, as some important novelties are being prepared for the Boston concerts. The biggest work (which has as yet been unheard in Boston) is Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which will be played in February. It is probable that the orchestra will play this at one of its coming concerts in New York, either in February or

---

Paper Post
City Chicago
Date State Ill
DEC 23 1906

And especial interest will be lent to the coming of the Boston orchestra by the presence at the conductor's desk of Dr. Carl Muck, the German director, who enjoys a high reputation in Berlin and who has been "loaned" by the German emperor to Boston for a single season. Dr. Muck has been in Boston since October, and both here and in New York has been received with unqualified approval by press and public. Rarely has any of the visiting "virtuoso conductors" been so kindly handled by the New York reviewers as has Dr. Muck. A recent article on conductors and conducting written for the New York Sun by W. J. Henderson gives an interesting glimpse of the new leader and his manner of directing his orchestra. In view of Dr. Muck's appearance here next month the article is pertinent. Mr. Henderson writes:

"Dr. Muck was well known to those who make it their business to keep track of musical affairs in Europe. His method of conducting, however, was unknown to all save a few, and they had their doubts as to the public attitude toward it. Dr. Muck's outward and visible signs are of the most simple and unpicturesque sort. His gestures are few and elementary. There is nothing to see.

"A man of slender, elegant, aristocratic figure, of clean cut, scholarly face, and of cultured manner stands before the orchestra, and while directing it with the certainty of an authority and the command of a master so effaces his personality that he becomes a perfectly transparent medium between the audience and the music. This is the highest achievement possible to the manner of conducting. If no other qualities were to be found in Dr. Muck's art, this alone would be enough to insure it a welcome from those who are weary of finding a gorgeously decorated curtain of Monsieur This or Herr That hung between them and Beethoven or Brahms.

"The doubts as to the attitude of the musical public in regard to this sort of conducting have been scattered to the four winds. There is more than one public in this little town. There is a public for ground and lofty tumbling and there is a public for sane art. There is a public which shrieks its throat to tatters every time Caruso or Bonci sings a high note, and there is a public which values the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Kneisel quartet above all tenors.

"This latter is the musical public, and its taste can be trusted to arrive at just verdicts. It has pronounced most emphatically in favor of Dr. Muck, the man with the continent style and the splendid results. No one of the music lovers who have spent most of their lives in observing musical doings was deceived by the applause which followed Dr. Muck's reading of Bruckner's E major symphony. That applause was not an expression of gratitude to old Bruckner for projecting into the world his troublous music, but to Dr. Muck for his clear, lucid, and euphonious reading of the composition.

"The audience was quick to recognize the nature of the achievement and it conveyed its satisfaction in no doubtful terms. Dr. Muck's triumph on this occasion was more notable than at his debut, though at the first concert the applause was more enthusiastic. But at that time the hearers were moved by the beautiful music of Brahms. It was music which they all knew and loved and they rejoiced at an interpretation such as they had not heard in many a long day."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
DECEMBER 31, 1906

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms—Variations on a Haydn Theme. Op. 56a.
Strube—Violin Concerto, F-sharp minor, No. 2.
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.
Liszt—Shepherd's Song at the Manger.
Liszt—March of the Three Holy Kings.

Not a very inspiring programme and Dr. Muck was absent, our climate having at last caught him by the throat. Prof. Willy Hess has hitherto only conducted concertos in Boston; last night he conducted everything but the concerto. We notice that the railroad-timetable exactness, with which Mr. Gericke used to begin the concerts is being departed from; on this occasion the concert began at 8.10.

In the first number the beauty of Haydn's theme impressed us more than the variations of it. Yet there was great skill in the work and the leading of the voices was remarkably fluent. In spite of the charm of the sixth and seventh variations the composition scarcely ever became more than interesting. One felt at the end that Brahms could readily have added half-a-dozen more variations if they had been demanded, with as much ease as a grocer's clerk could add a few more pounds of sugar to your purchase; there was too much facility in the composition, but the work was never dry nor dull, and Prof. Hess brought out the points with praiseworthy intelligence.

The Variations did not make a dress parade of the different departments of the orchestra, as is often done in this form of composition, but followed the higher plan of really developing the theme, so that Haydn's thought became very much enlarged and modernized before the end. Nevertheless, as intimated, we found the chief charm in the melody unadorned.

Mr. Strube and Mr. Adamowski are both very popular with orchestra and with public, and they were welcomed with enthusiasm by both. The concerto is one of Mr. Strube's best compositions. It is modern enough, but it is not exasperatingly ugly, as some of this composer's works strive to be. The Reverie (second movement) is a gem that deserves to be heard frequently. It is much the best number of the work.

The last movement, however, did not grow upon acquaintance. The cadenza, which Mr. Gericke wrote for the work, is an effective display of technique, especially in double-stopping. But we find no adequate reason for the employment of the bizarre rhythmic construction. Tschaikowsky once rebuked a Russian contemporary for using a 5-4 rhythm. Yet Tschaikowsky himself wrote one of the longest 5-4 movements in existence. But that 5-4 rhythm, in the Pathetic Symphony, had something to say; it pictured restlessness and uneasiness, even in the midst of gaiety, while most of the modern irregular rhythms (5-4 or 7-4) are only introduced to show the ingenuity of the composer.

Mr. Strube conducted his own concerto and, of course, with authority. Mr. Adamowski was in his best form, and played with that earnestness and temperament which we find to be his greatest charm. His breadth in the G-string work in the Reverie, his brilliancy in the cadenza, and his surety in every part of the work, carried the concerto to success, and violinist and composer-conductor won a triumph together, being recalled several times.

The selections from Liszt's "Christus" (the two last numbers of the concert) were scarcely as effective as the Bach "Pastorale" from the "Christmas Oratorio," to which we have become accustomed at this season of the year. Yet there is much beauty in each of the selections, in spite of Hanslick's virulent attacks on the work. That eminent German scold held that the master of luxurious instrumentation was trying to blow infantile bagpipes before the Child in the Manger and that the result was a most artificial "naivete," a new form of spiritual over-refinement. He adds that Liszt's "Christus" is an open declaration of musical bankruptcy. He attacks the "Shepherd's Song" with yet fiercer vehemence.

Yet the work lives and is likely to hold its place in the repertoire for a long while to come. Naturally it has considerable oboe pipings. Ever since Handel bleated forth the Calabrian Pifferrari melody as true Christmas music, the composers have given the oboes (and the English horns) full swing in this particular subject. Liszt's picture is, if anything, less conventional than the average.

The concert ended with the March of the three Kings. Every member of the symphony orchestra feels secure when he holds three kings, and they therefore played boldly. The opening pizzicati passages presented the kings very much as stealthy banditti are represented in operatic music, but there was fine melody and excellent orchestration in every part of this march. There was also a certain barbaric splendor that suited the subject well and therefore, even in the teeth of Mr. Hanslick, one may enjoy this brilliant work of that modern composer whose creative fame bids fair to be largely posthumous. Liszt was too great as a pianist to be fairly recognized as a composer during his lifetime, and he was also overshadowed by his chief "protege," Wagner, who held the stage to the exclusion of everybody else, for a full generation.

Mr. Hess conducted the two Liszt's works well, giving evident care to working up those climaxes in which Liszt revelled so frequently.

Louis C. Elson.

PENSION FUND CONCERT—A WAGNER PROGRAMME.

The concert in aid of the Pension Fund of the orchestra was interesting from the fact that it was almost entirely made up of Wagner overtures and preludes. The overtures to "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhaeuser," and the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers" and "Parsifal," gave a complete history of Wagner's development of these two forms. "Rienzi" gave a startling illustration of the bombastic, foot-light flavor of the earliest period. The "Flying Dutchman" and the "Tannhaeuser," overtures showed the master at the zenith of his composition in this form. The "Lohengrin" prelude showed the inception of the "Vorspiel" which, because of the composer's theory of musical continuity, was to replace the overture. "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Mastersingers of Nurenberg" showed the zenith of this later form, and "Parsifal" displayed the power of construction and the fertility of invention waning a trifle as old age came on. The only other work of the programme was the Siegfried funeral music.

Dr. Muck conquered his illness sufficiently to conduct the long programme wonderfully, although his fondness for slow tempo was often in evidence. The applause was constant although the enthusiasm reached its height after the "Tannhaeuser" overture, at which the entire orchestra was compelled to rise and bow with the conductor.

The concert was entirely orchestral, yet the audience was the largest yet gathered at a Pension Fund concert.

Such a beneficent concert is not for review, since all the participants are donating their services and all animadversion is excluded, under which circumstances laudation ceases to have its full value. Nevertheless, everybody knows how well our orchestra plays Wagner. Not even New York, in its great operatic performances, has such perfect orchestral interpretations as we enjoy in this little town at the end of the mismanaged branch line of the New York Central railroad.

It is pleasant to see a large audience at each of these Pension Fund concerts. There is a great necessity for such a fund, for our excellent artists being out of the musical labor union (the American Federation of Musicians) are in a sense musical pariahs, and might find difficulty in obtaining employment elsewhere, while under the ban of that powerful organization.

Few persons know how much this means. It means, for example, that there is great difficulty in adequately performing Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," since certain extra artists are necessary and the Federation forbids any of its members from playing with any of our men. This does not apply only to the Symphony concerts, but anywhere else, as this letter may show:

Boston, Mass., Nov. 1, 1906.

Mr. Owen Miller,
Sec'y A. F. of M.,
St. Louis, Mo.

Dear Sir and Brother:

By action of the Directors of Local No. 9, A. F. of M., held on Tuesday, October 30th, Messrs. C. M. Hollander and C. A. Salter were suspended for nonpayment of fines assessed for taking part in an engagement during the past summer with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in violation of our laws. Mr. Hollander's fine was $100.00, Mr. Salter's total fine was $120, $20.00 for the second offense, $100 for the offense proper, this in addition to an old fine of $10.00 standing against him, makes his total fine $130.

By same mail I am sending a notice to Messrs. Weber, Sanger and Ostendorf.

Fraternally yours,
T. C. Keleher, Secretary.

Under such circumstances it is especially necessary for Boston to help its band of musical outlaws, after their long service in its behalf.

Louis C. Elson.

MUSIC NOTE.

Letters from Mr. Gericke show that after a pleasant sojourn in Switzerland, and a visit to his home in Styria, he is now settled in Vienna.

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date State N.Y.
DEC 29 1906

The principal item of interest on the next Boston Symphony programme, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, January 11, will be an unknown symphony by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, his first in E minor. The music of Sibelius is gradually making its way into the repertory of our large orchestras, and has already attained a vogue on the other side. It will have its first performance in America at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston next Friday and Saturday. Another work which is also, to all intents and purposes, a novelty is Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme." The first number on the programme will be Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala."

Paper Union
City Brooklyn
Date State N.Y.
DEC 29 1906

Dr. Muck has prepared a most interesting set of programmes for the western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be made in the week of January 27. The work of the Orchestra at present is unusually heavy, as some unusually important novelties are being prepared for the Boston concerts. The biggest work which has yet been unheard in Boston is Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which will be played in February. It is probable that the Orchestra will play this at one of its coming concerts in New York, either in February or March.

BOSTON GLOBE
DECEMBER 31, 1906

WAGNER PROGRAMME.

Symphony Concert in Aid of Pension Fund.

Large Audience Enjoys Excerpts From the Music-Dramas.

Wagner was the only composer represented at last evening's concert in Symphony hall, for the benefit of the Symphony orchestra pension fund, the program comprising the following selections from his music-dramas: Overtures, "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" preludes, "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Meistersingor," the funeral march from "Gotterdammerung" and the "Parsifal" prelude. It was quite natural that Dr Muck should decide on a strictly Wagnerian evening of music at this time, for his reputation as a great interpreter of the German master's works is well known, his abilities have already been proven at Symphony concerts this season and the orchestra is familiar with the music.

The audience filled the great hall last evening and it is gratifying to know that the pension fund will be largely increased by this liberality on the part of the public. Dr Muck, who had been ill for the past week, conducted the concert, and throughout the evening the auditors gave demonstrative evidence that they appreciated his skill as a director and enjoyed the work of the orchestra and that the "one-name" program was highly satisfactory despite its severely serious character. The applause was spontaneous and liberally bestowed, especially after the "Tannhauser" number, when the members of the orchestra were obliged to rise and bow at the close of a magnificent performance of the popular overture.

Four of the selections have been played at this season's symphony concerts, "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman," "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," and the repetitions last evening call for no reiteration of praise now, except in a general way, for each number emphasized the fact that Dr Muck's fame in the Wagnerian field is well deserved.

The delicacy of the "Lohengrin" music, the pomp and solemnity of the funeral march, and the quaintness of "Die Meistersinger" prelude, were each brought out vividly by Dr Muck, who, while making no radical departures from accepted traditions, conducted with an air of authority that was very convincing as to the proper interpretation of the selections.

The "Parsifal" selection was given with great impressiveness, the "grail" motif being sung by the violins, and subsequently by the other instruments, with a cadence and beauty of tone that was prominent even in a performance of great merit throughout. The chant of the knights, a fine example of ensemble playing, and the lighter or "temptation" music, were other parts of the prelude calling for special commendation.

Paper Eagle
City Brooklyn
Date State N.Y.
DEC 2[illegible]

The principal item of interest on the next Boston Symphony programme, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, January 11, will be an unknown symphony by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, his first in E minor. The music of Sibelius is gradually making its way into the repertory of our large orchestras, and has already attained a great vogue on the other side. It will have its first performance in America at the Boston Symphony concerts, in Boston, next Friday and Saturday. Another work which is also, to all intents and purposes, a novelty, is Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme." The first number on the programme will be Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala."

Paper North American
City Philadelphia
Date DEC State Pa

A novelty of more than ordinary interest has been placed by Doctor Muck on the programme of the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy on Monday evening, January 7. It is Sibelius's first symphony in E minor. Mr. Scheel and the Philadelphia Orchestra have already done much good work in introducing here the unfamiliar music by this Finnish composer, and the growth of appreciation in respect to Sibelius's work is very rapid. A considerable vogue for him has been established in Germany. The soloist will be Willy Hess, of the orchestra, who will play the Beethoven concerto for violin. The remaining number of the programme will be the overture to "Egmont."

Paper Post
City Chicago
Date State Ill
DEC 23 1906

And especial interest will be lent to the coming of the Boston orchestra by the presence at the conductor's desk of Dr. Carl Muck, the German director, who enjoys a high reputation in Berlin and who has been "loaned" by the German emperor to Boston for a single season. Dr. Muck has been in Boston since October, and both here and in New York has been received with unqualified approval by press and public. Rarely has any of the visiting "virtuoso conductors" been so kindly handled by the New York reviewers as has Dr. Muck. A recent article on conductors and conducting written for the New York Sun by W. J. Henderson gives an interesting glimpse of the new leader and his manner of directing his orchestra. In view of Dr. Muck's appearance here next month the article is pertinent. Mr. Henderson writes:

"Dr. Muck was well known to those who make it their business to keep track of musical affairs in Europe. His method of conducting, however, was unknown to all save a few, and they had their doubts as to the public attitude toward it. Dr. Muck's outward and visible signs are of the most simple and unpicturesque sort. His gestures are few and elementary. There is nothing to see.

"A man of slender, elegant, aristocratic figure, of clean cut, scholarly face, and of cultured manner stands before the orchestra, and while directing it with the certainty of an authority and the command of a master so effaces his personality that he becomes a perfectly transparent medium between the audience and the music. This is the highest achievement possible to the manner of conducting. If no other qualities were to be found in Dr. Muck's art, this alone would be enough to insure it a welcome from those who are weary of finding a gorgeously decorated curtain of Monsieur This or Herr That hung between them and Beethoven or Brahms.

"The doubts as to the attitude of the musical public in regard to this sort of conducting have been scattered to the four winds. There is more than one public in this little town. There is a public for ground and lofty tumbling and there is a public for sane art. There is a public which shrieks its throat to tatters every time Caruso or Bonci sings a high note, and there is a public which values the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Kneisel quartet above all tenors.

"This latter is the musical public, and its taste can be trusted to arrive at just verdicts. It has pronounced most emphatically in favor of Dr. Muck, the man with the continent style and the splendid results. No one of the music lovers who have spent most of their lives in observing musical doings was deceived by the applause which followed Dr. Muck's reading of Bruckner's E major symphony. That applause was not an expression of gratitude to old Bruckner for projecting into the world his troublous music, but to Dr. Muck for his clear, lucid, and euphonious reading of the composition.

"The audience was quick to recognize the nature of the achievement and it conveyed its satisfaction in no doubtful terms. Dr. Muck's triumph on this occasion was more notable than at his début, though at the first concert the applause was more enthusiastic. But at that time the hearers were moved by the beautiful music of Brahms. It was music which they all knew and loved and they rejoiced at an interpretation such as they had not heard in many a long day."

Paper American
City New York
Date State N Y

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 10, and on Saturday afternoon, January 12. Thursday evening's concert will be devoted to Beethoven, the works being the overture to "Egmont," the concerto for violin and the seventh symphony. Willie Hess will be the soloist. Saturday afternoon the programme will comprise Elgar's overture "In the South," Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra," (first time), George Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and the overture to "Rienzi."

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, January 11. The item of chief interest in the programme will be a new quartet by Hugo Kaun, in D major, Op 48, No. 2. This work has had very considerable success wherever Professor Hess and his colleagues have played it.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y

Dr. Muck has prepared an interesting set of programmes for the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be made in the week of January 27. The work of the orchestra at present is unusually heavy, as some important novelties are being prepared for the Boston concerts. The biggest work (which has as yet been unheard in Boston) is Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which will be played in February. It is probable that the orchestra will play this at one of its coming concerts in New York, either in February or March.

[104]

MEMORABLE CONCERT

DR MUCK AS A CONDUCTOR OF WAGNER'S MUSIC

Three Overtures, Four Preludes and Siegfried's Glorification as Boston Has Not Heard Them in Years—Gliere and Leclair at the Sunday Chamber Concert—Mr Strube Reanimates the Concerto Form—News of the Local Theatres—"Madam Butterfly" in Paris and "Lakme" in New York

Seven times, at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last evening for the benefit of its pension fund, conductor, band and audience began an opera of Wagner, and yet not once did, or could, the curtain rise. Dr. Muck, who reappeared only a little paler for his illness, had arranged a curious programme, and the performance of it brought curious sensations. The overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," and "Tannhäuser," and the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "The Meistersingers" and "Parsifal"—the beginnings, indeed, of every opera by Wagner to which he put more than an introduction—stood on the list. Not one of them was played in the mild-mannered fashion that sometimes seems to have emasculated Wagner in the journey from the theatre to the concert hall. Dr. Muck and his responsive men took them all dramatically in the dramatic accent, fervor and contrast, the tonal pomp and incisiveness, the sweep and weight of climax, with which they clothed them. Theirs were declamatory voices proclaiming the drama that was to come. And yet the curtain never rose, though many a listener must have ached with eagerness for the whole opera when the overture had sounded as not once in many a season it sounds in the theatre. Conductor, men and audience were plainly "on edge." Seven times we began so well, and seven times we stopped so abruptly. It was a feast that never went beyond the most varied and stimulating hors d'œuvres. And with these beginnings we must be content as long as Boston remains operaless. Last spring the Symphony Orchestra gave a Wagner concert for the penston fund and every seat was sold. Last night it gave another, and there was not an empty place in Symphony Hall. All sorts and conditions of men and women made the audiences. Nearly every element in our musical and our social life was represented in them. At both concerts rapt attention relaxed at the end of each number into very hearty applause. If our public does these things for mere fragments of Wagner's operas in "concert form," for the mere beginnings of them, one after another, what would it not do, seemingly, for the whole of those operas in their only true place—the theatre? Yet one of the managers who might give us real opera again still doubts whether there is a public for it in Boston, while for the other the operatic field in America begins at the Battery and ends at the Harlem River.

Not that the opera either might give us would compare in the quality of the orchestra or in the abilities of the conductor with those that we heard in the three overtures, the four preludes and Siegfried's glorification from "Götterdammerung." Neither the Metropolitan nor the Manhattan Opera House has such a band as our orchestra, especially when it is as alive as it was last night with the new elasticity, warmth and eloquence that the new conductor has given it. Dr. Muck's reputation in Germany, and indeed in all Europe, is that of an operatic conductor of the first rank. The corner stone of that reputation is his signal ability as a conductor of Wagner's operas. Often in his concert work in the past three months here he has given some of the unmistakable signs of an operatic conductor of discernment and power—in the march of his climaxes, in the justness and adroitness of his proportions, in the skill of his weaving of backgrounds against the main current of the orchestral song, and in the quick sensing of the dramatic elements in such music as was inherently dramatic. Last night he had need to be only an operatic conductor, and such a one as we have not heard here since Mottl's brief visit, and such a Wagnerian conductor as has not come to us since Seidl's time. (It was a foolish fancy, doubtless; but it was hard not to dream of a week of Wagner here with singers and scenery borrowed from the Metropolitan Opera House, the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck.) Some of the traditions of Baireuth that were hangabout London last summer used to say Dr. Muck was all very well as a Wagnerian conductor, but that beside Herr So-and-So and Dr. Such-a-One he lacked temperament. Temperament indeed—and of a conductor who gave the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," a pictorial and an emotional power such as few that listened could have dreamed dwelt in the music; who wrought the climax of the overture to "Tannhäuser" so that the return of the Pilgrims' Chorus" was as the flooding of the dark and restless Venusberg with a great wave of clear white light; who made the path of the Grail, descending and ascending in the prelude to "Lohengrin," one long, shimmering modulation of ethereal tones; who, if there was something of the insatiate longing in the prelude to "Tristan," yet charged it with the accents of a fated and tragic love that is too deep to cry; who made the prelude to "The Mastersingers" from its beginning to end an outpouring of concentrated orchestral song; who gave the "Siegfried" selection from "Götterdämmerung" a broad and majestic eloquence—the apotheosis, not of a hero in the youth of the world, but of a hero in the youth of the world, and who held the prelude to [illegible] in a mood of [illegible]

[illegible] was played in the mild-mannered fashion that sometimes seems to have emasculated Wagner in the journey from the theatre to the concert hall. Dr. Muck and his responsive men took them all dramatically in the dramatic accent, fervor and contrast, the tonal pomp and incisiveness, the sweep and weight of climax, with which they clothed them. Theirs were declamatory voices proclaiming the drama that was to come. And yet the curtain never rose, though many a listener must have ached with eagerness for the whole opera when the overture had sounded as not once in many a season it sounds in the theatre. Conductor, men and audience were plainly "on edge." Seven times we began so well, and seven times we stopped so abruptly. It was a feast that never went beyond the most varied and stimulating hors d'œuvres. And with these beginnings we must be content as long as Boston remains operaless. Last spring the Symphony Orchestra gave a Wagner concert for the penston fund and every seat was sold. Last night it gave another, and there was not an empty place in Symphony Hall. All sorts and conditions of men and women made the audiences. Nearly every element in our musical and our social life was represented in them. At both concerts rapt attention relaxed at the end of each number into very hearty applause. If our public does these things for mere fragments of Wagner's operas in "concert form," for the mere beginnings of them, one after another, what would it not do, seemingly, for the whole of those operas in their only true place—the theatre? Yet one of the managers who might give us real opera again still doubts whether there is a public for it in Boston, while for the other the operatic field in America begins at the Battery and ends at the Harlem River.

Not that the opera either might give us would compare in the quality of the orchestra or in the abilities of the conductor with those that we heard in the three overtures, the four preludes and Siegfried's glorification from "Götterdammerung." Neither the Metropolitan nor the Manhattan Opera House has such a band as our orchestra, especially when it is as alive as it was last night with the new elasticity, warmth and eloquence that the new conductor has given it. Dr. Muck's reputation in Germany, and indeed in all Europe, is that of an operatic conductor of the first rank. The corner stone of that reputation is his signal ability as a conductor of Wagner's operas. Often in his concert work in the past three months here he has given some of the unmistakable signs of an operatic conductor of discernment and power—in the march of his climaxes, in the justness and adroitness of his proportions, in the skill of his weaving of backgrounds against the main current of the orchestral song, and in the quick sensing of the dramatic elements in such music as was inherently dramatic. Last night he had need to be only an operatic conductor, and such a one as we have not heard here since Mottl's brief visit, and such a Wagnerian conductor as has not come to us since Seidl's time. (It was a foolish fancy, doubtless; but it was hard not to dream of a week of Wagner here with singers and scenery borrowed from the Metropolitan Opera House, the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck.) Some of the traditions of Baireuth that were hangabout London last summer used to say Dr. Muck was all very well as a Wagnerian conductor, but that beside Herr So-and-So and Dr. Such-a-One he lacked temperament. Temperament indeed—and of a conductor who gave the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," a pictorial and an emotional power such as few that listened could have dreamed dwelt in the music; who wrought the climax of the overture to "Tannhäuser" so that the return of the Pilgrims' Chorus" was as the flooding of the dark and restless Venusberg with a great wave of clear white light; who made the path of the Grail, descending and ascending in the prelude to "Lohengrin," one long, shimmering modulation of ethereal tones; who, if there was something of the insatiate longing in the prelude to "Tristan," yet charged it with the accents of a fated and tragic love that is too deep to cry; who made the prelude to "The Mastersingers" from its beginning to end an outpouring of concentrated orchestral song; who gave the "Siegfried" selection from "Götterdämmerung" a broad and majestic eloquence—the apotheosis, not of a hero in the youth of the world, but of a hero in the youth of the world, and who held the prelude to [illegible]

[illegible] out of its tawdry meanness. [illegible]'s playing of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was more than a recreation. It was a revelation. The sea music came surging out of the orchestra with tumultuous voice and breath. Before our ears and emotions the overture developed into a whole music-drama. The Hollander and Senta were alive and vivid in it—the torture of the one, the longing of the other, and the redemption that her self-devotion brought. The poetry of it matched the power. If the overture, under Dr. Muck's hand, is so transfigured, what must the whole opera—almost neglected early Wagner nowadays—be? After it, perhaps, a purely objective view of the overture to "Tannhäuser" that disclosed no more and no less than the music seems to contain, was bound to seem a little tame—until, until, that stream of luminous tone began to pour deeper and deeper, broader and broader through the climax. Many a time has the song of the Pilgrims stilled the orgy of the Venusberg. Last night it flooded it. The shimmering euphony of the strings of the orchestra in the prelude to "Lohengrin" is an old story. It was not one whit the less shimmering last night, but it had beside an exquisite and ethereal undulation of sound that is as light. Long ago, as it seems now, Dr. Muck revealed in Wagner's "Faust" overture his feeling for the impinging and incisive phrase. So, again, he made the prelude to "Tristan" throb and pierce. The transition from the foreboding beginning to the rising passion of the love music was no mere instrumental rhetoric. It was as desire wrenching itself free of fate. It clutched the listener. Motti makes the passion of the lovers more burning and unappeasable, but he does not match Dr. Muck in the still, spent woe of the close. The prelude to "The Mastersingers" sang itself richly, sonorously, vitally. All its intricacies of counterpoint seemed as spontaneous improvisation—intertwining curves that leapt to the glowing instrumental colors that clothed them. Next, for the first time, Dr. Muck departed from his preludes. Resolute as he is against excerpts from the body of Wagner's music-dramas, he was willing to accept the glorification of Siegfried as a purely orchestral piece. Who, after all, heeds the bearing of Siegfried's body up the forest-path, the falling of the mists and their rising upon Gunther's hall, when he is watching "Götterdämmerung" in the theatre? The spectator may hardly see for the listening to Wagner's orchestral apotheosis of his slain hero. And Dr. Muck made it heroic. The tonal might and majesty were overwhelming, but there was more in his playing of it than this weight and magnificence of sound. There was heroic eloquence, recalling Siegfried's deeds, heroic lament, sorrowing for his death; and heroic exaltation proclaiming his glorification:

> "O kindischer Held!
> O herrlicher Knabe!
> Du hehrster Thaten
> thöriger Hort!"

Last of all came the prelude to "Parsifal," the calculated subtle prelude with its longing, its anguish and its ecstasy, its hint of knightly pomps and holy feasts, its voice of hope stilling the voice of pain. Conductors, as their temperament happens to go, have accented now the anguish and now the ecstasy. Dr. Muck poised both in a tremulous and piercing intensity.

Throughout Dr. Muck avoided the familiar pitfalls of Wagnerian conducting—the slow and affected tempi, the exaggerated contrasts, the forced "effects," the distorted phrase, the neglect of points of repose, the sound and fury that signifies nothing but the conductor's overstriving and anxiety. Throughout he kept himself and his men the voice of Wagner's music eloquent with the power of it, vital with the passion of it. And beneath this power and passion was full understanding. Long ago Wagner himself asserted the fundamental principle of all conducting—the finding, grasping, maintaining and imparting of the underlying song, the unifying melody (in the high and sublimated sense of the word) of the whole of a piece of music. So Dr. Muck seized these overtures and preludes, and so imparted them as organic and as songful wholes. Within each whole he shaped each phrase, adjusted each proportion, shaded each curve, sharpened or softened each accent. The sheer intellectual power and insight of his understanding of the music was masterly. The sheer adroitness of his shaping and adjusting of it was fascinating. He might have stopped there and given us a lifeless Wagner. As it was he ennobled the music with its appropriate eloquence; he animated it with its characteristic passion; he made it glow with the richest or the most transparent of tonal coloring. He not only found and kept the unifying song; but he made it throb and undulate with life. And his men, and soon his audience, took fire from him. Since Weingartner conducted here last January, there has been no such memorable concert in Boston.

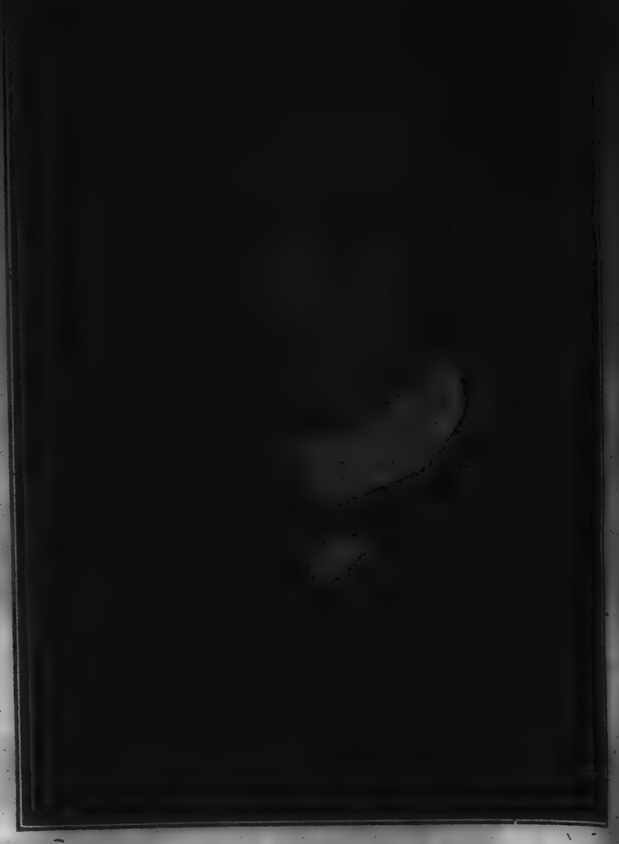
H. T. P.

The Other Week End Concerts

Mr. Hess and his comrades came into their own at the Sunday Chamber Concert yesterday, with the new quartet by the young Russian, Glière, that is fast going the musical world over. "The Kneisels" happened to be the first to play it here in November, but the Symphony Quartet was the first to play it in America at a concert in Geneva, N. Y., on their Western journey in October. Glière's music, moreover, happens to be exactly of the sort that suits its best talents. The sternest purist may not charge him with desire to distort the form or to inflate the voices of a string quartet. He is quite content to mould the one and fill the other with his own individuality, and without the quest of strange and subtle harmonies and accents. Yet from beginning to the end Glière writes the quartet with a fitful intensity that asks the nervous vitality which is the best trait of Mr. Hess and his comrades. With all its academic continence of form and harmony, the music is full of restlessness of mood and utterance. Technically polished as he is, Glière remains the true Slav in his swift alternations of feeling. [illegible] in the Slavic melancholy even when he [illegible] first movement an allegro, yet the [illegible] and then the contrast [illegible] both and himself with the delight of his own art as he invents and shapes new variations, exotic with Oriental interval or weird in their long-drawn threads of tone. The rest is often Russian folk-tune and Russian folk-dance, with its rudeness tempered by an artistry that shapes to itself whatever it touches. Only out of France of late and out of Reger has come such individual chamber music. The sonata for violin and viola (with piano) by old Leclair made a happy foil to the fitful, intense, and not quite civilized music of Gliere. The Russian was born a hundred years after the Frenchman died, but the Leclair of the Paris and the Turin of the eighteenth century was altogether civilized. Perhaps he was overcivilized in that he loved the voices of his two instruments more than he pondered the ideas and searched deep the moods that he should give them to speak. The charm of the sonata lay in its gratefulness to the two instruments that uttered it. They were speaking their natural idiom—the violin as Mr. Hess played it, warmly, clearly, with a delicate brilliance of pliant tone; the viola, in Mr. Férir's hands with a darker and more stately speech. With all its technical intricacies, there is repose in the smooth breadth of this eighteenth century music. And when our composers rest, it is rather against their will.

In one way, perhaps, Mr. Strube in his concerto for violin that Mr. Adamowski repeated at the Symphony concert on Saturday, is finding a new source of life for an orchestral form that was beginning to wither. Composers may write their concertos as a part of their whole duty to themselves and their art. Virtuosi, in turn, may play them, as their duty to the public—and their own talents; but in its old estate, as it flourished from Beethoven through the great musical generation of the middle quarters of the last century the form makes less and less appeal to our ears and imagination. Unless there is the transfiguring virtuoso many a listener is bored and is gathering courage to speak his boredom. Last winter Mr. Jacques-Dalcroze seemed to be trying to revitalize the violin concerto by charging it with high-pitched modern musical emotions (to which the form does not seem very susceptible) expressed in intricate ear-pricking modern musical idioms. Mr. Strube has chosen a wiser way. Why may not the concerto nowadays become a thing to charm by the grace and the fancy of the ideas that play through it, by the polished felicity with which they are expressed and by the elegance of technic and the fineness of feeling that are necessary to bring them to utterance. Thus may a composer write a spontaneous concerto and thus may he prove his possession of the lighter gifts and attributes of music. His foundation must still be his scholarly skill as it is in Mr. Strube's concerto, but the skill wears the mantle of grace, fancy, even playfulness, and steadily the garb of continent elegance. Of such is Mr. Strube's concerto. It is amusant in the fine French sense of the word, and it is one of the duties of music—and a saving duty for a concerto—to be amusant. As for Mr. Adamowski, it is hard to recall an occasion when he has played with such technical flawlessness and ease, such just warmth of feeling and such elegance of style as he did on Friday and on Saturday. He and the concerto were as one.

H. T. P.



DR CARL MUCK
The Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra This Season

DR KARL MUCK

The New Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

In many respects, the most important item in the present year of music has been the coming to America of Dr Karl Muck of Berlin, to be the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra for this season. Naturally his presence here with the orchestra at its coming concert will serve only to increase the interest which a concert by the Boston symphony orchestra is bound to excite among the music loving public. Dr Muck was a famous conductor long before he came to this country. As far back as 1886 when he was called to Prague and before he had got out of his twenties, he had attracted the attention of the connoisseurs of Europe through his work, orchestral and operatic, in Brunn and Graz, his first important posts. In the six years he was at Prague, the chief conductor of the German opera in the city and the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, he made a name for himself for sound scholarship, fine workmanship and valuable temperamental qualities. During that time his reputation increased so rapidly that when there came a vacancy in the ranks of the principal conductors of the royal opera in Berlin the post was given to him. He was then, in 1892, 33 years old.

From Berlin his fame spread through Europe. He became the principal conductor of the Parsifal performances at Bayreuth. He became one of the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts. He was for a season conductor of German opera at Covent Gardens, London. He appeared as guest-conductor with the principal orchestras of London, Paris, Brussels, Madrid, Budapest, Copenhagen, St Petersburg and Moscow and was generally recognized as belonging to that small group of men who are pre-eminent in that partciular field, such men as Richter, Mahler, Nikisch, Weingartner, Motti and Richard Strauss.

Dr Muck's was one of the three or four names seriously considered last spring as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra in succession to Mr Gericke. It was believed at the time that no experiment with a young man of short experience, no matter how talented he might be, could be made, and that it was neccessary to secure a conductor of established reputation. From the beginning the choice practically settled on Dr Muck, but there were grave doubts whether it would be possible to get him. He was the favorite conductor of the German emperor; in fact, enjoyed his personal friendship. Practically the entire responsibility of the opera in Berlin rested on him, for neither Weingartner nor Richard Strauss has spent much time in that city of recent years. And the task of securing him proved to be most difficult. The first time the matter was carried to the emperor an absolute refusal was the result. He would not listen to it. Then most powerful influences were brought to bear on him and in the end he told Dr Muck that he might go to Boston for a year, but no longer; that his (the emperor's) consent was given to this most unwillingly and that he would have allowed him to go to no other orchestra than the Boston symphony.

The feeling in Boston is that Dr Muck's coming to America for so short a time is both good fortune and misfortune, good fortune in that it has resulted in the most splendid concerts the orchestra has given in the whole 25 years of its existence; misfortune in that the profound impression he has made will make it almost impossible to find a man equal to the task of taking his place.

Dr Muck is a Bavarian by birth, having been born in Wurzburg on Oct 22, 1859. His father was a government official and a talented amateur musician. He gave his son his first lessons in music and intended him for the law, but while young Muck completed his university course and got his degree of "doctor juris" after a year's residence at Heidelberg and two years' residence at Leipsic, he never had any idea except to become a musician and a conductor. As a boy he appeared in public both as a violinist and as a pianist and the same year he took his degree from Leipsic university he graduated from the Leipsic conservatory and made his debut as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert with Karl Reinecke as conductor of the orchestra.

He had never seriously thought of the piano as a career, and immediately after his debut he accepted the post of chorus master in the little opera of Zurich in order to begin his training as a conductor. A year there was followed by a year in Salzburg, where he was conductor of the opera, two years in Brunn and two years in Graz. Then came his appointment to Prague and later to Berlin.

Dr Muck is in America for the first time, but this has not been for lack of chances to come here. Maurice Grau a few years ago offered him an almost fabulous sum to become the conductor of the Metropolitan opera in New York, but he did not care to leave Berlin. Later he has had other flattering offers, but none appealed to him until he was asked to be conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra.

While Dr Muck has been primarily concerned with opera, his experience in the concert field has been very thorough, for beginning with his engagement in Graz he has supplemented his operatic work with orchestral work. His success in America, although not unmixed, has been most gratifying to his friends and admirers, and he seems to have proved most thoroughly to Mr Lehmann and Milka Ternina and C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra in Germany last spring, that he is "the man of all men fitted to take charge of Boston's great orchestra."

Paper Times
City New York
Date DEC 30 1906 State N Y

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 10, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 12. The programme of the first concert will be devoted entirely to Beethoven. The programme of the second concert will be Elgar's overture, "In the South," Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," (first time,) Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," and the overture to "Rienzi."

Paper Times
City New York
Date DEC 30 1906 State N Y

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet on Jan. 11, a new quartet by Hugo Kaun in D major, Op. 48, No. 2, will be played.

[illegible] symphony

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date DEC 30 1906 State N Y

The second concert of [illegible] Boston Symphony Quartet will be given [illegible] Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, Jan. [illegible] The item of chief interest in the [illegible] will be a new quartet by Hugo Kaun [illegible] major, Op. 48, No. 2. With [illegible] impressions several

Paper Times
City New York
Date DEC 30 1906 State N Y

Dr. Muck is preparing [illegible] important novelties for performance [illegible] Boston Orchestra. Richard [illegible] Boston Domestica" will be [illegible] sinfonia. It is probable that [illegible] January 5 at one of its concerts [illegible] week.

[105]

... Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1906

A MEMORABLE CONCERT

DR. MUCK AS A CONDUCTOR OF WAGNER'S MUSIC

Three Overtures, Four Preludes and Siegfried's Glorification as Boston Has Not Heard Them in Years—Gliere and Leclair at the Sunday Chamber Concert—Mr. Strube Reanimates the Concerto Form—News of the Local Theatres—"Madam Butterfly" in Paris and "Lakme" in New York

Seven times, at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last evening for the profit of its pension fund, conductor, band and audience began an opera of Wagner, and yet not once did, or could, the curtain rise. Dr. Muck, who reappeared only a little paler for his illness, had arranged a curious programme, and the performance of it brought curious sensations. The overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," and "Tannhäuser," and the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "The Mastersingers" and "Parsifal"—the beginnings, indeed, of every opera by Wagner to which he put more than an introduction—stood on the list. Not one of them was played in the mild-mannered fashion that sometimes seems to have emasculated Wagner in the journey from the theatre to the concert hall. Dr. Muck and his responsive men took them all operatically in the dramatic accent, fervor and contrast, the tonal pomp and incisiveness, the sweep and weight of climax, with which they clothed them. Theirs were declamatory voices proclaiming the drama that was to come. And yet the curtain never rose, though many a listener must have ached with eagerness for the whole opera when the overture had sounded as not once in many a season it sounds in the theatre. Conductor, men and audience were plainly "on edge." Seven times we began so well, and seven times we stopped so abruptly. It was a feast that never went beyond the most varied and stimulating hors d'œuvres. And with these beginnings we must be content as long as Boston remains operaless. Last spring the Symphony Orchestra gave a Wagner concert for the pension fund and every seat was sold. Last night it gave another, and there was not an empty place in Symphony Hall. All sorts and conditions of men and women made the audiences. Nearly every element in our musical and our social life was represented in them. At both concerts rapt attention relaxed at the end of each number into very hearty applause. If our public does these things for mere fragments of Wagner's operas in "concert form," for the mere beginnings of them, one after another, what would it not do, seemingly, for the whole of those operas in their only true place—the theatre? Yet one of the managers who might give us real opera again still doubts whether there is a public for it in Boston, while for the other the operatic field in America begins at the Battery and ends at the Harlem River.

Not that the opera either might give us would compare in the quality of the orchestra or in the abilities of the conductor with those that we heard in the three overtures, the four preludes and Siegfried's glorification from "Götterdammerung." Neither the Metropolitan nor the Manhattan Opera House has such a band as our orchestra, especially when it is as alive as it was last night with the new elasticity, warmth and eloquence that the new conductor has given it. Dr. Muck's reputation in Germany, and indeed in all Europe, is that of an operatic conductor of the first rank. The corner stone of that reputation is his signal ability as a conductor of Wagner's operas. Often in his concert work in the past three months here he has given some of the unmistakable signs of an operatic conductor of discernment and power—in the march of his climaxes, in the justness and adroitness of his proportions, in the skill of his weaving of backgrounds against the main current of the orchestral song, and in the quick seizing of the dramatic elements in such music as was inherently dramatic. Last night he had need to be only an operatic conductor, and such a one as we have not heard here since Mottl's brief visit, and such a Wagnerian conductor as has not come to us since Seidl's time. (It was a foolish fancy, doubtless; but it was hard not to dream of a week of Wagner here with singers and scenery borrowed from the Metropolitan Opera House, the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck.) Some of the nurslings of Baireuth that were hanging about London last summer used to say that Dr. Muck was all very well as a Wagnerian conductor, but that beside Herr So-and-So and Dr. Such-a-One he lacked temperament. Temperament indeed—and of a conductor who gave the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," a pictorial and an emotional power such as few that listened could have dreamed dwelt in the music; who wrought the climax of the overture to "Tannhäuser" so that the return of the "Pilgrims' Chorus" was as the flooding of the hot and restless Venusberg with a great and clear white light; who made the path of the Grail, descending and ascending in the prelude to "Lohengrin," one long, shimmering undulation of ethereal tone; who, if he missed something of the insatiate longing of the prelude to "Tristan," yet charged the close with the accents of a fated and tragic woe that is too deep to cry; who made the prelude to "The Mastersingers" seem from beginning to end an outpouring of full-throated orchestral song; who gave the glorification from "Götterdämmerung" a mighty and majestic eloquence—the apotheosis, at last, of a hero in the youth of the world; and who held the prelude to "Parsifal" poised between unspeakable an- [illegible] beatitude.

He began ennobling with sheer largeness of utterance the overture to "Rienzi"—all but that abominable jigging tune which no man may lift out of its tawdry cheapness. His playing of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was more than a recreation. It was a revelation. The sea music came surging out of the orchestra with tumultuous voice and breath. Before our ears and emotions the overture developed into a whole music-drama. The Hollander and Senta were alive and vivid in it—the torture of the one, the longing of the other, and the redemption that her self-devotion brought. The poetry of it matched the power. If the overture, under Dr. Muck's hand, is so transfigured, what must the whole opera—almost neglected early Wagner nowadays—be? After it, perhaps, a purely objective view of the overture to "Tannhäuser" that disclosed no more and no less than the music seems to contain, was bound to seem a little tame—until, until, that stream of luminous tone began to pour deeper and deeper, broader and broader through the climax. Many a time has the song of the Pilgrims stilled the orgy of the Venusberg. Last night it flooded it. The shimmering euphony of the strings of the orchestra in the prelude to "Lohengrin" is an old story. It was not one whit the less shimmering last night, but it had beside an exquisite and ethereal undulation of sound that is as light. Long ago, as it seems now, Dr. Muck revealed in Wagner's "Faust" overture his feeling for the impinging and incisive phrase. So, again, he made the prelude to "Tristan" throb and pierce. The transition from the foreboding beginning to the rising passion of the love music was no mere instrumental rhetoric. It was as desire wrenching itself free of fate. It clutched the listener. Mottl makes the passion of the lovers more burning and unappeasable, but he does not match Dr. Muck in the still, spent woe of the close. The prelude to "The Mastersingers" sang itself richly, sonorously, vitally. All its intricacies of counterpoint seemed as spontaneous improvisation—intertwining curves that leapt to the glowing instrumental colors that clothed them. Next, for the first time, Dr. Muck departed from his preludes. Resolute as he is against excerpts from the body of Wagner's music-dramas, he was willing to accept the glorification of Siegfried as a purely orchestral piece. Who, after all, heeds the bearing of Siegfried's body up the forest-path, the falling of the mists and their rising upon Gunther's hall, when he is watching "Götterdämmerung" in the theatre? The spectator may hardly see for the listening to Wagner's orchestral apotheosis of his slain hero. And Dr. Muck made it heroic. The tonal might and majesty were overwhelming, but there was more in his playing of it than this weight and magnificence of sound. There was heroic eloquence, recalling Siegfried's deeds, heroic lament, sorrowing for his death; and heroic exaltation proclaiming his glorification:

> "O kindischer Held!
> O herrlicher Knabe!
> Du hehrster Thaten
> thöriger Hort!"

Last of all came the prelude to "Parsifal," the calculated subtle prelude with its longing, its anguish and its ecstasy, its hint of knightly pomps and holy feasts, its voice of hope stilling the voice of pain. Conductors, as their temperament happens to go, have accented now the anguish and now the ecstasy. Dr. Muck poised both in a tremulous and piercing intensity.

Throughout Dr. Muck avoided the familiar pitfalls of Wagnerian conducting—the slow and affected tempi, the exaggerated contrasts, the forced "effects," the distorted phrase, the neglect of points of repose, the sound and fury that signifies nothing but the conductor's overstriving and anxiety. Throughout he kept himself and his men the voice of Wagner's music eloquent with the power of it, vital with the passion of it. And beneath this power and passion was full understanding. Long ago Wagner himself asserted the fundamental principle of all conducting—the finding, grasping, maintaining and imparting of the underlying song, the unifying melody (in the high and sublimated sense of the word) of the whole of a piece of music. So Dr. Muck seized these overtures and preludes, and so imparted them as organic and as songful wholes. Within each whole he shaped each phrase, adjusted each proportion, shaded each curve, sharpened or softened each accent. The sheer intellectual power and insight of his understanding of the music was masterly. The sheer adroitness of his shaping and adjusting of it was fascinating. He might have stopped there and given us a lifeless Wagner. As it was he ennobled the music with its appropriate eloquence; he animated it with its characteristic passion; he made it glow with the richest or the most transparent of tonal coloring. He not only found and kept the unifying song; but he made it throb and undulate with life. And his men, and soon his audience, took fire from him. Since Weingartner conducted here last January, there has been no such memorable concert in Boston.

H. T. P.

The Other Week End Concerts

Mr. Hess and his comrades came into their own at the Sunday Chamber Concert yesterday, with the new quartet by the young Russian, Glière, that is fast going the musical world over. "The Kneisels" happened to be the first to play it here in November, but the Symphony Quartet was the first to play it in America at a concert in Geneva, N. Y., on their Western journey in October. Glière's music, moreover, happens to be exactly of the sort that suits its best talents. The sternest purist may not charge him with desire to distort the form or to inflate the voices of a string quartet. He is quite content to mould the one and fill the other with his own individuality, and without the quest of strange and subtle harmonies and accents. Yet from beginning to the end Glière writes the quartet with a fitful intensity that asks the nervous vitality which is the best trait of Mr. Hess and his comrades. With all its academic continence of form and harmony, the music is full of restlessness of mood and utterance. Technically polished as he is, Glière remains the true Slav in his swift alternations of feeling. His is the Slavic melancholy even when he [illegible] his first movement an allegro, yet the [illegible] themes and variations that make presumably a substitute for the slow movement are as restless. Again, there is melancholy song, again tumultuous energy tears its texture, and then the composer seems to still both and himself with the delight of his own art as he invents and shapes new variations, exotic with Oriental interval or weird in their long-drawn threads of tone. The rest is often Russian folk-tune and Russian folk-dance, with its rudeness tempered by an artistry that shapes to itself whatever it touches. Only out of France of late and out of Reger has come such individual chamber music. The sonata for violin and viola (with piano) by old Leclair made a happy foil to the fitful, intense, and not quite civilized music of Glière. The Russian was born a hundred years after the Frenchman died, but the Leclair of the Paris and the Turin of the eighteenth century was altogether civilized. Perhaps he was over-civilized in that he loved the voices of his two instruments more than he pondered the ideas and searched deep the moods that he should give them to speak. The charm of the sonata lay in its gratefulness to the two instruments that uttered it. They were speaking their natural idiom—the violin as Mr. Hess played it, warmly, clearly, with a delicate brilliance of pliant tone; the viola, in Mr. Férir's hands with a darker and more stately speech. With all its technical intricacies, there is repose in the smooth breadth of this eighteenth century music. And when our composers rest, it is rather against their will.

In one way, perhaps, Mr. Strube in his concerto for violin that Mr. Adamowski repeated at the Symphony concert on Saturday, is finding a new source of life for an orchestral form that was beginning to wither. Composers may write their concertos as a part of their whole duty to themselves and their art. Virtuosi, in turn, may play them, as their duty to the public—and their own talents; but in its old estate, as it flourished from Beethoven through the great musical generation of the middle quarters of the last century the form makes less and less appeal to our ears and imagination. Unless there is the transfiguring virtuoso many a listener is bored and is gathering courage to speak his boredom. Last winter Mr. Jacques-Dalcroze seemed to be trying to revitalize the violin concerto by charging it with high-pitched modern musical emotions (to which the form does not seem very susceptible) expressed in intricate ear-pricking modern musical idioms. Mr. Strube has chosen a wiser way. Why may not the concerto nowadays become a thing to charm by the grace and the fancy of the ideas that play through it, by the polished felicity with which they are expressed and by the elegance of technic and the fineness of feeling that are necessary to bring them to utterance. Thus may a composer write a spontaneous concerto and thus may he prove his possession of the lighter gifts and attributes of music. His foundation must still be his scholarly skill as it is in Mr. Strube's concerto, but the skill wears the mantle of grace, fancy, even playfulness, and steadily the garb of continent elegance. Of such is Mr. Strube's concerto. It is amusant in the fine French sense of the word, and it is one of the duties of music—and a saving duty for a concerto—to be amusant. As for Mr. Adamowski, it is hard to recall an occasion when he has played with such technical flawlessness and ease, such just warmth of feeling and such elegance of style as he did on Friday and on Saturday. He and the concerto were as one.

H. T. P.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 10, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 12. The programme of the first concert will be devoted entirely to Beethoven. The programme of the second concert will be Elgar's overture, "In the South," Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," (first time,) Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," and the overture to "Rienzi."

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet on Jan. 11, a new quartet by Hugo Kaun in D major, Op. 48, No. 2, will be played.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's second symphony

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, January 11. The item of chief interest in the programme will be a new quartet by Hugo Kaun in D major, Op. 48, No. 2.

Herbert Witherspoon will introduce several

THE SPRINGFIELD HOME
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 29, 190[illegible]

DR CARL MUCK
The Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra This Season

DR KARL MUCK

The New Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

In many respects, the most important item in the present year of music has been the coming to America of Dr Karl Muck of Berlin, to be the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra for this season. Naturally his presence here with the orchestra at its coming concert will serve only to increase the interest which a concert by the Boston symphony orchestra is bound to excite among the music loving public. Dr Muck was a famous conductor long before he came to this country. As far back as 1886 when he was called to Prague and before he had got out of his twenties, he had attracted the attention of the connoisseurs of Europe through his work, orchestral and operatic, in Brunn and Graz, his first important posts. In the six years he was at Prague, the chief conductor of the German opera in the city and the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, he made a name for himself for sound scholarship, fine workmanship and valuable temperamental qualities. During that time his reputation increased so rapidly that when there came a vacancy in the ranks of the principal conductors of the royal opera in Berlin the post was given to him. He was then, in 1892, 33 years old.

From Berlin his fame spread through Europe. He became the principal conductor of the Parsifal performances at Bayreuth. He became one of the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts. He was for a season conductor of German opera at Covent Gardens, London. He appeared as guest-conductor with the principal orchestras of London, Paris, Brussels, Madrid, Budapest, Copenhagen, St Petersburg and Moscow and was generally recognized as belonging to that small group of men who are pre-eminent in that partciular field, such men as Richter, Mahler, Nikisch, Weingartner, Mottl and Richard Strauss.

Dr Muck's was one of the three or four names seriously considered last spring as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra in succession to Mr Gericke. It was believed at the time that no experiment with a young man of short experience, no matter how talented he might be, could be made, and that it was neccessary to secure a conductor of established reputation. From the beginning the choice practically settled on Dr Muck, but there were grave doubts whether it would be possible to get him. He was the favorite conductor of the German emperor; in fact, enjoyed his personal friendship. Practically the entire responsibility of the opera in Berlin rested on him, for neither Weingartner nor Richard Strauss has spent much time in that city of recent years. And the task of securing him proved to be most difficult. The first time the matter was carried to the emperor an absolute refusal was the result. He would not listen to it. Then most powerful influences were brought to bear on him and in the end he told Dr Muck that he might go to Boston for a year, but no longer; that his (the emperor's) consent was given to this most unwillingly and that he would have allowed him to go to no other orchestra than the Boston symphony.

The feeling in Boston is that Dr Muck's coming to America for so short a time is both good fortune and misfortune, good fortune in that it has resulted in the most splendid concerts the orchestra has given in the whole 25 years of its existence; misfortune in that the profound impression he has made will make it almost impossible to find a man equal to the task of taking his place.

Dr Muck is a Bavarian by birth, having been born in Wurzburg on Oct 22, 1859. His father was a government official and a talented amateur musician. He gave his son his first lessons in music and intended him for the law, but while young Muck completed his university course and got his degree of "doctor juris" after a year's residence at Heidelberg and two years' residence at Leipsic, he never had any idea except to become a musician and a conductor. As a boy he appeared in public both as a violinist and as a pianist and the same year he took his degree from Leipsic university he graduated from the Leipsic conservatory and made his debut as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert with Karl Reinecke as conductor of the orchestra.

He had never seriously thought of the piano as a career, and immediately after his debut he accepted the post of chorus master in the little opera of Zurich in order to learn his training as a conductor. A year there was followed by a year in Salzburg where he was conductor of the opera, two years in Brunn and two years in Graz. Then came his appointment to Prague and later to Berlin.

Dr Muck is in America for the first time, but this has not been for lack of chances to come here. Maurice Grau a few years ago offered him an almost fabulous sum to become conductor of the Metropolitan opera in New York, but he did not care to leave Berlin. Later he has had other flattering offers, but none appealed to him until he was asked to be conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra.

While Dr Muck has been primarily concerned with opera, his experience in the concert field has been very thorough, for beginning with his engagement in Graz he has always supplemented his operatic by public orchestral work. His success in America, although not unexpected, has been most gratifying to his friends and admirers, and he seems to have proved most thoroughly [illegible] Lehmann and Milka Ternina. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra in Germany last spring, that he was "the man of all men fitted to take charge of Boston's great orchestra."

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

Dr. Muck is preparing some important novelties for performance by the Boston Orchestra. Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" will be played in February. It is probable that the orchestra will play this at one of its coming concerts in New York, either in February or March.

[105]

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date DEC 30 1906 State N Y

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 10, and Saturday afternoon, January 12. The programme of the first concert will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to "Egmont," the concerto for violin and the Seventh Symphony. The soloist will be Willy Hess. The programme of the second concert will be Elgar's overture "In the South," Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra" (first time), Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and the overture to "Rienzi."

Paper Press
City New York
Date DEC 30 1906 State N Y

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be in given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 10, and Saturday afternoon, January 12. The programme of the first concert will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to "Egmont," the concerto for violin and the seventh symphony. Willy Hess will be the soloist in the concerto. The programme of the second concert will comprise Elgar's overture, "In the South"; Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra" (first time), George Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and the overture to "Rienzi."

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet is announced for Friday afternoon, January 11, in Mendelssohn Hall. The item of chief interest will be a new quartet in D major, opus 48, No. 2, by Hugo Kaun.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date DEC 30 1906 State D C

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One of the most brilliant works of the nec-Russian school will hold the place of honor on the next Boston Symphony program, which will be played in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7. It is the fifth symphony of Glazounoff, a work which is little known in this country. It has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with success this year in Boston and New York.

The first number of the program will be Elgar's overture, "In the South." The soloist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, who will play Saint-Saens concerto for violin in B minor.

Paper Press
City Phila
Date DEC 30 1906 State Pa

A novelty of more than ordinary interest has been placed by Dr. [illegible] the program of the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. It is Sibelius' first symphony, in E minor. Mr. Scheel has had some music by this Finnish composer on his programs and the growth of appreciation in respect to Sibelius' work is very rapid. A very considerable vogue for him has been established in Germany. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, of the orchestra. He will play the Beethoven concerto for violin. The remaining number of the program will be the overture to "Egmont."

Paper Inquirer
City Phila.
State Pa.
DEC 30 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A novelty of more than ordinary interest has been placed by Dr. Muck on the program of the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. It is Sibelius' first symphony in E minor. The soloist will be Professor Willy Hess, of the orchestra. He will play the Beethoven concerto for violin. The remaining number on the program will be the overture to "Egmont."

Paper Sun
City New York
Date JAN 4 - 1907 State N Y

[illegible] Muck, the conductor from the Royal Opera House in Berlin, and this year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday [illegible] next [illegible] to conduct [illegible] ed to [illegible] he de-

Paper EVENING Sun
City New York
Date DEC 31 1906 State N Y

Dr. Karl Muck has prepared a difficult set of programmes for the western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be made in the week beginning Jan. 27. "Important novelties are also preparing for the Boston concerts, the biggest work, as yet unheard in Boston, being Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica." This will be played there in February and probably also in New York, either in February or March.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date DEC 31 1906 State N Y

Dr. Carl Muck Well Again.

BOSTON, Dec. 30.—Dr. Carl Muck has practically recovered from his recent attack of tonsilitis. To-night he conducted the symphony orchestra at the concert for the benefit of the Symphony Pension Fund.

Paper Journal of Commerce
City New York
Date DEC 31 1906 State N Y

Dr. Karl Muck's Indisposition Slight.

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been ill, is reported much better to-day. Although he did not venture out to conduct the usual Saturday evening concert at Symphony Hall, he is so improved from the slight attack of tonsillitis from which he has been suffering that he hopes to be able to conduct the special pension fund concert Sunday evening, for which a Wagner programme has been arranged.

BOSTON TRAVELER, DECEMBER 31, 1906.

THE illness of Dr. Muck prevented his leading the tenth Symphony concert on Saturday evening. Prof. Wily Hess conducted. The programme was Variations on a theme of Haydn-Brahms; Concerto No. 2 in F-sharp minor, for violin, Strube; Shepherds' Song at the Manger and March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus," Liszt. The feature of such a programme was naturally the concerto, more particularly so on Saturday night for the reason that the composer conducted. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist. Both are popular and were most enthusiastically received.

The Brahms number was not especially successful, not on account of any want of interpretation on the part of the musicians, but rather because of its own want of merit. Neither did the Liszt selections make any marked impression, although the march was superbly given.

Dr. Muck braved weather conditions long enough to lead the pension fund concert by the Symphony Orchestra on Sunday evening. The programme was practically a Wagnerian one and was given in a manner that this orchestra alone can give. The night was certainly a red letter night in these concerts in point of attendance, a most encouraging sign.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
State N Y

DR. MUCK TO STAGE WAGNERIAN OPERA

Hammerstein Refuses to Deny or Affirm Report That He Has Engaged Boston's New Leader.

It is asserted that Oscar Hammerstein, in furtherance of his plans for giving Wagnerian opera on the largest scale, has engaged Dr. Carl Muck, formerly the conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin, and now engaged for this season as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Hammerstein, seen yesterday afternoon, firmly refused to discuss this report, merely stating in the most positive way that he would neither affirm it nor deny it. He has already options on the services of many prominent Wagnerian artists, so his very silence on the matter is not without significance.

Paper [illegible] Press
City New York
Date DEC 30 1906 State N Y

DR. KARL MUCK, THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An Unusual Music Season.

An evidence of a noteworthy development in the musical taste of the American people,— in so far as the great cities of our country represent the American people,— is to be found in the lengthening list of foreign musical artists who are coming to our opera houses and concert chambers. The most notable personalities of the present season, which is to be unusually rich in vocal and instrumental music, are characterized by Mr. Gilman in a special article this month (page 398). Saint-Saëns, Puccini, Leoncavallo, and Scriabine are undoubtedly the most eminent of our visitors, all being composers of world-wide fame. Among conductors, Dr. Karl Muck, who has been one of the "Parsifal" pilots at Beyreuth, and who comes this year from the Berlin Royal Opera House to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its twenty-first season, is perhaps the most eminent. Vassili Safonov returns to lead the Philharmonic Orchestra. Among pianists we note the return of Moritz Rosenthal after an absence of eight years, and the concert lists of Joseph Lhévinne and Augusta Schnabel. On the violin we shall hear Alexander Petschnikov, Edwin Grasse and Gyöngyöshalaszy. Three opera companies will give us grand opera on a scale commensurate with our now cultivated taste and our plethoric purses: Mr. Conried, at the Metropolitan, Mr. Oscar Hammerstein, at the Manhattan, and Mr. Henry Savage, whose artists sing in English at the Garden Theatre. A unique and interesting feature of the musical season will be the tour through the United States of the eminent English composer, Mr. Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who will conduct a large chorus of negro voices in concert and other high grade chamber music.

PAWTUCKET. THE EVENING TIMES JANUARY 4. 1907.

SECOND CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Germaine Schnitzer as Soloist —Chadwick's "Cleopatra" Produced.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given before a large audience in Infantry Hall, Providence, last evening. Two especial features added to the pleasure of the occasion—one, the first appearance in the city of Miss Germaine Schnitzer, soloist, and the other the first production in Providence of Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra." George Whitfield Chadwick was born at Lowell, Mass., in 1854, and is now living in Boston. He composed the "poem" in the summer and fall of 1904, and the first performance was at the Worcester Music Festival of 1905. The work is scored for the full orchestra and is supposed to illustrate, musically, the story of Antony and Cleopatra. There is an undulating movement for flutes and harps, suggesting the voyage on the Cyndus. This is succeeded by an allegro agitato, illustrative of the approach of the Roman and his army. Then there is a sensuous melody for the violincello, gradually taken up by the entire orchestra. The defeat of Antony, his passing, and the lamentations are well worked out in the orchestration.

The second number was Schumann's concerto in A minor, with Miss Schnitzer at the piano. The soloist disclosed powers that delighted her auditors and her playing at times bordered on the sensational.

The final number, Glazounoff's symphony in B-flat major was also new to Providence. As in the other selections the orchestration was almost flawless, and was received with much applause.

Dr. Muck again led in the inimitable manner that has gained him such wide known and well-deserved popularity.

[illegible] THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(From Mr. [illegible]'s criticism in the Daily Advertiser.)

PROGRAMME.

Brahms—Variations on a Haydn Theme. Op. 56a.
Strube—Violin Concerto, F-sharp minor, No. 2.
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.
Liszt—Shepherd's Song at the Manger.
Liszt—March of the Three Holy Kings.

Not a very inspiring programme and Dr. Muck was absent, our climate having at last caught him by the throat. Prof. Willy Hess has hitherto only conducted concertos in Boston; last night he conducted everything but the concerto. We notice that the railroad-timetable exactness, with which Mr. Gericke used to begin the concerts is being departed from; on this occasion the concert began at 8.10.

In the first number the beauty of Haydn's theme impressed us more than the variations of it. Yet there was great skill in the work and the leading of the voices was remarkably fluent. In spite of the charm of the sixth and seventh variations the composition scarcely ever became more than interesting. One felt at the end that Brahms could readily have added half-a-dozen more variations if they had been demanded, with as much ease as a grocer's clerk could add a few more pounds of sugar to your purchase; there was too much facility in the composition, but the work was never dry nor dull, and Prof. Hess brought out the points with praiseworthy intelligence.

The Variations did not make a dress parade of the different departments of the orchestra, as is often done in this form of composition, but followed the higher plan of really developing the theme, so that Haydn's thought became very much enlarged and modernized before the end. Nevertheless, as intimated, we found the chief charm in the melody unadorned.

The selections from Liszt's "Christus" (the two last numbers of the concert) were scarcely as effective as the Bach "Pastorale" from the "Christmas Oratorio," to which we have become accustomed at this season of the year. Yet there is much beauty in each of the selections, in spite of Hanslick's virulent attacks on the work. That eminent German scold held that the master of luxurious instrumentation was trying to blow infantile bagpipes before the Child in the Manger and that the result was a most artificial "naivete," a new form of spiritual over-refinement. He adds that Liszt's "Christus" is an open declaration of musical bankruptcy. He attacks the "Shepherd's Song" with yet fiercer vehemence.

The Republican. JANUARY 4, 1907.

AFFAIRS OF THE LOCAL THEATERS.

MME OLGA SAMAROFF'S CONCERT.

Appearance of the Distinguished Pianist This Evening at Holyoke.

Music-lovers will be much interested in the appearance at Windsor hall, Holyoke, this evening, of the distinguished young pianist, Mme Olga Samaroff, who comes under the auspices of the Holyoke music club. She has not yet appeared in this city, and a large party of musicians and others from Springfield is expected to attend. The career of Mme Samaroff has been of a remarkable sort, if only for the promptness with which her talents have been recognized. It was not till January, 1905, a bare two years ago, that she made her professional debut, yet before the season was over she was established as one of the foremost pianists in the country. Since then she has been in such demand that a journey to the Pacific slope, for which many engagements have been offered, has necessarily been postponed till next season. She has played with all the leading orchestras and at festivals, including the one at Worcester last October, at which she was one of the principal attractions.

It has often been taken for granted from Mme Olga Samaroff's name that she is a Russian. She is, as a matter of fact, American, and was born at San Antonio, Tex., where her father was in the paymaster's department. She is, however, of German and Russian descent, so that both her name and her gift for piano playing are fully accounted for. Her maternal grandmother was a concert pianist in Germany, and with her she first studied. Her girlhood was spent in a convent in Paris, and in that city she studied the piano with the elder Marmontel. In 1895 she entered the conservatory—one of 12 successful candidates chosen from 176 applicants. There she studied five years with Delaborde, and later she went to Berlin for studies with Jedlicska. When she was at last ready to appear before the public her training was complete, and in technic and in temperament she has shown herself an artist of a very uncommon sort. Her program:—

Fantasia and fugue, G minor	Bach
Sonata, op. 35	Chopin
Allegro Agitato. Scherzo. Marche Funebre. Presto.
Etude, op. 25, No 7	Chopin
Etude, op. 25, No 6	Chopin
Etude, op. 10, No 12	Chopin
Valse, op. 64, No 2	Chopin
Polonaise, op. 53	Chopin
Rhapsodie, op. 79, No 2	Brahms
Intermezzo, op. 117, No 1	Brahms
Humoresque	Tschaikowsky
Nocturne (for the left hand only)	Scriabine
Prelude	Liadow
Liebestraum	Liszt
Rhapsodie, No 12	Liszt

[106]

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date DEC 30 1906 State N Y

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 10, and Saturday afternoon, January 12. The programme of the first concert will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to "Egmont," the concerto for violin and the Seventh Symphony. The soloist will be Willy Hess. The programme of the second concert will be Elgar's overture "In the South," Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra" (first time), Georg Schamann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and the overture to "Rienzi."

Paper Press
City New York
Date DEC 30 1906 State N Y

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be in given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 10, and Saturday afternoon, January 12. The programme of the first concert will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to "Egmont," the concerto for violin and the seventh symphony. Willy Hess will be the soloist in the concerto. The programme of the second concert will comprise Elgar's overture, "In the South"; Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra" (first time), George Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and the overture to "Rienzi."

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet is announced for Friday afternoon, January 11, in Mendelssohn Hall. The item of chief interest will be a new quartet in D major, opus 48, No. 2, by Hugo Kaun.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date DEC 30 1906 State D C

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One of the most brilliant works of the nec-Russian school will hold the place of honor on the next Boston Symphony program, which will be played in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7. It is the fifth symphony of Glazounoff, a work which is little known in this country. It has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with success this year in Boston and New York.

The first number of the program will be Elgar's overture, "In the South." The soloist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, who will play Saint-Saens concerto for violin in B minor.

Paper (Press
City Phila
Date DEC 30 1906 State Pa

A novelty of more than ordinary interest has been placed by Dr. [illegible] on the program of the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. It is Sibelius' first symphony, in E minor. Mr. Scheel has had some music by this Finnish composer on his programs and the growth of appreciation in respect to Sibelius' work is very rapid. A very considerable vogue for him has been established in Germany. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, of the orchestra. He will play the Beethoven concerto for violin. The remaining number of the program will be the overture to "Egmont."

Paper EVENING Sun
City New York
Date State N Y

DEC 31 1906

Dr. Karl Muck has prepared a difficult set of programmes for the western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be made in the week beginning Jan. 27. Important novelties are also preparing for the Boston concerts, the biggest work, as yet unheard in Boston, being Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica." This will be played there in February and probably also in New York, either in February or March.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date DEC 31 1906 State N Y

Dr. Carl Muck Well Again.

BOSTON, Dec. 30.—Dr. Carl Muck has practically recovered from his recent attack of tonsilitis. To-night he conducted the symphony orchestra at the concert for the benefit of the Symphony Pension Fund.

Paper Journal of Commerce
City New York
Date DEC 31 1906 State N Y

Dr. Karl Muck's Indisposition Slight.

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been ill, is reported much better to-day. Although he did not venture out to conduct the usual Saturday evening concert at Symphony Hall, he is so improved from the slight attack of tonsillitis from which he has been suffering that he hopes to be able to conduct the special pension fund concert Sunday evening, for which a Wagner programme has been arranged.

BOSTON TRAVELER, DECEMBER 31, 1906.

THE illness of Dr. Muck prevented his leading the tenth Symphony concert on Saturday evening. Prof. Willy Hess conducted. The programme was Variations on a theme of Haydn-Brahms; Concerto No. 2 in F-sharp minor, for violin, Strube; Shepherds' Song at the Manger and March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus," Liszt. The feature of such a programme was naturally the concerto, more particularly so on Saturday night for the reason that the composer conducted. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist. Both are popular and were most enthusiastically received.

The Brahms number was not especially successful, not on account of any want of interpretation on the part of the musicians, but rather because of its own want of merit. Neither did the Liszt selections make any marked impression, although the march was superbly given.

Dr. Muck braved weather conditions long enough to lead the pension fund concert by the Symphony Orchestra on Sunday evening. The programme was practically a Wagnerian one and was given in a manner that this orchestra alone can give. The night was certainly a red letter night in these concerts in point of attendance, a most encouraging sign.

Paper Engineer
City Phila.
State Pa.
DEC 30 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A novelty of more than ordinary interest has been placed by Dr. Muck on the program of the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. It is Sibelius' first symphony in E minor. The soloist will be Professor Willy Hess, of the orchestra. He will play the Beethoven concerto for violin. The remaining number on the program will be the overture to "Egmont."

Paper Sun
City New York
Date JAN 4 - 1907 State N Y

Karl Muck, the conductor from the Royal Opera House in Berlin, and this year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday declined the [illegible] Conried to conduct the German operas at the Metropolitan next winter, although Mr. Conried offered to allow him to select the orchestra if he de-

Paper Telegraph
City New York
State N Y

DR. MUCK TO STAGE WAGNERIAN OPERA

Hammerstein Refuses to Deny or Affirm Report That He Has Engaged Boston's New Leader.

It is asserted that Oscar Hammerstein, in furtherance of his plans for giving Wagnerian opera on the largest scale, has engaged Dr. Carl Muck, formerly the conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin, and now engaged for this season as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Hammerstein, seen yesterday afternoon, firmly refused to discuss this report, merely stating in the most positive way that he would neither affirm it nor deny it. He has already options on the services of many prominent Wagnerian artists, so his very silence on the matter is not without significance.

Paper Press
City New York
Date State N Y

DR. KARL MUCK, THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An Unusual Music Season.

An evidence of a noteworthy development in the musical taste of the American people,— in so far as the great cities of our country represent the American people,— is to be found in the lengthening list of foreign musical artists who are coming to our opera houses and concert chambers. The most notable personalities of the present season, which is to be unusually rich in vocal and instrumental music, are characterized by Mr. Gilman in a special article this month (page 398). Saint-Saëns, Puccini, Leoncavallo, and Scriabine are undoubtedly the most eminent of our visitors, all being composers of world-wide fame. Among conductors, Dr. Karl Muck, who has been one of the "Parsifal" pilots at Beyreuth, and who comes this year from the Berlin Royal Opera House to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its twenty-first season, is perhaps the most eminent. Vassili Safonov returns to lead the Philharmonic Orchestra. Among pianists we note the return of Moritz Rosenthal after an absence of eight years, and the concert lists of Joseph Lhévinne and Augusta Schnabel. On the violin we shall hear Alexander Petschnikov, Edwin Grasse and Gyöngyöshalaszy. Three opera companies will give us grand opera on a scale commensurate with our now cultivated taste and our plethoric purses: Mr. Conried, at the Metropolitan, Mr. Oscar Hammerstein, at the Manhattan, and Mr. Henry Savage, whose artists sing in English at the Garden Theatre. A unique and interesting feature of the musical season will be the tour through the United States of the eminent English composer, Mr. Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who will conduct a large chorus of negro voices in concert and other high grade chamber music.

PAWTUCKET.
THE EVENING TIMES
JANUARY 4, 1907.

SECOND CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Germaine Schnitzer as Soloist —Chadwick's "Cleopatra" Produced.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given before a large audience in Infantry Hall, Providence, last evening. Two especial features added to the pleasure of the occasion—one, the first appearance in the city of Miss Germaine Schnitzer, soloist, and the other the first production in Providence of Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra." George Whitfield Chadwick was born at Lowell, Mass., in 1854, and is now living in Boston. He composed the "poem" in the summer and fall of 1904, and the first performance was at the Worcester Music Festival of 1905. The work is scored for the full orchestra and is supposed to illustrate, musically, the story of Antony and Cleopatra. There is an undulating movement for flutes and harps, suggesting the voyage on the Cyndus. This is succeeded by an allegro agitato, illustrative of the approach of the Roman and his army. Then there is a sensuous melody for the violincello, gradually taken up by the entire orchestra. The defeat of Antony, his passing, and the lamentations are well worked out in the orchestration.

The second number was Schumann's concerto in A minor, with Miss Schnitzer at the piano. The soloist disclosed powers that delighted her auditors and her playing at times bordered on the sensational.

The final number, Glazounoff's symphony in B-flat major was also new to Providence. As in the other selections the orchestration was almost flawless, and was received with much applause.

Dr. Muck again led in the inimitable manner that has gained him such wide renown and well-deserved popularity. The next symphony concert will be given at Infantry Hall, on March 7.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD
DECEMBER 31, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(From Mr. Elson's criticism in the Daily Advertiser.)

PROGRAMME.

Brahms—Variations on a Haydn Theme. Op. 56a.
Strube—Violin Concerto, F-sharp minor, No. 2. Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.
Liszt—Shepherd's Song at the Manger.
Liszt—March of the Three Holy Kings.

Not a very inspiring programme and Dr. Muck was absent, our climate having at last caught him by the throat. Prof. Willy Hess has hitherto only conducted concertos in Boston; last night he conducted everything but the concerto. We notice that the railroad-timetable exactness, with which Mr. Gericke used to begin the concerts is being departed from; on this occasion the concert began at 8.10.

In the first number the beauty of Haydn's theme impressed us more than the variations of it. Yet there was great skill in the work and the leading of the voices was remarkably fluent. In spite of the charm of the sixth and seventh variations the composition scarcely ever became more than interesting. One felt at the end that Brahms could readily have added half-a-dozen more variations if they had been demanded, with as much ease as a grocer's clerk could add a few more pounds of sugar to your purchase; there was too much facility in the composition, but the work was never dry nor dull, and Prof. Hess brought out the points with praiseworthy intelligence.

The Variations did not make a dress parade of the different departments of the orchestra, as is often done in this form of composition, but followed the higher plan of really developing the theme, so that Haydn's thought became very much enlarged and modernized before the end. Nevertheless, as intimated, we found the chief charm in the melody unadorned.

The selections from Liszt's "Christus" (the two last numbers of the concert) were scarcely as effective as the Bach "Pastorale" from the "Christmas Oratorio," to which we have become accustomed at this season of the year. Yet there is much beauty in each of the selections, in spite of Hanslick's virulent attacks on the work. That eminent German scold held that the master of luxurious instrumentation was trying to blow infantile bagpipes before the Child in the Manger and that the result was a most artificial "naiveté," a new form of spiritual over-refinement. He adds that Liszt's "Christus" is an open declaration of musical bankruptcy. He attacks the "Shepherd's Song" with yet fiercer vehemence.

The Republican.
JANUARY 4, 1907.

AFFAIRS OF THE LOCAL THEATERS.

MME OLGA SAMAROFF'S CONCERT.

Appearance of the Distinguished Pianist This Evening at Holyoke.

Music-lovers will be much interested in the appearance at Windsor hall, Holyoke, this evening, of the distinguished young pianist, Mme Olga Samaroff, who comes under the auspices of the Holyoke music club. She has not yet appeared in this city, and a large party of musicians and others from Springfield is expected to attend. The career of Mme Samaroff has been of a remarkable sort, if only for the promptness with which her talents have been recognized. It was not till January, 1905, a bare two years ago, that she made her professional debut, yet before the season was over she was established as one of the foremost pianists in the country. Since then she has been in such demand that a journey to the Pacific slope, for which many engagements have been offered, has necessarily been postponed til next season. She has played with all the leading orchestras and at festivals, including the one at Worcester last October, at which she was one of the principal attractions.

It has often been taken for granted from Mme Olga Samaroff's name that she is a Russian. She is, as a matter of fact, American, and was born at San Antonio, Tex., where her father was in the paymaster's department. She is, however, of German and Russian descent, so that both her name and her gift for piano playing are fully accounted for. Her maternal grandmother was a concert pianist in Germany, and with her she first studied. Her girlhood was spent in a convent in Paris, and in that city she studied the piano with the elder Marmontel. In 1895 she entered the conservatory—one of 12 successful candidates chosen from 176 applicants. There she studied five years with Delaborde, and later she went to Berlin for studies with Jedlicska. When she was at last ready to appear before the public her training was complete, and she shown herself in technic and in temperament an artist of a very uncommon sort. Her program:—

Fantasia and fugue, G minor	Bach
Sonata, op. 35	Chopin
Allegro. Agitato. Scherzo. Marche Funebre. Presto.
Etude, op. 25, No 7	Chopin
Etude, op. 25, No 6	Chopin
Etude, op. 10, No 12	Chopin
Valse, op. 64, No 2	Chopin
Polonaise, op. 53	Chopin
Rhapsodie, op. 79, No 2	Brahms
Intermezzo, op. 117, No 1	Brahms
Humoresque	Tschaikowsky
Nocturne (for the left hand only)	Scriabine
Prelude	Liadow
Liebestraum	Liszt
Rhapsodie, No 12	Liszt

[106]

Paper Eagle
City Brooklyn
Date JAN 5 - 1907 State NY

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND THE CHORAL ART

Give Concerts in Brooklyn Next Week With Attractive Programmes.

A WEEK OF ITALIAN OPERAS,

At Both the Manhattan and Metropolitan Houses, With Many Concerts.

Two works new to Brooklyn appear on the programme of the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening. They are Georg Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme and Jean Sibelius' first symphoney, in E minor. Both of these men are most interesting personalities in modern music. Both of them are young, comparatively speaking, and both of them modern, although neither goes to the extreme of a Strauss, a Mahler or a Reger. Schumann, who was born in 1866, in Konigstein, is the conductor of the Singakademie of Berlin. He comes of a musical family, his father having been a conductor and his grandfather a cantor. His teachers were C. A. Fischer, Rolifuss and Baumfelder, of Dresden, and Jadassohn, Reinecke and Zwintscher of Leipsic. In Leipsic he won the Beethoven prize in 1887. From 1891 to 1896 he was the conductor of the Gesangverein of Dantzig and from 1896 to 1900 he was the conductor of the Philharmonic of Bremen. Thence he went to his present post in Berlin. He has written two symphonies, several large orchestra and orchestral and choral works, as well as chamber music and songs. Jean Sibelius is the representative composer of Finland. He has written two symphonies, several orchestra poems on national themes. He is a man of great talent and his works have been having a very considerable vogue in Europe. This first symphony was first played in this country by the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston last Friday and Saturday, January 4 and 5. The whole programme is as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala" .....Goldmark
Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme, Georg Schumann
Symphony, No. 1 in E Minor.....Sibelius

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date State N
JAN 5 - 1907

Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week. The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the Concerto for Violin in D major and the Symphony in A Major, No. 7. The soloist will be Willy Hess.

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 5 - 19

Dr. Karl Muck has arranged an all-Beethoven programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening. Willy Hess will be soloist in the D major concerto; the seventh symphony and the overture to Goethe's "Egmont" are the other numbers. At the Saturday afternoon concert there will be no soloist. George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra" and Edgar's overture "In the South" will be played.

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 5 - 1907

The Symphony Quartette, h... on Friday afternoon ... first time in New ... quartette in D major ... quartette in F major ...

Paper Post
City New York
Date JAN 5 - 1907 State NY

A Beethoven programme will be offered at next Thursday evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, the numbers chosen being the "Egmont" overture, the violin concerto (Willy Hess), and the seventh symphony. The Saturday afternoon programme will include Elgar's "In the South," Chadwick's "Cleopatra" (first time), Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date JAN 5 - 1907 State NY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes for its novelty to Brooklyn next Friday, the Finlander Sibelius's symphony No. 1 in E minor. The Carnegie Hall programme on Thursday night is all Beethoven—Seventh Symphony, "Egmont" overture, Mr. Hess in violin concerto—while the Saturday matinée has Elgar's "In the South," Chadwick's Bostonian "Cleopatra"—a first time—Georg Schumann's "Variations" and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

Paper Tribune
City Brooklyn
Date JAN 5 - 1907 State NY

Two works new to Brooklyn appear on the programme of the next Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening. They are Georg Schumann's "Variations" and "Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and Jean Sibelius' first symphony, in E minor. The whole programme is as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala" (Goldmark); "Variations" and "Fugue on a Merry Theme" (Georg Schumann); symphony No. 1, in E minor (Sibelius). This symphony was first played in this country at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston yesterday and to-day.

Paper Union
City Brooklyn
Date JAN - 1907 State NY

On Sunday evening, Dec. 30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Pension Fund concert of the season—the orchestra has a large pension fund in the making. The programme arranged by Dr. Muck comprised seven Wagner overtures and preludes and the "Funeral March" from "Gotterdammerung." For the first time in his career Dr. Muck put part of "Parsifal" in a concert programme. Dr. Muck, as is well known, is the greatest of living interpreters of "Parsifal," and he is thoroughly in accord with the belief that "Parsifal" is a sacred work and should never be performed outside of Bayreuth, much less on the concert stage. But for once he put his convictions aside in order that the programme of the Pension Fund concert might give a complete historical view of Wagner's artistic and creative development.

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date JAN 5 - 1907 State NY

On Sunday evening, December 30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Pension Fund concert of the season—the orchestra having a large pension fund in the making. The programme which Dr. Muck arranged, comprised seven Wagner overtures and preludes, and the Funeral March from "Kotterdammerung." An interesting thing about the programme was that Dr. Muck, for the first time in his career, put any part of "Parsifal" in a concert programme. Dr. Muck is one of the great interpreters of "Parsifal," and he is thoroughly in accord with the belief that "Parsifal" is a sacred work, and should never be performed outside of Bayreuth, much less on the concert stage. But for once he put his convictions aside in order that the programme of the Pension Fund concert might give a complete historical view of Wagner's artistic and creative development.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
JANUARY 5, 1907

The second concert of the Longy club will be given in Potter hall on Wednesday evening, Jan. 16. The club will be assisted by Messrs. Fritzsche, bass clarinet; Kloepfel, trumpet; Ludwig, cymbals; Retberg, tympani, and Schuecker, harp, all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

REHEARSAL FOR 11TH SYMPHONY

By Olin Downes

For the programme of the 11th public rehearsal Dr. Muck had chosen Goldmark's overture to Sakuntola, Volkmann's 'cello concerto in A minor and Sibelins' Symphony No. 1, which was performed for the first time. Mr. Heinrich Warnke was the 'cellist.

How often, since the time of Liszt and Berlioz, has the cry been raised that since Beethoven the symphony form is a twice told tale, a bundle of old bones, etc. Now we have in Jean Sibelius a composer who certainly has his own word to say in the matter. Two years ago, when his second symphony was first performed in this city, the new voice sounded strange and perplexing. Whether this in a measure had prepared us, or whether the first symphony is a more intelligible work, time will tell, but yesterday's hearing made an instantaneous impression of a creation of unusual strength and originality.

Finnish music, up to this time, has been practically an unknown quantity, and this composer has absorbed the rich heritage of national material at his command, transmitted it through the medium of a virile personality, and produced a work which, while of an unequal character, will surely put him in a high place among composers of the present era, and bear fruit in years to come.

With unerring instinct to produce a great effect with simple means, the first movement opens with a bleak, sadly reminiscent melody sung by a solo clarinet, accompanied by a low roll of the kettledrums. This melody, in a certain way, might be taken as the motto of the symphony; it recurs with tragic intensity in the last movement. It might be a voice from the primeval ages. An allegro follows of a savage, sombre character, which is the most easily grasped movement of the four. Any views given on the first hearing of such work are sure to be half-baked, but the allegretto struck one as being drawn-out, and its sadness became lugubrious, as we heard it yesterday. The following scherzo, a dance of brutal, harsh merriment, alternating with a lento section of a milder character, and above all the finale, which is in the form of a free fantasie, are animated by a spirit of "passion, and pulse, and power" which carry things with an epic sweep and grandeur, waking echoes in the soul of the time when gods walked the earth and men were giants and heroes. The symphony is filled with a spirit of brooding sadness, mounting at times to climaxes of tragic grief. A gleam of light (as the second theme played by the flutes in the first movement) occasionally shows, but soon disappears, and gives place to the pervading gloom. This music, however, is rather the expression of the nation and land than the melancholy of an individual, and with its primal might, could only come from the country of dark forests, silent lakes and towering mountains where nature reigns supreme. Such a creation is not only to be enjoyed for its unusual originality, but to be welcomed as a fresh and vivifying element in the art of today.

For the rest of the concert there was a glowing performance of the Goldmark overture, and Mr. Warnke played the concerto with all the exquisite grace which the composition demands. He was repeatedly recalled after a splendid performance.

On account of the orchestral trip there will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N. Y.
JAN 5 - 1907

Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given Thursday evening, Jan. 10, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 12, in Carnegie Hall. The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works chosen being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the violin concerto, and the Seventh Symphony. The soloist will be Willy Hess. The programme for Saturday afternoon will include one novelty—George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra." The other works will be Elgar's "In the South"; Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi."

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall, Friday afternoon, Jan. 11. The programme will comprise Beethoven's quartet in F minor, op. 95, No. 11; Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, op. 41, No. 2, and songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf, sung by Mme von Niessen-Stone.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date State NY
JAN - 5 1907

On Sunday evening, Dec. 30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Pension Fund concert of the season, in Boston, the orchestra having a large pension fund in the making. The programme which Dr. Muck arranged comprised seven Wagner overtures and preludes and the Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung." A most interesting thing about the programme was that Dr. Muck for the first time in his career, put any part of "Parsifal" in a concert programme.

THE COMING OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Program For the Concert to be One of Vivid Contrast

The sale of seats for the only concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in Springfield this year, will open at the box office of the Court Square theater next Saturday morning, Jan 12. The concert will be given Tuesday evening, Jan 15 at 8 o'clock. An unusually attractive program has been prepared by Dr Muck for the Springfield concert. In response to many requests from Springfield, and in accordance with the general policy of the orchestra this year at its first concerts in any city, there will be no soloist, it being the desire to give full emphasis to the presence of the distinguished conductor, who is at the head of the organization for this year. If this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra has proved anything, it has proved that the great majority of patron of symphony concerts are not only not anxious for a soloist but rather welcome a concert where there is none. It is a well know fact to all who have studied the different art of making programs that nothing is so sure to break the continuity of a program as a work for soloist, whether it be instrumental or vocal. Dr Muck, in building his programs, follows one of two formulas. His programs are arranged to show either the development of one particular school, or to bring out sharp and vivid contrasts. It is the latter scheme he has followed for the Springfield program which comprises three works. The first is an Overture, entitled In the South, by Sir Edward Elgar, the greatest of living English composers. In this work, the composer has sought to place in tone colors, the impression a northerner receivers in Italy. It is all glowing sunlight and song. The second is a Symphonic Poem, entitled Cleopatra, by the eminent American composer, George W. Chadwick. The inspiration for this work has been drawn from Plutarch's tale of the Egyptian Queen, and the composer has sought to embody in sound, her vivid emotional life. And finally comes Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which Wagner has called Apotheosis of the Dance. In no work, not even in Brahms's First Symphony, in which Dr Muck had such sensational success, has the new conductor of the orchestra risen to such hights of interpretive power as in this symphony. Springfield is to be congratulated that he has put it on the program for this city.

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN: SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1907.

MME SAMAROFF'S RECITAL.

A Delightful Program of Piano Music at Holyoke.

Mme Olga Samaroff, the new American pianist, gave a most delightful recital last night under the auspices of the Music club of Holyoke, in Windsor hall. Mme Samaroff, who is a native of Texas, appeared at the last Worcester festival, where her beautiful playing charmed every one and since then she has appeared with equal success in the leading cities of the country. This was her first recital in this neighborhood and the capacious hall was filled with an audience appreciative and enthusiastic.

Mme Samaroff opened her program with a very well played Bach fantasie and fugue, following this with a Chopin group, including the splendid sonata, opus 35, the "Revolutionary" etude, the stirring polonaise in A flat, as well as two other etudes and the C sharp minor waltz. In no part of the program was Mme Samaroff's beautiful playing displayed to greater advantage than in this group. She is an emotional, but not a sentimental, player, and while broad and brilliant she is never harsh and her interpretations were characterized throughout by a delightful intellectual grasp of the full musical content of the composition. She is assuredly an admirable player of the "greater Chopin."

Aside from the Brahms Rhapsodie, opus 79, No 2, and the Liszt 12th Rhapsodie, the remainder of the program was devoted to lighter compositions, the dainty intermezzo, opus 117, No1, by Brahms, which the audience would like to have had repeated, a group from modern Russian composers, including the beautiful nocturne by Scriabine for the left hand, and the "Liebestraum" in D flat by Liszt. In response to the enthusiastic applause at the close Mme Samaroff played the brilliant Schulz-Evler-Strauss "Blue Danube"

per Eagle
y Brooklyn
te State NY

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND THE CHORAL ART

Will Give Concerts in Brooklyn Next Week With Attractive Programmes.

A WEEK OF ITALIAN OPERAS,

At Both the Manhattan and Metropolitan Houses, With Many Concerts.

Two works new to Brooklyn appear on the programme of the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening. They are Georg Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme and Jean Sibelius' first symphoney, in E minor. Both of these men are most interesting personalities in modern music. Both of them are young, comparatively speaking, and both of them modern, although neither goes to the extreme of a Strauss, a Mahler or a Reger. Schumann, who was born in 1866, in Konigstein, is the conductor of the Singakademie of Berlin. He comes of a musical family, his father having been a conductor and his grandfather a cantor. His teachers were C. A. Fischer, Rollfuss and Baumfelder, of Dresden, and Jadassohn, Reinecke and Zwintscher of Leipsic. In Leipsic he won the Beethoven prize in 1887. From 1891 to 1896 he was the conductor of the Gesangverein of Dantzig and from 1896 to 1900 he was the conductor of the Philharmonic of Bremen. Thence he went to his present post in Berlin. He has written two symphonies, several large orchestra and orchestral and choral works, as well as chamber music and songs. Jean Sibelius is the representative composer of Finland. He has written two symphonies and several orchestra poems on national epic themes. He is a man of great talent and his works have been having a very considerable vogue in Europe. This first symphony was first played in this country at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston last Friday and Saturday, January 4 and 5. The whole programme is as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala" .....Goldmark
Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme, Georg Schumann
Symphony, No. 1, in E Minor.....Sibelius

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date State N

Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week.

The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont;" the Concerto for Violin in D major and the Symphony in A Major, No. 7. The soloist will be Willy Hess.

per World
y New York
te State N Y

JAN 5 - 19

Dr. Karl Muck has arranged an all-Beethoven programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening. Willy Hess will be soloist in the D major violin concerto; the seventh symphony in A major and the overture to Goethe's "Egmont" are the other numbers. At the Saturday afternoon concert there will be no soloist. George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra" and Edgar's overture "In the South" will be played.

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 5 - 1907

The Boston Symphony Quartette, in Mendelssohn Hall, on Friday afternoon, will play for the first time in New York Hugo Kaun's quartette in D major and Beethoven's quartette in F minor. Mme. Von Niessen-Stone will sing Schubert and Hugo Wolf songs.

Paper Post
City New York
Date JAN 5 State NY

A Beethoven programme will be offered at next Thursday evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, the numbers chosen being the "Egmont" overture, the violin concerto (Willy Hess), and the seventh symphony. The Saturday afternoon programme will include Elgar's "In the South," Chadwick's "Cleopatra" (first time), Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y

The Boston Symphony Orchestra carries one novelty to Brooklyn next Friday, the Finlander Sibelius's symphony No. 1 in E minor. The Carnegie Hall programme on Thursday night is all Beethoven—Seventh Symphony, "Egmont" overture, Mr. Hess in violin concerto—while the Saturday matinée has Elgar's "In the South," Chadwick's Eostonian "Cleopatra"—a first time—Georg Schumann's "Variations" and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

Paper
City
Date State

Two works new to Brooklyn appear on the programme of the next Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening. They are Georg Schumann's "Variations" and "Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and Jean Sibelius' first symphony, in E minor. The whole programme is as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala" (Goldmark); "Variations" and "Fugue on a Merry Theme" (Georg Schumann); symphony No. 1, in E minor (Sibelius). This symphony was first played in this country at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston yesterday and to-day.

Paper
City
Date State

On Sunday evening, Dec. 30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Pension Fund concert of the season—the orchestra has a large pension fund in the making. The programme arranged by Dr. Muck comprised seven Wagner overtures and preludes and the "Funeral March" from "Gotterdammerung." For the first time in his career Dr. Muck put part of "Parsifal" in a concert programme. Dr. Muck, as is well known, is the greatest of living interpreters of "Parsifal," and he is thoroughly in accord with the belief that "Parsifal" is a sacred work and should never be performed outside of Bayreuth, much less on the concert stage. But for once he put his convictions aside in order that the programme of the Pension Fund concert might give a complete historical view of Wagner's artistic and creative development.

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date 1907 State

On Sunday evening, December 30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Pension Fund concert of the season—the orchestra having a large pension fund in the making. The programme which Dr. Muck arranged, comprised seven Wagner overtures and preludes, and the Funeral March from "Kotterdammerung." An interesting thing about the programme was that Dr. Muck, for the first time in his career, put any part of "Parsifal" in a concert programme. Dr. Muck is one of the great interpreters of "Parsifal," and he is thoroughly in accord with the belief that "Parsifal" is a sacred work, and should never be performed outside of Bayreuth, much less on the concert stage. But for once he put his convictions aside in order that the programme of the Pension Fund concert might give a complete historical view of Wagner's artistic and creative development.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER JANUARY 5, 1907

The second concert of the Longy club will be given in Potter hall on Wednesday evening, Jan. 16. The club will be assisted by Messrs. Fritzsche, bass clarinet; Kloepfel, trumpet; Ludwig, cymbals; Retberg, tympani, and Schuecker, harp, all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

January 1907

F, SATURDAY, JAN

REHEARSAL FOR 11TH SYMPHONY

By Olin Downes

For the programme of the 11th public rehearsal Dr. Muck had chosen Goldmark's overture to Sakuntola, Volkmann's 'cello concerto in A minor and Sibelins' Symphony No. 1, which was performed for the first time. Mr. Heinrich Warnke was the 'cellist.

How often, since the time of Liszt and Berlioz, has the cry been raised that since Beethoven the symphony form is a twice told tale, a bundle of old bones, etc. Now we have in Jean Sibelins a composer who certainly has his own word to say in the matter. Two years ago, when his second symphony was first performed in this city, the new voice sounded strange and perplexing. Whether this in a measure had prepared us, or whether the first symphony is a more intelligible work, time will tell, but yesterday's hearing made an instantaneous impression of a creation of unusual strength and originality.

Finnish music, up to this time, has been practically an unknown quantity, and this composer has absorbed the rich heritage of national material at his command, transmitted it through the medium of a virile personality, and produced a work which, while of an unequal character, will surely put him in a high place among composers of the present era, and bear fruit in years to come.

With unerring instinct to produce a great effect with simple means, the first movement opens with a bleak, sadly reminiscent melody sung by a solo clarinet, accompanied by a low roll of the kettledrums. This melody, in a certain way, might be taken as the motto of the symphony; it recurs with tragic intensity in the last movement. It might be a voice from the primeval ages. An allegro follows of a savage, sombre character, which is the most easily grasped movement of the four. Any views given on the first hearing of such work are sure to be half-baked, but the allegretto struck one as being drawn-out, and its sadness became lugubrious, as we heard it yesterday. The following scherzo, a dance of brutal, harsh merriment, alternating with a lento section of a milder character, and above all the finale, which is in the form of a free fantasie, are animated by a spirit of "passion, and pulse, and power" which carry things with an epic sweep and grandeur, waking echoes in the soul of the time when gods walked the earth and men were giants and heroes. The symphony is filled with a spirit of brooding sadness, mounting at times to climaxes of tragic grief. A gleam of light (as the second theme played by the flutes in the first movement) occasionally shows, but soon disappears, and gives place to the pervading gloom. This music, however, is rather the expression of the nation and land than the melancholy of an individual, and with its primal might, could only come from the country of dark forests, silent lakes and towering mountains where nature reigns supreme. Such a creation is not only to be enjoyed for its unusual originality, but to be welcomed as a fresh and vivifying element in the art of today.

For the rest of the concert there was a glowing performance of the Goldmark overture, and Mr. Warnke played the concerto with all the exquisite grace which the composition demands. He was repeatedly recalled after a splendid performance.

On account of the orchestral trip there will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N. Y.

5 - 1907

Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given Thursday evening, Jan. 10, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 12, in Carnegie Hall. The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works chosen being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the violin concerto, and the Seventh Symphony. The soloist will be Willy Hess. The programme for Saturday afternoon will include one novelty—George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra." The other works will be Elgar's "In the South"; Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi."

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall, Friday afternoon, Jan. 11. The programme will comprise Beethoven's quartet in F minor, op. 95, No. 11; Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, op. 41, No. 2, and songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf, sung by Mme von Niessen-Stone.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date State NY
JAN - 5 1907

On Sunday evening, Dec. 30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Pension Fund concert of the season, in Boston, the orchestra having a large pension fund in the making. The programme which Dr. Muck arranged comprised seven Wagner overtures and preludes and the Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung." A most interesting thing about the programme was that Dr. Muck for the first time in his career, put any part of "Parsifal" in a concert programme.

THE COMING OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Program For the Concert to be One of Vivid Contrast

The sale of seats for the only concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in Springfield this year, will open at the box office of the Court Square theater next Saturday morning, Jan 12. The concert will be given Tuesday evening, Jan 15 at 8 o'clock. An unusually attractive program has been prepared by Dr Muck for the Springfield concert. In response to many requests from Springfield, and in accordance with the general policy of the orchestra this year at its first concerts in any city, there will be no soloist, it being the desire to give full emphasis to the presence of the distinguished conductor, who is at the head of the organization for this year. If this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra has proved anything, it has proved that the great majority of patron of symphony concerts are not only not anxious for a soloist but rather welcome a concert where there is none. It is a well know fact to all who have studied the different art of making programs that nothing is so sure to break the continuity of a program as a work for soloist, whether it be instrumental or vocal. Dr Muck, in building his programs, follows one of two formulas. His programs are arranged to show either the development of one particular school, or to bring out sharp and vivid contrasts. It is the latter scheme he has followed for the Springfield program which comprises three works. The first is an Overture, entitled In the South, by Sir Edward Elgar, the greatest of living English composers. In this work, the composer has sought to place in tone colors, the impression a northerner receivers in Italy. It is all glowing sunlight and song. The second is a Symphonic Poem, entitled Cleopatra, by the eminent American composer, George W. Chadwick. The inspiration for this work has been drawn from Plutarch's tale of the Egyptian Queen, and the composer has sought to embody in sound, her vivid emotional life. And finally comes Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which Wagner has called Apotheosis of the Dance. In no work, not even in Brahms's First Symphony, in which Dr Muck had such sensational success, has the new conductor of the orchestra risen to such hights of interpretive power as in this symphony. Springfield is to be congratulated that he has put it on the program for this city.

SPRINGFIELD HOMESTEAD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1907

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN: SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1907.

MME SAMAROFF'S RECITAL.

A Delightful Program of Piano Music at Holyoke.

Mme Olga Samaroff, the new American pianist, gave a most delightful recital last night under the auspices of the Music club of Holyoke, in Windsor hall. Mme. Samaroff, who is a native of Texas, appeared at the last Worcester festival, where her beautiful playing charmed every one and since then she has appeared with equal success in the leading cities of the country. This was her first recital in this neighborhood and the capacious hall was filled with an audience appreciative and enthusiastic.

Mme Samaroff opened her program with a very well played Bach fantasie and fugue, following this with a Chopin group, including the splendid sonata, opus 35, the "Revolutionary" etude, the stirring polonaise in A flat, as well as two other etudes and the C sharp minor waltz. In no part of the program was Mme Samaroff's beautiful playing displayed to greater advantage than in this group. She is an emotional, but not a sentimental, player, and while broad and brilliant she is never harsh and her interpretations were characterized throughout by a delightful intellectual grasp of the full musical content of the composition. She is assuredly an admirable player of the "greater Chopin."

Aside from the Brahms Rhapsodie, opus 79, No 2, and the Liszt 12th Rhapsodie, the remainder of the program was devoted to lighter compositions, the dainty intermezzo, opus 117, No1, by Brahms, which the audience would like to have had repeated, a group from modern Russian composers, including the beautiful nocturne by Scriabine for the left hand, and the "Liebestraum" in D flat by Liszt. In response to the enthusiastic applause at the close Mme Samaroff played the brilliant Schulz-Eoler-Strauss "Blue Danube"

[107]

Paper Times
City Brklyn
Date JAN 5 - 1907 State N Y

ton Symphony Orchestra will be with us again and will give us an exclusively orchestral programme once more. Brooklyn's habit of concluding that no orchestral concert could be just what it should be without a soloist, has been so assiduously fostered in the past that music lovers are surprised to discover, as they have had opportunity to do of late, how thoroughly satisfactory a concert can be, minus the solo exploitation. It is not necessary to decry soloism in order to insist upon the intrinsic worth of orchestral music to be valued as an individual entity. The efforts of soloists will always appeal strongly by virtue of the element of personality which enters so largely into artistic endeavor. But it is time to protest persistently against the assertiveness of the popular notion that under all circumstances concerts must contribute to solo aggrandizement. Surely we have reached that stage of appreciation which can accept orchestral music as an independent offering. Perhaps Dr. Muck is making it his definite purpose to give prominence to the European idea of a concert without a soloist. Or is the aspect of next week's concert programme due to the fact that Paderewski changed his mind about coming to America this season? Whatever the reason for such a programme, the effect upon public taste is likely to be salutary.

Two new works are scheduled for this concert. They are Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme, and Jean Sibelius' first symphony, in E minor. Both of these men are most interesting personalities in modern music. Both of them are young, comparatively speaking, and both of them modern, although neither goes to the extreme of a Strauss, a Mahler or a Reger. Schumann, who was born in 1866, in Konigstein, is the conductor of the Singakademie, of Berlin. He comes of a musical family, his father having been a conductor and his grandfather a cantor. His teachers were J. A. Fischer, Rollfuss and Baumfelder, of Dresden, and Jadassohn, Reinecke and Zwintscher, of Leipsic. In Leipsic he won the Beethoven prize in 1887. From 1891 to 1896 he was the conductor of the Gesangverein, of Dantzig, and 1896 to 1900 he was the conductor of the Philharmonic, of Bremen. Thence he went to his present post in Berlin. He has written two symphonies, several large orchestra and orchestral and choral works, as well as chamber music and songs.

Jean Sibelius is the representative composer of Finland. He has written two symphonies and several orchestra poems on national epic themes. He is a man of great talent and his works have been having a very considerable vogue in Europe. This first symphony was first played in this country at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, last Friday and Saturday, January 4 and 5. The whole programme is as follows:

Goldmark .....overture "Sakuntala"
Georg Schumann,
Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme
Sibelius .....Symphony, No. 1, in E minor

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 3 - 1907

All-Wagner is the next Metropolitan Sunday concert bill with seven German stars. [illegible] cast will sing "Siegfried" at popu[illegible] this Saturday. [illegible] starvation [illegible] thirty [illegible] and two more [illegible] season's greatest audiences are nearly sold out now.

The Wagnerians of Boston have had a little hunger on their own account, and at last Sunday's Boston Symphony pension fund concerts, Dr. Muck conducted seven Wagner overtures and preludes and the funeral march from "Götterdämmerung." For the first time in his career Muck put a bit of "Parsifal" in a concert programme. As the interpreter of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth, he has joined in maintaining always that "Parsifal" is a sacred work and should never be performed outside of Bayreuth, much less on the concert stage." But he put his convictions aside in order that the pension fund concert might give a complete historical view of Wagner's artistic and creative development.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date JAN 6 - 1907 State N Y

Muck's Tribute to Boston Orchestra.

At the conclusion of the Pension concert last Sunday in Boston, Dr. Carl Muck arose and addressed the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had just completed the successful playing [illegible] Wagner programme.

[illegible] said: "I have heard

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date State N Y

[illegible] concert of the Lenox Club [illegible] evening, Jan. 16. The club will be assisted by Messrs. Fritzsche, bass clarinet; Kloepfel, trumpet; Ludwig, cymbals; Hettberg, tympani, and Schuecker, harp, all of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Two novelties are on the programme.

Programmes for the Next Boston Symphony Concerts.

TWO rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week.

The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the Concerto for Violin in D major and the Symphony in A Major, No. 7. The soloist will be Willy Hess.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be rather lighter than usual, and will include one novelty. That is George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," which is the last work of importance from his pen. "Cleppatra" was performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival of 1904, under the direction of Franz Kneisel, and was not again played in this country until Dr. Muck put it on his Boston programmes of December 14 and 15.

The other works are Elgar's overture, "In the South," a part of which Mr. Gericke played last year; Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," which Mr. Walter Damrosch introduced in this country a few years ago and the overture to "Rienzi." There will be no soloist at this concert.

Paper American
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN - 6 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on next Friday afternoon, Jan. 11, at 3 o'clock. The programme will comprise Beethoven's Quartet in F minor, Opus 95, No. 11, and Hugo Kaun's Quartet in D major, Opus 41, No. 2, and songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf, sung by Mme. von Niessen-Stone. The songs will be as follows: Schubert—"Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang," "Liebhaber in allen Gestalten"; Wolf—"Wer rief dich denn?" "Wir haben beide lange Zeit geschwiegen," "Sie blasen zum Abmarsch," "In dem Schatten meiner Locken." The quartet by Hugo Kaun will be heard in New York for the first time.

The Republican.
JANUARY 6, 1907.

COMING MUSICAL EVENTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Plans for the Concert to be Given at Court Square Theater Next Week—First Appearance of Dr Muck.

The sale of seats for the only concert to be given in this city during the present season by the Boston Symphony orchestra will open Saturday morning, the 12th, at the box office of Court Square theater. The concert will take place the following Tuesday evening, the 15th. The previous evening the orchestra will play at Hartford, appearing at these two cities on its way back to Boston after its New York concerts. The program here will be very fine. There will be no soloist. The star will be the orchestra's distinguished new conductor, Dr Muck, of whose personality and traits as a leader a full account is given elsewhere. He is the center, just now, of public interest, and the audience will welcome a program in which he has full sway and can produce the effects he seeks without the interruption and distraction of an irrelevant solo piece. Many requests that this plan be followed have been received from this city by the orchestra management.

Dr Muck, in building his programs, follows one of two formulas. His programs are arranged to show either the development of one particular school, or to bring out sharp and vivid contrasts. It is the latter scheme he has followed for the Springfield program, which comprises three works. The first is an overture, entitled "In the South," by Sir Edward Elgar, the greatest of living English composers. In this work the composer has sought to place in tone colors the impression a northerner receives in Italy. It is all glowing sunlight and song. The second is a symphonic poem, entitled, "Cleopatra," by the eminent American composer, George W. Chadwick. The inspiration for this work, which was first produced at the late Worcester festival, has been drawn from Plutarch's tale of the Egyptian queen, and the composer has sought to embody in sound her vivid emotional life. And finally comes Beethoven's seventh symphony, which Wagner has called "Apotheosis of the Dance." In no work, not even in Brahms's first symphony, in which Dr Muck had such sensational success, has the new conductor of the orchestra risen to such hights of interpretative power as in this symphony. Springfield is to be congratulated that he has put it on the program for this city, the more so that it is a long time since it has been heard here.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 6 - 1907

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall next Friday afternoon, January 11, at 3 o'clock. The programme will comprise Beethoven's quartet in F minor, op. 95, No. 11 and Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, op. 41, No. 2, and songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf, sung by Mme. von Niessen-Stone. The songs will be as follows: Schubert, "Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang," "Liebhaber in allen Gestalten"; Wolf, "Wer rief dich denn?" "Wir haben beide lange Zeit geschwiegen," "Sie blasen zum Abmarsch," "In dem schatten meiner Locken." The Hugo Kaun quartet will be heard in New York for the first time.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 6 - 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

"Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of Boston Symphony Concerts, which will be given on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the concerto for violin in D major, and the Symphony in A major, No. 7. The soloist will be Willy Hess.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be lighter than usual and will include one novelty. This is George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," which is the last work of importance from his pen. "Cleopatra" was performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival of 1904 under the direction of Franz Kneisel, and was not again played in this country until Dr. Muck put it on his Boston programmes of Dec. 14 and 15. The other works are Elgar's overture "In the South;" Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," which Mr Walter Damrosch introduced in this country a few years ago, and the overture to "Rienzi." There will be no soloist at this concert.

Paper American
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN - 6 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

"Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of Boston Symphony Concerts, which will be given on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the concerto for violin in D major, and the Symphony in A major, No. 7. The soloist will be Willy Hess.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be lighter than usual and will include one novelty. This is George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," which is the last work of importance from his pen. "Cleopatra" was performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival of 1904 under the direction of Franz Kneisel, and was not again played in this country until Dr. Muck put it on his Boston programmes of Dec. 14 and 15. The other works are Elgar's overture "In the South;" Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," which Mr Walter Damrosch introduced in this country a few years ago, and the overture to "Rienzi." There will be no soloist at this concert.

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 6 - 1907

Brooklyn Institute Offers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] Karl Muck, conductor, will appear at [illegible]

[illegible] Baptist Temple, Friday evening, Jan. 11, at 8.15 o'clock.

A lecture recital will be given by Dr. Otto Neitzel, pianist, of Cologne; subject, "Salome," an opera based upon the play of the same name, at Association Hall, Friday, Jan. 18, at 8.15 o'clock.

Sardonya Club Christmas.

[illegible] Club gave the second annual [illegible] at 8.30 [illegible] musical program [illegible] sang Christmas carols [illegible]

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN - 6 1907

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall next Friday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The programme will comprise Beethoven's Quartet in F minor, op. 95, No. 11, and Hugo Kaun's Quartet in D major, op. 41, No. 2, and songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf, sung by Mme. von Niessen-Stone. The songs will be as follows: Schubert—"Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang" and "Liebhaber in allen Gestalten," Wolf—"Wer rief dich denn?" "Wir haben beide lange Zeit geschwiegen," "Sie blasen zum Abmarsch" and "In dem schatten meiner Locken." The Hugo Kaun Quartet will be heard in New York for the first time.

Paper American
City Baltimore
Date State Md
JAN 6 - 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, January 9, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Mr. Heinrich Warnke, principal cellist of the orchestra, who will then make his first appearance in Baltimore in this capacity. He will play Volkmann's concerto for cello in A minor, op. 33. The opening number will be the ever-popular overture by Goldmark, "Sakuntala."

The symphony will be an interesting example of the neo-Russian school, the school which, while admitting Tschaikowsky's greatness, has always denied that he was typically Russian. It is Glazounoff's fifth, in B flat major, a work which has never before been heard in this city.

The symphony was composed in 1895, and published in 1896. Its first—and until Dr. Muck brought it out in Boston, month before last—and last American performance was by the Philharmonic Society, of New York, under Anton Seidl, on March 5, 1898, just before the distinguished conductor's death.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date State D C
JAN 6 - 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, January 8, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most popular violinists of the orchestra, whose appearance as a soloist is always warmly welcomed by the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts. Mr. Adamowski has not played in Washington for many years. He will play Saint-Saens' concerto for violin in B minor, No. 3.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert is decidedly modern in tone. The first work on it will be Elgar's overture, "In the South," a composition the charm of which, always great, grows immensely with repeated hearings.

The symphony will be an interesting example of the neo-Rusian school, the school which while admitting Tschaikowsky's greatness, has always denied that he was typically Russian. It is Glazounoff's fifth, in B flat major, a work which has never been heard in this city. Glazounoff is a young man and a very prolific writer. He is the son of a rich bookseller in St. Petersburg, where he was born in 1865. He has devoted himself, outside of his university work, entirely to music, beginning with the piano when he was nine years old.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date JAN 6 - 1907 State N Y

Muck's Tribute to Boston Orchestra.

At the conclusion of the Pension concert last Sunday in Boston, Dr. Carl Muck arose and addressed the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had just completed the successful playing [illegible] Wagner programme.

[illegible] said: "I have heard

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN - 6 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Carl Muck, will be heard at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night when the entire programme will consist of compositions by Beethoven. The Seventh Symphony and "Egmont" Overture will be played, while Willy Hess will be heard in Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

For the Saturday matinee at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Orchestra will play, as a novelty, Chadwick's "Cleopatra." The other compositions to be heard are Elgar's "In the South." Wagner's "Rienzi Overture" and George Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme."

Herbert Witherspoon will give a song recital [illegible] day afternoon.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give a concert on Friday afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall. The assisting artist will be Nissen-Stone, who will sing songs by Schubert and Wolf. The quartet will play works by Beethoven and Hugo Kaun.

[108]

Paper Times
City Brklyn
Date JAN 5 State N Y

On Friday evening of next week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be with us again and will give us an exclusively orchestral programme once more. Brooklyn's habit of concluding that no orchestral concert could be just what it should be without a soloist, has been so assiduously fostered in the past that music lovers are surprised to discover, as they have had opportunity to do of late, how thoroughly satisfactory a concert can be, minus the solo exploitation. It is not necessary to decry soloism in order to insist upon the intrinsic worth of orchestral music to be valued as an individual entity. The efforts of soloists will always appeal strongly by virtue of the element of personality which enters so largely into artistic endeavor. But it is time to protest persistently against the assertiveness of the popular notion that under all circumstances concerts must contribute to solo aggrandizement. Surely we have reached that stage of appreciation which can accept orchestral music as an independent offering. Perhaps Dr. Muck is making it his definite purpose to give prominence to the European idea of a concert without a soloist. Or is the aspect of next week's concert programme due to the fact that Paderewski changed his mind about coming to America this season? Whatever the reason for such a programme, the effect upon public taste is likely to be salutary.

Two new works are scheduled for this concert. They are Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme, and Jean Sibelius' first symphony, in E minor. Both of these men are most interesting personalities in modern music. Both of them are young, comparatively speaking, and both of them modern, although neither goes to the extreme of a Strauss, a Mahler or a Reger. Schumann, who was born in 1866, in Konigstein, is the conductor of the Singakademie, of Berlin. He comes of a musical family, his father having been a conductor and his grandfather a cantor. His teachers were C. A. Fischer, Rollfuss and Baumfelder, of Dresden, and Jadassohn, Reinecke and Zwintscher, of Leipsic. In Leipsic he won the Beethoven prize in 1887. From 1891 to 1896 he was the conductor of the Gesangverein, of Dantzig, and 1896 to 1900 he was the conductor of the Philharmonic, of Bremen. Thence he went to his present post in Berlin. He has written two symphonies, several large orchestra and orchestral and choral works, as well as chamber music and songs.

Jean Sibelius is the representative composer of Finland. He has written two symphonies and several orchestra poems on national epic themes. He is a man of great talent and his works have been having a very considerable vogue in Europe. This first symphony was first played in this country at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, last Friday and Saturday, January 4 and 5. The whole programme is as follows:

Goldmark .....overture "Sakuntala"
Georg Schumann,
Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme
Sibelius .....Symphony, No. 1, in E minor

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 6 1907

All-Wagner is the next Metropolitan Sunday concert bill with seven German stars. [redacted] cast will sing "Siegfried" at popular [redacted] this Saturday. [redacted] starvation [redacted] thirty-days [redacted] two more [redacted] season's greatest audiences are nearly sold out now.

The Wagnerians of Boston have had a little hunger on their own account, and at last Sunday's Boston Symphony pension fund concerts, Dr. Muck conducted seven Wagner overtures and preludes and the funeral march from "Götterdämmerung." For the first time in his career Muck put a bit of "Parsifal" in a concert programme. As the interpreter of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth, he has joined in maintaining always that "Parsifal" is a sacred work and "should never be performed outside of Bayreuth, much less on the concert stage." But he put his convictions aside in order that the pension fund concert might give a complete historical view of Wagner's artistic and creative development.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date State N Y

Muck's Tribute to Boston Orchestra.

At the conclusion of the Pension concert last Sunday in Boston, Dr. Carl Muck arose and addressed the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had just completed the successful playing of a Wagner programme.

"Gentlemen," said he, "I have heard to-night in your rendering of these Wagner excerpts beauties, which up to now had escaped my notice. That I have been enabled to do so is due to your-

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date State N Y

BOSTON TRAVELER.
JANUARY 5, 1907.

The second concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall on Wednesday evening, Jan. 16. The club will be assisted by Messrs. Fritzsche, bass clarinet; Kloepfel, trumpet; Ludwig, cymbals; Rettberg, tympani, and Schuecker, harp, all of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Two novelties are on the programme.

Programmes for the Next Boston Symphony Concerts.

TWO rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week.

The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the Concerto for Violin in D major and the Symphony in A Major, No. 7. The soloist will be Willy Hess.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be rather lighter than usual, and will include one novelty. That is George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," which is the last work of importance from his pen. "Cleopatra" was performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival of 1904, under the direction of Franz Kneisel, and was not again played in this country until Dr. Muck put it on his Boston programmes of December 14 and 15.

The other works are Elgar's overture, "In the South," a part of which Mr. Gericke played last year; Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," which Mr. Walter Damrosch introduced in this country a few years ago, and the overture to "Rienzi." There will be no soloist at this concert.

Paper American
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN - 6 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on next Friday afternoon, Jan. 11, at 3 o'clock. The programme will comprise Beethoven's quartet in F minor, Opus 95, No. 11, and Hugo Kaun's Quartet in D major, Opus 41, No. 2, and songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf, sung by Mme. von Niessen-Stone. The songs will be as follows: Schubert—"Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang," "Liebhaber in allen Gestalten"; Wolf—"Wer rief dich denn?" "Wir haben beide lange Zeit geschwiegen," "Sie blasen zum Abmarsch," "In dem Schatten meiner Locken." The quartet by Hugo Kaun will be heard in New York for the first time.

The Republican.
JANUARY 6, 1907.

COMING MUSICAL EVENTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Plans for the Concert to be Given at Court Square Theater Next Week—First Appearance of Dr Muck.

The sale of seats for the only concert to be given in this city during the present season by the Boston Symphony orchestra will open Saturday morning, the 12th, at the box office of Court Square theater. The concert will take place the following Tuesday evening, the 15th. The previous evening the orchestra will play at Hartford, appearing at these two cities on its way back to Boston after its New York concerts. The program here will be very fine. There will be no soloist. The star will be the orchestra's distinguished new conductor, Dr Muck, of whose personality and traits as a leader a full account is given elsewhere. He is the center, just now, of public interest, and the audience will welcome a program in which he has full sway and can produce the effects he seeks without the interruption and distraction of an irrelevant solo piece. Many requests that this plan be followed have been received from this city by the orchestra management.

Dr Muck, in building his programs, follows one of two formulas. His programs are arranged to show either the development of one particular school, or to bring out sharp and vivid contrasts. It is the latter scheme he has followed for the Springfield program, which comprises three works. The first is an overture, entitled "In the South," by Sir Edward Elgar, the greatest of living English composers. In this work the composer has sought to place in tone colors the impression a northerner receives in Italy. It is all glowing sunlight and song. The second is a symphonic poem, entitled, "Cleopatra," by the eminent American composer, George W. Chadwick. The inspiration for this work, which was first produced at the late Worcester festival, has been drawn from Plutarch's tale of the Egyptian queen, and the composer has sought to embody in sound her vivid emotional life. And finally comes Beethoven's seventh symphony, which Wagner has called "Apotheosis of the Dance." In no work, not even in Brahms's first symphony, in which Dr Muck had such sensational success, has the new conductor of the orchestra risen to such hights of interpretative power as in this symphony. Springfield is to be congratulated that he has put it on the program for this city, the more so that it is a long time since it has been heard here.

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Carl Muck, will be heard at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night when the entire programme will consist of compositions by Beethoven. The Seventh Symphony and "Egmont" Overture will be played, while Willy Hess will be heard in Beethoven's Violin Concerto. For the Saturday matinee at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Orchestra will play, as a novelty, Chadwick's "Cleopatra." The other compositions to be heard are Elgar's "In the South," Wagner's "Rienzi Overture" and George Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme."

* * *

Herbert Witherspoon will give a song [redacted] day afternoon.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give a concert on Friday afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall. The assisting artist will be Nissen-Stone, who will sing songs by Schubert and Wolf. The quartet will play works by Beethoven and Hugo Kaun.

JAN - 6 1907

Paper Sun
City New York
Date JAN 6 - 1907 State N Y

Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of Boston symphony concerts which will be given next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the concerto in D major for violin and the symphony in A major, No. 7. The soloist will be Willy Hess. The programme for Saturday afternoon will be rather lighter than usual and will include one novelty. This is George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra," the last work of importance from his pen. "Cleopatra" was performed for the first time at the Worcester festival of 1904 under the direction of Franz Kneisel and was not again played in this country until Dr. Muck put it on his Boston programmes of December 14 and 15. The other works are Elgar's overture "In the South," a part of which Mr. Gericke played last year; Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," which Walter Damrosch introduced in this country a few years ago, and the overture to "Rienzi." There will be no soloist at this concert.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y
6 - 1907

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall next Friday afternoon, January 11, at 3 o'clock. The programme will comprise Beethoven's quartet in F minor, op. 95, No. 11 and Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, op. 41, No. 2, and songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf, sung by Mme. von Niessen-Stone. The songs will be as follows: Schubert, "Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang," "Liebhaber in allen Gestalten"; Wolf, "Wer rief dich dem?" "Wir haben beide lange Zeit geschwiegen," "Sie blasen zum Abmarsch," "In dem schatten meiner Locken." The Hugo Kaun quartet will be heard in New York for the first time.

aper American
ity New York
)ate State N Y
JAN - 6 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of Boston Symphony Concerts, which will be given on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the concerto for violin in D major, and the Symphony in A major, No. 7. The soloist will be Willy Hess.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be lighter than usual and will include one novelty. This is George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," which is the last work of importance from his pen. "Cleopatra" was performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival of 1904 under the direction of Franz Kneisel, and was not again played in this country until Dr. Muck put it on his Boston programmes of Dec. 14 and 15. The other works are Elgar's overture "In the South;" Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," which Mr Walter Damrosch introduced in this country a few years ago, and the overture to "Rienzi." There will be no soloist at this concert.

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 6 - 1907

Brooklyn Institute Offers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will appear at the Baptist Temple, Friday evening, Jan. 11, at 8.15 o'clock.

A lecture recital will be given by Dr. Otto Neitzel, pianist, of Cologne; subject, "Salome," an opera based upon the play of the same name, at Association Hall, Friday, Jan. 18, at 8.15 o'clock.

Sardonya Club Christmas.

Sardonya Club gave the second annual [redacted] at 8.30 [redacted] musical pro[redacted] sang Christmas carols [redacted]

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall next Friday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The programme will comprise Beethoven's Quartet in F minor, op. 95, No. 11, and Hugo Kaun's Quartet in D major, op. 41, No. 2, and songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf sung by Mme. von Niessen-Stone. The songs will be as follows: Schubert—"Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang" and "Liebhaber in allen Gestalten," Wolf—"Wer rief dich denn?" "Wir haben beide lange Zeit gesohwiegen," "Sie blasen zum Abmarsch" and "In dem schatten meiner Locken." The Hugo Kaun Quartet will be heard in New York for the first time.

aper American
ity Baltimore
)ate State Md
JAN 6 - 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, January 9, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Mr. Heinrich Warnke, principal cellist of the orchestra, who will then make his first appearance in Baltimore in this capacity. He will play Volkmann's concerto for cello in A minor, op. 33. The opening number will be the ever-popular overture by Goldmark, "Sakuntala."

The symphony will be an interesting example of the neo-Russian school, the school which, while admitting Tschaikowsky's greatness, has always denied that he was typically Russian. It is Glazounoff's fifth, in B flat major, a work which has never been heard in this city.

The symphony was composed in 1895, and published in 1896. Its first—and until Dr. Muck brought it out in Boston, month before last—and last American performance was by the Philharmonic Society, of New York, under Anton Seidl, on March 5, 1898, just before the distinguished conductor's death.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date State D C
JAN 6 - 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, January 8, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most popular violinists of the orchestra, whose appearance as a soloist is always warmly welcomed by the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts. Mr. Adamowski has not played in Washington for many years. He will play Saint-Saens' cencerto for violin in B minor, No. 3.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert is decidedly modern in tone. The first work on it will be Elgar's overture, "In the South," a composition the charm of which, always great, grows immensely with repeated hearings.

The symphony will be an interesting example of the neo-Rusian school, the school which while admitting Tschaikowsky's greatness, has always denied that he was typically Russian. It is Glazounoff's fifth, in B flat major, a work which has never been heard in this city. Glazounoff is a young man and a very prolific writer. He is the son of a rich bookseller in St. Petersburg, where he was born in 1865. He has devoted himself, outside of his university work, entirely to music, beginning with the piano when he was nine years old.

[108]

OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

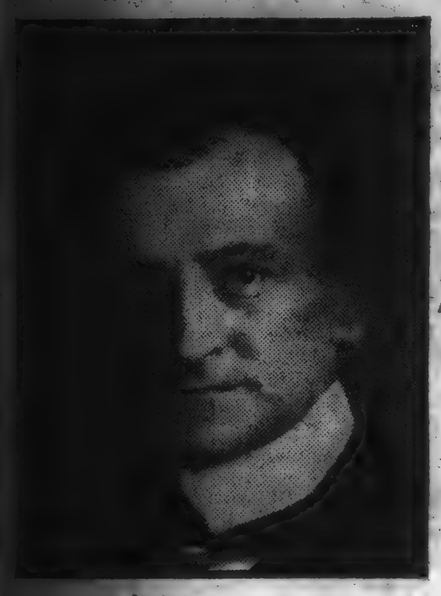
JANUARY 6, 1907.

TOPICS OF TIMELY INTEREST.

PERSONALITY OF DR. MUCK.

The Brilliant New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Who is Soon to Make His First Appearance in Springfield.

The visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra this month, with a single concert at Court Square theater, will be specially notable because it will introduce to the Springfield public one of the most notable of living conductors. Mr Gericke, who retired last year, was very warmly admired and bitterly criticised. Dr Muck has had nothing but praise, and as he is to stay but a year, it is not likely that the high strain of eulogy will be marred by a single discord. An interesting account of his personality and work is given by



DR KARL MUCK.

[Conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Photograph by Garo.]

one who has had an opportunity to see much of him since his arrival in Boston last fall:—

If a man of small stature gives from the stage of a theater or from the podium of a concert hall a universal impression of hight it is a safe presumption that he possesses in an uncommon degree that mysterious and indefinable quality known as personal magnetism. One of the most amusing features of all the descriptions of Dr Karl Muck, following his first appearance in a city with the Boston Symphony orchestra this season, has been the ever-present comment on his hight. He has been "above middle hight," or "tall," or "very tall" to those who have only seen him standing before the orchestra; yet, as a matter of fact, he is rather below middle hight but so slenderly and gracefully built and of such a commanding and authoritative presence that deception is very easy. Such are his qualities of mind, temperament and character that wherever he may be he is certain to be a center of interest.

There is a decided charm about the man, whether one sees him in the distance before the orchestra or close at hand, talking to him. He seems to be the personification of nervous energy under complete and absolute control. His face is strongly marked and attractive, especially when it is lighted by his peculiarly fascinating smile, a smile which is full of good nature and full of humor. It is a face that once seen is not likely soon to be forgotten. The chin is long and strong. The mouth is small and firm, its sternness softened by little lines which show that laughter is never far away. The nose is big, masculine and well modeled. The eyes are dark, bright and piercing and look out from behind nose-glasses which are heavily rimmed with black rubber. The forehead is broad and high and brushed back from it fine, black, closely-cropped hair. The head, while large, is well shaped and one notices no disproportion between it and the slender body which supports it.

One notices another thing about Dr Muck. He is well tailored and knows how to wear his clothes. No follower of the ancient tradition of musical slovenliness, his clothes increase one's respect for Berlin tailors, for they might well have come from Bond street or Vienna. He wears them with the easy grace of a man who has a good figure and is used to and takes pride in good clothes. In fact, there is just the touch of the dandy about him. His cravats are rich in color and skilfully tied and his scarf pins are always in taste. One sees that he likes jewelry, for he wears several handsome rings and his watch guard is a heavy chain that goes around his neck.

It is easy to understand why in Germany he is called the "aristocrat of conductors." Thoroughly a man of the world, intimate of the greatest personages of [illegible], a favored friend of the German [illegible], he is none the less simple and collected in all he does. Without the [illegible] of humor in his eyes, his ready smile [illegible] richness and care of his dress, [illegible] impression one would carry from him [illegible] of austerity and even asceticism. [illegible] elements are in him and betray [illegible] his stern and unwavering [illegible] the highest ideals of his art. [illegible] from his work he is almost [illegible] enjoyment of every-[illegible] music with [illegible]

[illegible] from most musicians in that in addition to his musicianship he is not only a man of widest social experience but has built his musical knowledge on a foundation of broadest culture. His title of "doctor" is not a compliment bestowed on him by a university but was won by three years' hard work in the universities of Heidelberg and Leipsic where he took his degree of "doctor juris" in philosophy, classical philology and musical history. He is a keen student and critic of literature and art. When he is in New York he rarely misses spending some hours in the museum of natural history, for he is enthusiastic on the subject of paleontology. A dweller for years in the official circles of Berlin, he follows modern politics with closest attention and one of his prime motives in coming to America was to see for himself the wonders of this new civilization.

In music Dr Muck is to be classed among the broad conservatives. He confesses that he finds little inspiration in the music which is being written to-day. He believes that in our search for absolute beauty we must still go back to the great masters of the last century. The music of to-day reflects the spirit of our times. It is the product of labored thought rather than of creative inspiration. It mirrors an age of criticism and analysis and is objective rather than subjective. He believes that absolute music reaches its greatest beauty in Beethoven and operatic music in the operas of Mozart and the music-dramas of Wagner. And yet so broad are his sympathies that he is called one of the greatest authorities on the music of Anton Bruckner and is regarded as an inspired interpreter of Brahms. Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler find in him the friendliest of co-operators and he is frankly an admirer of the modern Russians. To the modern Frenchman he is not altogether so sympathetic. Interesting they are, he says, but theirs is too often the music of the head instead of the heart and the precieux quality is too often apparent.

The question of conductors and conducting has grown mightily in the last few years with the advent of "star conductor." Two distinct schools have arisen, the objective and the subjective of which typical and familiar examples are Hans Richter in the former and Arthur Nikisch in the latter. Defined crudely, the objective conductor seeks to elide the element of personality from his work while the subjective conductor believes that the conductor's personality is a most, if not the most, important factor in interpretation. Undoubtedly the most familiar illustration of the objective conductor in this country was the late Theodore Thomas, while aside from Nikisch, who is already a faint memory here, the most familiar illustration of the subjective school was the late Anton Seidl. Dr Muck undoubtedly belongs to the objective school. His belief as to the duties of a conductor were expressed in an interview published earlier in the season by the New York Times. In this he said:—

"There is only one thing for the conductor to do; that is to make beautiful music, true music. When he has done that he has done everything which is to be expected of him. In giving compositions he should not sound the personal note. His own personality has nothing whatever to do with it. To attempt to give an individual interpretation of the work of a composer is often to give exactly what the composer did not mean. The only way is to find the meaning of the composer and give his works as nearly as possible in the real and true style."

"Is that to be done intellectually or by feeling?" was the question put to him.

"How can I say?" he replied. "I could not tell how it is done. It all lies in the gift of interpretation. If one has that he will know the truth when he has found it. That is all there is to it. I learn the truth according to my gift of interpretation and present it. That is all."

How devotedly he practices this creed is evident to all familiar with his methods. His complete absorption in his task, totally oblivious of the audience back of him, the absence of everything in carriage or gesture which smacks of sensationalism; his sharp, short, angular and altogether despotic beat; these are some of the external evidences of his belief. No man known to this country, save possibly Theodore Thomas, has been so sparing of gesture, yet there is no lack of authority. There is such military precision in his actions that the poetic and imaginative qualities with which his work is filled come only as a second impression.

The internal evidence of his devotion to his ideal is the work of which the public knows nothing; of the hours he spends marking all the orchestral parts with painstaking care and thus reducing the work of rehearsal to a minimum. As rigid a disciplinarian as Mr Gericke, his predecessor, he is most popular with the men who work under him. Of him it may be said that the steel hand is sheathed in a velvet glove. Few conductors command the respect and affection of the musicians under them as does Dr Muck and this has been true of him during his entire career, in Salzburg, Brunn, Graz, Prague, Berlin, Vienna and now Boston. His humanity is as great as his musicianship, and,—a rare things among musicians—he has a saving sense of humor.

Dr Muck has prepared a most interesting set of programs for the western trip of the Boston symphony orchestra which will be made in the week of January 27. The work of the orchestra at present is unusually heavy, as some unusually important novelties are being prepared for the Boston concerts. The biggest work which has yet been unheard in Boston is Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which will be played in February. It is probable that the orchestra will play this at one of its coming concerts in New York, either in February or March.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date JAN 6 - 1907 State N Y

On Friday afternoon in the same place the Boston Symphony Quartet gives its second chamber music concert. Quartets by Beethoven and Hugo Kaun, the latter a novelty, will be played, and Mme. Von Niessen-Stone, the soloist, will sing a series of German lieder.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date JAN - 6 1907 State N Y

Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the concerto for violin in D major, and the symphony in A major, No. 7. The soloist will be Willy Hess.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be rather lighter than usual, and will include one novelty. This is George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," which is the last work of importance from his pen, is a novelty of this week's Boston Symphony matinée at Carnegie Hall. "Cleopatra" was performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival of 1904, under the direction of Franz Kneisel, and was not again played in this country until Dr. Muck put it on his Boston programmes of December 14 and 15. The other works are Elgar's overture, "In the South," a part of which Mr. Gericke played last year; Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," which Walter Damrosch introduced in this country a few years ago, and the overture to "Rienzi." There will be no soloist at this concert.

Paper Press
City New York
State N Y

Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Thursday's programme will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the concerto for violin in D major and the symphony in A major, No. 7, while Saturday's list will comprise George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra," Edgar's "In the South," George Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," and the "Rienzi" overture. "Cleopatra" was performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival of 1904 under the direction of Franz Kneisel, and was not heard again in this country until Dr. Muck put it on his Boston programmes of December 14 and 15.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The programme will comprise Beethoven's quartet in F minor, opus 95, No. 11; Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, opus 41, No. 2, and songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf, sung by Mme. von Niessen-Stone. Hugo Kaun's quartet will be heard for the first time in New York.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date JAN 6 - 1907 State N Y

MUSIC NOTES.

DR. CARL MUCK has arranged two sharply contrasted programmes for the Boston Orchestra's third pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thuraday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. That for Thursday night will be devoted exclusively to Beethoven's works, whereas Saturday's list contains contemporary music of a romantic character.

In the Beethoven programme will be the "Egmont" overture, the seventh symphony and the violin concerto in D major, with Professor Willy Hess as soloist in the last mentioned work. On Saturday Mr. George W. Chadwick's recently written symphonic poem will be played with Sir Edward Elgar's overture "In the South," George Schumann's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme" and the "Rienzi" overture of Wagner.

TRAVELER, JANUARY 7, 1907.

For the 11th symphony concert on Saturday evening Dr. Muck offered Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Volkmann's A minor 'cello concerto and the first symphony of Sibelius, the famous Finnish composer, the last-named number being given for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Warnke of the orchestra was the soloist.

Naturally first interest was in the symphony, and it proved to be well merited. Never has the composer been heard to better advantage. His work breathes of Finland throughout, with a breath that simply fascinates. Dr. Muck's reading was thoroughly in keeping with the number, making of the whole one of the most delightful selections of the season to date. The "Sakuntala" overture strengthens its hold upon every hearing. It seemed Saturday evening as though it had never before possessed so much merit. Between these two jewels came the 'cello concert, which, like all of its school, is endured rather than embraced. This is no reflection on Mr. Warnke, for he made the most of the possibilities, but a 'cello concerto never has been and never will be enthusiastically received. The soloist ever carries the work.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date JAN 10 1907 State N Y

Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, op 42, No. 2, is announced for the first time here at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall at 3 o'clock to-morrow. The programme will also have Beethoven's quartet in F minor, op. 95, No. 11, and songs of Schubert and Hugo Wolf, sung by Mme. von Niessen-Stone.

Paper Telegram
City Philadelphia.
Date JAN 8 1907 State Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Third of the Series Brings Out Important New Work.

Interest in the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night centred in the playing for the first time in this city of the E Minor Symphony No. 1, by Jan Sibelius.

The chaotic storm of the four movements swept like a hurricane of gorgeous sound through the Academy. In contrast to the serene and classic spirit of the two Beethoven numbers, which preceded the symphony, it was impressive to note Sibelius's knowledge of the dramatic and decorative possibilities of the accent and his command of orchestral color. There are passages in the work not altogether free from that radical modernity which temporarily confuses the ear.

The grotesque and humorous invention of the Allegro at times gave rise to an unjust suspicion that the men were not all playing in the same key. Even here, however, the intellectual grip of the composer—and also of his interpreter, Doctor Muck—was so firm, yet so pliant, that those who listened seriously to the harmonic maze found that it was as a jungle of vigorous life, all instinct with riotous value and intention. The first two movements were less iconoclastic.

Doctor Muck brought out an infinity of detail and color in a score that of itself boasts splendid dramatic power. The ensemble effects of Boston's great orchestra were never so hardly taxed, nor so splendidly evidenced.

The soloist was Prof. Willy Hess, an old friend to Philadelphia audiences, as his warm welcome fully proved. He played Beethoven's great D Major Concerto in scholarly mood, and was received with the highest appreciation. Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture completed the evening's programme.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date JAN 10 1907 State N Y

George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra," described as the "last work of importance from his pen," is a novelty of this week's Boston Symphony matinée at Carnegie Hall. "Cleopatra" was performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival of 1904, under the direction of Franz Kneisel.

[109]

The Republican.

OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

JANUARY 6, 1907

TOPICS OF TIMELY INTEREST.

PERSONALITY OF DR MUCK.

The Brilliant New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Who is Soon to Make His First Appearance in Springfield.

The visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra this month, with a single concert at Court Square theater, will be specially notable because it will introduce to the Springfield public one of the most notable of living conductors. Mr Gericke, who retired last year, was very warmly admired and bitterly criticised. Dr Muck has had nothing but praise, and as he is to stay but a year, it is not likely that the high strain of eulogy will be marred by a single discord. An interesting account of his personality and work is given by

DR KARL MUCK.

[Conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Photograph by Garo.]

one who has had an opportunity to see much of him since his arrival in Boston last fall:—

If a man of small stature gives from the stage of a theater or from the podium of a concert hall a universal impression of hight it is a safe presumption that he possesses in an uncommon degree that mysterious and indefinable quality known as personal magnetism. One of the most amusing features of all the descriptions of Dr Karl Muck, following his first appearance in a city with the Boston Symphony orchestra this season, has been the ever-present comment on his hight. He has been "above middle hight," or "tall," or "very tall" to those who have only seen him standing before the orchestra; yet, as a matter of fact, he is rather below middle hight but so slenderly and gracefully built and of such a commanding and authoritative presence that deception is very easy. Such are his qualities of mind, temperament and character that wherever he may be he is certain to be a center of interest.

There is a decided charm about the man, whether one sees him in the distance before the orchestra or close at hand, talking to him. He seems to be the personification of nervous energy under complete and absolute control. His face is strongly marked and attractive, especially when it is lighted by his peculiarly fascinating smile, a smile which is full of good nature and full of humor. It is a face that once seen is not likely soon to be forgotten. The chin is long and strong. The mouth is small and firm, its sternness softened by little lines which show that laughter is never far away. The nose is big, masculine and well modeled. The eyes are dark, bright and piercing and look out from behind nose-glasses which are heavily rimmed with black rubber. The forehead is broad and high and brushed back from it fine, black, closely-cropped hair. The head, while large, is well shaped and one notices no disproportion between it and the slender body which supports it.

One notices another thing about Dr Muck. He is well tailored and knows how to wear his clothes. No follower of the ancient tradition of musical slovenliness, his clothes increase one's respect for Berlin tailors, for they might well have come from Bond street or Vienna. He wears them with the easy grace of a man who has a good figure and is used to and takes pride in good clothes. In fact, there is just the touch of the dandy about him. His cravats are rich in color and skilfully tied and his scarf pins are always in taste. One sees that he likes jewelry, for he wears several handsome rings and his watch guard is a heavy chain that goes around his neck.

It is easy to understand why in Germany he is called the "aristocrat of conductors." Thoroughly a man of the world, an intimate of the greatest personages of Europe, a favored friend of the German emperor, he is none the less simple and unaffected in all he does. Without the glint of humor in his eyes, his ready smile and the richness and care of his dress, the impression one would carry from him would be of austerity and even asceticism. These elements are in him and betray themselves in his stern and unwavering devotion to the highest ideals of his art; but once away from his work he is almost boyish in his keen enjoyment of every-

Dr Muck differs from most musicians in that in addition to his musicianship he is not only a man of widest social experience but has built his musical knowledge on a foundation of broadest culture. His title of "doctor" is not a compliment bestowed on him by a university but was won by three years' hard work in the universities of Heidelberg and Leipsic where he took his degree of "doctor juris" in philosophy, classical philology and musical history. He is a keen student and critic of literature and art. When he is in New York he rarely misses spending some hours in the museum of natural history, for he is enthusiastic on the subject of paleontology. A dweller for years in the official circles of Berlin, he follows modern politics with closest attention and one of his prime motives in coming to America was to see for himself the wonders of this new civilization.

In music Dr Muck is to be classed among the broad conservatives. He confesses that he finds little inspiration in the music which is being written to-day. He believes that in our search for absolute beauty we must still go back to the great masters of the last century. The music of to-day reflects the spirit of our times. It is the product of labored thought rather than of creative inspiration. It mirrors an age of criticism and analysis and is objective rather than subjective. He believes that absolute music reaches its greatest beauty in Beethoven and operatic music in the operas of Mozart and the music-dramas of Wagner. And yet so broad are his sympathies that he is called one of the greatest authorities on the music of Anton Bruckner and is regarded as an inspired interpreter of Brahms. Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler find in him the friendliest of co-operators and he is frankly an admirer of the modern Russians. To the modern Frenchman he is not altogether so sympathetic. Interesting they are, he says, but theirs is too often the music of the head instead of the heart and the precieux quality is too often apparent.

The question of conductors and conducting has grown mightily in the last few years with the advent of "star conductor." Two distinct schools have arisen, the objective and the subjective of which typical and familiar examples are Hans Richter in the former and Arthur Nikisch in the latter. Defined crudely, the objective conductor seeks to elide the element of personality from his work while the subjective conductor believes that the conductor's personality is a most, if not the most, important factor in interpretation. Undoubtedly the most familiar illustration of the objective conductor in this country was the late Theodore Thomas, while aside from Nikisch, who is already a faint memory here, the most familiar illustration of the subjective school was the late Anton Seidl. Dr Muck undoubtedly belongs to the objective school. His belief as to the duties of a conductor were expressed in an interview published earlier in the season by the New York Times. In this he said:—

"There is only one thing for the conductor to do; that is to make beautiful music, true music. When he has done that he has done everything which is to be expected of him. In giving compositions he should not sound the personal note. His own personality has nothing whatever to do with it. To attempt to give an individual interpretation of the work of a composer is often to give exactly what the composer did not mean. The only way is to find the meaning of the composer and give his works as nearly as possible in the real and true style."

"Is that to be done intellectually or by feeling?" was the question put to him.

"How can I say?" he replied. "I could not tell how it is done. It all lies in the gift of interpretation. If one has that he will know the truth when he has found it. That is all there is to it. I learn the truth according to my gift of interpretation and present it. That is all."

How devotedly he practices this creed is evident to all familiar with his methods. His complete absorption in his task, totally oblivious of the audience back of him, the absence of everything in carriage or gesture which smacks of sensationalism; his sharp, short, angular and altogether despotic beat; these are some of the external evidences of his belief. No man known to this country, save possibly Theodore Thomas, has been so sparing of gesture, yet there is no lack of authority. There is such military precision in his actions that the poetic and imaginative qualities with which his work is filled come only as a second impression.

The internal evidence of his devotion to his ideal is the work of which the public knows nothing; of the hours he spends marking all the orchestral parts with painstaking care and thus reducing the work of rehearsal to a minimum. As rigid a disciplinarian as Mr Gericke, his predecessor, he is most popular with the men who work under him. Of him it may be said that the steel hand is sheathed in a velvet glove. Few conductors command the respect and affection of the musicians under them as does Dr Muck and this has been true of him during his entire career, in Salzburg, Brunn, Graz, Prague, Berlin, Vienna and now Boston. His humanity is as great as his musicianship, and,—a rare things among musicians—he has a saving sense of humor.

Dr Muck has prepared a most interesting set of programs for the western trip of the Boston symphony orchestra which will be made in the week of January 27. The work of the orchestra at present is unusually heavy, as some unusually important novelties are being prepared for the Boston concerts. The biggest work which has yet been unheard in Boston is Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which will be played in February. It is probable that the orchestra will play this at one of its coming concerts in New York, either in February or March.

Paper Herald

City New York

Date JAN 6 - 1907 State N Y

On Friday afternoon in the same place the Boston Symphony Quartet gives its second chamber music concert. Quartets by Beethoven and Hugo Kaun, the latter a novelty, will be played, and Mme. Von Niessen-Stone, the soloist, will sing a series of German lieder.

Paper Tribune

City New York

Date State N Y

JAN - 3 1907

Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme for Thursday night will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the concerto for violin in D major, and the symphony in A major, No. 7. The soloist will be Willy Hess.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be rather lighter than usual, and will include one novelty. This is George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," which is the last work of importance from his pen, and was performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival of 1904, under the direction of Franz Kneisel, and was not again played in this country until Dr. Muck put it on his Boston programmes of December 14 and 15. The other works are Elgar's overture, "In the South," a part of which Mr. Gericke played last year; Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," which Walter Damrosch introduced in this country a few years ago, and the overture to "Rienzi." There will be no soloist at this concert.

aper Press

ty New York

te State N Y

Two rather unusual programmes have been arranged by Dr. Muck for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Thursday's programme will be devoted entirely to Beethoven, the works being the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the concerto for violin in D major and the symphony in A major, No. 7, while Saturday's list will comprise George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra," Edgar's "In the South," George Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," and the "Rienzi" overture. "Cleopatra" was performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival of 1904 under the direction of Franz Kneisel, and was not heard again in this country until Dr. Muck put it on his Boston programmes of December 14 and 15.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The programme will comprise Beethoven's quartet in F minor, opus 95, No. 11; Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, opus 41, No. 2, and songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf, sung by Mme. von Niessen-Stone. Hugo Kaun's quartet will be heard for the first time in New York.

Paper Herald

City New York

Date 1907 State N Y

MUSIC NOTES.

DR. CARL MUCK has arranged two sharply contrasted programmes for the Boston Orchestra's third pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. That for Thursday night will be devoted exclusively to Beethoven's works, whereas Saturday's list contains contemporary music of a romantic character.

In the Beethoven programme will be the "Egmont" overture, the seventh symphony and the violin concerto in D major, with Professor Willy Hess as soloist in the last mentioned work. On Saturday Mr. George W. Chadwick's recently written symphonic poem will be played with Sir Edward Elgar's overture "In the South," George Schumann's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme" and the "Rienzi" overture of Wagner.

TRAVELER, JANUARY 7, 1907.

For the 11th Symphony concert on Saturday evening Dr. Muck offered Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Volkmann's A minor 'cello concerto and the first symphony of Sibelius, the famous Finnish composer, the last-named number being given for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Warnke of the orchestra was the soloist.

Naturally first interest was in the symphony, and it proved to be well merited. Never has the composer been heard to better advantage. His work breathes of Finland throughout, with a breath that simply fascinates. Dr. Muck's reading was thoroughly in keeping with the number, making of the whole one of the most delightful selections of the season to date. The "Sakuntala" overture strengthens its hold upon every hearing. It seemed Saturday evening as though it had never before possessed so much merit. Between these two jewels came the 'cello concert, which, like all of its school, is endured rather than embraced. This is no reflection on Mr. Warnke, for he made the most of the possibilities, but a 'cello concerto never has been and never will be enthusiastically received. The soloist ever carries the work.

Paper Sun

City New York

Date State N Y

JAN 19 1907

Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, op 43, No. 2, is announced for the first time here at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall at 3 o'clock to-morrow. The programme will also have Beethoven's quartet in F minor, op. 95, No. 11, and songs of Schubert and Hugo Wolf, sung by Mme. von Niessen-Stone.

SUNDAY GLOBE-JANUARY 6, 1907.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 11th program of the Symphony orchestra opened with the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala," the first cellist, Mr Warnke, played the solo part in Volkmann's A minor concerto and the E minor symphony by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, was played here for the first time. The Goldmark overture is a charming work, which pictures in glowing colors the alleged adventures of Sakuntala and her kingly lover, who are separated for a while by a vile priest; the plot introducing the loss of a royal ring, the temporary lapse of memory of the king, the repudiation of his wife, the return of the ring and recovery of reason and happiness almost at the same time. These episodes were daintily set forth by the orchestra, the performance being in a sympathetic vein and thoroughly enjoyable.

In the Volkmann concerto, Mr Warnke's fingering throughout was about as perfect in tone production as if he had been playing upon a keyed instrument, his work in the higher register having the sweet qualities of the violin and the broader bowing of the heavier strings being free from the rasping accompaniment often heard in less accomplished artists. The chords, double stoppings and harmonics were beautifully executed and none of the great difficulties of the concerto appeared to be an obstacle to the performer not easily compassed. The cadenza was a brilliant exhibition of technique that was almost impeccable. The appreciation of his interpretation was marked and he was recalled several times to the platform.

The Sibelius symphony sounds a mournful note at the beginning and excepting in the quaint and bizarre third movement this somber suggestion is reiterated throughout the whole composition. Much of the orchestration is fantastic, the strenuous moments are oft-occurring and there are tempestuous spots in the first and final movements that are rivals of Wagner's fortissimos at their loudest.

The themes seemingly are continually at war with each other, crescendos abound, and the few gentler motifs, some of them very sweet and all of them very brief, come as a relief to the musical turmoil.

The somewhat piquant third movement has a theme for wood-winds that was exquisitely played by this contingent and in the hurly-burly of the second and last movements the brasses gave out their declamations with a resonant harmony that showed good ensemble work. Aside from these points there is nothing but praise of a general nature for the other parts of the orchestra, as the men were not called upon to do more than play according to the direction of Mr Muck, carefully and one might say violently most of the time.

This week the orchestra will make its third trip to other cities. The program Jan 18 and 19 will have Katherine Goodson as soloist in Grieg's piano concerto. The other selections will be the overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn and Schubert's C major symphony.

Paper Ledger

City Philada.

Date State Pa.

JAN 8 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Third of the Series Brings Out Important New Work.

Interest in the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night centred in the playing for the first time in this city of the E Minor Symphony No. 1, by Jan Sibelius.

The chaotic storm of the four movements swept like a hurricane of gorgeous sound through the Academy. In contrast to the serene and classic spirit of the two Beethoven numbers, which preceded the symphony, it was impressive to note Sibelius's knowledge of the dramatic and decorative possibilities of the accent and his command of orchestral color. There are passages in the work not altogether free from that radical modernity which temporarily confuses the ear.

The grotesque and humorous invention of the Allegro at times gave rise to an unjust suspicion that the men were not all playing in the same key. Even here, however, the intellectual grip of the composer—and also of his interpreter, Doctor Muck—was so firm, yet so pliant, that those who listened seriously to the harmonic maze found that it was as a jungle of vigorous life, all instinct with riotous value and intention. The first two movements were less iconoclastic.

Doctor Muck brought out an infinity of detail and color in a score that of itself boasts splendid dramatic power. The ensemble effects of Boston's great orchestra were never so hardly taxed, nor so splendidly evidenced.

The soloist was Prof. Willy Hess, an old friend to Philadelphia audiences, as his warm welcome fully proved. He played Beethoven's great D Major Concerto in scholarly mood, and was received with the highest appreciation. Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture completed the evening's programme.

Paper Sun

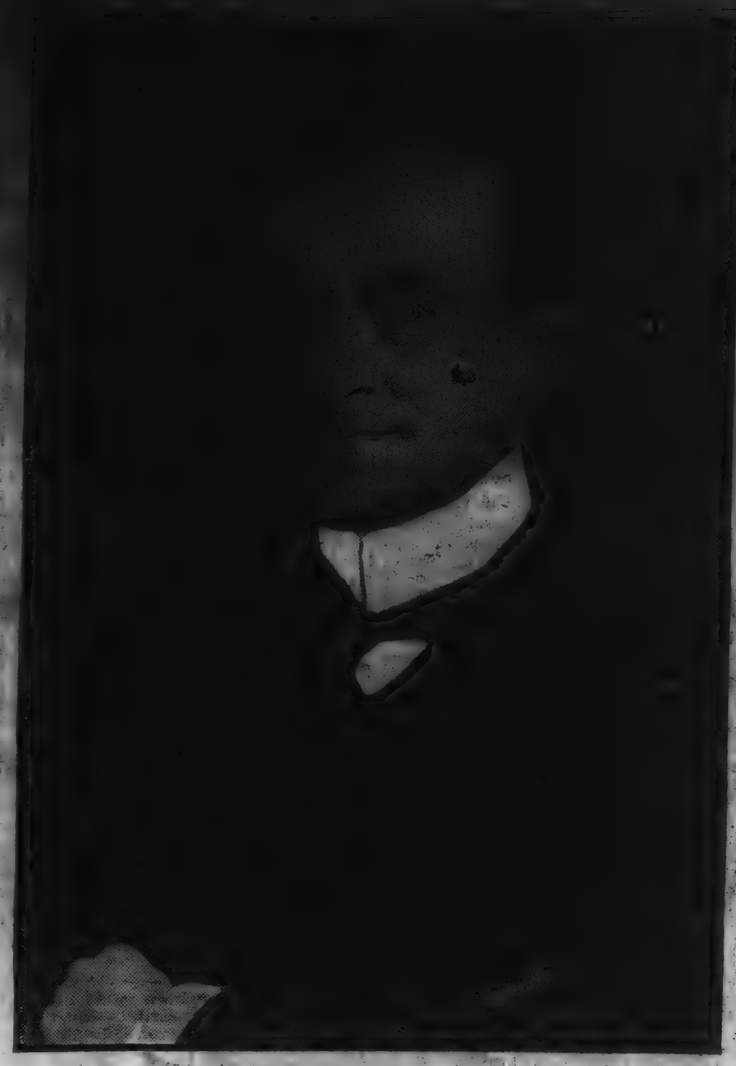
City New York

Date State N Y

George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra," described as the "last work of importance from his pen," is a novelty of this week's Boston Symphany matinée at Carnegie Hall. "Cleopatra" was performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival of 1904, under the direction of Franz Kneisel.

[109]

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY UNION: JANUARY 6. 1907.



Dr. Karl Muck
New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

AN ARTISTIC PROGRAM.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play Noteworthy Numbers.

The sale of seats for the only concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in Springfield this year, will open at the box office of the Court Square theater next Saturday morning, Jan. 12. The concert will be given on Tuesday evening, Jan. 15, at 8 o'clock.

An unusually attractive program has been prepared by Dr. Muck for the Springfield concert. In response to many requests from Springfield, and in accordance with the general policy of the orchestra this year at its first concerts in any city, there will be no soloists, it being the desire to give full emphasis to the presence of the distinguished conductor, who is at the head of the organization for this year. If this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra has proved anything, it has proved that the great majority of patrons of symphony concerts are not only anxious for a soloist but rather welcome a concert where there is none.

It is a well known fact to all who have studied the difficult art of making programs that nothing is so sure to break the continuity of a program as a work for soloist, whether it be instrumental or vocal. Dr. Muck, in building his program, follows one of two formulas. His programs are arranged to show either the development of one particular school, or to bring out sharp and vivid contrasts. It is the latter scheme he has followed for the Springfield program which comprises three works.

The first is an overture, entitled "In the South" by Sir Edward Elgar, the greatest of living English composers. In this work, the composer has sought to place in tone colors, the impression a Northerner receives in Italy. It is all glowing sunlight and song. The second is a symphonic poem, entitled "Cleopatra," by the eminent American composer, George W. Chadwick. The inspiration for this work has been drawn from Plutarch's tale of the Egyptian queen, and the composer has sought to embody in sound, her vivid emotional life. And finally comes Beethoven's Seventh Symphony which Wagner has called "Apotheosis of the Dance." In no work, not even in Brahms's First Symphony, in which Dr. Muck had such sensational success, has the new conductor of the orchestra risen to such hights of interpretative power as in this symphony. Springfield is to be congratulated that he has put it on the program for this city.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y

THIRD BOSTON SYMPATHY CONCERT WITH NEW MUSIC

Melba to Sing in "Rigoletto" at Manhattan Opera House.

LECTURES ON "SALOME."

Mr. Watters' Musicales on Brooklyn Calendar—Local and Manhattan Concerts.

Two works new to Brooklyn appear on the programme of the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening. They are George Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme and Jean Sibelius' first symphony in E minor. There will be no soloist.

Both of these men are most interesting personalities in modern music. Both of them are young, comparatively speaking, and both of them modern. Schumann, who was born in 1866, in Konigstein, is the conductor of the Singakademie of Berlin. He comes of a musical family, his father having been a conductor and his grandfather a cantor. His teachers were C. A. Fisher, Rollfuss and Beaumfelder, of Dresden, and Jadassohn, Reinecke and Zwintscher, of Leipsic. In Leipsic he won the Beethoven prize in 1887. From '91 to '96 he was the conductor of the Gesangverein of Dantzig and from '96 to 1900 he was the conductor of the Philharmonic of Bremen. Thence he went to his present post in Berlin. He has written two symphonies, several large orchestra and orchestral and choral works, as well as chamber music and songs.

Jean Sibelius is the representative composer of Finland. He has written two symphonies and several orchestra poems on national epic themes. He is a man of great talent and his works have been having a very considerable vogue in Europe. This first symphony was first played in this country at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston last Friday and Saturday, Jan. 4 to 5. The whole programme is as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala" (Goldmark); Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme, (George Schumann); Symphony No. 1, in E minor, (Sibelius).

BOSTON EVENING RECORD JANUARY 7, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(From Mr. Elson's Criticism in The Daily Advertiser).

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark. "Sakuntala" Overture.
Volkmann. Violoncello Concerto, in A minor. Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Sibelius. Symphony in E minor, No. 1.

The Sakuntala Overture wears well. We have had it many times at the symphony concerts but familiarity in this case only breeds increased pleasure. Its orchestration is masterly, its melodies beautiful and well worked up. When Goldmark is viewed in the perspective of Time, it is possible that posterity will grade him higher than his own contemporaries have done, for the world at present does not admit him to the ranks of absolutely great tonal masters.

Dr. Muck's reading was a fine one. He drew out the slow passages in his accustomed manner. If one were to time his overture readings it would be found that in almost every case his deliberation adds two or three minutes to the accustomed length of a long movement. But he makes his contrasts very effectively and his climaxes are always effective. The final working up of the principal themes in this overture (representing the two lovers) was superb and there was much enthusiasm manifested. Therefore even the mannerism alluded to is not often to be considered a defect. The end justifies the means.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date JAN 9 - 1907 State D C

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Adamowski Replaced by Heinrich Warnke, First 'Cellist.

The third of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the National Theater yesterday afternoon and was attended by the usual large and appreciative audience. The program was chiefly of modern music, including Elgar's overture, "In the South," and Glazounoff's symphony in B flat major, No. 5, but there had also been announced Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor, for violin, No. 3, op. 61, with Mr. Timothee Adamowski as the soloist, and a large number of people no doubt went with the anticipation of hearing that excellent performer in a composition which would have given him splendid scope for all his skill. Mr. Adamowski was, however, not in the city, being sick in Boston with the "grippe," and so Henirich Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, volunteered to play a concerto by Galtermann, which he did, proving to the audience that he was a finished artist in the handling of his instrument, bringing out unexpected effects and showing its extensive range. He held the attention of the audience by his skillful playing and received long and emphatic applause at its conclusion so that he responded to an encore.

The work of the orchestra was of the high standard of excellence that has been observed for many years, and the new conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, had his force absolutely under control. The Elgar overture was produced at Covent Garden in March, 1904, and is supposed to suggest the joy of living in a balmy climate under sunny skies, and while much is stirring and joyous there is a note of sadness that seems cold, but which is replaced later on, and the ending is in harmony with the beginning.

The Russian symphony was first presented in St. Petersburg in 1895, and sprung at once into public favor. The last movement is by far the most interesting, and although this composition closed the program the applause was loud and prolonged.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date JAN 9 - 1907 State D C

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Adamowski Replaced by Heinrich Warnke, First 'Cellist.

The third of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the National Theater yesterday afternoon and was attended by the usual large and appreciative audience. The program was chiefly of modern music, including Elgar's overture, "In the South," and Glazounoff's symphony in B flat major, No. 5, but there had also been announced Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor, for violin, No. 3, op. 61, with Mr. Timothee Adamowski as the soloist, and a large number of people no doubt went with the anticipation of hearing that excellent performer in a composition which would have given him splendid scope for all his skill. Mr. Adamowski was, however, not in the city, being sick in Boston with the "grippe," and so Henirich Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, volunteered to play a concerto by Galtermann, which he did, proving to the audience that he was a finished artist in the handling of his instrument, bringing out unexpected effects and showing its extensive range. He held the attention of the audience by his skillful playing and received long and emphatic applause at its conclusion so that he responded to an encore.

The work of the orchestra was of the high standard of excellence that has been observed for many years, and the new conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, had his force absolutely under control. The Elgar overture was produced at Covent Garden in March, 1904, and is supposed to suggest the joy of living in a balmy climate under sunny skies, and while much is stirring and joyous there is a note of sadness that seems cold, but which is replaced later on, and the ending is in harmony with the beginning.

The Russian symphony was first presented in St. Petersburg in 1895, and sprung at once into public favor. The last movement is by far the most interesting, and although this composition closed the program the applause was loud and prolonged.

Paper American
City Baltimore
Date JAN 1 - 1907 State Md

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT LYRIC

Under the Direction of Dr. Karl Muck, the Musicians Render Fine Program.

Another large and fashionable audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of its third concert of this series last evening at the Lyric, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. The following fine program was given:

Goldmark—
Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13.
R. Volkmann—
Concerto in A minor, for Violoncello and Orchestra, Op. 33.
Glazounoff—
Symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, Op. 55.
I. Moderato maestoso; Allegro.
II. Scherzo; Moderato; Pochissimo meno mosso.
III. Andante.
IV. Allegro maestoso.

The Goldmark overture to Sakuntala and the Volkmann concerto for violincello and orchestra are both familiar to Baltimore lovers of music, as the overture has been played several times here by the Barton Symphony Orchestra, and the Volkmann concerto was a favorite work at the former Peabody concerts, where it was frequently given with the Peabody Orchestra by the late Rudolph Green, one of the cellists of the orchestra. Mr. Warnke gave the solo part of the concerto a fine rendition and was indorsed by several recalls by the audience.

The great novelty of the evening was the magnificent Glazonnoff symphony by a Russian composer still living, and one of the best. When Anton Rubinstein was in this country he said to a young lady who sang some and giggled much: "When you have suffered you will understand music." That was years ago, but she has not forgotten it. The Russians are musical, partly because, like all the dwellers in the high north latitudes, they have suffered much. It is impossible to live in Russia, Finland, Sweden, Norway or Iceland without feeling the climatic asperities of nature.

The rendition of the above great symphony in the way that it was given last evening was another musical success for [illegible]

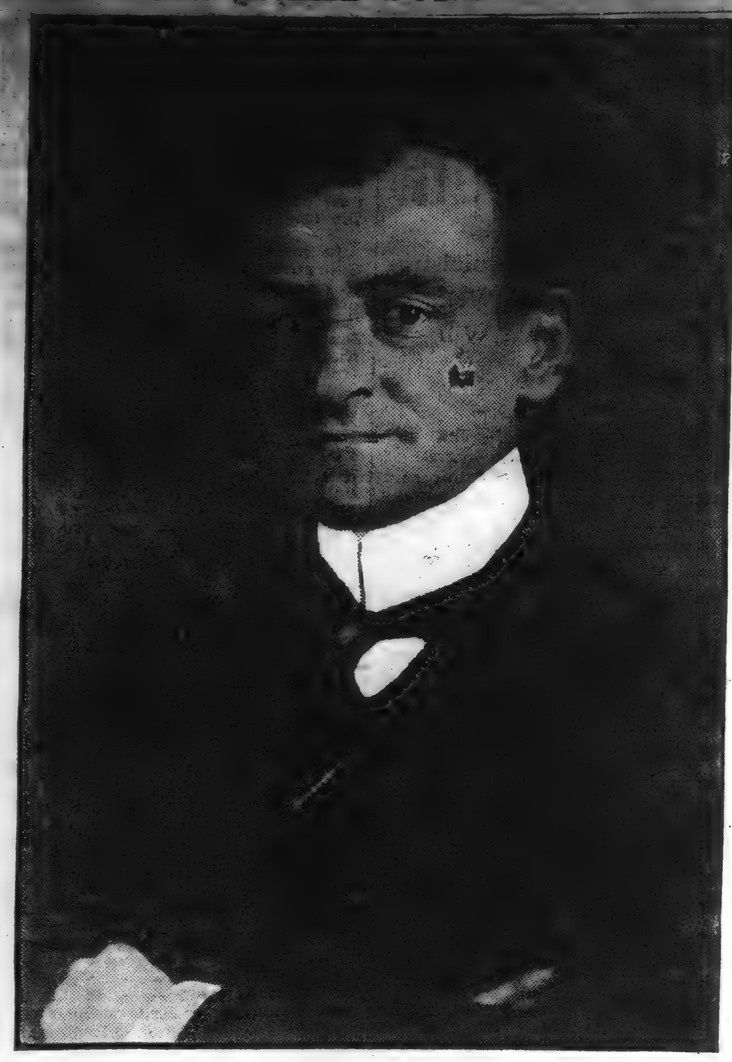
Paper Eagle
City Brooklyn
Date State N.J.
JAN 10 1907

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

Study of Programme to Be Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Interpretative study of the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Philharmonic concert to-morrow night, at the Baptist Temple, was given in the preliminary lecture recital at Association Hall (Brooklyn Institute) yesterday afternoon. Charles M. Skinner was the lecturer at this, as at the last preliminary lecture recital, and, as before, Robert Thallon was the assisting pianist, he, in turn, having yesterday the assistance of Miss Josephine B. Taylor wherever a four-handed arrangement of the music made the effect more complete. The programme taken up included the overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13, Goldmark; "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," Op. 39, Georg Schumann, and the Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Sibelius.

[110]



Dr. Karl Muck
New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

AN ARTISTIC PROGRAM.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play Noteworthy Numbers.

The sale of seats for the only concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in Springfield this year, will open at the box office of the Court Square theater next Saturday morning, Jan. 12. The concert will be given on Tuesday evening, Jan. 15, at 8 o'clock.

An unusually attractive program has been prepared by Dr. Muck for the Springfield concert. In response to many requests from Springfield, and in accordance with the general policy of the orchestra this year at its first concerts in any city, there will be no soloists, it being the desire to give full emphasis to the presence of the distinguished conductor, who is at the head of the organization for this year. If this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra has proved anything, it has proved that the great majority of patrons of symphony concerts are not only anxious for a soloist but rather welcome a concert where there is none.

It is a well known fact to all who have studied the difficult art of making programs that nothing is so sure to break the continuity of a program as a work for soloist, whether it be instrumental or vocal. Dr. Muck, in building his program, follows one of two formulas. His programs are arranged to show either the development of one particular school, or to bring out sharp and vivid contrasts. It is the latter scheme he has followed for the Springfield program which comprises three works.

The first is an overture, entitled "In the South" by Sir Edward Elgar, the greatest of living English composers. In this work, the composer has sought to place in tone colors, the impression a Northerner receives in Italy. It is all glowing sunlight and song. The second is a symphonic poem, entitled "Cleopatra," by the eminent American composer, George W. Chadwick. The inspiration for this work has been drawn from Plutarch's tale of the Egyptian queen, and the composer has sought to embody in sound, her vivid emotional life. And finally comes Beethoven's Seventh Symphony which Wagner has called "Apotheosis of the Dance." In no work, not even in Brahms's First Symphony, in which Dr. Muck had such sensational success, has the new conductor of the orchestra risen to such hights of interpretative power as in this symphony. Springfield is to be congratulated that he has put it on the program for this city.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD JANUARY 7, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(From Mr. Elson's Criticism in The Daily Advertiser).

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark. "Sakuntala" Overture.
Volkmann. 'Violoncello Concerto, in A minor.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Sibelius. Symphony in E minor, No. 1.

The Sakuntala Overture wears well. We have had it many times at the symphony concerts but familiarity in this case only breeds increased pleasure. Its orchestration is masterly, its melodies beautiful and well worked up. When Goldmark is viewed in the perspective of Time, it is possible that posterity will grade him higher than his own contemporaries have done, for the world at present does not admit him to the ranks of absolutely great tonal masters.

Dr. Muck's reading was a fine one. He drew out the slow passages in his accustomed manner. If one were to time his overture readings it would be found that in almost every case his deliberation adds two or three minutes to the accustomed length of a long movement. But he makes his contrasts very effectively and his climaxes are always effective. The final working up of the principal themes in this overture (representing the two lovers) was superb and there was much enthusiasm manifested. Therefore even the mannerism alluded to is not often to be considered a defect. The end justifies the means.

Paper Eagle
City Brooklyn
Date State N.Y.
JAN 10 1907

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

Study of Programme to Be Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Interpretative study of the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Philharmonic concert to-morrow night, at the Baptist Temple, was given in the preliminary lecture recital at Association Hall (Brooklyn Institute) yesterday afternoon. Charles M. Skinner was the lecturer at this, as at the last preliminary lecture recital, and, as before, Robert Thallon was the assisting pianist, he, in turn, having yesterday the assistance of Miss Josephine B. Taylor wherever a four-handed arrangement of the music made the effect more complete. The programme taken up included the overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13, Goldmark; "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," Op. 30, Georg Schumann, and the Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Sibelius.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date JAN 9 - 1907 State D

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Adamowski Replaced by Heinrich Warnke, First 'Cellist.

The third of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the National Theater yesterday afternoon and was attended by the usual large and appreciative audience. The program was chiefly of modern music, including Elgar's overture, "In the South," and Glazounoff's symphony in B flat major, No. 5, but there had also been announced Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor, for violin, No. 3, op. 61, with Mr. Timothee Adamowski as the soloist, and a large number of people no doubt went with the anticipation of hearing that excellent performer in a composition which would have given him splendid scope for all his skill. Mr. Adamowski was, however, not in the city, being sick in Boston with the "grippe," and so Henirich Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, volunteered to play a concerto by Galtermann, which he did, proving to the audience that he was a finished artist in the handling of his instrument, bringing out unexpected effects and showing its extensive range. He held the attention of the audience by his skillful playing and received long and emphatic applause at its conclusion so that he responded to an encore.

The work of the orchestra was of the high standard of excellence that has been observed for many years, and the new conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, had his force absolutely under control. The Elgar overture was produced at Covent Garden in March, 1904, and is supposed to suggest the joy of living in a balmy climate under sunny skies, and while much is stirring and joyous there is a note of sadness that seems cold, but which is replaced later on, and the ending is in harmony with the beginning.

The Russian symphony was first presented in St. Petersburg in 1895, and sprung at once into public favor. The last movement is by far the most interesting, and although this composition closed the program the applause was loud and prolonged.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date State D C
JAN 9 - 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Adamowski Replaced by Heinrich Warnke, First 'Cellist.

The third of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the National Theater yesterday afternoon and was attended by the usual large and appreciative audience. The program was chiefly of modern music, including Elgar's overture, "In the South," and Glazounoff's symphony in B flat major, No. 5, but there had also been announced Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor, for violin, No. 3, op. 61, with Mr. Timothee Adamowski as the soloist, and a large number of people no doubt went with the anticipation of hearing that excellent performer in a composition which would have given him splendid scope for all his skill. Mr. Adamowski was, however, not in the city, being sick in Boston with the "grippe," and so Henirich Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, volunteered to play a concerto by Galtermann, which he did, proving to the audience that he was a finished artist in the handling of his instrument, bringing out unexpected effects and showing its extensive range. He held the attention of the audience by his skillful playing and received long and emphatic applause at its conclusion so that he responded to an encore.

The work of the orchestra was of the high standard of excellence that has been observed for many years, and the new conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, had his force absolutely under control. The Elgar overture was produced at Covent Garden in March, 1904, and is supposed to suggest the joy of living in a balmy climate under sunny skies, and while much is stirring and joyous there is a note of sadness that seems cold, but which is replaced later on, and the ending is in harmony with the beginning.

The Russian symphony was first presented in St. Petersburg in 1895, and sprung at once into public favor. The last movement is by far the most interesting, and although this composition closed the program the applause was loud and prolonged.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y

THIRD BOSTON SYMPATHY CONCERT WITH NEW MUSIC

Melba to Sing in "Rigoletto" at Manhattan Opera House.

LECTURES ON "SALOME."

Mr. Watters' Musicales on Brooklyn Calendar—Local and Manhattan Concerts.

Two works new to Brooklyn appear on the programme of the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening. They are George Schumann's Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme and Jean Sibelius' first symphony in E minor. There will be no soloist.

Both of these men are most interesting personalities in modern music. Both of them are young, comparatively speaking and both of them modern. Schumann, who was born in 1866, in Konigstein, is the conductor of the Singakademie of Berlin. He comes of a musical family, his father having been a conductor and his grandfather a cantor. His teachers were C. A. Fisher, Rollfuss and Beaumfelder, of Dresden, and Jadassohn, Reinecke and Zwintscher, of Leipsic. In Leipsic he won the Beethoven prize in 1887. From '91 to '96 he was the conductor of the Gesangverein of Dantzig and from '96 to 1900 he was the conductor of the Philharmonic of Bremen. Thence he went to his present post in Berlin. He has written two symphonies, several large orchestra and orchestral and choral works, as well as chamber music and songs.

Jean Sibelius is the representative composer of Finland. He has written two symphonies and several orchestra poems on national epic themes. He is a man of great talent and his works have been having a very considerable vogue in Europe. This first symphony was first played in this country at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston last Friday and Saturday, Jan. 4 to 5. The whole programme is as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala" (Goldmark); Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme, (George Schumann); Symphony No. 1, in E minor, (Sibelius).

Paper American
City Baltimore
Date State Md

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT LYRIC

Under the Direction of Dr. Karl Muck, the Musicians Render Fine Program.

Another large and fashionable audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of its third concert of this series last evening at the Lyric, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. The following fine program was given:

Goldmark—
Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13.
R. Volkmann—
Concerto in A minor, for Violoncello and Orchestra, Op. 33.
Glazounoff—
Symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, Op. 55.
I. Moderato maestoso; Allegro.
II. Scherzo: Moderato; Pochissimo meno mosso.
III. Andante.
IV. Allegro maestoso.

The Goldmask overture to Sakuntala and the Volkmann concerto for violincello and orchestra are both familiar to Baltimore lovers of music, as the overture has been played several times here by the Barton Symphony Orchestra, and the Volkmann concerto was a favorite work at the former Peabody concerts, where it was frequently given with the Peabody Orchestra by the late Rudolph Green, one of the cellists of the orchestra. Mr. Warnke gave the solo part of the concerto a fine rendition and was indorsed by several recalls by the audience.

The great novelty of the evening was the magnificent Glazonnoff symphony by a Russian composer still living, and one of the best. When Anton Rubinstein was in this country he said to a young lady who sang some and giggled much: "When you have suffered you will understand music." That was years ago, but she has not forgotten it. The Russians are musical, partly because, like all the dwellers in the high north latitudes, they have suffered much. It is impossible to live in Russia, Finland, Sweden, Norway or Iceland without feeling the climatic asperities of nature.

The rendition of the above great symphony in the way that it was given last evening was another musical revelation for Baltimore and a most decided additional triumph for Dr. Merck.

...STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
...ONDAY, JANUARY 7, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES FOR HALF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mme. Nordica's Recital and the Longy Club's New Music—The Distinctive Note and Merit of Mr. Sothern's Hamlet as He Now Shapes It—Three Months of the Endowed Theatre in Chicago—News of the Day

Dr. Muck completed on Saturday night the third group of Symphony concerts for the current musical year. The particular concert was the eleventh in the series. Two weeks hence comes the twelfth, the programme for which is already announced. Thus, it is possible and interesting to tabulate the compositions that Dr. Muck has chosen for half his term of service here. The list runs as follows, with those that were played under Mr. Gericke last year marked with a star:

Symphonies — Beethoven, No. 5* and No. 7; Brahms, No. 1; Bruckner, No. 7 (first time in twenty years); Haydn, G major; Glazounoff, No. 5 (first time); Mozart, "Jupiter;"* Sibelius, No. 1 (first time); Sinding, D minor (first time in six years); Schumann, No. 1;* Schubert, "Unfinished,"* C major.*

Overtures and Preludes—Beethoven, "Leonore," No. 3, "Egmont;"* Elgar, "In the South;"* Goldmark, "Sakuntala;"* Mendelssohn, "Midsummer Night's Dream;" Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Betrothed of the Czar;" Wagner, "A Faust Overture," "Die Meistersinger," "Rienzi;" Weber, "Der Freischütz,"* "Oberon."

Miscellaneous Pieces—Bach, Suite for Flute and Strings; Berlioz, Dances and March from "The Damnation of Faust;" Brahms, "St. Anthony" Variations; Chadwick, "Cleopatra" (first time); Liszt, "Shepherd's Song" (first time) and "March of the Kings" from "Christus;" G. Schumann, Variations and Double Fugue (first time); Strauss, "Don Juan;" Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl."

Concertos—Beethoven, G major for Piano; Chopin, E minor for Piano; Grieg, A minor for Piano;* Liszt, E-flat major for Piano;* Spohr, D minor for Violin; Strube, F-sharp minor for Violin;* Tschaikowski, D major, for Violin; Volkmann, A minor for 'Cello.

Thus, through the first half of the concerts—a time in which a new conductor must necessarily be feeling his way—Dr. Muck has played two new symphonies, and, had the parts been obtainable he would have played a third by the Pole, Stojowski. He has further revived a symphony by Bruckner, which to all intents and purposes was new, and few hearers could have had a lively recollection, after six years, of Sinding's symphony. Each of these four symphonies, moreover, was well worth performance; Sibelius's and Bruckner's in particular were genuinely notable; and Glazounoff's was at least pleasant musical entertainment. Dr. Muck has indeed shown his preference for the composers of the North in his choice of new symphonies, but are there any in Germany or Austria, except Mahler's, that cry for hearing here; and have we not, and recently, had those of every symphonic writer in France, except Magnard's. Nor have we heard of any symphony by an American that has lain in a neglected packet on Dr. Muck's cold doorstep. As for the classics, the conductor's range has been wide and the results in the case of Brahms's first symphony and Beethoven's seventh remarkable.

With overtures, Dr. Muck is making no such quest for new music as Mr. Gericke used to pursue. Only one of the eleven, Elgar's "In the South" (and possibly Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Betrothed of the Czar") had any flavor of novelty. On the other hand, new or unfamiliar overtures that are interesting are hard to find, and a strange conductor may reasonably test himself and quicken his audiences, as Dr. Muck has done, with his performances of the classics. Three new compositions stand in the list of miscellaneous pieces—Chadwick's tone-poem, Georg Schumann's variations, and the trifle from Liszt. Schumann's music was amusing and Chadwick's was interesting; but no striking new composition appears in this category of Dr. Muck's programmes. The tone-poem is the characteristic form of contemporary music; yet Dr. Muck has chosen but two such compositions. It is in these miscellaneous pieces that his view might have been more catholic and his choice more interesting.

In the arrangement of his programmes Dr. Muck has quietly pursued an individual bent. As some will have it, he is too fond of the severely classical order—overture, concerto, symphony or the reverse. Yet only six of the twelve programmes have been so arranged, and they have not been the less interesting. Apparently the conductor is disposed to make programmes of miscellaneous numbers by themselves (like that which carried Elgar's overture, Wagner's "Rienzi," Chadwick's tone-poem and Schumann's variations) and other programmes which cling to the three classical forms. Often there has been a clear purpose running through a programme, like the grouping of the music of a particular period, spirit or race. Again, as in the more miscellaneous lists there has been seemingly no other guide than personal idiosyncrasy or some cryptic point of view. Liking for Dr. Muck's programmes seems equally a matter of personal taste. There are many among his hearers that welcome a concert that sustains a single mood or that consists of music of a particular sort. There are others—and they are not few—who like better a programme that mingles many kinds. Other voices find some of Dr. Muck's programmes too rigid, and yet in the next breath complain that his more miscellaneous lists are a hodge-podge. Perhaps these very differences of opinion prove the interest of the programmes as a whole; surely if he had not made them individual he would have been quickly chidden as one who travels easily in a well-worn rut. Wisely, Dr. Muck has pursued his own way. It is his right to do so, and it is also one of the causes of the interest [illegible] in him. In the child's rhyme [illegible] not the man [illegible]

...JANUARY 7, 19...

THE SYMPHONY CONCE...

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark. "Sakuntala" Overture.
Volkmann. Violoncello Concerto, in A.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Sibelius. Symphony in E minor, No. 1.

The Sakuntala Overture wears well. have had it many times at the symphon concerts but familiarity in this case only breeds increased pleasure. Its orchestration is masterly, its melodies beautiful and well worked up. When Goldmark is viewed in the perspective of Time, it is possible that posterity will grade him higher than his own contemporaries have done, for the world at present does not admit him to the ranks of absolutely great tonal masters.

Dr. Muck's reading was a fine one. He drew out the slow passages in his accustomed manner. If one were to time his overture readings it would be found that in almost every case his deliberation adds two or three minutes to the acoustomed length of a long movement. But he makes his contrasts very effectively and his climaxes are always effective. The final working up of the principal themes in this overture (representing the two lovers) was superb and there was much enthusiasm manifested. Therefore even the mannerism alluded to is not often to be considered a defect. The end justifies the means.

Volkmann's violoncello concerto is genteel, and Mr. Warnke's performance of it was politeness itself. We admire Volkmann's two symphonies and his "Richard III." overture (in spite of his introducing a Scottish song on an English battle-field and a century before the tune was composed!) but this concerto, for all that it contains some pretty tunes and an enormous amount of technique, is too prolix and too conventional for even the modern conservative. There is very much recitative in the composition, but none of that inspired kind which one finds in the first movement of Bruch's G minor violin concerto. There was frequent dialogue between the solo instrument and one or the other of its orchestral fellows, but it scarcely ever rose above a gossiping level. Sentimental melodies were often revealed, but, while we do not hold with the modern attempts at the abolition of melody, we cannot believe that mere tune constitutes music.

The final cadenza was fearfully long-winded, although it contained almost every kind of violoncello technique. There were harmonics, which Mr. Warnke played with praiseworthy surety; there was pizzicato work; there were many runs and difficult skips; and there was an enormous amount of double-stopping, which Mr. Warnke gave with commendable purity of intonation. In short the technical display was of a very high order, but one does not always crave such instrumental polish. The hungry man in the desert who found a bag of pearls devoutly wished that they had been nuts instead.

Mr. Warnke has not a very large tone, but it is always pure and often sympathetic. His masterly technique certainly deserved the three recalls which were given to him at the end of the concerto.

After this the programme came to its Finnish with the first symphony of Sibelius. The sceptre of orchestral supremacy (when Richard Strauss has ended) will probably depart northward. Russians, Norwegians and Finns seem to have something to say, while Germans and Frenchmen are spending their lives in the search of unusual modulations and new dissonances. At the very beginning of this work there was a clarinette passage (beautifully played) that had something of the loneliness that is found upon the same instrument in Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. There was much gloom in the entire work, but the chief theme in this opening Allegro was remarkably powerful and masculine. The muted horns gave their portentous note of evil and there was mystery and brooding in almost every theme. There were also some very vivid contrasts, a la Mahler, but the thematic material was much more inspired than that of the German. There was a grand climax, legitimately derived from the figures that had preceded, and a sudden pizzicato brought the noble movement to an end. Dr. Muck deserves hearty praise for the clearness with which he presented this allegro.

The Andante was less coherent than the preceding movement. There was some interesting canonic work on the wood wind and an excess of sequence work in all the instruments. There was a tiresome degree of lamenting, even in the major keys.

The Scherzo, however, was once more in the domain of hearty virility, and its unrestrained vigor was eminently suggestive of the sturdy North. It combined the brusquerie of the Halling with the strong rhythm of the Spring-Tanz. There was a charming contrast in the Trio, with its horn phrases, while the return of the Scherzo was emphasized even by the kettle-drums which struck the rhythmic figure with splendid effect. Even this humble member of the orchestra had its obbligato and the kettle-drummer must receive a word of recognition for his incisive performance.

The Finale had many points of derivation from preceding movements. Beethoven began this transference of themes from movement to movement in his ninth symphony, but Brahms went far beyond him in this kind of continuity and it has become almost a regular factor in modern symphonic construction.

There was decided unrest in this movement and finally a rush as of a mountain torrent. There were many touches of instrumentation in the depth of the wind-instruments in the vein of Tschaikowsky, the bass-drum added its thumps to the marking of the rhythm and the work ran with frenzied power through the most fortissimo phrases to a very soft pizzicato, where it unexpectedly stopped short. We recognized a sure hand in the construction of this movement, although one may not be able to grasp the full meaning of its contents at a first hearing. We consider the first and third movements the best of the symphony. We cannot pay too much tribute to Dr. Muck's careful and conscientious interpretation. In lesser hands the work would scarcely have made any effect.

Louis C. Elson.

SIBELIUS PLAYS A FINNISH WORK

Sibelius' Music Makes Profound Impression with Vigorous Character.

PICTURES STRUGGLE AND SHOCK OF BATTLE

Orchestra's Brilliant Performance of Goldmark's "Sakuntula" Overture.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the 11th Symphony concert, Dr. Muck, conductor, in Symphony Hall last night was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Concerto in A minor for 'cello.....Volkmann
Mr. Warnke, 'cellist.
Symphony No. 1 in E minor.....Sibelius
(First time in Boston.)

The orchestral pieces played last night could not have been in sharper contrast, as far as mood and color were concerned. Goldmark's lush and sultry overture reminds one of

Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit,
And perfume the swart kings treat underfoot,
For pleasure when their minds wax amorous,
Charred frankincense and crested sandalroot.

The symphony by Sibelius is of his country. It is music that suggests desolate moors, storm-swept pines, wild voices heard by lonely wanderers far from any dwelling place of man, angry defiance, shock of battle. If there be a moment of gayety, it is rough rollicking and knives are quickly drawn. There is little thought of woman or of love in this savage music. The gentler passages are those of low lamentation, or the quieter moments are mutterings, "ancestral voices prophesying war."

The second symphony of Sibelius has been played here at a Symphony concert. It is a gray, forbidding work, but it has not the elemental strength, the volcanic spontaneity of the first. It is more prudently, more discreetly written. It is also less effective.

The themes of the symphony played last night are striking in form and character. Take the chief theme of the first movement, for example, that of the Scherzo and that of its contrasting section; or the second chief theme of the finale. These melodies are of the soil, yet they are not folk tunes. They are something nearer and farther than folk tunes; they are typical of the spirit and the feelings of the Finns; they have epic proportions; they are charged with imagination. Their rugged independence is defiance even now when Finland is subject to Russia. The wonder is that a man who writes this revolutionary music should be granted a stipend by the government.

Fortunate in his invention of themes, Sibelius impresses by his heroic treatment of them. The elaboration is an enlargement of the spirit as of the letter. There are no incongruous digressions. There are no halting places in the allegros for rest and meditation. In the first movement after the opening melancholy tune for the clarinet, a tune which in the finale becomes superbly tragical, the excitement is constantly at fever heat. The harmonic pungency or strangeness, the instrumentation which is often forcible with a force that approaches brutality, often fantastical to the verge of wildness, often overwhelmingly sonorous as is nature's instrumentation of a tempest—these add to the effect and make it irresistible. The music might be dismissed as grim, austere, granitic. It is all this, but it is more than this. The voices of Northern Nature, fierce and melancholy voices of hyperboreans, are heard. Seldom has modern music such a direct and overpowering speech.

The performance of the overture was one of unusual euphony and brilliance and the coda with the blend of the two chief themes was delivered with a proud sonority that became the exultation of the united lovers. Dr. Muck's interpretation of the symphony was even more triumphant in its appreciation of the vital elements; its spirit now of bodement and now of defiant action, now of virile melancholy and now of joy in a hopeless struggle; in its suggestion of wild landscapes; in its intensity of primaeval feeling.

Between these works was the concerto of Volkmann, which voices the melancholy of a shy and broken man. It is not a work of much distinction; in truth, the music is often peevish, often tiresome. Mr. Warnke did little to give it a fictitious value. He played in an amiable manner; he took a commendably cheerful view of the situation; but his performance was below his own standard.

It may be added that few cello concertos are worth the labor of preparation or repay the respectful attention of the hearer. It is the custom for the solo cellist of the Orchestra, whoever he may be, to play annually a concerto. There was a time when oboe, clarinet, and horn concertos were frequently heard in orchestral concerts. They have disappeared from Symphony programmes. Fifty years from now a cello concerto may be used only for the practice of pupils or for the best in competitive examination.

Paper Post
City Washington
Date JAN - 9 1907 State D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DRAWS.

Fashionable Audience Hear High-class Music by Artists.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city took place at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, every seat in the house being taken, and practically all of the standing room occupied.

The orchestra has been facing a series of mishaps. Dr. Muck was unable to conduct the rehearsal and concert of the orchestra in Boston on December 28 and 29. The soloist on that occasion was Timothee Adamowski. Yesterday Dr. Muck had recovered from his cold and was at the conductor's desk, but Mr. Adamowski was too ill to play, and was replaced by the 'cellist, Heinrich Warnke, who gave Goltermann's concerto. The remainder of the programme was devoted to Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony and Elgar's overture, "In the South."

By far the most interesting number of the afternoon was the Glazounoff symphony. In its last movement marched wild defiance of conventional rhythm and accent, where syncopation crowded upon syncopation and lawlessness ran rampant. The second movement, "Scherzo," was full of sparkle and the bright quiver of sunbeams upon a flower garden. It was too honeyed and fragile a taste for longevity, but was a fascinating episode while it lasted. The "Andante" was not remarkable for any unusual expression excepting that of a quiet, meditative loveliness.

It is said that the Elgar overture was conceived on a glorious spring day in the Valley of Andora, and that it is meant to suggest the joy of living in a balmy climate under sunny skies; and yet nearly half of it sounded frigid. So much for the accuracy of music as a language. There was something about the earlier measures of the work that reminded one of the cold, dreary winter scene in Puccini's "La Boheme," where the snow is falling and all is chilliness and desolation. Aside from the descriptive power of the music, it was an interesting example of Elgar's style, and there has been heard too little of that celebrated Britisher in Washington.

The Goltermann concerto was perhaps the least interesting work on the programme. There are moments in this composition where the music seems to go round and round without ever reaching the point of its remarks. Mr. Warnke played admirably, and Dr. Muck was never more active in the pursuit of perfection.

Mrs. Roosevelt entertained a box party and several leading society women and musicians were noticeable in the boxes and the audience.

Paper World
City New York
Date JAN 7 1907 State N Y

SYMPHONY CONCERT TRIUMPH FOR MUCK.

Conductor Wins Audience by Masterful Reading of Beethoven Programme.

Dr. Karl Muck, at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall last night, gave another convincing exhibition of his mastery as a conductor. He led a programme that was confined to three numbers and was devoted entirely to Beethoven, and he succeeded in bringing the audience to their feet and to his feet by his stunning reading of Beethoven's seventh symphony, the "Dance Symphony," as it has been called.

It was a revelation to the music lovers of this community, who hear a great deal of cut-and-dried Beethoven playing, relieved at times by some excitable, over-accentuated interpretations that are more pernicious in their artistic effects even than the pedantic versions of the works of this master. There was not an uninteresting moment in the entire work, as Dr. Muck conducted it, and the closing section of the last movement was almost frenzied in its whirling dancing spirit. In contrast to these the lovely allegretto was tenderly treated, and the entire reading was sufficient to stamp this conductor as great among great conductors.

The audience expressed its appreciation in no uncertain manner, and the enthusiasm was justly provoked. The "Egmont" overture was played with a great deal of dramatic force and the joyous finale was rousingly read.

The weakest part of the evening was the solo playing of Willy Hess, concertmaster, who performed Beethoven's famous violin concerto. He was evidently very nervous and his intonation was not above reproach.

Boston Transcript
324 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.
MONDAY, JANUARY 7, 1907.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES FOR HALF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mme. Nordica's Recital and the Longy Club's New Music—The Distinctive Note and Merit of Mr. Sothern's Hamlet as He Now Shapes It—Three Months of the Endowed Theatre in Chicago—News of the Day

Dr. Muck completed on Saturday night the third group of Symphony concerts for the current musical year. The particular concert was the eleventh in the series. Two weeks hence comes the twelfth, the programme for which is already announced. Thus, it is possible and interesting to tabulate the compositions that Dr. Muck has chosen for half his term of service here. The list runs as follows, with those that were played under Mr. Gericke last year marked with a star:

Symphonies — Beethoven, No. 5* and No. 7; Brahms, No. 1; Bruckner, No. 7 (first time in twenty years); Haydn, G major; Glazounoff, No. 5 (first time); Mozart, "Jupiter;"* Sibelius, No. 1 (first time); Sinding, D minor (first time in six years); Schumann, No. 1;* Schubert, "Unfinished,"* C major.*

Overtures and Preludes—Beethoven, "Leonore," No. 3, "Egmont;"* Elgar, "In the South;"* Goldmark, "Sakuntala;"* Mendelssohn, "Midsummer Night's Dream;" Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Betrothed of the Czar;" Wagner, "A Faust Overture," "Die Meistersinger," "Rienzi;" Weber, "Der Freischütz,"* "Oberon."

Miscellaneous Pieces—Bach, Suite for Flute and Strings; Berlioz, Dances and March from "The Damnation of Faust;" Brahms, "St. Anthony" Variations; Chadwick, "Cleopatra" (first time); Liszt, "Shepherd's Song" (first time) and "March of the Kings" from "Christus;" G. Schumann, Variations and Double Fugue (first time); Strauss, "Don Juan;" Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl."

Concertos—Beethoven, G major for Piano; Chopin, E minor for Piano; Grieg, A minor for Piano;* Liszt, E-flat major for Piano;* Spohr, D minor for Violin; Strube, F-sharp minor for Violin;* Tschaikovski, D major, for Violin; Volkmann, A minor for 'Cello.

Thus, through the first half of the concerts—a time in which a new conductor must necessarily be feeling his way—Dr. Muck has played two new symphonies, and, had the parts been obtainable he would have played a third by the Pole, Stojowski. He has further revived a symphony by Bruckner, which to all intents and purposes was new, and few hearers could have had a lively recollection, after six years, of Sinding's symphony. Each of these four symphonies, moreover, was well worth performance; Sibelius's and Bruckner's in particular were genuinely notable; and Glazounoff's was at least pleasant musical entertainment. Dr. Muck has indeed shown his preference for the composers of the North in his choice of new symphonies, but are there any in Germany or Austria, except Mahler's, that cry for hearing here; and have we not, and recently, had those of every symphonic writer in France, except Magnard's. Nor have we heard of any symphony by an American that has lain in a neglected packet on Dr. Muck's cold doorstep. As for the classics, the conductor's range has been wide and the results in the case of Brahms's first symphony and Beethoven's seventh remarkable.

With overtures, Dr. Muck is making no such quest for new music as Mr. Gericke used to pursue. Only one of the eleven, Elgar's "In the South" (and possibly Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Betrothed of the Czar") had any flavor of novelty. On the other hand, new or unfamiliar overtures that are interesting are hard to find, and a strange conductor may reasonably test himself and quicken his audiences, as Dr. Muck has done, with his performances of the classics. Three new compositions stand in the list of miscellaneous pieces—Chadwick's tone-poem, Georg Schumann's variations, and the trifle from Liszt. Schumann's music was amusing and Chadwick's was interesting; but no striking new composition appears in this category of Dr. Muck's programmes. The tone-poem is the characteristic form of contemporary music; yet Dr. Muck has chosen but two such compositions. It is in these miscellaneous pieces that his view might have been more catholic and his choice more interesting.

In the arrangement of his programmes Dr. Muck has quietly pursued an individual bent. As some will have it, he is too fond of the severely classical order—overture, concerto, symphony or the reverse. Yet only six of the twelve programmes have been so arranged, and they have not been the less interesting. Apparently the conductor is disposed to make programmes of miscellaneous numbers by themselves (like that which carried Elgar's overture, Wagner's "Rienzi," Chadwick's tone-poem and Schumann's variations) and other programmes which cling to the three classical forms. Often there has been a clear purpose running through a programme, like the grouping of the music of a particular period, spirit or race. Again, as in the more miscellaneous lists there has been seemingly no other guide than personal idiosyncrasy or some cryptic point of view. Liking for Dr. Muck's programmes seems equally a matter of personal taste. There are many among his hearers that welcome a concert that sustains a single mood or that consists of music of a particular sort. There are others—and they are not few—who like better a programme that mingles many kinds. Other voices find some of Dr. Muck's programmes too rigid, and yet in the next breath complain that his more miscellaneous lists are a hodge-podge. Perhaps these very differences of opinion prove the interest of the programmes as a whole; surely if he had not made them individual he would have been quickly chidden as one who travels easily in a well-worn rut. Wisely, Dr. Muck has pursued his own way. It is his right to do so, and it is also one of the causes of the interest of his public in him. In the child's rhyme it was the man that took everyone's advice that fell into difficulties—not the man who held to his own course.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
JANUARY 7, 19

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark. "Sakuntala" Overture.
Volkmann. Violoncello Concerto, in A
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Sibelius. Symphony in E minor, No. 1.

The Sakuntala Overture wears well. have had it many times at the symphony concerts but familiarity in this case only breeds increased pleasure. Its orchestration is masterly, its melodies beautiful and well worked up. When Goldmark is viewed in the perspective of Time, it is possible that posterity will grade him higher than his own contemporaries have done, for the world at present does not admit him to the ranks of absolutely great tonal masters.

Dr. Muck's reading was a fine one. He drew out the slow passages in his accustomed manner. If one were to time his overture readings it would be found that in almost every case his deliberation adds two or three minutes to the accustomed length of a long movement. But he makes his contrasts very effectively and his climaxes are always effective. The final working up of the principal themes in this overture (representing the two lovers) was superb and there was much enthusiasm manifested. Therefore even the mannerism alluded to is not often to be considered a defect. The end justifies the means.

Volkmann's violoncello concerto is genteel, and Mr. Warnke's performance of it was politeness itself. We admire Volkmann's two symphonies and his "Richard III." overture (in spite of his introducing a Scottish song on an English battle-field and a century before the tune was composed!) but this concerto, for all that it contains some pretty tunes and an enormous amount of technique, is too prolix and too conventional for even the modern conservative. There is very much recitative in the composition, but none of that inspired kind which one finds in the first movement of Bruch's G minor violin concerto. There was frequent dialogue between the solo instrument and one or the other of its orchestral fellows, but it scarcely ever rose above a gossiping level. Sentimental melodies were often revealed, but, while we do not hold with the modern attempts at the abolition of melody, we cannot believe that mere tune constitutes music.

The final cadenza was fearfully long-winded, although it contained almost every kind of violoncello technique. There were harmonics, which Mr. Warnke played with praiseworthy surety; there was pizzicato work; there were many runs and difficult skips; and there was an enormous amount of double-stopping, which Mr. Warnke gave with commendable purity of intonation. In short the technical display was of a very high order, but one does not always crave such instrumental polish. The hungry man in the desert who found a bag of pearls devoutly wished that they had been nuts instead.

Mr. Warnke has not a very large tone, but it is always pure and often sympathetic. His masterly technique certainly deserved the three recalls which were given to him at the end of the concerto.

After this the programme came to its Finnish with the first symphony of Sibelius. The sceptre of orchestral supremacy (when Richard Strauss has ended) will probably depart northward. Russians, Norwegians and Finns seem to have something to say, while Germans and Frenchmen are spending their lives in the search of unusual modulations and new dissonances. At the very beginning of this work there was a clarinette passage (beautifully played) that had something of the loneliness that is found upon the same instrument in Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. There was much gloom in the entire work, but the chief theme in this opening Allegro was remarkably powerful and masculine. The muted horns gave their portentous note of evil and there was mystery and brooding in almost every theme. There were also some very vivid contrasts, a la Mahler, but the thematic material was much more inspired than that of the German. There was a grand climax, legitimately derived from the figures that had preceded, and a sudden pizzicato brought the noble movement to an end. Dr. Muck deserves hearty praise for the clearness with which he presented this allegro.

The Andante was less coherent than the preceding movement. There was some interesting canonic work on the wood wind and an excess of sequence work in all the instruments. There was a tiresome degree of lamenting, even in the major keys.

The Scherzo, however, was once more in the domain of hearty virility, and its unrestrained vigor was eminently suggestive of the sturdy North. It combined the brusquerie of the Halling with the strong rhythm of the Spring-Tanz. There was a charming contrast in the Trio, with its horn phrases, while the return of the Scherzo was emphasized even by the kettle-drums which struck the rhythmic figure with splendid effect. Even this humble member of the orchestra had its obbligato and the kettle-drummer must receive a word of recognition for his incisive performance.

The Finale had many points of derivation from preceding movements. Beethoven began this transference of themes from movement to movement in his ninth symphony, but Brahms went far beyond him in this kind of continuity and it has become almost a regular factor in modern symphonic construction.

There was decided unrest in this movement and finally a rush as of a mountain torrent. There were many touches of instrumentation in the depth of the wind-instruments in the vein of Tschaikowsky, the bass-drum added its thumps to the marking of the rhythm and the work ran with frenzied power through the most fortissimo phrases to a very soft pizzicato, where it unexpectedly stopped short. We recognized a sure hand in the construction of this movement, although one may not be able to grasp the full meaning of its contents at a first hearing. We consider the first and third movements the best of the symphony. We cannot pay too much tribute to Dr. Muck's careful and conscientious interpretation. In lesser hands the work would scarcely have made any effect.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD
JANUARY 6, 1907.

SYMPHONY PLAYS A FINNISH WORK

Sibelius' Music Makes Profound Impression with Vigorous Character.

PICTURES STRUGGLE AND SHOCK OF BATTLE

Orchestra's Brilliant Performance of Goldmark's "Sakuntula" Overture.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the 11th Symphony concert, Dr. Muck, conductor, in Symphony Hall last night was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Concerto in A minor for 'cello.....Volkmann
Mr. Warnke, 'cellist.
Symphony No. 1 in E minor.....Sibelius
(First time in Boston.)

The orchestral pieces played last night could not have been in sharper contrast, as far as mood and color were concerned. Goldmark's lush and sultry overture reminds one of

Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit
And perfume the swart kings treat underfoot
For pleasure when their minds wax amorous,
Charred frankincense and grated sandalroot.

The symphony by Sibelius is of his country. It is music that suggests desolate moors, storm-swept pines, wild voices heard by lonely wanderers far from any dwelling place of man, angry defiance, shock of battle. If there be a moment of gayety, it is rough rollicking and knives are quickly drawn. There is little thought of woman or of love in this savage music. The gentler passages are those of low lamentation, or the quieter moments are mutterings, "ancestral voices prophesying war."

The second symphony of Sibelius has been played here at a Symphony concert. It is a gray, forbidding work, but it has not the elemental strength, the volcanic spontaneity of the first. It is more prudently, more discreetly written. It is also less effective.

The themes of the symphony played last night are striking in form and character. Take the chief theme of the first movement, for example, that of the Scherzo and that of its contrasting section; or the second chief theme of the finale. These melodies are of the soil, yet they are not folk tunes. They are something nearer and farther than folk tunes; they are typical of the spirit and the feelings of the Finns; they have epic proportions; they are charged with imagination. Their rugged independence is defiance even now when Finland is subject to Russia. The wonder is that a man who writes this revolutionary music should be granted a stipend by the government.

Fortunate in his invention of themes, Sibelius impresses by his heroic treatment of them. The elaboration is an enlargement of the spirit as of the letter. There are no incongruous digressions. There are no halting places in the allegros for rest and meditation. In the first movement after the opening melancholy tune for the clarinet, a tune which in the finale becomes superbly tragical, the excitement is constantly at fever heat. The harmonic pungency or strangeness, the instrumentation which is often forcible with a force that approaches brutality, often fantastical to the verge of wildness, often overwhelmingly sonorous as is nature's instrumentation of a tempest—these add to the effect and make it irresistible. The music might be dismissed as grim, austere, granitic. It is all this, but it is more than this. The voices of Northern Nature, fierce and melancholy voices of hyperboreans, are heard. Seldom has modern music such a direct and overpowering speech.

The performance of the overture was one of unusual euphony and brilliance and the coda with the blend of the two chief themes was delivered with a proud sonority that became the exultation of the united lovers. Dr. Muck's interpretation of the symphony was even more triumphant in its appreciation of the vital elements; its spirit now of bodement and now of defiant action, now of virile melancholy and now of joy in a hopeless struggle; in its suggestion of wild landscapes; in its intensity of primaeval feeling.

Between these works was the concerts of Volkmann, which voices the melancholy of a shy and broken man. It is not a work of much distinction; in truth, the music is often peevish, often tiresome. Mr. Warnke did little to give it a fictitious value. He played in an amiable manner; he took a commendably cheerful view of the situation; but his performance was below his own standard.

It may be added that few cello concertos are worth the labor of preparation or repay the respectful attention of the hearer. It is the custom for the solo cellist of the Orchestra, whoever he may be, to play annually a concerto. There was a time when oboe, clarinet, and horn concertos were frequently heard in orchestral concerts. They have disappeared from Symphony programmes. Fifty years from now a cello concerto may be used only for the practice of pupils or for the best in competitive examination.

Paper Post
City Washington
Date State D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DRAWS.

Fashionable Audience Hear High-class Music by Artists.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city took place at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, every seat in the house being taken, and practically all of the standing room occupied.

The orchestra has been facing a series of mishaps. Dr. Muck was unable to conduct the rehearsal and concert of the orchestra in Boston on December 28 and 29. The soloist on that occasion was Timothee Adamowski. Yesterday Dr. Muck had recovered from his cold and was at the conductor's desk, but Mr. Adamowski was too ill to play, and was replaced by the 'cellist, Heinrich Warnke, who gave Goltermann's concerto. The remainder of the programme was devoted to Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony and Elgar's overture, "In the South."

By far the most interesting number of the afternoon was the Glazounoff symphony. In its last movement marched wild defiance of conventional rhythm and accent, where syncopation crowded upon syncopation and lawlessness ran rampant. The second movement, "Scherzo," was full of sparkle and the bright quiver of sunbeams upon a flower garden. It was too honeyed and fragile a taste for longevity, but was a fascinating episode while it lasted. The "Andante" was not remarkable for any unusual expression excepting that of a quiet, meditative loveliness.

It is said that the Elgar overture was conceived on a glorious spring day in the Valley of Andora, and that it is meant to suggest the joy of living in a balmy climate under sunny skies; and yet nearly half of it sounded frigid. So much for the accuracy of music as a language. There was something about the earlier measures of the work that reminded one of the cold, dreary winter scene in Puccini's "La Boheme," where the snow is falling and all is chilliness and desolation. Aside from the descriptive power of the music, it was an interesting example of Elgar's style, and there has been heard too little of that celebrated Britisher in Washington.

The Goltermann concerto was perhaps the least interesting work on the programme. There are moments in this composition where the music seems to go round and round without ever reaching the point of its remarks. Mr. Warnke played admirably, and Dr. Muck was never more active in the pursuit of perfection.

Mrs. Roosevelt entertained a box party and several leading society women and musicians were noticeable in the boxes and the audience.

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y

SYMPHONY CONCERT TRIUMPH FOR MUCK.

Conductor Wins Audience by Masterful Reading of Beethoven Programme.

Dr. Karl Muck, at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall last night, gave another convincing exhibition of his mastery as a conductor. He led a programme that was confined to three numbers and was devoted entirely to Beethoven, and he succeeded in bringing the audience to their feet and to his feet by this stunning reading of Beethoven's seventh symphony, the "Dance Symphony," as it has been called.

It was a revelation to the music lovers of this community, who hear a great deal of cut-and-dried Beethoven playing, relieved at times by some excitable, over-accentuated interpretations that are more pernicious in their artistic effects even than the pedantic versions of the works of this master. There was not an uninteresting moment in the entire work, as Dr. Muck conducted it, and the closing section of the last movement was almost frenzied in its whirling dancing spirit. In contrast to these the lovely allegretto was tenderly treated, and the entire reading was sufficient to stamp this conductor as great among great conductors.

The audience expressed its appreciation in no uncertain manner, and the enthusiasm was justly provoked. The "Egmont" overture was played with a great deal of dramatic force and the joyous finale was rousingly read.

The weakest part of the evening was the solo playing of Willy Hess, concertmaster, who performed Beethoven's famous violin concerto. He was evidently very nervous and his intonation was not above reproach.

[11]

Paper Sun
City New York
Date JAN 1 1907 State N Y

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of Beethoven Music Performed Extremely Well.

Beethoven did not have a birthday yesterday. Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented a programme composed entirely of Beethoven music at Carnegie Hall last night, apparently for no reason except that he believes in music of this kind and thinks the public ought to hear it often. A good many other old fashioned lovers of all that is lofty, chaste and noble in art are likely to agree with him. At any rate, an audience of large size last evening paid to Beethoven, Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra a compliment so marked and so unusual that it cannot be passed without record.

The final number on the programme was the beautiful seventh symphony and despite the fact that many people are in the habit of beginning to leave all concerts before the last movement all remained seated until the music was finished. This testimonial followed a burst of genuine enthusiasm after the performance of the scherzo of the symphony.

The tribute was all the more notable because the audience had begun the evening evidently in a state of apathy, which was not disturbed by the exceedingly quiet and smooth interpretation of the "Egmont" overture, with which the programme opened. The overture was well played, but the repose and refinement of its treatment went to the extreme limit of continence and in a community which has of late been leading a somewhat strenuous musical life something more thrilling was needed to evoke warm approbation.

The second number was the violin concerto, the solo performer being Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra. This artist demonstrated that he can play better than he too often does, for his delivery of Beethoven's music, though cast in a small mould, had dignity, sincerity and musicianship to commend it. In the second movement the player was especially happy, for here his tone was singularly sweet and pure and his cantilena round, smooth and expressive.

The seventh symphony is one of the most perfectly balanced of all Beethoven's works and it is so clean cut in its rhythms and so ingratiating in its thematic matter that he would be a hard listener who could find no enjoyment in it. For last night's performance Dr. Muck doubled the wood wind, a practise which is by no means new and which in these days of numerous strings has much in its favor. Certainly last evening the results were good, for the tuttie were noticeably enriched without being made opaque.

Dr. Muck's reading was admirable in the matter of tempi, nuance and insight. It was especially praiseworthy for its delicacy and clarity. Everything was brought out, and yet nothing was overdone. In the scherzo the director went to the extreme of quiet manner in conducting, sometimes letting the orchestra travel through many measures without a beat. Perhaps there is something of pose in this as well as in extravagant gesture; but this has the undeniable merit of transferring public attention from the conductor to the well trained and self-reliant orchestra.

Paper Press
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 11 1907

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck Again Shows Greatness.

It was hardly possible for Dr. Muck to increase one's respect for his interpretative and directorial powers at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so great was the admiration in which he was already held. But he reinforced and strengthened one's estimate of his musical calibre, and probably augmented the number of his adherents, by conducting a programme devoted entirely to Beethoven in a manner that few other leaders, if any, could have surpassed—not excepting Weingartner.

Last night's programme contained the overture of "Egmont" (opus 84), the violin concerto (D major, opus 61) and the symphony in A major (No. 7, opus 92). Hess, the orchestra's concertmaster, was the soloist of the evening and received many recalls. But it cannot be said he was the "star" of the concert. Evidently the audience's attention was centred on the leader. His large share in bringing the violin concerto to a finished hearing had to be acknowledged.

But though Hess played the concerto excellently and the orchestra gave him an accompaniment which in restraint, refinement and flexibility could hardly have been surpassed, this was not the most impressive contribution of the evening. Whether the violinist's feelings were frozen by nervousness there was no way of telling. The fact remains that his performance, academically admirable, was emotionally gelid.

Muck's reading of the beautiful "Egmont" overture and the symphony was characterized by repose, rhythmical strength, an extremely fine sense of nuance, and, above all, by that poetic eloquence and sublimity of feeling (how well we knew it in Anton Seidl!) which defies analysis. New Yorkers probably have heard few performances of Beethoven's Seventh so finely balanced, so exquisitely finished, yet so alive and persuasive as one Muck and his incomparable orchestra gave last night.

Both in the Allegretto and in the Scherzo the conductor frequently let his men play unassisted by the beat of his baton, giving them only occasional signs, when he deemed them necessary. There is absolutely no reason for objecting to Muck's way of displaying the excellence of his orchestral ensemble. But ought not those who are everlastingly harping on Safonoff's "mannerisms" [illegible] in wrath and denounce the Boston conductor as a model [illegible]

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 11 1907

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Beethoven Programme at Their Concert Last Evening—Prof. Hess Soloist.

The third visit to New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place this week, and its first concert was given at Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme was devoted entirely to Beethoven's music, including but three numbers—the overture to "Egmont," the violin concerto, played by Mr. Hess, and the seventh symphony. And it was a programme that was listened to with evident delight by the audience. Dr. Muck may or may not plume himself upon his Beethoven "readings"; there is generally little evidence in his conducting that he plumes himself upon any of his achievements in front of his orchestra. But whether he does or not, it is evident that he penetrates to the real spirit of Beethoven's music and he reproduces for us that music charged with that spirit. To do this there is no need of looking for something that is not there, but to do it needs, as Mr. Weingartner has observed, a man of temperament and of talent. That Dr. Muck is such a man he has already shown, and he added a new demonstration of it in the performance that the orchestra gave under his direction last evening.

It was a sane, strong, dignified performance at every point; it was instinct with life, with the meaning and significance of each phrase, finely planned and developed with reference to the larger proportions of both the "Egmont" overture and the symphony. The latter was remarkable for its euphony and for the pointed expression that was given to the marked and entirely characteristic rhythms of each movement. How close the understanding is between Dr. Muck and his men was shown by the confidence that he placed in them in the last two movements of the symphony. For long stretches in the score he let them play without a beat from his stick, or with here and there only a sign. But this is only an indication of the players' familiarity with the music, and the thoroughness with which at rehearsals and previous performances they have imbued themselves with the conductor's intentions as to these movements. And in the ability to bring this about lies a strong conductor's real power; his eloquence does not reside in the end of his stick or the movements of his hands at the performance. It would not do to suggest that such a tour de force might or should become a rule; but there is a hint here as to the true authority of a conductor.

Prof. Hess played the concerto in a sincere and dignified manner, rather than with distinction or lofty eloquence. It was a musician's performance; Prof. Hess commanded the technical difficulties of the work and was generally secure in his intonation. But the greatest difficulties of it are not technical, but lie in its spirit. The cadenzas in the movements were Joachim's short but not remarkably happy insertions into a work where, notwithstanding the old custom and the composer's intentions and directions, any insertion by a strange hand seems an impertinence. In the transition from the slow movement to the final rondo, often not made at all as a transition, Prof. Hess used Laub's cadenza, which is more in the spirit of Beethoven's music than Joachim's. He was liberally applauded and several times recalled.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 11 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN CARNEGIE HALL

Beethoven Programme Presented by Dr. Karl Muck Delights Ultra-Conservatives, but Bores Radicals.

Dr. Karl Muck delighted the ultra-conservatives and bored a good many of the radicals in last night's Carnegie Hall audience by presenting an all Beethoven programme at the Boston Orchestra's third evening concert.

While it is true that opportunities are rare to hear such Beethoven playing as the Berlin conductor evoked from his virtuoso orchestra last night, still it seemed to many that this organization's visits to New York are too few to permit the making of programmes confined to a single school of composition, and there was some grumbling in the "waits" as a consequence.

Three numbers made up the evening's list. These were the "Egmont" overture, the D major violin concerto, in which Professor Willy Hess, the orchestra's concertmeister, appeared as the soloist, and the Seventh Symphony in A major, opus 72.

The impress of Dr. Muck's personality upon the orchestra has resulted in a tendency toward bigger and more virile tone by all the instruments, and this has been accomplished without a loss of that fine balance and high finish which have long been the most prized characteristics of the Boston organization.

The "Egmont" overture exemplified all this admirably last night. So, too, did the symphony. More satisfying interpretations of these familiar scores are difficult to recall. The new conductor's poise, his quiet eye, and his quiet but explicit baton obtained just the results he aimed at—nothing less, nor a shade more. The strings distinguished themselves.

Professor Hess gave the concerto a performance thoroughly commendable from an academic point of view, smooth in tone, especially polished in the slower passages. But this concerto has been given more interestingly before New York audiences. The violinist was applauded heartily.

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date JAN 11 1907 State N Y

The Boston Symphony in a

TO those who have listened to the bold outbursts of Russian music this season and the stridency of Puccini and his fellows, and who look forward to the impending Strauss opera, there was comfort and healing at the Boston Symphony concert last night in Carnegie Hall.

For this purpose Dr. Muck selected three of Beethoven's works, the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," opus 84; the violin concerto in D minor, opus 61, and the "Seventh Symphony," a very conservative programme.

As was to be expected, Dr. Muck gave honest, straightforward readings of both the Overture and the Symphony. There is a wonderful repose about this sterling conductor. Last night he indulged in no individualistic tricks, displayed no irritating vagaries.

Under his restrained yet potent baton the themes of the master rolled out clearly defined and suave. The great band spoke as a single voice, with a big range and varied color.

The concerto is to some extent disappointing. The first movement is dull as a solo, but the compensation here lies in the beauty of the orchestration. In the second movement, the larghetto. Beethoven, as usual with his slow movements, came into his own. Here the theme is brilliant.

Mr. Willi Hess, the soloist, played more satisfactorily here than during the recent Philadelphia engagement, when the bad weather interfered with the pitch of his instrument. His reading throughout was that of a man steeped in the classics. His most favorable impression was made in the final movement, when Mr. Hess' playing was brilliant.

Paper Mail
City New York
Date JAN 11 1907 State N Y

BEETHOVEN BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Three Masterpieces Performed to an Appreciative Audience—Herbert Witherspoon in Song Recital.

A doctor and a professor offered to a large audience in Carnegie hall last night some music by a plain man named Beethoven. They had the Boston Symphony orchestra to help them, and its participation was probably more of an attraction than the learned titles of Dr. Karl Muck, who conducted, and Prof. Willy Hess, who was soloist in the Beethoven violin concerto and then took his place as first violin for the Seventh symphony. Musicians who have been long in America find titles, especially that of professor, somewhat in the way, and so does the musical public.

But titles or no titles, there was some notable Beethoven playing done last night by the orchestra from Boston, in spite of certain limitations. Dr. Muck's conducting suggested in the first movement of the Seventh symphony, and also in its final allegro, a slight tendency toward restraint, the choice of too restricted a scale of dynamic and rhythmic emphasis. Even the allegretto suffered at moments from this, when the happy second theme entered, against the muttering echoes of the first, one missed the relaxation from tension, the sudden relief, that help to make this symphony a fine emotional experience. This second theme was beautifully played, but it emerged from too neutral a background, and thereby lost potency. The scherzo was brilliantly performed throughout, and it aroused the audience to delighted demonstrations.

Prof. Hess—but let rather it be Mr. Hess in these columns—played the violin concerto with sure and refined tone, and with conscientious accuracy. But there was little evidence, in this performance, of the larger aspects of Beethoven's music. His playing wanted breadth and majesty of style; it was not the interpretation of a masterwork by a mind and hand attuned to the utterance of great messages. Mr. Hess was careful, but he was not eloquent.

Paper EVENING SUN
City New York
Date JAN 11 1907 State N Y

Paderewski failed the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, as Cæsar Thomson did the New York. To-night's Brooklyn concert, like to-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinée, is without a soloist, depending on Sibelius's instead of Paderewski's new symphony over the river, and on fresh music of Chadwick and Elgar to-morrow afternoon. But what's the use of soloists anyhow? The Boston orchestra has given more concerts this year with a new conductor as its only star, than all the New York bands gave in the three years they stuck to the "baton prima donna" plan. Last night Dr. Muck conducted "nothing but Beethoven," and the house was packed to hear him.

All his men rose with him to bow, after finishing the mad scherzo while Muck stood still, the baton hand resting on his music rack, the other on his hip. There wasn't a finger-tap or a "mental gesture" to guide them. The entire Seventh Symphony, which Wagner called Beethoven's "apotheosis of the dance," was played with inimitable delicacy and in a plain, old-fashioned sort of way that suggested no time-serving innovations, and asked for none.

Doubling the wood-wind choir was a happy thought for balance of parts, but a risky one for the most famous unison of tone quality in America. Concert Master Willy Hess, as soloist in the Beethoven violin concerto, glanced anxiously back and spoke at least once to his leader when the wind and the fiddlestrings disagreed. Once the trumpets turned symphony to cacophony. It was only the "bee in the honey." A little change is welcome, as showing that the Boston men are a mobile army in practical routine, while devoted to a fixed ideal.

It was New York's first programme annotator who called popular attention, quite rightly, to the fact that the continued exclusion of Mr. Philip Hale's Boston "programme books" from the hall has worked a public hardship, robbed a time-honored institution of all literary values. "And this," as Mr. Krehbiel said, "in a public building 'Founded by Andrew Carnegie.'"

What these programmes were may be judged from last year's Boston series, of which Secretary W. E. Walter sent out certain bound copies about Christmas time. The volume contains 1804 pages of musical comment, much of it timely and novel. It discusses at particular length the men whose works were performed:

Beethoven, eight times represented; Wagner, seven, and Liszt, six; Bach, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Strauss, Tschaikowsky and Weber, four times; Brahms, Dvorak, Franck, Goldmark, D'Indy, Schubert and Schumann, three times; twice each for Busoni, Haydn, Humperdinck and Mahler, and one apiece for Berlioz, Boehe, Chausson, Coleridge-Taylor, Converse, Debussy, Dukas, Elgar, Fauré, Glazunoff, R. Goldmark, Grieg, Handel, Harcourt, Dalcroze, Loeffler, MacDowell, Marschner, Paine, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Schillings, Sinding, Smetana, Strobe and A. Webber.

What is the public going to do about it? Let the programmes go?

Paper American
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 11 1907

BOSTON ILLUMINES A BEETHOVEN NIGHT

Famous Orchestra from the Hub Draws Big Throng to Carnegie Hall.

The hold which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has on New York's musical public was shown last night by the audience that filled Carnegie Hall from the first orchestra seat to the last row of the loft. The hold which Dr. Muck has on the Boston organization was evinced in the organization's interpretation of Beethoven's symphony in A major, No. 7.

Where an orchestral piece is full of extravagances—like Bruckner's introduction of a bass tuba quartet or a Strauss fantasia on the cymbals—it is easy enough to produce exects or to keep an audience alert, but, when one has to interpret Beethoven, with his classic sanity it means a clever and loving reading of the score. These qualities Dr. Muck possesses; he is fortunate in having an orchestra that responds to his feeling, and New York is fortunate in having the occasional chance to listen to the result.

There were two other Beethoven numbers, for it was a Beethoven night; the Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and the Concerto for violin and orchestra, in D major. The solist in the Concerto was Willy Hess, who played with his accustomed precision and feeling.

[112]

Paper Sun
City New York
Date JAN 1 1907 State N Y

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of Beethoven Music Performed Extremely Well.

Beethoven did not have a birthday yesterday. Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented a programme composed entirely of Beethoven music at Carnegie Hall last night, apparently for no reason except that he believes in music of this kind and thinks the public ought to hear it often. A good many other old fashioned lovers of all that is lofty, chaste and noble in art are likely to agree with him. At any rate, an audience of large size last evening paid to Beethoven, Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra a compliment so marked and so unusual that it cannot be passed without record.

The final number on the programme was the beautiful seventh symphony and despite the fact that many people are in the habit of beginning to leave all concerts before the last movement all remained seated until the music was finished. This testimonial followed a burst of genuine enthusiasm after the performance of the scherzo of the symphony.

The tribute was all the more notable because the audience had begun the evening evidently in a state of apathy, which was not disturbed by the exceedingly quiet and smooth interpretation of the "Egmont" overture, with which the programme opened. The overture was well played, but the repose and refinement of its treatment went to the extreme limit of continence and in a community which has of late been leading a somewhat strenuous musical life something more thrilling was needed to evoke warm approbation.

The second number was the violin concerto, the solo performer being Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra. This artist demonstrated that he can play better than he too often does, for his delivery of Beethoven's music, though cast in a small mould, had dignity, sincerity and musicianship to commend it. In the second movement the player was especially happy, for here his tone was singularly sweet and pure and his cantilena round, smooth and expressive.

The seventh symphony is one of the most perfectly balanced of all Beethoven's works and it is so clean cut in its rhythms and so ingratuating in its thematic matter that he would be a hard listener who could find no enjoyment in it. For last night's performance Dr. Muck doubled the wood wind, a practise which is by no means new and which in these days of numerous strings has much in its favor. Certainly last evening the results were good, for the tuttis were noticeably enriched without being made opaque.

Dr. Muck's reading was admirable in the matter of tempi, nuance and insight. It was especially praiseworthy for its delicacy and clarity. Everything was brought out, and yet nothing was overdone. In the scherzo the director went to the extreme of quiet manner in conducting, sometimes letting the orchestra travel through many measures without a beat. Perhaps there is something of pose in this as well as in extravagant gesture; but this has the undeniable merit of transferring public attention from the conductor to the well trained and self-reliant orchestra.

Paper Press
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 1 1907

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck Again Shows Greatness.

It was hardly possible for Dr. Muck to increase one's respect for his interpretative and directorial powers at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so great was the admiration in which he was already held. But he reinforced and strengthened one's estimate of his musical calibre, and probably augmented the number of his adherents, by conducting a programme devoted entirely to Beethoven in a manner that few other leaders, if any, could have surpassed—not excepting Weingartner.

Last night's programme contained the overture of "Egmont" (opus 84), the violin concerto (D major, opus 61) and the symphony in A major (No. 7, opus 92). Hess, the orchestra's concertmaster, was the soloist of the evening and received many recalls. But it cannot be said he was the "star" of the concert. Evidently the audience's attention was centred on the leader. His large share in bringing the violin concerto to a finished hearing had to be acknowledged.

But though Hess played the concerto excellently and the orchestra gave him an accompaniment which in restraint, refinement and flexibility could hardly have been surpassed, this was not the most impressive contribution of the evening. Whether the violinist's feelings were frozen by nervousness there was no way of telling. The fact remains that his performance, academically admirable, was emotionally gelid.

Muck's reading of the beautiful "Egmont" overture and the symphony was characterized by repose, rhythmical strength, an extremely fine sense of nuance, and, above all, by that poetic eloquence and sublimity of feeling (how well we knew it in Anton Seidl!) which defies analysis. New Yorkers probably have heard few performances of Beethoven's Seventh so finely balanced, so exquisitely finished, yet so alive and persuasive as one Muck and his incomparable orchestra gave last night.

Both in the Allegretto and in the Scherzo the conductor frequently let his men play unassisted by the beat of his baton, giving them only occasional signs, when he deemed them necessary. There is absolutely no reason for objecting to Muck's way of displaying the excellence of his orchestral ensemble. But ought not those who are everlastingly harping on Safonoff's "mannerisms" rise in wrath and denounce the Boston conductor as a musical impostor?

The final movement of the Beethoven symphony was given with an exultant vigor and joyousness that sent every one home feeling better for the experience.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Beethoven Programme at Their Concert Last Evening—Prof. Hess Soloist.

The third visit to New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place this week, and its first concert was given at Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme was devoted entirely to Beethoven's music, including but three numbers—the overture to "Egmont," the violin concerto, played by Mr. Hess, and the seventh symphony. And it was a programme that was listened to with evident delight by the audience. Dr. Muck may or may not plume himself upon his Beethoven "readings"; there is generally little evidence in his conducting that he plumes himself upon any of his achievements in front of his orchestra. But whether he does or not, it is evident that he penetrates to the real spirit of Beethoven's music and he reproduces for us that music charged with that spirit. To do this there is no need of looking for something that is not there, but to do it needs, as Mr. Weingartner has observed, a man of temperament and of talent. That Dr. Muck is such a man he has already shown, and he added a new demonstration of it in the performance that the orchestra gave under his direction last evening.

It was a sane, strong, dignified performance at every point; it was instinct with life, with the meaning and significance of each phrase, finely planned and developed with reference to the larger proportions of both the "Egmont" overture and the symphony. The latter was remarkable for its euphony and for the pointed expression that was given to the marked and entirely characteristic rhythms of each movement. How close the understanding is between Dr. Muck and his men was shown by the confidence that he placed in them in the last two movements of the symphony. For long stretches in the score he let them play without a beat from his stick, or with here and there only a sign. But this is only an indication of the players' familiarity with the music, and the thoroughness with which at rehearsals and previous performances they have imbued themselves with the conductor's intentions as to these movements. And in the ability to bring this about lies a strong conductor's real power; his eloquence does not reside in the end of his stick or the movements of his hands at the performance. It would not do to suggest that such a tour de force might or should become a rule; but there is a hint here as to the true authority of a conductor.

Prof. Hess played the concerto in a sincere and dignified manner, rather than with distinction or lofty eloquence. It was a musician's performance; Prof. Hess commanded the technical difficulties of the work and was generally secure in his intonation. But the greatest difficulties of it are not technical, but lie in its spirit. The cadenzas in the movements were Joachim's short but not remarkably happy insertions into a work where, notwithstanding the old custom and the composer's intentions and directions, any insertion by a strange hand seems an impertinence. In the transition from the slow movement to the final rondo, often not made at all as a transition, Prof. Hess used Laub's cadenza, which is more in the spirit of Beethoven's music than Joachim's. He was liberally applauded and several times recalled.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 1 1 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN CARNEGIE HALL

Beethoven Programme Presented by Dr. Karl Muck Delights Ultra-Conservatives, but Bores Radicals.

Dr. Karl Muck delighted the ultra-conservatives and bored a good many of the radicals in last night's Carnegie Hall audience by presenting an all Beethoven programme at the Boston Orchestra's third evening concert.

While it is true that opportunities are rare to hear such Beethoven playing as the Berlin conductor evoked from his virtuoso orchestra last night, still it seemed to many that this organization's visits to New York are too few to permit the making of programmes confined to a single school of composition, and there was some grumbling in the "waits" as a consequence.

Three numbers made up the evening's list. These were the "Egmont" overture, the D major violin concerto, in which Professor Willy Hess, the orchestra's concertmeister, appeared as the soloist, and the Seventh Symphony in A major, opus 72.

The impress of Dr. Muck's personality upon the orchestra has resulted in a tendency toward bigger and more virile tone by all the instruments, and this has been accomplished without a loss of that fine balance and high finish which have long been the most prized characteristics of the Boston organization.

The "Egmont" overture exemplified all this admirably last night. So, too, did the symphony. More satisfying interpretations of these familiar scores are difficult to recall. The new conductor's poise, his quiet eye, and his quiet but explicit baton obtained just the results he aimed at—nothing less, nor a shade more. The strings distinguished themselves.

Professor Hess gave the concerto a performance thoroughly commendable from an academic point of view, smooth in tone, especially polished in the slower passages. But this concerto has been given more interestingly before New York audiences. The violinist was applauded heartily.

Telegram
New York
te JAN State 1907 Y

The Boston Symphony in a

TO those who have listened to the bold outbursts of Russian music this season and the stridency of Puccini and his fellows, and who look forward to the impending Strauss opera, there was comfort and healing at the Boston Symphony concert last night in Carnegie Hall.

For this purpose Dr. Muck selected three of Beethoven's works, the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," opus 84; the violin concerto in D minor, opus 61, and the "Seventh Symphony," a very conservative programme.

As was to be expected, Dr. Muck gave honest, straightforward readings of both the Overture and the Symphony. There is a wonderful repose about this sterling conductor. Last night he indulged in no individualistic tricks, displayed no irritating vagaries.

Under his restrained yet potent baton the themes of the master roled out clearly defined and suave. The great band spoke as a single voice, with a big range and varied color.

The concerto is to some extent disappointing. The first movement is dull as a solo, but the compensation here lies in the beauty of the orchestration. In the second movement, the larghetto. Beethoven, as usual with his slow movements, came into his own. Here the theme is brilliant.

Mr. Willi Hess, the soloist, played more satisfactorily here than during the recent Philadelphia engagement, when the bad weather interfered with the pitch of his instrument. His reading throughout was that of a man steeped in the classics. His most favorable impression was made in the final movement, when Mr. Hess' playing was brilliant.

Paper Mail
City New York
Date JAN 1 1907 State N Y

BEETHOVEN BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Three Masterpieces Performed to an Appreciative Audience—Herbert Witherspoon in Song Recital.

A doctor and a professor offered to a large audience in Carnegie hall last night some music by a plain man named Beethoven. They had the Boston Symphony orchestra to help them, and its participation was probably more of an attraction than the learned titles of Dr. Karl Muck, who conducted, and Prof. Willy Hess, who was soloist in the Beethoven violin concerto and then took his place as first violin for the Seventh symphony. Musicians who have been long in America find titles, especially that of professor, somewhat in the way, and so does the musical public.

But titles or no titles, there was some notable Beethoven playing done last night by the orchestra from Boston, in spite of certain limitations. Dr. Muck's conducting suggested in the first movement of the Seventh symphony, and also in its final allegro, a slight tendency toward restraint, the choice of too restricted a scale of dynamic and rhythmic emphasis. Even the allegretto suffered at moments from this, when the happy second theme entered, against the muttering echoes of the first, one missed the relaxation from tension, the sudden relief, that help to make this symphony a fine emotional experience. This second theme was beautifully played, but it emerged from too neutral a background, and thereby lost potency. The scherzo was brilliantly performed throughout, and it aroused the audience to delighted demonstrations.

Prof. Hess—but let rather it be Mr. Hess in these columns—played the violin concerto with sure and refined tone, and with conscientious accuracy. But there was little evidence, in this performance, of the larger aspects of Beethoven's music. His playing wanted breadth and majesty of style; it was not the interpretation of a masterwork by a mind and hand attuned to the utterance of great messages. Mr. Hess was careful, but he was not eloquent.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y

Paderewski failed the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, as Cæsar Thomson did the New York. To-night's Brooklyn concert, like to-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinée, is without a soloist, depending on Sibelius's instead of Paderewski's new symphony over the river, and on fresh music of Chadwick and Elgar to-morrow afternoon. But what's the use of soloists anyhow? The Boston orchestra has given more concerts this year with a new conductor as its only star, than all the New York bands gave in the three years they stuck to the "baton prima donna" plan. Last night Dr. Muck conducted "nothing but Beethoven," and the house was packed to hear him.

All his men rose with him to bow, after finishing the mad scherzo while Muck stood still, the baton hand resting on his music rack, the other on his hip. There wasn't a finger-tap or a "mental gesture" to guide them. The entire Seventh Symphony, which Wagner called Beethoven's "apotheosis of the dance," was played with inimitable delicacy and in a plain, old-fashioned sort of way that suggested no time-serving innovations, and asked for none.

Doubling the wood-wind choir was a happy thought for balance of parts, but a risky one for the most famous unison of tone quality in America. Concert Master Willy Hess, as soloist in the Beethoven violin concerto, glanced anxiously back and spoke at least once to his leader when the wind and the fiddlestrings disagreed. Once the trumpets turned symphony to cacophony. It was only the "bee in the honey." A little change is welcome, as showing that the Boston men are a mobile army in practical routine, while devoted to a fixed ideal.

It was New York's first programme annotator who called popular attention, quite rightly, to the fact that the continued exclusion of Mr. Philip Hale's Boston "programme books" from the hall has worked a public hardship, robbed a time-honored institution of all literary values. "And this," as Mr. Krehbiel said, "in a public building 'Founded by Andrew Carnegie.'"

What these programmes were may be judged from last year's Boston series, of which Secretary W. E. Walter sent out certain bound copies about Christmas time. The volume contains 1804 pages of musical comment, much of it timely and novel. It discusses at particular length the men whose works were performed:

Beethoven, eight times represented; Wagner, seven, and Liszt, six; Bach, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Strauss, Tschaikowsky and Weber, four times: Brahms, Dvorak, Franck, Goldmark, D'Indy, Schubert and Schumann, three times: twice each for Busoni, Haydn, Humperdinck and Mahler, and one apiece for Berlioz, Boehe, Chausson, Coleridge-Taylor, Converse, Debussy, Dukas, Elgar, Fauré, Glazunoff, R. Goldmark, Grieg, Handel, Harcourt, Dalcroze, Loeffler, MacDowell, Marschner, Paine, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Schillings, Sinding, Smetana, Strobe and A. Webber.

What is the public going to do about it? Let the programmes go?

Paper American
City New York
Date State N Y

BOSTON ILLUMINES A BEETHOVEN NIGHT

Famous Orchestra from the Hub Draws Big Throng to Carnegie Hall.

The hold which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has on New York's musical public was shown last night by the audience that filled Carnegie Hall from the first orchestra seat to the last row of the loft. The hold which Dr. Muck has on the Boston organization was evinced in the organization's interpretation of Beethoven's symphony in A major, No. 7.

Where an orchestral piece is full of extravagances—like Bruckner's introduction of a bass tuba quartet or a Strauss fantasia on the cymbals—it is easy enough to produce effects or to keep an audience alert, but when one has to interpret Beethoven, with his classic sanity it means a clever and loving reading of the score. These qualities Dr. Muck possesses; he is fortunate in having an orchestra that responds to his feeling, and New York is fortunate in having the occasional chance to listen to the result.

There were two other Beethoven numbers, for it was a Beethoven night: the Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and the Concerto for violin and orchestra, in D major. The solist in the Concerto was Willy Hess, who played with his accustomed precision and feeling.

[112]

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 11 1907

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The third evening concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night in Carnegie Hall, was devoted wholly to the music of Beethoven. The incident had no association with any anniversary date connected with the composer or the works presented, but it served an admirable purpose, nevertheless. First and foremost it represented Dr. Muck as a purist and an unselfish artist when it comes to reading and expounding the sacred books of music—an aspect which is positively, illuminative and full of comforting promise in this nerve rasping, brain and sense destroying age. Then it threw a new glory around the virtuosoship of the gentleman musicians from Boston. The programme was composed of three works—the overture to "Egmont," the violin concerto, with Professor Willy Hess as solo performer, and the seventh symphony. There was not a false spiritual note in the evening's music, which arose from the orchestra like a tribute of sweet incense to the manes of the composer and made a temple out of the concert room. The chastity of the service brought up memories of occasions of false worship, but left them to perish in a pitying smile. Beethoven's rhythms were given as they pulsed in his creative fancy, not in the grimacing caricatures bred by the diseased imaginations of a Reimann or a Fuchs. His melodies flowed forth with buoyant and elastic life, spontaneous and refreshing as the south wind bearing its spicy odors. When the players got into the full swing of the symphony which Wagner characterized as the apotheosis of the dance, the conductor, whose gestures of command had been continence itself, effaced himself altogether. The Scherzo, madly merry as a tumbling mountain brook, played itself, breaking ever and anon into sunlit effervescence, with only the incentive of the conductor's eye or a scarcely discernible motion of his baton to suggest unanimity in a nuance of tempo. So the Finale's wild dance, with its headlong rush, its erratic explosions, its sudden dartings, elusive turnings and wilful pausings. The music and the men seemed to rejoice in themselves and each other, and the audience was transported.

Professor Hess played the concerto with such pure and lofty taste that his few slips of intonation caused as little distress as a passing slip of the trumpets in the Trio of the Scherzo in the symphony. He introduced Joachim's cadenzas in the first and last movements and Laub's exquisitely tuneful transition from the Larghetto to the Rondo. It is deplorable that cadenzas must needs be. Last night we could have wished that it were possible to realize the fancy to which Ysaye once gave utterance when he said that he wished when the inevitable pause was reached he might address the audience and say that after Beethoven had finished elaborating his themes it was a ridiculous impertinence for any mortal musician to try to say more about them, and he would beg the listeners to consider the cadenza played. Joachim's are brilliant and commendably brief. The audience crowded the house, and there was but one grievous thing to be deplored—the admirers of Mr. Hale's programme notes, each book a liberal education, had to take them from the hands of men outside the hall, or, failing in this, go without them. Yet this hall of music, as a proud legend over its portals attests, was "Founded by Andrew Carnegie."

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 11 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

A Beethoven Programme.

If Schumann had to complain, more than half a century ago, that there was nothing left to say about Beethoven, fancy the plight of the twentieth century critic! Dr. Muck had an opportunity to give him something new to write about, by favoring Manhattan with the Sibelius symphony he played in Philadelphia a few days ago, and will play in Brooklyn to-night; but this was not deemed advisable, for some mysterious reason or other; and so the symphony at last night's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Orchestra was Beethoven's seventh—an excellent composition, which this band has never failed to play with euphony and spirit.

From Beethoven's pen also were the other two numbers on the programme—the "Egmont" overture, which was performed rather dryly and mechanically, and the violin concerto, which Prof. Willy Hess played in a dignified and literally correct manner, so far as the notes are concerned, but without a trace of feeling or poetic fancy. The house was full, and, except after the "Egmont," there was abundant applause.

In its notice of last night's concert, the Tribune says: "There was but one grievous thing to be deplored—the admirers of Mr. Hale's programme notes, each book a liberal education, had to take them from the hands of men outside the hall, or, failing in this, go without them. Yet this hall of music, as a proud legend over its portals attests, was 'Founded by Andrew Carnegie.'"

But this does not tell the whole story. These valuable and interesting programme books used to be distributed in the hall; then they were banished to the sidewalk, and lately those who want them (and nearly everybody in the audience does want them) have had to go to a neighboring drug store for copies. The explanation given is that the owner of the house programme (which contains merely a list of the pieces played) will not allow the Boston programme in or near the hall, because it also contains advertisements. The management of the Boston concerts submits to this dictation, and allows its audiences to be disadvantaged, with a meekness which is surprising and not creditable. It must be possible to fight such officiousness. There are other things about Carnegie Hall that call for discussion. There is a good deal of dissatisfaction, and the demand for a new hall is becoming louder every year.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N. Y.
JAN 11 1907

BEETHOVEN AT LAST.

DR. MUCK would seem to regard Ludwig von Beethoven as an obscure German composer who flourished early in the last century, and with strangely prophetic inspiration anticipated the immortal Bruckner by writing nine symphonies. Dr. Muck brought his band all the way from Boston to play the seventh of these nine symphonies, and an overture and a concerto, too, by Beethoven, in Carnegie Hall last night. It is the sort of programme with which Dr. Muck has been edifying Boston this year. He would produce Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony? Forsooth, he invokes Bach and Haydn, too, and makes an eighteenth century programme. In like spirit, he has given a "romantic" programme—Weber, Schubert, and Schumann—a Wagner programme, a Russian programme, a Beethoven programme.

Dr. Muck has not yet mastered English sufficiently to deliver an explanatory lecture on these occasions, but the programme notes are copious and exhaustive. The modern Athenians soon spiffed Education (with a capital E) in the air, and they hastened obediently to their Symphony Hall to slake their thirst for culture in long and cooling draughts. Until last night Dr. Muck chose his Carnegie Hall programmes along the customary lines, but now he has extended the gracious educational privilege to New York, and probably many in the audience yesterday were privately congratulating themselves on the generous missionary spirit of the conductor, the proximity of New York to Boston, and their own good luck in being at the concert.

Yet why should a New York audience give special thanks for hearing Dr. Muck lead the "Egmont" overture or Willy Hess play the Beethoven violin concerto? The overture is good music, but it is played here continually. The violin concerto is unquestionably the greatest of all violin concertos (there is no risk in that superlative), but it, too, is not neglected. Ysaye and Kreisler played it here repeatedly two years ago as no other violinists can play it. It is, moreover, announced for two more performances in Carnegie Hall this month. Prof. Hess did some creditable playing. After he had found the pitch and warmed his tone his performance in the first and second movements was not unworthy of the music, but to treat the final rondo as he did is to rob it of spirit and vitality.

Much, however, is to be forgiven Dr. Muck, for he brought forward the Seventh Symphony. To Wagner it was the apotheosis of the dance. To some of the rest of us it is also the apotheosis of the symphony. It had not been played here lately at our large orchestral concerts. Moreover, it was admirably played last night. Only how much more effective it would have been if nearly an hour of Beethoven had not preceded it!

Paper Times
City New York
Date JAN 1[illegible] 1907 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

A New Work by Hugo Kaun Played—Mme. Niessen-Stone Sings.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet was given yesterday afternoon in Mendelssohn Hall. There was an audience of considerable size present that heard an interesting programme from this quartet party that has become one of the standing additions to the chamber music organizations active in New York City. Its playing on this occasion was of the best that it has given here. Beethoven's beautiful quarter in F minor, Op. 95, standing on the borderland between his middle period and the strange new region of his last quartets, was played with strength and masculine power rather than with refinement of tone and of nuance. The other ensemble piece on the programme was a new quartet by Hugo Kaun.

Mr. Kaun, formerly and for a number of years of Milwaukee and Chicago, is now resident in Berlin, where he has become prominent as a composer, especially of songs, in which many have found a new and original note. He has also written some orchestral pieces, as a symphonic poem, "Falstaff," which has been played by the Chicago Orchestra, and several chamber compositions. The latter are practically unknown here. The quartet that Mr. Hess and his fellows played is strangely designed. The composer has not followed the accepted form, but has cast his work in three movements, respectively, slow, lively, and slow. It cannot be said that the music displays a strongly marked originality, or that in fixing a form of his own the composer has found a valuable means of expression. His ideas suffer from lack of coherence and plasticity; there is a sort of endless melody that he cultivates that in the first and second movements especially leads to no very definite goal. The last movement is the strongest, its texture the firmest. In this Mr. Kaun has gained a sustained power and has presented his ideas in a more logical and definite shape with a strong and original harmonic background. He writes skillfully for the four instruments, treating them independently and with a fine feeling for their possibilities in color and sonority. The three movements "sound" unquestionably, but of the novelty or force of their musical content a first hearing is not very convincing.

Mme. Niessen-Stone contributed a group of very unfamiliar songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf. The former, "Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang," "Liebhaber in allen Gestalten," are not very important specimens. The last is a gay and sparkling ditty, with a characteristic accompaniment. The four by Wolf are characteristic of his efforts after dramatic expressiveness and the unsteadiness of his melodic line in gaining it. There are impressive qualities in "Wer nief dich denn" and "Sie blasen zum Abmarsch." "In dem Schatten meiner Locken" has something of the gracious melody that he could command. Mme. Niessen-Stone's singing was musically intelligent, in phrasing, and in her seeking for characteristic expression. Her voice sounded less agreeable in quality than at her recital some weeks ago.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 11 1907

DR. MUCK LETS HIS PLAYERS GO IT ALONE

Tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Also Shows the Good Sense of the Director.

During a large portion of the third movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck permitted the orchestra to play by itself, undirected by the beat of his baton.

This was at once an evidence of the good taste and good sense of Dr. Muck and a tribute to the efficiency of his orchestra. His good sense made him realize that the skilled and experienced musicians who were under him were more than familiar with the text of this celebrated symphony, because of innumerable renderings under his predecessors, and that they were also fully acquainted with his own wishes as a result of recent rehearsals.

It has never been Dr. Muck's habit to obtrude his personality upon his audience by means of eccentric gesture and peculiar gyrations. He has always suppressed every self but his musical self, and his generous recognition of the ability of his instrumentalists does him as much honor as it does them. It is hardly necessary to say that the Seventh Symphony was admirably rendered.

Willy Hess played the Beethoven violin concerto in D. His tone was at times narrow and scanty, but there was warmth and eloquence in his playing of the second movement.

TRANSCRIPT, JANUARY 11, 1907

Dr. Muck and the Symphony orchestra played Beethoven's seventh symphony at their concert in New York last night and the performance stirred the audience and the reviewers to the same admiration that it excited here. Mr. Krehbiel, for example, writes in the Tribune this morning: "Beethoven's rhythms were given as they pulsed in his creative fancy, not in the grimabing caricatures bred by diseased imaginations. His melodies flowed forth with buoyant and elastic life, spontaneous and refreshing. When the players got into the full swing of the symphony the conductor, whose gestures of command had been continence itself, effaced himself altogether. The Scherzo, madly merry as a tumbling mountain brook, played itself, breaking ever and anon into sunlit effervescence, with only the incentive of the conductor's eye or a scarcely discernible motion of his baton to suggest unanimity in a nuance of tempo. So the Finale's wild dance, with its headlong rush, its erratic explosions, its sudden dartings, elusive turnings and wilful pausings. The music and the men seemed to rejoice in themselves and each other, and the audience was transported." Mr. Aldrich adds in the Times: "Dr. Muck may or may not plume himself upon his Beethoven 'readings'; there is generally little evidence in his conducting that he plumes himself upon any of his achievements in front of his orchestra. But whether he does or not, it is evident that he penetrates to the real spirit of Beethoven's music and he reproduces for us that music charged with that spirit. . . . It was a sane, strong, dignified performance at every point; it was instinct with life, with the meaning and significance of each phrase, finely planned and developed with reference to the larger proportions of both the 'Egmont' overture and the symphony. The latter was remarkable for its euphony and for the pointed expression that was given to the marked and entirely characteristic rhythms of each movement." Mr. Henderson in the Sun found the performance of the symphony "admirable in the matter of tempi, nuance and insight. It was especially praiseworthy for its delicacy and clarity. Everything was brought out, and yet nothing was overdone."

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date State N Y

Dr. Muck Gives All Beethoven At Boston Orchestra Concert

DR. KARL MUCK'S genius extends beyond the pale of an orchestra leader. He has an instinctive comprehension of public taste. How otherwise would he have dared to offer an all Beethoven programme for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night? New works he reserves for production in the benighted regions of Philadelphia and Brooklyn. The Kaiser's friend, lent to us for only a short period, has quickly discerned the love of New Yorkers for the classics. There can be no mistake in admiring them. They are familiar.

Seriously, it was a delightful concert enjoyed by a great audience representing all that is best in New York's musical cultivation. The joyous Seventh Symphony got a [illegible]. All its moods were developed with clarity, precision, vivacity and tonal power. The scherzo was played entrancingly and the applause that followed it caused Dr. Muck to make the whole orchestra rise in acknowledgment.

Willy Hess, the concert master, played the solo part in the D major violin concerto with skill and appreciation. The overture to Goethe's "Egmont" went with splendid swing. To show his confidence in his men, Dr. Muck several times let them play without a suggestion of direction from him.

The programme for the Saturday afternoon concert is announced to consist of Elgar's overture, "In the South;" Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra;" Georg Schumann's "Variations and double fugue on a Merry Theme" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

SYLVESTER RAWLING.

THE SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN.
JANUARY 12, 1907.

The attention of the music-lovers in Springfield should be called to the fact that the sale of seats for the Boston symphony orchestra concert in the Court Square theater next Tuesday evening opens at the box office of the theater this morning. The prices range from 50 cents to $1.50. It will be well for those who purpose going to the concert to secure their places in good season because the chances are that the greater part of the house will be sold out to-day, as has heretofore been the case with the first day's sale.

[113]

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 11 1907

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The third evening concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night in Carnegie Hall, was devoted wholly to the music of Beethoven. The incident had no association with any anniversary date connected with the composer or the works presented, but it served an admirable purpose, nevertheless. First and foremost it presented Dr. Muck as a purist and an unselfish devotee when it comes to reading and expounding the sacred books of music—an aspect which is lovely, illuminative and full of comforting promise in this nerve rasping, brain and sense destroying day. Then it threw a new glory around the virtuososhlp of the gentlemen musicians from Boston. The programme was composed of three works—the overture to "Egmont," the violin concerto, with Professor Willy Hess as solo performer, and the seventh symphony. There was not a false spiritual note in the evening's music, which arose from the orchestra like a tribute of sweet incense to the manes of the composer and made a temple out of the concert room. The chastity of the service brought up memories of occasions of false worship, but left them to perish in a pitying smile. Beethoven's rhythms were given as they pulsed in his creative fancy, not in the grimacing caricatures bred by the diseased imaginations of a Reimann or a Fuchs. His melodies flowed forth with buoyant and elastic life, spontaneous and refreshing as the south wind bearing its spicy odors. When the players got into the full swing of the symphony which Wagrer characterized as the apotheosis of the dance, the conductor, whose gestures of command had been continence itself, effaced himself altogether. The Scherzo, madly merry as a tumbling mountain brook, played itself, breaking ever and anon into sunlit effervescence, with only the incentive of the conductor's eye or a scarcely discernible motion of his baton to suggest unanimity in a nuance of tempo. So the Finale's wild dance, with its headlong rush, its erratic explosions, its sudden dartings, elusive turnings and wilful pausings. The music and the men seemed to rejoice in themselves and each other, and the audience was transported.

Professor Hess played the concerto with such pure and lofty taste that his few slips of intonation caused as little distress as a passing slip of the trumpets in the Trio of the Scherzo in the symphony. He introduced Joachim's cadenza in the first and last movements and Laub's exquisitely tasteful transition from the Larghetto to the Rondo. It is deplorable that cadenzas must needs be. Last night we could have wished that it were possible to realize the fancy to which Ysaye once gave utterance when he said that he wished when the inevitable pause was reached he might address the audience and say that after Beethoven had finished elaborating his themes it was a ridiculous impertinence for any mortal musician to try to say more about them, and he would beg the listeners to consider the cadenza played. Joachim's are brilliant and commendably brief. The audience crowded the house, and there was but one grievous thing to be deplored—the admirers of Mr. Hale's programme notes, each book a liberal education, had to take them from the hands of men outside the hall, or, failing in this, go without them. Yet this hall of music, as a proud legend over its portals attests, was "Founded by Andrew Carnegie."

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 11 1907

DR. MUCK LETS HIS PLAYERS GO IT ALONE

Tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Also Shows the Good Sense of the Director.

During a large portion of the third movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck permitted the orchestra to play by itself, undirected by the beat of his baton.

This was at once an evidence of the good taste and good sense of Dr. Muck and a tribute to the efficiency of his orchestra. His good sense made him realize that the skilled and experienced musicians who were under him were more than familiar with the text of this celebrated symphony, because of innumerable renderings under his predecessors, and that they were also fully acquainted with his own wishes as a result of recent rehearsals.

It has never been Dr. Muck's habit to intrude his personality upon his audience by means of eccentric gesture and peculiar gyrations. He has always suppressed every self but his musical self, and his generous recognition of the abilities of his instrumentalists does him as much honor as it does them. It is hardly necessary to say that the Seventh Symphony was admirably rendered.

Mr. Willy Hess played the Beethoven violin concerto in D. His tone was at times a little narrow and scanty, but there was force and eloquence in his interpretation of the second movement. The orchestral part of the concerto was surprisingly well played. A polished performance of Beethoven's none too exciting "Egmont Overture" completed the programme.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 11 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

A Beethoven Programme.

If Schumann had to complain, more than half a century ago, that these was nothing left to say about Beethoven, fancy the plight of the twentieth century critic! Dr. Muck had an opportunity to give him something new to write about, by favoring Manhattan with the Sibelius symphony he played in Philadelphia a few days ago, and will play in Brooklyn to-night; but this was not deemed advisable, for some mysterious reason or other; and so the symphony at last night's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Orchestra was Beethoven's seventh—an excellent composition, which this band has never failed to play with euphony and spirit.

From Beethoven's pen also were the other two numbers on the programme—the "Egmont" overture, which was performed rather dryly and mechanically, and the violin concerto, which Prof. Willy Hess played in a dignified and literally correct manner, so far as the notes are concerned, but without a trace of feeling or poetic fancy. The house was full, and, except after the "Egmont," there was abundant applause.

In its notice of last night's concert, the Tribune says: "There was but one grievous thing to be deplored—the admirers of Mr. Hale's programme notes, each book a liberal education, had to take them from the hands of men outside the hall, or, failing in this, go without them. Yet this hall of music, as a proud legend over its portals attests, was 'Founded by Andrew Carnegie.'"

But this does not tell the whole story. These valuable and interesting programme books used to be distributed in the hall; then they were banished to the sidewalk, and lately those who want them (and nearly everybody in the audience does want them) have had to go to a neighboring drug store for copies. The explanation given is that the owner of the house programme (which contains merely a list of the pieces played) will not allow the Boston programme in or near the hall, because it also contains advertisements. The management of the Boston concerts submits to this dictation, and allows its audiences to be disadvantaged, with a meekness which is surprising and not creditable. It must be possible to fight such officiousness. There are other things about Carnegie Hall that call for discussion. There is a good deal of dissatisfaction, and the demand for a new hall is becoming louder every year.

TRANSCRIPT, JANUARY 11, 1907

Dr. Muck and the Symphony orchestra played Beethoven's seventh symphony at their concert in New York last night and the performance stirred the audience and the reviewers to the same admiration that it excited here. Mr. Krehbiel, for example, writes in the Tribune this morning: "Beethoven's rhythms were given as they pulsed in his creative fancy, not in the grimacing caricatures bred by diseased imaginations. His melodies flowed forth with buoyant and elastic life, spontaneous and refreshing. When the players got into the full swing of the symphony the conductor, whose gestures of command had been continence itself, effaced himself altogether. The Scherzo, madly merry as a tumbling mountain brook, played itself, breaking ever and anon into sunlit effervescence, with only the incentive of the conductor's eye or a scarcely discernible motion of his baton to suggest unanimity in a nuance of tempo. So the Finale's wild dance, with its headlong rush, its erratic explosions, its sudden dartings, elusive turnings and wilful pausings. The music and the men seemed to rejoice in themselves and each other, and the audience was transported." Mr. Aldrich adds in the Times: "Dr. Muck may or may not plume himself upon his Beethoven 'readings'; there is generally little evidence in his conducting that he plumes himself upon any of his achievements in front of his orchestra. But whether he does or not, it is evident that he penetrates to the real spirit of Beethoven's music and he reproduces for us that music charged with that spirit. . . . It was a sane, strong, dignified performance at every point; it was instinct with life, with the meaning and significance of each phrase, finely planned and developed with reference to the larger proportions of both the 'Egmont' overture and the symphony. The latter was remarkable for its euphony and for the pointed expression that was given to the marked and entirely characteristic rhythms of each movement." Mr. Henderson in the Sun found the performance of the symphony "admirable in the matter of tempi, nuance and insight. It was especially praiseworthy for its delicacy and clarity. Everything was brought out, and yet nothing was overdone."

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N. Y.

JAN 11 1907

BEETHOVEN AT LAST.

DR. MUCK would seem to regard Ludwig von Beethoven as an obscure German composer who flourished early in the last century, and with strangely prophetic inspiration anticipated the immortal Bruckner by writing nine symphonies. Dr. Muck brought his band all the way from Boston to play the seventh of these nine symphonies, and an overture and a concerto, too, by Beethoven, in Carnegie Hall last night. It is the sort of programme with which Dr. Muck has been edifying Boston this year. He would produce Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony? Forsooth, he invokes Bach and Haydn, too, and makes an eighteenth century programme. In like spirit, he has given a "romantic" programme—Weber, Schubert, and Schumann—a Wagner programme, a Russian programme, a Beethoven programme.

Dr. Muck has not yet mastered English sufficiently to deliver an explanatory lecture on these occasions, but the programme notes are copious and exhaustive. The modern Athenians soon sniffed Education (with a capital E) in the air, and they hastened obediently to their Symphony Hall to slake their thirst for culture in long and cooling draughts. Until last night Dr. Muck chose his Carnegie Hall programmes along the customary lines, but now he has extended the gracious educational privilege to New York, and probably many in the audience yesterday were privately congratulating themselves on the generous missionary spirit of the conductor, the proximity of New York to Boston, and their own good luck in being at the concert.

Yet why should a New York audience give special thanks for hearing Dr. Muck lead the "Egmont" overture or Willy Hess play the Beethoven violin concerto? The overture is good music, but it is played here continually. The violin concerto is unquestionably the greatest of all violin concertos (there is no risk in that superlative), but it, too, is not neglected. Ysaye and Kreisler played it here repeatedly two years ago as no other violinists can play it. It is, moreover, announced for two more performances in Carnegie Hall this month. Prof. Hess did some creditable playing. After he had found the pitch and warmed his tone his performance in the first and second movements was not unworthy of the music, but to treat the final rondo as he did is to rob it of spirit and vitality.

Much, however, is to be forgiven Dr. Muck, for he brought forward the Seventh Symphony. To Wagner it was the apotheosis of the dance. To some of the rest of us it is also the apotheosis of the symphony. It had not been played here lately at our large orchestral concerts. Moreover, it was admirably played last night. Only how much more effective it would have been if nearly an hour of Beethoven had not preceded it!

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date State N Y

Dr. Muck Gives All Beethoven At Boston Orchestra Concert

DR. KARL MUCK'S genius extends beyond the pale of an orchestra leader. He has an instinctive comprehension of public taste. How otherwise would he have dared to offer an all Beethoven programme for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night? New works he reserves for production in the benighted regions of Philadelphia and Brooklyn. The Kaiser's friend, lent to us for only a short period, has quickly discerned the love of New Yorkers for the classics. There can be no mistake in admiring them. They are familiar.

Seriously, it was a delightful concert enjoyed by a great audience representing all that is best in New York's musical cultivation. The joyous Seventh Symphony got a beau
All its moods were developed with clarity, precision, vivacity and tonal power. The scherzo was played entrancingly and the applause that followed it caused Dr. Muck to make the whole orchestra rise in acknowledgment.

Willy Hess, the concert master, played the solo part in the D major violin concerto with skill and appreciation. The overture to Goethe's "Egmont" went with splendid swing. To show his confidence in his men, Dr. Muck several times let them play without a suggestion of direction from him.

The programme for the Saturday afternoon concert is announced to consist of Elgar's overture, "In the South." Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra;" Georg Schumann's "Variations and double fugue on a Merry Theme" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

SYLVESTER RAWLING.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

A New Work by Hugo Kaun Played—Mme. Niessen-Stone Sings.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet was given yesterday afternoon in Mendelssohn Hall. There was an audience of considerable size present that heard an interesting programme from this quartet party that has become one of the standing additions to the chamber music's organizations active in New York City. Its playing on this occasion was of the best that it has given here. Beethoven's beautiful quarter in F minor, Op. 95, standing on the borderland between his middle period and the strange new region of his last quartets, was played with strength and masculine power rather than with refinement of tone and of nuance. The other ensemble piece on the programme was a new quartet by Hugo Kaun.

Mr. Kaun, formerly and for a number of years of Milwaukee and Chicago, is now resident in Berlin, where he has become prominent as a composer, especially of songs, in which many have found a new and original note. He has also written some orchestral pieces, as a symphonic poem, "Falstaff," which has been played by the Chicago Orchestra, and several chamber compositions. The latter are practically unknown here. The quartet that Mr. Hess and his fellows played is strangely designed. The composer has not followed the accepted form, but has cast his work in three movements, respectively, slow, lively, and slow. It cannot be said that the music displays a strongly marked originality, or that in fixing a form of his own the composer has found a valuable means of expression. His ideas suffer from lack of coherence and plasticity; there is a sort of endless melody that he cultivates that in the first and second movements especially leads to no very definite goal. The last movement is the strongest, its texture the firmest. In this Mr. Kaun has gained a sustained power and has presented his ideas in a more logical and definite shape with a strong and original harmonic background. He writes skillfully for the four instruments, treating them independently and with a fine feeling for their possibilities in color and sonority. The three movements "sound" unquestionably, but of the novelty or force of their musical content a first hearing is not very convincing.

Mme. Niessen-Stone contributed a group of very unfamiliar songs by Schubert and Hugo Wolf. The former, "Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang," "Liebhaber in allen Gestalten," are not very important specimens. The last is a gay and sparkling ditty, with a characteristic accompaniment. The four by Wolf are characteristic of his efforts after dramatic expressiveness and the unsteadiness of his melodic line in gaining it. There are impressive qualities in "Wer nie dich denn" and "Sie blasen gum Abmarsch." "In dem Schatten meiner Locken" has something of the gracious melody that he could command. Mme. Niessen-Stone's singing was musically intelligent, in phrasing, and in her seeking for characteristic expression. Her voice sounded less agreeable in quality than at her recital some weeks ago.

THE SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN.

JANUARY 12, 1907.

The attention of the music-lovers in Springfield should be called to the fact that the sale of seats for the Boston symphony orchestra concert in the Court Square theater next Tuesday evening opens at the box office of the theater this morning. The prices range from 50 cents to $1.50. It will be well for those who purpose going to the concert to secure their places in good season because the chances are that the greater part of the house will be sold out to-day, as has heretofore been the case with the first day's sale.

[113]

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 12 1907

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The Boston Symphony Quartet introduced an interesting novelty to its patrons (who refuse to grow in numbers, though they are most amiable in their attitude toward the organization) at its second concert in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. This was a string quartet in D major, by Hugo Kaun, now a resident of Berlin, but for some years active in the musical life of Milwaukee and Chicago. During the last few years of Mr. Theodore Thomas's activity he made place for a number of Mr. Kaun's orchestral pieces on his symphony programmes and played one of them in this city eight or nine years ago. Mr. Kaun is an industrious composer in practically all the serious fields, and since his sojourn in Germany has enlisted attention more and more, until now he seems likely to take rank with the best of the latter-day writers of chamber music, though he seems unwilling to run with the pack of extremists who are oftenest in the public eye. The quartet played yesterday held the interest of the audience throughout, though its chief excellence was found in the last movement, which is a splendidly conceived, deeply emotional and superbly written piece of slow music, in which the part writing is of the finest description and full of interesting color effects, without getting out of its proper field. As the composition was presented yesterday it had only three movements, the first and third being slow, with an animated one between. This fact, together with the comparative weakness of the middle allegro, suggested the thought that the composer is less happy in depicting the cheerful mood than in the serious and contemplative.

Professor Hess's organization did its best work in the novelty, leaving the audience wishing for a fuller and a more sensuous tone in the Beethoven Quartet in F minor, op. 95, with which the concert opened. Between the two quartets Mme. von Niessen-Stone sang a group of German songs to a pianoforte accompaniment played by Miss Anna Lockwood. The songs—three by Schubert and four by Hugo Wolf—were sung with ripe intelligence and warm temperament, though with not as much tonal charm as the fine voice of the singer led one to expect. There were occasional lapses from just intonation, and the voice at intervals lost its vitality. But the artist was disclosed in the performance as well as in the selections, all of which were unhackneyed. They were "Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang" and "Liebhaber in Allen Gestalten," by Schubert, and "Wir rief rich denn?" "Wir haben beide lang Zeit geschwiegen," "Sie blasen zum Almarsch" and "In den Schatten meiner Locken."

H. E. K.

[illegible] 12, 1907.

[illegible] only element of novelty in the twelfth symphony program which will be heard next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is the soloist, Katherine Goodson, a young English pianist who will then play for the first time in this country. The orchestral numbers will be Mendelssohn's overture to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Schubert's Symphony in C major. The Mendelssohn overture has not been on a symphony program for a good many years.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its fourth concert of the season on Monday evening, Jan. 21, at 8 o'clock. The assisting artists will be Victor Benham, pianist, and Georges Grisez, clarinet.

LONGY CLUB'S CONCERT.

The second concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall on next Wednesday evening. As usual Mr. Longy has found some interesting novelties to give to the public. One of these is a set of symphonic variations for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, bass clarinet, two horns and bassoon by Larcroix. The other is a suite by Reynaldo Hahn, the young French composer and conductor, who is a very considerable figure in modern French music. The club will be assisted by Messrs. O. Fritzsche, bass clarinet; L. Kloepfel, trumpet; C. F. Ludwig, cymbals; Rettberg, tympani, and Schuecker, harp.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 13 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN.

Players Render "Poem" by Chadwick and "Rienzi" Overture.

There was a large audience in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to hear the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A novelty, a symphonic poem by Chadwick, was produced. It was Chadwickian.

The orchestra was heard to advantage in George Schumann's Variations on a Merry Theme, and the programme concluded with a spirited rendering of the overture to "Rienzi."

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 13 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA [illegible]

CHADWICK'S "CLEOPATRA" FOR THE FIRST TIME HERE.

An Interesting Symphonic Poem Part of Dr. Muck's Programme at Carnegie Hall—Wagner, Schumann and Elgar the Other Composers Who Were Represented

The third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. Despite the fact that there was no soloist and that the weather had returned to its habitual state of turpitude there was a large audience and the applause signified that enjoyment was general. The programme consisted of Elgar's overture, "In the South," Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," George Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. Dr. Muck's recognition of an American composer thus early in his career in this country was a graceful act and ought to help the pessimists to believe that native ability is not neglected by foreign conductors.

George W. Chadwick is one of the American composers who has produced some serious and admirable compositions. His "Cleopatra" was made known at Worcester festival two years ago, and was heard yesterday for the first time in this city. The subject has been treated by other composers, but that did not deter Mr. Chadwick from finding something of his own to say. The composition is well made, excellently scored and interesting to hear.

The thematic matter is clearly defined and even the uniformed listener can readily find the music intended to characterize the mighty and destructive passion of Antonius and the Egyptian queen, the martial movements of the Roman soldiery and the final union of the two lovers in death. The work has dignity, solidity and expressiveness, and it will be strange if it does not again find its way into local programmes. It was superbly performed and conducted by Dr. Muck with genuine appreciation.

The orchestra was in excellent form yesterday afternoon and the concert as a whole was most enjoyable. It is good to know that such admirable orchestral playing can attract audiences without the aid of soloists.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 13 1907

THE BOSTON ORCHES[illegible]

A Concert Devoted to Modern M[illegible] Without a Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's [illegible]inée concert yesterday afternoon [illegible] forward neither soloist nor sym[illegible] Dr. Muck had made a programme entir[illegible] of modern pieces, of which the most [illegible]portant and extensive was George [illegible] Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra," which was played for the first time [illegible] New York. There was also Elgar's over[illegible]ture "In the South," Georg Schumann's "Variations and fugue on a Merry Theme," and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi." There was plenty here to interest those whose interest extends to modern music; and there was a very large audience present.

Mr. Chadwick's "Cleopatra," which was first played at the Worcester Festival of 1905, is one of his most recent as well as one of his most ambitious works; but it may be doubted whether it will stand as one of the most authoritative products of his own genius, which is one of the strongest that America possesses in music. It shows an evident intention to assimilate some of the modern methods of treatment in harmony and thematic development that scarcely sound as his own native utterance. In going to the story of Antony and Cleopatra Mr. Chadwick has taken a theme that has many allurements and many possibilities in the delineation of character, of passion, and of incident. He has used these rather as poetic hints than as outlines to be definitely followed in the music, which shows forth the characters of the voluptuous Egyptian Queen, and of the Roman warrior, the death of the ill-fated Antony, and the lament of Cleopatra, and their burial together in one grave. Many of the themes are unimportant of themselves, without deep musical significance, the most striking and characteristic as well as the most plastic being those attributed to Cleopatra, languorous and passionate. There is much highly colored and bold orchestration. One of the most successful episodes is at the very beginning, when the music echoes the plashing waters through which Cleopatra's voyage is made.

The close is of sonorous eloquence when the themes of Antony and Cleopatra are united in a kind of apotheosis and in the suggestion of their burial together. But much that comes between is labored, and certain fine bursts of pathos and passion are too soon merged in long and painfully wrought development. The work received an enthusiastic and painstaking performance that put everything in Mr. Chadwick's score in its finest aspect. It was the first time that Dr. Muck has performed here a work by an American composer, and the appreciation and devotion that were given to it by conductor and players alike were most grateful.

Elgar's overture, "In the South," has more than once been played here by Mr. Walter Damrosch, who first introduced it to New York. It has many of the fascinating qualities of Elgar's art, and pre[illegible] eminently his superb command of the orchestra and his dextrous manipulation of his themes. But it sounds still, as it did at first, lacking in continuity, in broad lines of development, and however attractive certain of its sections are, they are as the sections of a mosaic. Georg Schumann's burlesque theme and variations are also known from several performances here. The conception is amusing, the theme really "merry," like a German student's song, and the variations are full of comic effects, with the bassoon and the contra-bassoon playing their part as orchestral clowns, and with many striking passages for all the woodwind choir, some charming, some grotesque. The work has much that is clever and stimulating for those who have ears to hear its drollery. Needless to say, it is the sort of thing that the virtuosos of the orchestra revel in, and its performance was brilliant. The concert closed with the Rienzi overture.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date [illegible] State N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

A NEW quartet by Hugo Kaun gave special interest to the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet at Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. The last movement in particular is music of rare excellence. Prof. Hess and his associates played also Beethoven's quartet in F minor, Op. 95, and Mme. von Niessen-Stone sang sympathetically three songs by Schubert and four by Hugo Wolf.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date State N Y

MODERN MUSIC FINELY PLAYED

In Contrast to His Beethoven Programme Dr. Muck Presents an Interesting List.

In striking contrast to the severity of Thursday's all Beethoven programme, Dr. Karl Muck presented an interesting list of modern compositions in Carnegie Hall yesterday at the Boston Orchestra's third matinee concert. Both the programme matter and the stirring manner of its performance went to make an afternoon of rare musical enjoyment and won the hearty applause of a large audience.

Sir Edward Elgar's overture "In the South" opened the proceedings, a symphonic poem by Mr. George W. Chadwick called "Cleopatra" was played for the first time here. Mr. Georg Schumann's capital "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme" was heard again, and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi" closed the programme.

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem proved to have considerable value as a piece of romantic "programme" music, and it was well received. Aiming evidently to describe incidents and persons in the life of Cleopatra, there were some suggestions of Oriental splendor, Roman pageantry, a love scene and a final dolorous episode apparently designed to suggest the unhappy queen's end. In this composition an instrument of Russian origin called the celeste was used with agreeable effect.

The orchestra played admirably throughout, and Dr. Muck's interpretations of the more familiar numbers were well proportioned and forceful.

Paper World
City New York
Date JAN 13 1907 State N Y

GREAT AUDIENCE AT MUCK MATINEE.

Boston Symphony Programme Superbly Rendered by Visiting Orchestra.

A programme that smacked of classic popularity drew a great audience to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to hear the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck. It was very enjoyable, and the playing of the orchestra was superb again. Once more there was demonstrated the mastery of this conductor over his men, and once more the magnificent ensemble of this orchestra and its beautiful tonal qualities were emphasized.

A novelty was the symphonic poem by Chadwick called "Cleopatra." This is by an American, and proved a very interesting work, full of musical ideas and of effective treatment. It was stirringly read and very well played and was apparently appreciated by the audience.

Elgar's tuneful overture, "In the South," was the opening number, and in this Dr. Muck breathed the warm life of Italy. In Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" there was cast abroad a spirit of merriment that was delightful. Dr. Muck lays stress upon the burlesque spirit and makes its humor irresistible. It is a jest in music, and a very clever one.

The final number was Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, which Dr. Muck read with telling authority and with effective shadings of tempo. He did not dismiss this as a worn-out concert battle horse, but worked out its every detail and stamped his reading with a dignity that was estimable.

Dr. Muck's present term with the Boston Symphony Orchestra expires at the end of this season, but application has been made to the German Emperor to permit Muck to remain in this country for a term of years, in which case he will continue at the head of the Boston Symphony for several years to come. An answer to the appeal to the Emperor is expected in a few weeks.

BOSTON TRAVELER JANUARY 12, 1907.

THE only element of novelty in the 12th Symphony programme which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is the soloist, Katherine Goodson, a young English pianist, who will then play for the first time in this country. Mme. Goodson comes to America with very high recommendations. Prof. Willy Hess, with whom she played some years ago in Cologne, speaks most enthusiastically of her musicianship and general command of her instrument. She will play the Greig concerto.

The orchestral numbers will be Mendelssohn's overture to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Schubert's Symphony in C major. The Mendelssohn overture has not been on a Symphony programme for a good many years.

The second concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall on next Wednesday evening, Jan. 16. As usual Mr. Longy has found some interesting novelties to give to the public. One of these is a set of symphonic variations for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, bass clarinet, two horns and bassoon by Larcroix. The other is a suite by Reynaldo Hahn, the young French composer and conductor, who is a very considerable figure in modern French music.

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date JAN 14 1907 State N Y

An American composer held the post of honor at the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Dr. Karl Muck did without either a soloist or a symphony. Instead, he presented as the chief work George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," which was played first at the Worcester festival two years ago and had never been heard here. The orchestration is effective. It shows the composer's intimate acquaintance with the latest ingenuity of expression, even when least inspiring. The moving of Cleopatra's barge through the waters as she sails to meet Anthony, at the beginning, is marvellously realistic; the delineation of the Egyptian Queen's voluptuous nature is striking and, while there are dull moments, there is a superbly eloquent finish.

Elgar's overture, "In the South," George Schumann's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture were the other numbers. All were played by the men from Boston, under their masterful leader, in the incomparable way that is expected of them.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 12 1907

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The Boston Symphony Quartet introduced an interesting novelty to its patrons (who refuse to grow in numbers, though they are most amiable in their attitude toward the organization) at its second concert in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. This was a string quartet in D major, by Hugo Kaun, now a resident of Berlin, but for some years active in the musical life of Milwaukee and Chicago. During the last few years of Mr. Theodore Thomas's activity he made place for a number of Mr. Kaun's orchestral pieces on his symphony programmes and played one of them in this city eight or nine years ago. Mr. Kaun is an industrious composer in practically all the serious fields, and since his sojourn in Germany has enlisted attention more and more, until now he seems likely to take rank with the best of the latter-day writers of chamber music, though he seems unwilling to run with the pack of extremists who are oftenest in the public eye. The quartet played yesterday held the interest of the audience throughout, though its chief excellence was found in the last movement, which is a splendidly conceived, deeply emotional and superbly written piece of slow music, in which the part writing is of the finest description and full of interesting color effects, without getting out of its proper field. As the composition was presented yesterday it had only three movements, the first and third being slow, with an animated one between. This fact, together with the comparative weakness of the middle allegro, suggested the thought that the composer is less happy in depicting the cheerful mood than in the serious and contemplative.

Professor Hess's organization did its best work in the novelty, leaving the audience wishing for a fuller and a more sensuous tone in the Beethoven Quartet in F minor, op. 95, with which the concert opened. Between the two quartets Mme. von Niessen-Stone sang a group of German songs to a pianoforte accompaniment played by Miss Anna Lockwood. The songs—three by Schubert and four by Hugo Wolf—were sung with ripe intelligence and warm temperament, though with not as much tonal charm as the fine voice of the singer led one to expect. There were occasional lapses from just intonation, and the voice at intervals lost its vitality. But the artist was disclosed in the performance as well as in the selections, all of which were unhackneyed. They were "Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang" and "Liebhaber in Allen Gestalten," by Schubert, and "Wir rief rich denn?" "Wir haben bede lang Zeit geschwiegen," "Sie blasen zum Almarsch" and "In den Schatten meiner Locken."

H. E. K.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

A NEW quartet by Hugo Kaun gave special interest to the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet at Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. The last movement in particular is music of rare excellence. Prof. Hess and his associates played also Beethoven's quartet in F minor, Op. 95, and Mme von Niessen-Stone sang sympathetically three songs by Schubert and four by Hugo Wolf.

BOSTON TRAVELER JANUARY 12, 1907.

THE only element of novelty in the 12th Symphony programme which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is the soloist, Katherine Goodson, a young English pianist, who will then play for the first time in this country. Mme. Goodson comes to America with very high recommendations. Prof. Willy Hess, with whom she played some years ago in Cologne, speaks most enthusiastically of her musicianship and general command of her instrument. She will play the Greig concerto.

The orchestral numbers will be Mendelssohn's overture to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Schubert's Symphony in C major. The Mendelssohn overture has not been on a Symphony programme for a good many years.

The second concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall on next Wednesday evening, Jan. 16. As usual Mr. Longy has found some interesting novelties to give to the public. One of these is a set of symphonic variations for flute, obce, English horn, clarinet, bass clarinet, two horns and bassoon by Larcroix. The other is a suite by Reynaldo Hahn, the young French composer and conductor, who is a very considerable figure in modern French music.

BOSTON JOURNAL JANUARY 12, 1907.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

The only element of novelty in the twelfth symphony program which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is the soloist, Katherine Goodson, a young English pianist who will then play for the first time in this country. The orchestral numbers will be Mendelssohn's overture to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Shubert's Symphony in C major. The Mendelssohn overture has not been on a symphony program for a good many years.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its fourth concert of the season on Monday evening, Jan. 21, at 8 o'clock. The assisting artists will be Victor Benham, pianist, and Georges Grisez, clarinet.

LONGY CLUB'S CONCERT.

The second concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall on next Wednesday evening. As usual Mr. Longy has found some interesting novelties to give to the public. One of these is a set of symphonic variations for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, bass clarinet, two horns and bassoon by Laroix. The other is a suite by Reynaldo Hahn, the young French composer and conductor, who is a very considerable figure in modern French music. The club will be assisted by Messrs. O. Fritzsche, bass clarinet; L. Kloepfel, trumpet; C. F. Ludwig, cymbals; Rettberg, tympani, and Schuecker, harp.

aper Telegraph
ty New York
ate State N Y

JAN 13 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN.

Players Render "Poem" by Chadwick and "Rienzi" Overture.

There was a large audience in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to hear the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A novelty, a symphonic poem by Chadwick, was produced. It was Chadwickian.

The orchestra was heard to advantage in George Schumann's Variations on a Merry Theme, and the programme concluded with a spirited rendering of the overture to "Rienzi."

Paper Herald
City New York
Date State N Y

MODERN MUSIC FINELY PLAYED

In Contrast to His Beethoven Programme Dr. Muck Presents an Interesting List.

In striking contrast to the severity of Thursday's all Beethoven programme, Dr. Karl Muck presented an interesting list of modern compositions in Carnegie Hall yesterday at the Boston Orchestra's third matinee concert. Both the programme matter and the stirring manner of its performance went to make an afternoon of rare musical enjoyment and won the hearty applause of a large audience.

Sir Edward Elgar's overture "In the South" opened the proceedings, a symphonic poem by Mr. George W. Chadwick called "Cleopatra" was played for the first time here. Mr. Georg Schumann's capital "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme" was heard again, and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi" closed the programme.

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem proved to have considerable value as a piece of romantic "programme" music, and it was well received. Aiming evidently to describe incidents and persons in the life of Cleopatra, there were four suggestions of Oriental splendor, Roman pageantry, a love scene and a final dolorous episode apparently designed to suggest the unhappy queen's end. In this composition an instrument of Russian origin called the celeste was used with agreeable effect.

The orchestra played admirably throughout, and Dr. Muck's interpretations of the more familiar numbers were well proportioned and forceful.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS

CHADWICK'S "CLEOPATRA" FOR THE FIRST TIME HERE.

An Interesting Symphonic Poem Part of Dr. Muck's Programme at Carnegie Hall —Wagner, Schumann and Elgar the Other Composers Who Were Represented

The third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. Despite the fact that there was no soloist and that the weather had returned to its habitual state of turpitude there was a large audience and the applause signified that enjoyment was general. The programme consisted of Elgar's overture, "In the South," Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," George Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. Dr. Muck's recognition of an American composer thus early in his career in this country was a graceful act and ought to help the pessimists to believe that native ability is not neglected by foreign conductors.

George W. Chadwick is one of the American composers who has produced some serious and admirable compositions. His "Cleopatra" was made known at Worcester festival two years ago, and was heard yesterday for the first time in this city. The subject has been treated by other composers, but that did not deter Mr. Chadwick from finding something of his own to say. The composition is well made, excellently scored and interesting to hear.

The thematic matter is clearly defined and even the uniformed listener can readily find the music intended to characterize the mighty and destructive passion of Antonius and the Egyptian queen, the martial movements of the Roman soldiery and the final union of the two lovers in death. The work has dignity, solidity and expressiveness, and it will be strange if it does not again find its way into local programmes. It was superbly performed and conducted by Dr. Muck with genuine appreciation.

The orchestra was in excellent form yesterday afternoon and the concert as a whole was most enjoyable. It is good to know that such admirable orchestral playing can attract audiences without the aid of soloists.

per World
y New York
te State N Y

GREAT AUDIENCE AT MUCK MATINEE.

Boston Symphony Programme Superbly Rendered by Visiting Orchestra.

A programme that smacked of classic popularity drew a great audience to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to hear the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck. It was very enjoyable, and the playing of the orchestra was superb again. Once more there was demonstrated the mastery of this conductor over his men, and once more the magnificent ensemble of this orchestra and its beautiful tonal quarties were emphasized.

A novelty was the symphonic poem by Chadwick called "Cleopatra." This is by an American, and proved a very interesting work, full of musical ideas and of effective treatment. It was stirringly read and very well played and was apparently appreciated by the audience.

Elgar's tuneful overture, "In the South," was the opening number, and in this Dr. Muck breathed the warm life of Italy. In Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" there was cast abroad a spirit of merriment that was delightful. Dr. Muck lays stress upon the burlesque spirit and makes its humor irresistible. It is a jest in music, and a very clever one.

The final number was Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, which Dr. Muck read with telling authority and with effective shadings of tempo. He did not dismiss this as a worn-out concert battle horse, but worked out its every detail and stamped his reading with a dignity that was estimable.

Dr. Muck's present term with the Boston Symphony Orchestra expires at the end of this season, but application has been made to the German Emperor to permit Muck to remain in this country for a term of years, in which case he will continue at the head of the Boston Symphony for several years to come. An answer to the appeal to the Emperor is expected in a few weeks.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

JAN 13 1907

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Concert Devoted to Modern Music Without a Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée concert yesterday afternoon brought forward neither soloist nor symphony. Dr. Muck had made a programme entirely of modern pieces, of which the most important and extensive was George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem "Cleopatra," which was played for the first time in New York. There was also Elgar's overture "In the South," Georg Schumann's "Variations and fugue on a Merry Theme," and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi." There was plenty here to interest those whose interest extends to modern music; and there was a very large audience present.

Mr. Chadwick's "Cleopatra," which was first played at the Worcester Festival of 1905, is one of his most recent as well as one of his most ambitious works; but it may be doubted whether it will stand as one of the most authoritative products of his own genius, which is one of the strongest that America possesses in music. It shows an evident intention to assimilate some of the modern methods of treatment in harmony and thematic development that scarcely sound as his own native utterance. In going to the story of Antony and Cleopatra Mr. Chadwick has taken a theme that has many allurements and many possibilities in the delineation of character, of passion, and of incident. He has used these rather as poetic hints than as outlines to be definitely followed in the music, which shows forth the characters of the voluptuous Egyptian Queen, and of the Roman warrior, the death of the ill-fated Antony, and the lament of Cleopatra, and their burial together in one grave. Many of the themes are unimportant of themselves, without deep musical significance, the most striking and characteristic as well as the most plastic being those attributed to Cleopatra, languorous and passionate. There is much highly colored and bold orchestration. One of the most successful episodes is at the very beginning, when the music echoes the plashing waters through which Cleopatra's voyage is made.

The close is of sonorous eloquence when the themes of Antony and Cleopatra are united in a kind of apotheosis and in the suggestion of their burial together. But much that comes between is labored, and certain fine bursts of pathos and passion are too soon merged in long and painfully wrought development. The work received an enthusiastic and painstaking performance that put everything in Mr. Chadwick's score in its finest aspect. It was the first time that Dr. Muck has performed here a work by an American composer, and the appreciation and devotion that were given to it by conductor and players alike were most grateful.

Elgar's overture, "In the South," has more than once been played here by Mr. Walter Damrosch, who first introduced it to New York. It has many of the fascinating qualities of Elgar's art, and preeminently his superb command of the orchestra and his dextrous manipulation of his themes. But it sounds still, as it did at first, lacking in continuity, in broad lines of development, and however attractive certain of its sections are, they are as the sections of a mosaic. Georg Schumann's burlesque theme and variations are also known from several performances here. The conception is amusing, the theme really "merry," like a German student's song, and the variations are full of comic effects, with the bassoon and the contra-bassoon playing their part as orchestral clowns, and with many striking passages for all the woodwind choir, some charming, some grotesque. The work has much that is clever and stimulating for those who have ears to hear its drollery. Needless to say, it is the sort of thing that the virtuosos of the orchestra revel in, and its performance was brilliant. The concert closed with the Rienzi overture.

aper Evening World
ty New York
Date State N Y

AN American composer held the post of honor at the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Dr. Karl Muck did without either a soloist or a symphony. Instead, he presented as the chief work George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," which was played first at the Worcester festival two years ago and had never been heard here. The orchestration is effective. It shows the composer's intimate acquaintance with the latest ingenuity of expression, even when least inspiring. The moving of Cleopatra's barge through the waters, as she sails to meet Anthony, at the beginning, is marvellously realistic; the delineation of the Egyptian Queen's voluptuous nature is striking and, while there are dull moments, there is a superbly eloquent finish.

Elgar's overture, "In the South," George Schumann's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture were the other numbers. All were played by the men from Boston, under their masterful leader, in the incomparable way that is expected of them.

Paper Eagle Brooklyn
City
Date JAN 13 1907 State N.Y.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS; EXPLANATION DEMANDED

Brilliant Soloists Were Promised But They Did Not Appear.

WHAT PROF. HOPPER SAYS.

Denies That Any Responsibility Rests Upon Institute for Failure Complained Of.

To the Editor of the Brooklyn Eagle:

Can the Eagle throw any light upon the methods pursued by the parties who got up the prospectus for the Boston Symphony concerts and for which subscriptions were obtained from the public, in which it was stated that there would be no soloist at the November concert, but a reception to Dr. Muck, that Mme. Samaroff would be the soloist December 7, Paderewski January 11 and Adamowski in February, with the result that without any explanation to the public Samaroff did not appear, but Mr. Hess, a member of the orchestra was substituted, and at last night's concert, instead of Paderewski, we had no soloist, and a brief concert which was over at 9:45.

Are we to have Adamowski in February and is it not time that a public explanation was made for the gold brick received by the subscribers thus far?

SUBSCRIBER.

Brooklyn, January 12, 1906.

This letter was submitted last night to Professor Franklin W. Hooper as the head of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and chairman of the executive committee of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, under whose joint auspices the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are given each winter in Brooklyn.

Professor Hooper read the letter carefully and then denied that any responsibility rested upon the Institute for the non-appearance of the different soloists who were advertised to be present in the prospectus at the last two concerts which were given in Brooklyn by the orchestra. He referred the reporter for information on the subject to Charles E. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who, Professor Hooper said, resided in Boston.

"Mr. Frothingham, the secretary of the Philharmonic Society," it was suggested to Professor Hooper, "is the authority for the statement that the Institute conducts all the business details for the society with the orchestra."

"That is not so," was the reply. "The selection of the soloists and all the other details of the concerts are left to the management of the orchestra."

"Did the Institute request any explanation from Mr. Ellis as to the non-appearance of the soloists who were advertised to be present in the prospectus?"

"The Institute asked for no explanation," the professor replied. "Everything is left to Mr. Ellis."

Professor Hooper was asked if he did not believe that it was the duty of the Institute, in justice to the many people who subscribed to the concerts, on the strength of the announcements which were made in advance that Mme. Samaroff and Paderewski would appear at the recitals on December 7 and January 11, to ask Mr. Ellis, as the manager of the orchestra, to make some explanation for the non-appearance of these artists.

It was apparent that Professor Hooper did not believe that any serious reason existed for such an explanation. He thought it over for a minute and then replied:

"That Paderewski would not appear was stated in the papers a month ago. It was then explained that he had decided not to come to this country, and consequently he could not appear at the concert.

"As for Samaroff," he went on, "will appear at the concert in February."

The professor volunteered no explanation why Mme. Samaroff did not appear at the concert on December 7, as she was advertised to do. Professor Hooper was asked if it was true that he had received a letter from a member of the Ladies Auxiliary, charging the Institute with receiving money under false pretenses, because of the failure of the soloists to appear at the concerts.

"That is untrue," was the sharp reply. "I know nothing about it."

Among the subscribers the impression prevails that at least a moral responsibility not only rests upon the Philharmonic Society, but on the Institute as well to see that the announcements made in the prospectus are carried out to the letter. While many attend just to hear the music given by the orchestra, a large number of others are attracted to the concerts by the announcement of the appearance of celebrities in the musical and operatic worlds.

A statement which was made last night by Mr. Frothingham, the secretary of the Philharmonic Society, seems to bear out the contention that the society and the Institute have a moral responsibility [illegible] has appeared [illegible]

...the public with the details of the proposed concerts by the orchestra to Professor Hooper. It obviated the necessity, Mr. Frothingham said, for the orchestra to send its own agents to Brooklyn to do this work. The announcement of all the dates of the concerts and the soloists who are to appear are made jointly by the society and the Institute.

These announcements are incorporated in a printed prospectus bearing the name of the society and the Institute and circulated in Brooklyn. The pictures of the different soloists are given and the date of the concert at which each one will appear. Upon these facts, the people who believe they have been unfairly treated base their contention that a moral responsibility rests upo nthe society and the Institute to see that the programme as published is carried out in every detail and that an explanation is due the public for the omissions which have occurred so far.

Mr. Frothingham explained that the time intervening between Paderewski's announcement that he did not intend to come to this country this year and the concert was probaly too short to permit the engagement of another soloist in his place.

Meanwhile, the subscribers to the concert are awaiting with feverish anticipation to see whether Timothee Adamowski will appear, as scheduled, for the concert on Washington's Birthday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Mack, is recognized as one of the leading msuical organizations in this country and has been giving concerts in Brooklyn for the last nineteen seasons.

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date JAN 14 1907 State N Y

Amusement Jottings.

THE third matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's present series was given on Saturday afternoon last in Carnegie Hall before a record audience. The programme was exceptional in that it plunged without ado into a vortex of modern works, among which Wagner was the patriarch. Elgar's long, interesting, but prolix overture, "In the South;" a symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," by Mr. George Chadwick; "The Variations" and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" of G. Schumann, and Wagner's boisterous, noisy, fairly empty overture to "Rienzi" formed the programme. The latter, one imagines, is played rather more as a reminder of a great man's humble beginnings than as an example of lofty, artistic attainments per se.

The work of the orchestra one may dismiss with a word. It surpassed even the time honored lustre of this famous organization, and served through the afternoon to ravish the ear with a succession of beautiful expositions and flawless technique that disarmed criticism.

The significant feature of the programme was the symphonic poem of Chadwick. This work was new to local concertgoers. When first heard at the Worcester Festival in the fall of 1905, the effect produced was one rather of disappointment. It seemed incoherent, prolix, dull on the whole. Yesterday's performance quite reversed one's earlier impressions. Owing to more careful and sympathetic insight, greater technical skill, finer acoustic possibilities in the hall, the work suddenly opened up into larger proportions. Unheard melodies stood out with fine distinction, skilful development, ingratiating combinations of timbres, together with a renewed acquaintance with the score, all combined to give much distinction to this work. It is individual, of strong characterization, finely blended moods, and a really powerful close. The opening bars, descriptive of the barge floating idly down the stream, is exquisite in its conception; the melodious delineation of Cleopatra and of Antony are rarely skilful, and the closing maestoso burial of the royal lovers is handled with fine vigor. As Mr. Hale has it: "For this, Shakespeare's line is, perhaps, not inappropriate:—

"'She shall be buried by her Antony.
No grave on earth shall hold a pair so famous.'"

The conjunction of circumstances by which so fine an American composition should be superbly read and played was indeed a happy one, and the audience privileged to hear this performance might well carry away memories of a noble work excellently and well performed.

Mr. Chadwick and Mr. Wassily Safonoff heard the performance from boxes.

Paper Staats Zeitung
City New York
Date JAN 1 - 1907 State N Y

Boston Symphonie-Quartett.

Das Boston Symphonie-Quartett veranstaltet heute Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall eine Quartett-Produktion. Als Solistin ist Frau Nissen-Stone angekündigt, welche Lieder singen wird.

[115]

Paper Post
City New York
Date JAN 15 1907 State N Y

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there was, for the second time this season, no soloist, and the music was all "modern," unless we may except Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. The first number was Elgar's overture, "In the South," which seemed long—doubtless it is long. "Sunny Italy" is not very inviting, judging by this overture. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," came next. This work, written only two years ago, proved to be very interesting. Full of color and dramatic in character as it is, it has something to say and says it well. Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" was another novelty. This is a virtuoso piece for modern orchestra, and as such could not fail of a brilliant performance by the Boston musicians. The "merry theme" (scarcely "burlesque" as the programme notes had it) is much like a boisterous students' song, and was treated in a humorous, though not decidedly original, manner. Of course, the "clowns" of the orchestra, the bassoon and double bassoon, had prominent parts.

The Rienzi overture was played so slowly from beginning to end that it was robbed of its brilliancy—a quality which, in comparison with Wagner's later achievements, is its sole claim to fame. But the counter theme for trombones toward the close of the overture did not drown out the principal

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 18, 1907

A Letter About Dr. Muck's Programmes.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The twelfth programme of the Symphony Concerts has been announced and is of no more interest than previous ones have been —Mendelssohn, Grieg, Schubert—and the season is half gone; and but one first-class modern work has been given the while: toujours the old masters!

We hear often how it has become the habit in Boston to fossilize—how a public that piques itself upon its knowledge and its ability to appreciate great art, invariably becomes inert when it must exercise the discriminative sense of the individual and not the tradition of years. Well, there is some truth in that; but what of our new conductor from Berlin? In Berlin, we have believed, Teutonic progress centres. Can it be that in the home of Strauss they are so very exclusive—they of the musical élite—of all that savors of the twentieth century? In his conducting, Dr. Muck has with much authority set for us a standard of interpretation which for its brilliance, reserve and sanity will not soon be forgotten. Shall we not have one well-made programme from his hands?

Perhaps Dr. Muck believes with Mr. Wells that we have not yet awakened from the embalmed repose in which we lay so long under the spell of Beethoven's music. How are we to persuade him that we are alive to the situation—that he stands at the beginning of the twentieth century in a progressive town of today, not in Vienna of the early eighties? After "all-Beethoven" programmes, "all-Russian" programmes, and "all-mediocrity" programmes, may not our minds be refreshed by the Symphonica Domestica, which we have not yet heard in Boston; or our overworked comprehending faculties be soothed by the dreams of Debussy before they are dulled to subtle effects. After the gross eloquence of Bruckner, Elgar and Glazounoff a tone-poem of Strauss, d'Indy, Debussy or Loeffler would be heard, if not with critical appreciation by everyone, at least with genuine pleasure by many.

It takes, as a rule, fifteen to eighteen years for a public to solve with satisfaction to itself the riddle of its creative sphinx. And for this reason particularly it is the first and most certain duty of an orchestra such as ours to produce with all its energy the little mite in each decade which has something new to say, something which, even if not of permanent quality, is of value now, that at least can show the way and say, "This much is true at all events." Not to give pleasure only, though that were enough, but to give light, is the function of our organization. The late Theodore Thomas appreciated with rare keenness the educational task that was his; and by indefatigable searching out of new works of interest, he worked an extraordinary enlightenment upon the mind of the public in Chicago. But perhaps Dr. Muck is a cynic and would not incur the obligations which a teacher must incur—but then, at least, he should aim to give pleasure; he should at all events provide contrasts and stimulation. C. K.

[Programme-making for a series of orchestral concerts is so intricate a task and the results depend so much upon the individual likes and dislikes of the hearer that we venture no comment on our correspondent's letter. Besides, within a fortnight we have printed our own view of the much-disputed matter of Dr. Muck's programmes. As a matter of fact, Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" was chosen long ago for performance, and will be played in February. By "one first-class modern work," our correspondent seems to mean Strauss's "Don Juan." Others might put Sibelius's and Sinding's symphonies, and even Elgar's overture, "In the South" in the same category. "Old masters," moreover, is rather a comprehensive term when our correspondent stretches it, apparently, to include the contemporaries as well as the predecessors of Strauss. Tran-

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N. Y.
JAN 14 1907

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

ELGAR'S overture "In the South" Saturday afternoon welcomed a throng of damp humanity to sunny Italy. The sunny Italy this time was Carnegie Hall, and the occasion the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; but on a day like Saturday it is a pleasure to be welcomed to sunny Italy anywhere, whether the welcoming hand is extended by the Hon. James Bronson Reynolds in the streets of Naples, or only by an imaginary Sir Edward Elgar in Carnegie Hall. And, after all, Elgar "makes good." There are dull passages in his overture, but there is also much agreeable music and an abundance of glowing orchestration.

A recent symphonic poem by George W. Chadwick, entitled "Cleopatra," and previously unheard in New York, followed the Elgar overture. Mr. Chadwick is not merely an estimable citizen of Boston; he is also a typical American composer. His strongest claim to recognition lies probably in his songs. They have not the individual quality of Mr. MacDowell's. Few of them rise above the level of salon music. None of them touches the height of inspiration attained by Mrs. Beach in "The Year's at the Spring." But they are charming songs, melodious, and well written for the voice.

Mr. Chadwick has also written music in larger forms — elaborate choral and orchestral compositions. This "Cleopatra" symphonic poem is well imagined and carefully worked out. There is an appropriately martial theme for Antony and a theme of sensuous suggestion for Cleopatra. In the closing "maestoso," the programme note informs us, "the burial of Antony and Cleopatra in the same grave is suggested by the two themes now heard for the first time simultaneously. For this, Shakespeare's line is, perhaps, not inappropriate: 'She shall be buried by her Antony. No grave on earth shall hold a pair so famous.'"

Many composers other than Mr. Chadwick have been stirred to music by the story of the Roman soldier and the royal Egyptian woman, yet none of this music has lived. Like Launcelot and Guinevere, and Hamlet and Ophelia, Antony and Cleopatra are still awaiting adequate expression in tone. In literature how different their fate! Shakespeare they inspired to the world's greatest love poem, and witness the three sonnets of a minor man like Hérédia, the last of which was surely written for all time. Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem is well worth hearing, but it does not convince one that he is the composer divinely appointed to immortalize the pair in sound.

The second part of the programme began with Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme." This piece is an attempt to make music definitely humorous. Now there are many kinds of humor. There is American humor, at least the British say so, and there is British humor, though Americans deny it. Doubtless this juggling with an alleged "merry" theme is German humor. But so is "Fliegende Blätter." The audience applauded the effort as if it enjoyed it, but no one was ejected from the hall for loud and unseemly laughter.

Wagner's "Rienzi" overture brought to a close a concert that had the great virtue of brevity—a virtue that shines the brighter as American programmes tend more and more to a length that is European rather than heavenly. No one takes the "Rienzi" overture too seriously nowadays, but when well played it is great good fun, far better than Georg Schumann and all his contortions on a "merry" theme.

The performance of the orchestra under Dr. Muck's direction, superb throughout the concert, became in the "Rienzi" overture positively thrilling.

Sun
Baltimore
State Md.
JAN 10 1907

LARGE AUDIENCE AT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Program Had Much Of Interest In It.

The third of the present series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Lyric last evening in the presence of an audience that practically filled the entire hall. Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor.

Following was the program given:

Overture to Sakuntala, op. 13.....Goldmark
Concerto in A minor, for violoncello and orchestra, op. 33.....B. Volkmann
Symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, op. 35..Glazounoff
I. Moderato maestoso; allegro.
II. Scherzo, moderato; pochissimo meno mosso.
III. Andante.
IV. Allegro maestoso.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke, cellist.

Although the program lasted but little over an hour there was much therein of decided interest. Of the three numbers the Glazounoff symphony was by far the most interesting. The work is replete with beautiful melody, especially the brilliant, rythmic theme of the scherzo. Above all things, the works shows plainly the ability of the composer at instrumentation. In it he has brought out all of the resources of the orchestra.

The work is typical in its strength and forcefulness and especially so in the turbulent and martial theme of the fourth movement.

Paper Eagle Brooklyn
City
Date JAN 15 1907 State N.Y.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS; EXPLANATION DEMANDED

Brilliant Soloists Were Promised But They Did Not Appear.

WHAT PROF. HOOPER SAYS.

Denies That Any Responsibility Rests Upon Institute for Failure Complained Of.

To the Editor of the Brooklyn Eagle:

Can the Eagle throw any light upon the methods pursued by the parties who got up the prospectus for the Boston Symphony concerts and for which subscriptions were obtained from the public, in which it was stated that there would be no soloist at the November concert, but a exception to Dr. Muck, that Mme. Samaroff would be the soloist December 7, Paderewski January 11 and Adamowski in February, with the result that without any explanation to the public Samaroff did not appear, but Mr. Hess, a member of the orchestra was substituted, and at last night's concert, instead of Paderewski, we had no soloist, and a brief concert which was over at 9:45.

Are we to have Adamowski in February and is it not time that a public explanation was made for the gold brick received by the subscribers thus far?

SUBSCRIBER.

Brooklyn, January 12, 1906.

This letter was submitted last night to Professor Franklin W. Hooper as the head of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and chairman of the executive committee of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, under whose joint auspices the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are given each winter in Brooklyn.

Professor Hooper read the letter carefully and then denied that any responsibility rested upon the Institute for the non-appearance of the different soloists who were advertised to be present in the prospectus at the last two concerts which were given in Brooklyn by the orchestra. He referred the reporter for information on the subject to Charles B. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who, Professor Hooper said, resided in Boston.

"Mr. Frothingham, the secretary of the Philharmonic Society," it was suggested to Professor Hooper, "is the authority for the statement that the Institute conducts all the business details for the society with the orchestra."

"That is not so," was the reply. "The selection of the soloists and all the other details of the concerts are left to the management of the orchestra."

"Did the Institute request any explanation from Mr. Ellis as to the non-appearance of the soloists who were advertised to be present in the prospectus?"

"The Institute asked for no explanation," the professor replied. "Everything is left to Mr. Ellis."

Professor Hooper was asked if he did not believe that it was the duty of the Institute, in justice to the many people who subscribed to the concerts on the strength of the announcements which were made in advance that Mme. Samaroff and Paderewski would appear at the recitals on December 7 and January 11, to ask Mr. Ellis, as the manager of the orchestra, to make some explanation for the non-appearance of these artists.

It was apparent that Professor Hooper did not believe that any serious reason existed for such an explanation. He thought it over for a minute and then replied:

"That Paderewski would not appear was stated in the papers a month ago. It was then explained that he had decided not to come to this contry, and consequently he could not appear at the concert.

"Mme. Samaroff," he went on, "will appear at the concert in February."

The professor volunteered no explanation why Mme. Samaroff did not appear at the concert on December 7, as she was advertised to do. Professor Hooper was asked if it was true that he had received a letter from a member of the Ladies Auxiliary, charging the Institute with receiving money under false pretenses, because of the failure of the soloists to appear at the concerts.

"That is untrue," was the sharp reply. "I know nothing about it."

Among the subscribers the impression prevails that at least a moral responsibility not only rests upon the Philharmonic Society, but on the Institute as well to see that the announcements made in the prospectus are carried out to the letter. While many attend just to hear the music given by the orchestra, a lareg number of others are attracted to the concerts by the announcement of the appearance of celebrities in the musical and operatic worlds.

A statement which was made last night by John S. Frothingham, the secretary of the Philharmonic Society, seems to bear out the contention that the society and the Institute have a moral responsibility to discharge to the public. Since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has appeared in Brooklyn the concerts have been under the joint auspices of the society and the Institute. Mr. Frothingham explained, has a large administrative force at its command, and the society has always left the task of acquainting the Brooklyn public with the details of the proposed concerts by the orchestra to Professor Hooper. It obviated the necessity, Mr. Frothingham said, for the orchestra to send its own agents to Brooklyn to do this work. The announcement of all the dates of the concerts and the soloists who are to appear are made jointly by the society and the Institute.

These announcements are incorporatd in a printed prospectus bearing the name of the society and the Institute and circulated in Brooklyn. The pictures of the different soloists are given and the date of the concert at which each one will appear. Upon these facts, the people who believe they have been unfairly treated, base their contention that a moral responsibility rests upo nthe society and the Institute to see that the programme as published is carried out in every detail and that an explanation is due the public for the omissisons which have occurred so far.

Mr. Frothingham explained that the time intervening between Paderewski's announcement that he did not intend to come to this country this year and the concert was probaly too short to permit the engagement of another soloist in his place.

Meanwhile, the subscribers to the concert are awaiting with feverish anticipation to see whether Timothee Adamowski will appear, as scheduled, for the concert on Washington's Birthday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Mack, is recognized as one of the leading msuical organizations in this country and has been giving concerts in Brooklyn for the last nineteen seasons.

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date JAN 14 1907 State N Y

Amusement Jottings.

THE third matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's present series was given on Saturday afternoon last in Carnegie Hall before a record audience. The programme was exceptional in that it plunged without ado into a vortex of modern works, among which Wagner was the patriarch. Elgar's long, interesting, but prolix overture, "In the South;" a symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," by Mr. George Chadwick; "The Variations" and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" of G. Schumann, and Wagner's boisterous, noisy, fairly empty overture to "Rienzi" formed the programme. The latter, one imagines, is played rather more as a reminder of a great man's humble beginnings than as an example of lofty, artistic attainments per se.

The work of the orchestra one may dismiss with a word. It surpassed even the time honored lustre of this famous organization, and served through the afternoon to ravish the ear with a succession of beautiful expositions and flawless technique that disarmed criticism.

The significant feature of the programme was the symphonic poem of Chadwick. This work was new to local concertgoers. When first heard at the Worcester Festival in the fall of 1905, the effect produced was one rather of disappointment. It seemed incoherent, prolix, dull on the whole. Yesterday's performance quite reversed one's earlier impressions. Owing to more careful and sympathetic insight, greater technical skill, finer acoustic possibilities in the hall, the work suddenly opened up into larger proportions. Unheard melodies stood out with fine distinction, skilful development, ingratiating combinations of timbres, together with a renewed acquaintance with the score, all combined to give much distinction to this work. It is individual, of strong characterization, finely blended moods, and a really powerful close. The opening bars, descriptive of the barge floating idly down the stream, is exquisite in its conception; the melodious delineation of Cleopatra and of Antony are rarely skilful, and the closing maestoso burial of the royal lovers is handled with fine vigor. As Mr. Hale has it: "For this, Shakespeare's line is, perhaps, not inappropriate:—

"'She shall be buried by her Antony.
No grave on earth shall hold a pair so famous.'"

The conjunction of circumstances by which so fine an American composition should be superbly read and played was indeed a happy one, and the audience privileged to hear this performance might well carry away memories of a noble work excellently and well performed.

Mr. Chadwick and Mr. Wassily Safonoff heard the performance from boxes.

Paper Press
City New York
Date JAN 1 1907 State N Y

Boston Symphonie-Quartett.

Das Boston Symphonie-Quartett veranstaltet heute Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall eine Quartett-Produktion. Als Solistin ist Frau Nissen-Stone angekündigt, welche Lieder singen wird.

[115]

Paper Press
City New York
Date JAN 15 1907 State N Y

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there was, for the second time this season, no soloist, and the music was all "modern," unless we may except Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. The first number was Elgar's overture, "In the South," which seemed long—doubtless it is long. "Sunny Italy" is not very inviting, judging by this overture. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," came next. This work, written only two years ago, proved to be very interesting. Full of color and dramatic in character as it is, it has something to say and says it well. Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" was another novelty. This is a virtuoso piece for modern orchestra, and as such could not fail of a brilliant performance by the Boston musicians. The "merry theme" (scarcely "burlesque" as the programme notes had it) is much like a boisterous students' song, and was treated in a humorous, though not decidedly original, manner. Of course, the "clowns" of the orchestra, the bassoon and double bassoon, had prominent parts.

The Rienzi overture was played so slowly from beginning to end that it was robbed of its brilliancy—a quality which, in comparison with Wagner's later achievements, is its sole claim to fame. But the counter theme for trombones toward the close of the overture did not drown out the principal

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 18, 1907

A Letter About Dr. Muck's Programme.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The twelfth programme of the Symphony Concerts has been announced and is of no more interest than previous ones have been — Mendelssohn, Grieg, Schubert — and the season is half gone; and but one first-class modern work has been given the while: toujours the old masters!

We hear often how it has become the habit in Boston to fossilize—how a public that piques itself upon its knowledge and its ability to appreciate great art, invariably becomes inert when it must exercise the discriminative sense of the individual and not the tradition of years. Well, there is some truth in that; but what of our new conductor from Berlin? In Berlin, we have believed, Teutonic progress centres. Can it be that in the home of Strauss they are so very exclusive—they of the musical élite—of all that savors of the twentieth century? In his conducting, Dr. Muck has with much authority set for us a standard of interpretation which for its brilliance, reserve and sanity will not soon be forgotten. Shall we not have one well-made programme from his hands?

Perhaps Dr. Muck believes with Mr. Wells that we have not yet awakened from the embalmed repose in which we lay so long under the spell of Beethoven's music. How are we to persuade him that we are alive to the situation—that he stands at the beginning of the twentieth century in a progressive town of today, not in Vienna of the early eighties? After "all-Beethoven" programmes, "all-Russian" programmes, and "all-mediocrity" programmes, may not our minds be refreshed by the Symphonica Domestica, which we have not yet heard in Boston; or our overworked comprehending faculties be soothed by the dreams of Debussy before they are dulled to subtle effects. After the gross eloquence of Bruckner, Elgar and Glazounoff a tone-poem of Strauss, d'Indy, Debussy or Loeffler would be heard, if not with critical appreciation by everyone, at least with genuine pleasure by many.

It takes, as a rule, fifteen to eighteen years for a public to solve with satisfaction to itself the riddle of its creative sphinx. And for this reason particularly it is the first and most certain duty of an orchestra such as ours to produce with all its energy the little mite in each decade which has something new to say; something which, even if not of permanent quality, is of value now, that at least can show the way and say, "This much is true at all events." Not to give pleasure only, though that were enough, but to give light, is the function of our organization. The late Theodore Thomas appreciated with rare keenness the educational task that was his; and by indefatigable searching out of new works of interest, he worked an extraordinary enlightenment upon the mind of the public in Chicago. But perhaps Dr. Muck is a cynic and would not incur the obligations which a teacher must incur—but then, at least, he should aim to give pleasure; he should at all events provide contrasts and stimulation.

C. K.

[Programme-making for a series of orchestral concerts is so intricate a task and the results depend so much upon the individual likes and dislikes of the hearer that we venture no comment on our correspondent's letter. Besides, within a fortnight we have printed our own view of the much-disputed matter of Dr. Muck's programmes. As a matter of fact, Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" was chosen long ago for performance, and will be played in February. By "one first-class modern work," our correspondent seems to mean Strauss's "Don Juan." Others might put Sibelius's and Sinding's symphonies, and even Elgar's overture, "In the South" in the same category. "Old masters," moreover, is rather a comprehensive term when our correspondent stretches it, apparently, to include the contemporaries as well as the predecessors of Strauss. Ed. Transcript.]

Paper Globe
City New York
Date JAN 1 1907 State N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

ELGAR'S overture "In the South" Saturday afternoon welcomed a throng of damp humanity to sunny Italy. The sunny Italy this time was Carnegie Hall, and the occasion the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; but on a day like Saturday it is a pleasure to be welcomed to sunny Italy anywhere, whether the welcoming hand is extended by the Hon. James Bronson Reynolds in the streets of Naples, or only by an imaginary Sir Edward Elgar in Carnegie Hall. And, after all, Elgar "makes good." There are dull passages in his overture, but there is also much agreeable music and an abundance of glowing orchestration.

A recent symphonic poem by George W. Chadwick, entitled "Cleopatra," and previously unheard in New York, followed the Elgar overture. Mr. Chadwick is not merely an estimable citizen of Boston; he is also a typical American composer. His strongest claim to recognition lies probably in his songs. They have not the individual quality of Mr. MacDowell's. Few of them rise above the level of salon music. None of them touches the height of inspiration attained by Mrs. Beach in "The Year's at the Spring." But they are charming songs, melodious, and well written for the voice.

Mr. Chadwick has also written music in larger forms — elaborate choral and orchestral compositions. This "Cleopatra" symphonic poem is well imagined and carefully worked out. There is an appropriately martial theme for Antony and a theme of sensuous suggestion for Cleopatra. In the closing "maestoso," the programme note informs us, "the burial of Antony and Cleopatra in the same grave is suggested by the two themes now heard for the first time simultaneously. For this, Shakespeare's line is, perhaps, not inappropriate: 'She shall be buried by her Antony. No grave on earth shall hold a pair so famous'."

Many composers other than Mr. Chadwick have been stirred to music by the story of the Roman soldier and the royal Egyptian woman, yet none of this music has lived. Like Launcelot and Guinevere, and Hamlet and Ophelia, Antony and Cleopatra are still awaiting adequate expression in tone. In literature how different their fate! Shakespeare they inspired to the world's greatest love poem, and witness the three sonnets of a minor man like Hérédia, the last of which was surely written for all time. Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem is well worth hearing, but it does not convince one that he is the composer divinely appointed to immortalize the pair in sound.

The second part of the programme began with Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme." This piece is an attempt to make music definitely humorous. Now there are many kinds of humor. There is American humor, at least the British say so, and there is British humor, though Americans deny it. Doubtless this juggling with an alleged "merry" theme is German humor. But so is "Fliegende Blätter." The audience applauded the effort as if it enjoyed it, but no one was ejected from the hall for loud and unseemly laughter.

Wagner's "Rienzi" overture brought to a close a concert that had the great virtue of brevity—a virtue that shines the brighter as American programmes tend more and more to a length that is European rather than heavenly. No one takes the "Rienzi" overture too seriously nowadays, but when well played it is great good fun, far better than Georg Schumann and all his contortions on a "merry" theme.

The performance of the orchestra under Dr. Muck's direction, superb throughout the concert, became in the "Rienzi" overture positively thrilling.

Paper Herald
City Baltimore
State Md.
JAN

LARGE AUDIENCE AT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Program Had Much Of Interest In It.

The third of the present series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Lyric last evening in the presence of an audience that practically filled the entire hall. Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor.

Following was the program given:

Overture to Sakuntala, op. 13.....Goldmark
Concerto in A minor, for violoncello and orchestra, op. 33.....R. Volkmann
Symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, op. 55..Glazounoff
I. Moderato maestoso; allegro.
II. Scherzo, moderato; pochissimo meno mosso.
III. Andante.
IV. Allegro maestoso.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke, cellist.

Although the program lasted but little over an hour there was much therein of decided interest. Of the three numbers the Glazounoff symphony was by far the most interesting. The work is replete with beautiful melody, especially the brilliant, rythmic theme of the scherzo. Above all things, the works shows plainly the ability of the composer at instrumentation. In it he has brought out all of the resources of the orchestra.

The work is typical in its strength and forcefulness and especially so in the turbulent and martial theme of the fourth movement.

Paper Tribune

City New York

Date JAN 13 1907 State N Y

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall contained no solo feature, but something much more enjoyable and profitable to the education of the audience—a fine, new composition by an American composer. This was a symphonic poem entitled "Cleopatra," by George W. Chadwick. It was the only feature of the concert which calls for more than the inevitable complimentary phrases touching the manner in which Dr. Muck and his men delivered themselves of their task of performance, for the rest of the music was familiar, consisting of Sir Edward Elgar's brilliant but too extended overture, "In the South"; Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. The Schumann piece which Mr. Walter Damrosch introduced into American concert schemes was peculiarly delectable because of the delicious clearness with which its humor was set forth, and also, perhaps, for those who chose so to take it, because of the suspicion that it may have awakened in some minds that the wag Richard Strauss had met another wag who found a subject for excellent satirical fooling in the strained harmonization, violent contrasts of instrumental color and arbitrary counterpoint upon which his exemplar chooses to depend to bewilder, confound and amaze his hearers.

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem had its first performance at the Worcester (Mass.) festival of 1905, under the direction of Mr. Franz Kneisel. It was heard then and discussed at considerable length in The Tribune by this reviewer, and it was interesting to note to what extent the first impressions were confirmed and negatived by a second hearing under different circumstances. The work benefited largely from the new conditions. Not only was there a larger orchestra, but a better, for though many of the men who played it in Worcester also played it yesterday, they played it the second time in the middle of the season with the advantage of better study and spirits keyed to concert pitch, whereas at Worcester the season had not begun, the musicians came from their summer employment and were plunged at once into the furious mêlée of a festival which kept them at work from morning till midnight. Moreover, it was found that an instrument omitted in Worcester as having been introduced ad libitum, was highly effective in adding color to the voluptuous measures designed by the composer to delineate the Egyptian Queen and her passion. This instrument is the celesta, of which some of Mr. Chadwick's Russian contemporaries seem inclined to make much, though we cannot recall such effective use of it as that made in this finely conceived and well wrought composition. At Worcester we were inclined to think that, compared with Mr. Chadwick's other overtures and symphonies, "Cleopatra" marked an advance in striving rather than achievement. This opinion was not a little shaken yesterday. The new work is in harmonic and instrumental texture much more up to date than anything of Mr. Chadwick's that preceded it, and the elements which make it up to date are handled with admirable strength. It was noticeable a year and a half ago that Mr. Chadwick keeps an open ear and an open mind for the doings of his colleagues the world over. It is an affectation, the honesty of which we very much doubt, of the composers whom he has followed in some things that they contemn academic instruction. Now, Mr. Chadwick is the head of a musical conservatory, and himself the author of musical textbooks, yet he uses exotic scales when he feels impelled so to do, and is not afraid to spice his harmonies rather highly if thereby he can attain a purpose which he recognizes as within the province of his art, and laudable. Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem is prolix, not in its expository portion in which the Cleopatra and Antony are characterized, nor in the fine finale in which, after the fateful outcome of the ill-starred passion, in which the union of the two principal melodies, rising like an apotheosis, suggests the burial of the lovers in a common grave:

> She shall be buried by her Antony:
> No grave upon the earth shall clip in it
> A pair so famous. High events as these
> Strike those that make them; and their story is
> No less in pity than his glory, which
> Brought them to be lamented.

Mr. Chadwick is prolix in the illustrative portion. He must needs linger long over Cleopatra's "love of Love and her soft hours," so that he may indulge himself to the full in music of the languorous East, and again over the Queen's death, of which Shakespeare makes such quick dispatch, so that his themes may come and go in many woful metmorphoses. Would he had been briefer! Dr. Muck might have curtailed his work with less disastrous effect upon its destiny than, as somebody has said, would have resulted to the fate of the world had the Egyptian Queen's nose been a trifle longer or shorter.

There has been much Antony and Cleopatra music; the ingenious Mr. Hale enumerated a quarter of a hundred operas alone in his notes on yesterday's programme. But for all that Mr. Chadwick was fully justified in harking back to the old story, for it is full of such stuff as music is made of—external pomp and circumstance, the glory of masculine puissance and feminine charm, strength sapped by indulgence, vigor wasting under seduction, and all overspread with the charm against which philosophy is impotent and in which the weak and erring find comfort and justification. The composer has gone to Plutarch's narrative, instead of Shakespeare's tragedy, and has selected situations and moods that bear more directly on Cleopatra's character than upon Antony's, and therefore has chosen his title wisely. The music is concerned with her languorous nature and consuming passion in the first instance, and her lover's undoing in the second. It begins with an exquisite bit of delineation which suggests the music of the waters when Cleopatra came sailing up the Cydnus to meet Antony at Cilicia "in a barge with gilded stern and outspread sails of purple, while oars of silver beat time to the music of flutes and fifes and harps." Shakespeare enriches the picture:

> The barge she sat in, like a burnished throne,
> Burned on the water: the poop was beaten gold;
> Purple the sails and so perfumed that > [illegible] the oars were silver,

BOSTON HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXXI., NO. 17.

THURSDAY, JAN. 17, 1907.

LONGY CLUB GIVES SECOND CONCERT

Messrs. Fritzsche, Kloepfel, Ludwig, Rettberg and Schuecker Assist.

DELIGHTFUL CONCERT OF PUREST ARTISTRY

Unfamiliar Pieces by Lacroix, Mouquet and Hahn Are Played.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Longy Club (wind instruments and piano), assisted by Messrs. Fritzsche, Kloepfel, Ludwig, Rettberg and Schuecker, gave its second concert last night in Potter Hall. There was a warmly applausive audience.

Lazzari's octet, op. 20, for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, two horns and two bassoons, has been heard here, but it gained by repetition. The first movement is melodically charming, the thematic treatment is masterly, and the effects gained by contrasting and blending timbres are often delightful. The second movement gives much promise in the opening, but the interest is not maintained till the end. The finale is agreeable.

Mouquet's "Pan," a sonata for flute and piano, played by Messrs. D. Maquarre and A. de Voto, is a truly poetic work, one of the most noteworthy, if not the most noteworthy, contributions for many years to the repertory of the flute. The three movements portray Pan with the shepherds, the birds and the nymphs. These movements are characterized by exquisite fancy and uncommon finish in workmanship. The musical thought is refined and original, and the variety of expression in both cantabile and bravura passages is surprising. The performance was one of rare excellence, one in which virtuosity and interpretation worked lovingly together. Jules Ernest Georges Mouquet was born in Paris, July 10, 1867. He was a prix de Rome man in 1896, and he began solemnly by composing "Andromeda," "The Sacrifice of Isaac," as a decent and Institute-fearing prix de Rome man should compose. He has written a string quartet, choruses, Danse Grecque, Ballade and Aubade, and one of his latest works is a quartet for harmonium, violin, viola, 'cello, which was produced in Paris last year.

Lacroix's Variations Symphoniques for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, bass clarinet, two horns and bassoon, were played here for the first time, as was the "Pan" sonata. This piece belongs, on the whole, to the class of compositions that are characterized as "well made." They remind one of the unfortunate women who are lumped together as "estimable persons." The first variations are ingenious, and they also have musical value, but the weariness of labor becomes apparent, and the final pages are as the working out of problems which interest chiefly the worker.

A suite by Reynaldo Hahn, "Le Bal de Beatrice d'Este," for two flutes, oboe, two clarinets, two horns, two bassoons, trumpet, kettle drums, cymbals, harp, piano, was played here for the first time. Hahn is known here chiefly by a few songs of a sentimental nature. The title of one of them—for they are sung in French by our indefatigably polyglot singers—was once translated hesitatingly by a young woman who sat behind me and was friendly disposed to her companion, "If My Worms Had Wings." It is only fair to say that the young woman added: "That doesn't seem to be right, but 'vers' must mean 'worms!'" Mr. Hahn, who of late has been as much interested in Mozart as he formerly was in Massenet—and imitation though in a diluted form is unmistakable admiration—is said to be a pet of all the ladies, in which respect he resembles Hildebrand Montrose. This charge may come from less successful composers in Paris, and as he purposes to visit the United States this season, let us give him the benefit of the doubt.

The suite played last night contains pretty as well as quaint pages. Perhaps the most noteworthy are those in which Ludovico Sforza enters, a swarthy man who was known as "The Moor," the "Romanesque," and a short scene, "Leda and the Swan," for it is highly probable that the "oiseau" of the composer is our old friend Jupiter disguised. I hasten to add that this scene would not bring a blush to the cheek of a maiden aunt, for Hahn in this respect is more modest in music than was Michael Angelo in art.

Hahn makes a brave attempt to be pleasantly archaic in this suite by a use of old modes, and he is at times fairly successful, though he falls far below Delibes, whose music to "Le Roi s'Amuse" is a masterpiece in its suggestion of the formal grace and elegance of bygone years.

The performance throughout was of a high order of excellence. These concerts are to be ranked for artistic merit with those given by the Kneisel quartet. [illegible] no greater praise than this.

[illegible] PUBLICAN: WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1907.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

DR MUCK'S FIRST APPEARANCE

At a Concert in This City—A Fine Program of English, American and German Music.

The concert by the Boston symphony orchestra in Court Square theater last evening was specially notable because it was the first and (there is reason to fear) the only appearance in this city of one of the finest of living conductors. Dr Muck's engagement is but for a year, and his orchestra will not appear here again this season, but everyone will hope that his impressions of America are pleasant enough to tempt him to return when he can again be spared from his responsible and onerous post in Berlin. It is hard to imagine a more ideal conductor for the Boston orchestra, which needed a change, but not a shock. Dr Muck comes like a gentle amelioration of the New England climate, a relaxing south wind, a glint of sunshine in a gray day. To the harassed personnel of the orchestra it is like a grateful application of the rest cure, a balsam for raw nerves; to the audience it is just the extra touch of warmth and geniality that makes the difference. Let justice always be done to Mr Gericke; he is an admirable conductor and he made the Boston symphony orchestra what it is to-day. There are more lavishly praised leaders who would spoil it in a year. That is precisely what Dr Muck will not do; he is the perfect successor to Mr Gericke—refined, intellectual, fastidious, regardful of detail, yet an artist first and a drillmaster only as a means to an end. There is not in him so much as an atom of charlatanism: he looks upon the conductor simply as the interpreter, the medium between the composer and the public—most admirable when it is least noticed, when the audience can forget everything but the music.

It was very fitting that on such an occasion the usual soloist should be dispensed with, and the conductor given full liberty to construct the entire program with a view to an intended effect. Has an orchestral concert before been given in this city without some solo attraction? No case comes to mind. The result last night showed the superior unity of an unbroken program; the very act of turning attention to an individual performer changes the mood of an audience. Whether as a rule unbroken orchestral concerts would be equally popular is another matter; personality counts for much with an audience, and there is not always a distinguished new conductor to study. But an occasional unbroken evening of orchestral music is delightful, and there is not the sense of waste of precious minutes which is given by a mere solo performance when the most perfect orchestra in the country might be playing. The audience last evening was large and received Dr Muck with sincere though not exuberant cordiality. There was not in the concert much opportunity or occasion for frenetic applause, but everyone listened with apparent pleasure, and it is seldom that a concert has had more unanimous and hearty praise in the aftercomment.

It is likely that in making out his program Dr Muck had it less in mind to produce the strongest possible musical impression than to give a varied and representative list of works going together reasonably well and providing for a strong but not sensational climax. Climax is evidently the cornerstone of his method—not the frenzied climax of excess, but the intellectually calculated structure of the fine architect who builds to a predestined end. He gave his hearers last evening three works of very different character—three countries at their best. It is remarkable indeed for a conductor fresh from Berlin to construct a program in which Anglo-Saxon music preponderates. For the Anglo-Saxon is but tardily acquiring musical standing; English and American music are about equally apt to leave the European indifferent. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that Sir Edward Elgar, whose overture, "In the South," opened the program, is the first modern Englishman to take a place among the world's great composers, and no one has done more for America's reputation than G. W. Chadwick, whose new symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," intervened between the opening number and the great seventh symphony by Beethoven. The Elgar overture is rich and warm, a beautiful piece of orchestral coloring, with a specially fine passage for solo viola played by Mr Ferir, who will appear next Wednesday at high school hall in the concert by the Boston symphony quartet. There is an elaborate program to the overture, but it seems not at all important—of no more consequence than the temporary scaffolding for a cathedral. The composer has brought together various literary odds and ends that gave an emotional pattern and no doubt served as a stimulus to his work, but the music stands by itself, raises no irrelevant queries, is strong and interesting. Sir Edward's work and title have spoiled the old joke among musicians, of beknighted England; his work has vitality, melody, inspiration; he has, perhaps, through being largely "self-made," escaped the benumbing influence of English academicism.

In Mr Chadwick's "Cleopatra" the legend is naturally of much more consequence. It would be interesting music without a program, and even without a title, but there are passages that must inevitably provoke curiosity—passages dictated obviously by something outside the musical development, shaped in the interest of a story. After hearing it both with and without the program—it was first given to the public at the Worcester festival of 1905—it may be said that the poetic thread adds much not merely to the intelligibility of the work, but to its artistic effect. It is one of the strongest and most characteristic of Mr Chadwick's orchestral works, and the musical construction as well as the instrumentation shows a skilled hand. As an interpretation of the tragedy of Egypt's queen it is perhaps open to the suspicion of lack of sensuousness; one hears more of the sad northern notes of the English horn, suggestive of Tintagel, soft mild fogs, and Iseult, than of the warmer tones of the south and the tinkling mystery of the Orient. The composer of "The Queen of Sheba" might have done it in [illegible] and the con-

Beethoven's A major symphony, with which the program closed, is in itself admirably suited to Dr Muck's notions of a climax. Hardly any work so great begins so unostentatiously, and the conductors general practice of slightly keeping down a first movement in the interest of the total effect is [illegible] hardly necessary. That this symphony, [illegible] with the C minor, is not equally popular, is largely due, it may be believed, to the slowness with which the splendid [illegible] sign is developed. There is no part of it, to be sure, quite so popular in character as the andante of the fifth, but it is much more important that the opening is less likely to attract attention; there is nothing comparable to the famous hammer strokes of Fate-at-the-Door. It is only after long familiarity with the first movement that its beauties fully reveal themselves; even the brilliant dance rhythm of the vivace that follows the long introduction is apt to seem a little monotonous at a first hearing. But nothing could be lovelier than the allegretto, one of the most heavenly of Beethoven's inspirations, and curiously like Schubert, who as a lad of 15 must have been present at the famous benefit concert in 1813 at which this symphony was first played, and may well have had his musical thought colored for life by this lovely lyric strain. It was exquisitely played last night, perfect in tempo, beautifully interpreted in every detail, rich and tender in the treatment of the melody. And no less ideal was the scherzo with its deliciously contrasted trio; there could hardly be a more perfect presentation of values; every shade of expression realized, without the slightest exaggeration of any sort. And then came the finale, with its brilliant triumphant strains, the long-awaited climax in which for the first time the full resources of the orchestra had a chance. Dr Muck is not a brutal conductor; he does not treat a Beethoven symphony as though it had been written to-morrow by Richard Strauss; his readings are as far removed as Mr Gericke's from sensationalism. But he has a strong grasp; he makes his players do great things. Without the least violence or over-emphasis he brings out the full power and majesty of Beethoven. Conductor and orchestra are happily matched.

[116]

Paper Tribune

City New York

Date JAN 13 1907 State N Y

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall contained no solo feature, but something much more enjoyable and profitable to the education of the audience—a fine, new composition by an American composer. This was a symphonic poem entitled "Cleopatra," by George W. Chadwick. It was the only feature of the concert which calls for more than the inevitable complimentary phrases touching the manner in which Dr. Muck and his men delivered themselves of their task of performance, for the rest of the music was familiar, consisting of Sir Edward Elgar's brilliant but too extended overture, "In the South"; Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. The Schumann piece which Mr. Walter Damrosch introduced into American concert schemes was peculiarly delectable because of the delicious clearness with which its humor was set forth, and also, perhaps, for those who chose so to take it, because of the suspicion that it may have awakened in some minds that the wag Richard Strauss had met another wag who found a subject for excellent satirical fooling in the strained harmonization, violent contrasts of instrumental color and arbitrary counterpoint upon which his exemplar chooses to depend to bewilder, confound and amaze his hearers.

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem had its first performance at the Worcester (Mass.) festival of 1895, under the direction of Mr. Franz Kneisel. It was heard then and discussed at considerable length in The Tribune by this reviewer, and it was interesting to note to what extent the first impressions were confirmed and negatived by a second hearing under different circumstances. The work benefited largely from the new conditions. Not only was there a larger orchestra, but a better, for though many of the men who played it in Worcester also played it yesterday, they played it the second time in the middle of the season with the advantage of better study and spirits keyed to concert pitch, whereas at Worcester the season had not begun, the musicians came from their summer employment and were plunged at once into the furious mêlée of a festival which kept them at work from morning till midnight. Moreover, it was found that an instrument omitted in Worcester as having been introduced ad libitum, was highly effective in adding color to the voluptuous measures designed by the composer to delineate the Egyptian Queen and her passion. This instrument is the celesta, of which some of Mr. Chadwick's Russian contemporaries seem inclined to make much, though we cannot recall such effective use of it as that made in this finely conceived and well wrought composition. At Worcester we were inclined to think that, compared with Mr. Chadwick's other overtures and symphonies, "Cleopatra" marked an advance in striving rather than achievement. This opinion was not a little shaken yesterday. The new work is in harmonic and instrumental texture much more up to date than anything of Mr. Chadwick's that preceded it, and the elements which make it up to date are handled with admirable strength. It was noticeable a year and a half ago that Mr. Chadwick keeps an open ear and an open mind for the doings of his colleagues the world over. It is an affectation, the honesty of which we very much doubt, of the composers whom he has followed in some things that they contemn academic instruction. Now, Mr. Chadwick is the head of a musical conservatory, and himself the author of musical textbooks, yet he uses exotic scales when he feels impelled so to do, and is not afraid to spice his harmonies rather highly if thereby he can attain a purpose which he recognizes as within the province of his art, and laudable. Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem is prolix, not in its expository portion in which the Cleopatra and Antony are characterized, nor in the fine finale in which, after the fateful outcome of the ill-starred passion, in which the union of the two principal melodies, rising like an apotheosis, suggests the burial of the lovers in a common grave:

> She shall be buried by her Antony:
> No grave upon the earth shall clip in it
> A pair so famous. High events as these
> Strike those that make them; and their story is
> No less in pity than his glory, which
> Brought them to be lamented.

Mr. Chadwick is prolix in the illustrative portion. He must needs linger long over Cleopatra's "love of Love and her soft hours," so that he may indulge himself to the full in music of the languorous East, and again over the Queen's death, of which Shakespeare makes such quick dispatch, so that his themes may come and go in many woful metmorphoses. Would he had been briefer! Dr. Muck might have curtailed his work with less disastrous effect upon its destiny than, as somebody has said, would have resulted to the fate of the world had the Egyptian Queen's nose been a trifle longer or shorter.

There has been much Antony and Cleopatra music; the ingenious Mr. Hale enumerated a quarter of a hundred operas alone in his notes on yesterday's programme. But for all that Mr. Chadwick was fully justified in harking back to the old story, for it is full of such stuff as music is made of—external pomp and circumstance, the glory of masculine puissance and feminine charm, strength sapped by indulgence, vigor wasting under seduction, and all overspread with the charm against which philosophy is impotent and in which the weak and erring find comfort and justification. The composer has gone to Plutarch's narrative, instead of Shakespeare's tragedy, and has selected situations and moods that bear more directly on Cleopatra's character than upon Antony's, and therefore has chosen his title wisely. The music is concerned with her languorous nature and consuming passion in the first instance, and her lover's undoing in the second. It begins with an exquisite bit of delineation which suggests the music of the waters when Cleopatra came sailing up the Cydnus to meet Antony at Cilicia "in a barge with gilded stern and outspread sails of purple, while oars of silver beat time to the music of flutes and fifes and harps." Shakespeare enriches the picture:

> The barge she sat in, like a burnished throne,
> Burned on the water; the poop was beaten gold;
> Purple the sails, and so perfumed that
> The winds were lovesick with them; the oars were silver,
> Which to the tune of flutes kept stroke, and made
> The water which they beat follow faster,

High and streaming chords from the violins throw a shimmer about the rippling music, for which the composer has, consciously or unconsciously, chosen the instruments mentioned by Plutarch. Then follows music with martial rhythms, which grows into a pompous, but, we fear, somewhat commonplace march, which serves to characterize Antony. As has been intimated, the greater part of the tone poem is taken up with the development of the Cleopatra theme, obviously designed to picture Cleopatra, the nature and growth of her passion, and her end.

H. E. K.

BOSTON HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXXI., NO. 17.

THURSDAY, JAN. 17, 1907.

LONGY CLUB GIVES SECOND CONCERT

Messrs. Fritzsche, Kloepfel, Ludwig, Rettberg and Schuecker Assist.

DELIGHTFUL CONCERT OF PUREST ARTISTRY

Unfamiliar Pieces by Lacroix, Mouquet and Hahn Are Played.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Longy Club (wind instruments and piano), assisted by Messrs. Fritzsche, Kloepfel, Ludwig, Rettberg and Schuecker, gave its second concert last night in Potter Hall. There was a warmly applausive audience.

Lazzari's octet, op. 20, for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, two horns and two bassoons, has been heard here, but it gained by repetition. The first movement is melodically charming, the thematic treatment is masterly, and the effects gained by contrasting and blending timbres are often delightful. The second movement gives much promise in the opening, but the interest is not maintained till the end. The finale is agreeable.

Mouquet's "Pan," a sonata for flute and piano, played by Messrs. D. Maquarre and A. de Voto, is a truly poetic work, one of the most noteworthy, if not the most noteworthy, contributions for many years to the repertory of the flute. The three movements portray Pan with the shepherds, the birds and the nymphs. These movements are characterized by exquisite fancy and uncommon finish in workmanship. The musical thought is refined and original, and the variety of expression in both cantabile and bravura passages is surprising. The performance was one of rare excellence, one in which virtuosity and interpretation worked lovingly together. Jules Ernest Georges Mouquet was born in Paris, July 10, 1867. He was a prix de Rome man in 1896, and he began solemnly by composing "Andromeda," "The Sacrifice of Isaac," as a decent and Institute-fearing prix de Rome man should compose. He has written a string quartet, choruses, Danse Grecque, Ballade and Aubade, and one of his latest works is a quartet for harmonium, violin, viola, 'cello, which was produced in Paris last year.

Lacroix's Variations Symphoniques for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, bass clarinet, two horns and bassoon, were played here for the first time, as was the "Pan" sonata. This piece belongs, on the whole, to the class of compositions that are characterized as "well made." They remind one of the unfortunate women who are lumped together as "estimable persons." The first variations are ingenious, and they also have musical value, but the weariness of labor becomes apparent, and the final pages are as the working out of problems which interest chiefly the worker.

A suite by Reynaldo Hahn, "Le Bal de Beatrice d'Este," for two flutes, oboe, two clarinets, two horns, two bassoons, trumpet, kettle drums, cymbals, harp, piano, was played here for the first time. Hahn is known here chiefly by a few songs of a sentimental nature. The title of one of them—for they are sung in French by our indefatigably polyglot singers—was once translated hesitatingly by a young woman who sat behind me and was friendly disposed to her companion, "If My Worms Had Wings." It is only fair to say that the young woman added: "That doesn't seem to be right, but 'vers' must mean 'worms!'" Mr. Hahn, who of late has been as much interested in Mozart as he formerly was in Massenet—and imitation though in a diluted form is unmistakable admiration—is said to be a pet of all the ladies, in which respect he resembles Hildebrand Montrose. This charge may come from less successful composers in Paris, and as he purposes to visit the United States this season, let us give him the benefit of the doubt.

The suite played last night contains pretty as well as quaint pages. Perhaps the most noteworthy are those in which Ludovico Sforza enters, a swarthy man who was known as "The Moor," the "Romanesque," and a short scene, "Leda and the Swan," for it is highly probable that the "oiseau" of the composer is our old friend Jupiter disguised. I hasten to add that this scene would not bring a blush to the cheek of a maiden aunt, for Hahn in this respect is more modest in music than was Michael Angelo in art.

Hahn makes a brave attempt to be pleasantly archaic in this suite by a use of old modes, and he is at times fairly successful, though he falls far below Delibes, whose music to "Le Roi s'Amuse" is a masterpiece in its suggestion of the formal grace and elegance of bygone years.

The performance throughout was of a high order of excellence. These concerts are to be ranked for artistic merit with those given by the Kneisel quartet, and there is no greater praise than this.

THE SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN: WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1907.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

DR MUCK'S FIRST APPEARANCE

At a Concert in This City—A Fine Program of English, American and German Music.

The concert by the Boston symphony orchestra in Court Square theater last evening was specially notable because it was the first and (there is reason to fear) the only appearance in this city of one of the finest of living conductors. Dr Muck's engagement is but for a year, and his orchestra will not appear here again this season, but everyone will hope that his impressions of America are pleasant enough to tempt him to return when he can again be spared from his responsible and onerous post in Berlin. It is hard to imagine a more ideal conductor for the Boston orchestra, which needed a change, but not a shock. Dr Muck comes like a gentle amelioration of the New England climate, a relaxing south wind, a glint of sunshine in a gray day. To the harassed personnel of the orchestra it is like a grateful application of the rest cure, a balsam for raw nerves; to the audience it is just the extra touch of warmth and geniality that makes the difference. Let justice always be done to Mr Gericke; he is an admirable conductor and he made the Boston symphony orchestra what it is to-day. There are more lavishly praised leaders who would spoil it in a year. That is precisely what Dr Muck will not do; he is the perfect successor to Mr Gericke—refined, intellectual, fastidious, regardful of detail, yet an artist first and a drillmaster only as a means to an end. There is not in him so much as an atom of charlatanism. he looks upon the conductor simply as the interpreter, the medium between the composer and the public—most admirable when it is least noticed, when the audience can forget everything but the music.

It was very fitting that on such an occasion the usual soloist should be dispensed with, and the conductor given full liberty to construct the entire program with a view to an intended effect. Has an orchestral concert before been given in this city without some solo attraction? No case comes to mind. The result last night showed the superior unity of an unbroken program; the very act of turning attention to an individual performer changes the mood of an audience. Whether as a rule unbroken orchestral concerts would be equally popular is another matter; personality counts for much with an audience, and there is not always a distinguished new conductor to study. But an occasional unbroken evening of orchestral music is delightful, and there is not the sense of waste of precious minutes which is given by a mere solo performance when the most perfect orchestra in the country might be playing. The audience last evening was large and received Dr Muck with sincere though not exuberant cordiality. There was not in the concert much opportunity or occasion for frenetic applause, but everyone listened with apparent pleasure, and it is seldom that a concert has had more unanimous and hearty praise in the after-comment.

It is likely that in making out his program Dr Muck had it less in mind to produce the strongest possible musical impression than to give a varied and representative list of works going together reasonably well and providing for a strong but not sensational climax. Climax is evidently the cornerstone of his method—not the frenzied climax of excess, but the intellectually calculated structure of the fine architect who builds to a predestined end. He gave his hearers last evening three works of very different character—three countries at their best. It is remarkable indeed for a conductor fresh from Berlin to construct a program in which Anglo-Saxon music preponderates. For the Anglo-Saxon is but tardily acquiring musical standing; English and American music are about equally apt to leave the European indifferent. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that Sir Edward Elgar, whose overture, "In the South," opened the program, is the first modern Englishman to take a place among the world's great composers, and no one has done more for America's reputation than G. W. Chadwick, whose new symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," intervened between the opening number and the great seventh symphony by Beethoven. The Elgar overture is rich and warm, a beautiful piece of orchestral coloring, with a specially fine passage for solo viola played by Mr Ferir, who will appear next Wednesday at high school hall in the concert by the Boston symphony quartet. There is an elaborate program to the overture, but it seems not at all important—of no more consequence than the temporary scaffolding for a cathedral. The composer has brought together various literary odds and ends that gave an emotional pattern and no doubt served as a stimulus to his work, but the music stands by itself, raises no irrelevant queries, is strong and interesting. Sir Edward's work and title have spoiled the old joke among musicians, of beknighted England; his work has vitality, melody, inspiration; he has, perhaps, through being largely "self-made," escaped the benumbing influence of English academicism.

In Mr Chadwick's "Cleopatra" the legend is naturally of much more consequence. It would be interesting music without a program, and even without a title, but there are passages that must inevitably provoke curiosity—passages dictated obviously by something outside the musical development, shaped in the interest of a story. After hearing it both with and without the program—it was first given to the public at the Worcester festival of 1905—it may be said that the poetic thread adds much not merely to the intelligibility of the work, but to its artistic effect. It is one of the strongest and most characteristic of Mr Chadwick's orchestral works, and the musical construction as well as the instrumentation shows a skilled hand. As an interpretation of the tragedy of Egypt's queen it is perhaps open to the suspicion of lack of sensuousness; one hears more of the sad northern notes of the English horn, suggestive of Tintagel, soft mild fogs, and Iseult, than of the warmer tones of the south and the tinkling mystery of the Orient. The composer of "The Queen of Sheba" might have done it in one way, and the composer of "Salome" in still another; Mr Chadwick's way is temperamentally cool,

Beethoven's A major symphony, with which the program closed, is in itself admirably suited to Dr Muck's notions of a climax. Hardly any work so great begins so unostentatiously, and the conductor's general practice of slightly keeping down a first movement in the interest of the total effect is [illegible] hardly necessary. That this symphony, ra[illegible]ing with the C minor, is not equally pop[illegible]r, is largely due, it may be believed, [illegible] the slowness with which the splendid [illegible]sign is developed. There is no part of it to be sure, quite so popular in character as the andante of the fifth, but it is muc[illegible] more important that the opening is less likely to attract attention; there is nothin[illegible] comparable to the famous hammer strokes of Fate-at-the-Door. It is only after long familiarity with the first movement that its beauties fully reveal themselves; even the brilliant dance rhythm of the vivace that follows the long introduction is apt to seem a little monotonous at a first hearing. But nothing could be lovelier than the allegretto, one of the most heavenly of Beethoven's inspirations, and curiously like Schubert, who as a lad of 15 must have been present at the famous benefit concert in 1813 at which this symphony was first played, and may well have had his musical thought colored for life by this lovely lyric strain. It was exquisitely played last night, perfect in tempo, beautifully interpreted in every detail, rich and tender in the treatment of the melody. And no less ideal was the scherzo with its deliciously contrasted trio; there could hardly be a more perfect presentation of values; every shade of expression realized, without the slightest exaggeration of any sort. And then came the finale, with its brilliant triumphant strains, the long-awaited climax in which for the first time the full resources of the orchestra had a chance. Dr Muck is not a brutal conductor; he does not treat a Beethoven symphony as though it had been written to-morrow by Richard Strauss; his readings are as far removed as Mr Gericke's from sensationalism. But he has a strong grasp; he makes his players do great things. Without the least violence or over-emphasis he brings out the full power and majesty of Beethoven. Conductor and orchestra are happily matched.

[116]

MUSIC AND DRAMA

REYNALDO HAHN AND BEATRICE D'ESTE

A Vision of "The Sweetest Lady in All Italy" and Her Ball, as Hahn's Music Dances It—H. B. Irving Acts Charles I. in His Father's Play and Again Proves His Ability and Individuality—The Western Trip of the Symphony Orchestra—News of the Day

"The sweetest lady in all Italy," as the poets and the scholars of the Renaissance liked to call her, came very unexpectedly into the concert of the Longy Club and even into Potter Hall, last night. Ariosto and scores of minor poets sung her in her time and long afterwards. She has her place and praise in Castiglione's mirror of perfect courtiers and perfect ladies. Here and now she had no such gallant heralding. "Le Bal de Béatrice d'Este," ran a line of the programme dryly and curtly, "suite by Reynaldo Hahn for two flutes, oboe, two clarinets, two horns, two bassoons, trumpet, tympani, cymbals, harp and piano—first performance." Mr. Longy employs no learned programmist; Hahn printed no note on the titlepage of his music; and so there was no hint of what manner of woman this Beatrice d'Este was, when she lived and how, and why four centuries have remembered her and one man at least—amorist and composer—taken thought of her when he would write music. Yet she still kneels before the Madonna in Zenate's altar-piece in the Brera at Milan—her husband, the black duke, opposite her, and by her side her children. She lies in effigy on her tomb in the great Certosa beyond the city, and in the Louvre is the bust that Christoforo Romano wrought of her when she was still an unwedded girl at Ferrara. She had but twenty-two years to live at most and each artist saw the same round, childish face, lips that pouted a little and nose that tilted a little. The painter gives the animation of her eyes the sculptors, the charm of her irregular features. Her hair platted smoothly over her head in circlets of pearls falls almost to her feet in a long braid with its pearl ropings too—for Beatrice loved ornament. There are pearls about her neck and forehead as well, and her dress rustles with her favorite ribbons.

A child, surely, yet the wife of Ludovico Sforza-Ludovico Il Mere, so-called for his swarthy complexion and blacker hair—the greatest and richest prince of his time in Italy, the last of the mighty despots, the friend and patron of Leonardo da Vinci and of countless artists and scholars, the lord for few short years, of the most opulent and brilliant court in all Europe. You may see him in that same altar-piece grave, strong, swarthy. By his side through these years sat the young Beatrice. He had married her out of the old red castello of the Estensi that still stands in sleepy Ferrara, he a soldier and a courtier of forty, she a girl of fifteen. He brought her to Milan in such state that even an ostentatious age marvelled at the display. There from 1491 to 1497, she reigned with him, until death cut her down as suddenly and swiftly as a gardener's shears cut a flower. And she was "the sweetest lady in all Italy." The young poets, the gray-haired scholars, the monitor of courtiers are all agreed upon it. And she loved every innocent pleasure, and she would take every innocent joy of life, and for her it was a gala life. The chroniclers of the time are filled with the tales of her hunts, her fetes, her balls, her plays, her journeys, of every diversion that the passing hour or long preparation might yield. The artists loved her and even designed her dresses. Leonardo himself ordered her masques. The musicians made her beautiful viols and clavichords and even their beauty did not exceed the loveliness of the sound that they drew from them for her delight. The poets made verses for her and in the intervals wrote her plays and pastorals. Scholars sent her some treasure of classic bust or jewel that the earth had newly yielded. There was no dancing like her dancing, and new dances were invented for her. Huntsmen and even the great engineers of the court brought their choicest falcons and their bravest horses to her door. Going on embassy, she fascinated the old men of the Venetian Senate and had her will and her husband's of it. The King of France might not speak for the stilling charm of her as she came into his presence. At mere report of her, the pope bade her eat meat when she would. For she was a beautiful pagan. "Vivete lieti!" take the joy of life—she cried to comrades that were as young and pagan as she. "And when Duchess Beatrice died," wrote the poet, Calmeta, "everything fell into ruin, and that court which had been a joyous paradise was changed into a black inferno."

Wherever the Lady Beatrice dwelt or went, there was dancing. She danced as a child in the great bare rooms of her father's castello. She danced into her marriage and into her capital. In Milan, at her country houses, the fetes were endless. The very evening before she died at midnight Beatrice was dancing. What ball, indeed, if so many, would Reynaldo Hahn recall and picture? Perhaps it was the wondrous fete with which the black Ludovico celebrated the coming of his bride to Milan. It was in the great hall of the castello where the men were wont to play at ball as their sons are to this day in the cities of the Lombard plain and the Apennines. Leonardo himself painted the vaulted roof in azure and gold to imitate the firmament. On the wall, tapestries proclaimed the deeds of arms and statecraft of the Sforza and the Visconti. At the entrance stood a huge arch, and beneath it was the colossal image of Ludovico himself on horseback, and again, per chance, Leonardo made it. To the ball came all the court of Milan and all the visiting guests. And peasant girls from all parts of Italy danced before them, and the maidens gave the palm of Terpsichore to a Tuscan maiden.

Then the ball began. Hahn has not told us whether it was a masque or not, but he has given us the music of the dances. There is the stately entrance of the guests, the ordered beat of drums, the acclaim of trumpets; the measured progress of the cortége. The impression is of stately and graceful formality. Then the dances—perhaps the dances of the peasant maidens from every corner of Italy. The names suggest the curious and exotic artistry that has discovered and designed them—a Lesquercade, a Romanesque, and an Ibérienne. They are all archaic dances rhythmed in the vein of formal grace and polished fantasy, or in the Ibérienne, whirling with sharp and fiery motion. Next the classic mask, which was a part of every such pageant in the joyous paganism of the Renaissance. It is Leda and her ruffling swan, subdued by Hahn, polished amorist always, to the tender sentiment that he fancies, perhaps, in his Beatrice; polished in every méasure as befits her court. Last, the stately coranto of the duchess and her train, and then the duke departs as he came. The suite is artificial music, deliberately archaic, polished often to the last touch of elegance or piquancy, subdued as often to courtly form, sharpened now and then with fantastic contrast and superficial always. Yet with a little sympathetic imagination the breath of a Renaissance pageant and the faint, far fragrance of Beatrice herself blow lightly through it.

The rest of the programme lent no such piquant spur to fancy. Lazzeri's octet for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, two horns and two bassoons, gave pleasure by the richness of its harmonies and its warm blending of the peculiar voices of the several instruments. Lacroix's symphonic variations for the same instruments, less one bassoon and with a bass clarinet added, was less fertile in melodic invention and harmonic detail, and less wooing in its fused or contrasted tonal colors—an ingenious exercise in music for wind choir and little more. Mouquet's sonata for flute and piano, on the other hand, was notable in its kind. It used the flute in its full and undulating tones and not in the shrill and skipping brevura of many a tawdry show-piece. It gave them the voice of song and it colored them with quick and warm imagination. Pan piped to the shepherds, sung with the birds, beguiled the nymphs, and one or another made him playful answer. Even a flute may inspire to such fancies with Mouquet's feeling for it to shape the music and Mr. Daniel Maquarre's artistry to play it. Perhaps indeed the flowing beauty, the soft fullness and the rippling life of the music lay most of all in his [illegible]

H. T. P.

The Western Trip of the Symphony Orchestra

A week from next Sunday, on Jan. 27, the Symphony Orchestra begins the longest Western trip that it has made in many years. A year ago, last autumn, before the season began here, it journeyed as far as Buffalo, Cleveland and Toronto. Now it is going to Chicago, where it has not played for fifteen years, to Indianapolis and to Cincinnati. The first concert of the little tour takes place at Rochester on Monday evening, Jan. 28; the second at Cleveland on Tuesday, Jan. 29; the third at Chicago on Wednesday, Jan. 30; the fourth at Detroit on Thursday, Jan. 31; the fifth at Indianapolis on Friday, Feb. 1; and the sixth at Cincinnati on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 2. From Cincinnati, the orchestra returns directly to Boston. Dr. Muck, needless to say, is conducting at each concert, and making his first appearance in the several cities to be visited. Mr. Adamowski will be the solo violinist in Rochester, Cleveland and Detroit; and Mr. Hess in Cincinnati. In Chicago, Rudolph Ganz, the pianist, plays with the orchestra; and in Indianapolis the local management wished no soloist at all. The programmes, as usual on the journeys of the orchestra, have been made exclusively from compositions that we in Boston have already heard. Beethoven's seventh symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan," and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" stand on three. Detroit is to hear Glazounoff's fifth symphony; Indianapolis, Brahms's first; and Cincinnati the symphony by Sibelius that made so large an impression here a fortnight ago. In full the programmes are:

At Rochester Jan. 28, and Cleveland Jan. 29—

Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violin in B-minor, No.3. (Mr. Adamowski.)
Beethoven: Symphony in A major, No. 7.

At Chicago Jan. 30—

Wagner: Overture to "Rienzi."
Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Tchaikovsky: Concerto for Piano in B-flat, No. 1. (Mr. Ganz.)
Beethoven: Symphony in A major, No. 7.

At Detroit Jan. 31—

Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violin in B-minor, No.3. (Mr. Adamowski.)
Glazounoff: Symphony in B-flat, No. 5.

At Indianapolis Feb. 1—

Brahms: Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

At Cincinnati Feb. 2—

Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Beethoven: Concerto for Violin in D major. (Mr. Hess.)
Sibelius: Symphony in E minor, No. 1.

[redacted]

Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," after the like-named poem by Walt Whitman, will be played for the first times in Boston at the Symphony concerts of Jan. 25 and 26. It was written in 1904-1905, and it has been played by the Cincinnati and the Philadelphia orchestras. It is the only one of Mr. Converse's more recent compositions in the larger forms that has not yet been heard here.

JANUARY 17, 1907

THE LONGY CLUB CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Lazzari—Octuor for Wood and Brass wind.
Mouquet—"The Flute of Pan," Sonata for Flute and Piano.
Lacroix—Variations Symphoniques, for Wood and Brass wind.
Hahn—"Le Bal de Beatrice D'Este." Suite for wind, orchestra and piano.

Mr. Longy is known for his tact and taste in programme-making and the list of the concert of last night, in Potter Hall, was a striking example of this good quality. Every number on the programme had its points of interest. The scores were larger than usual, the three last numbers were new to Boston, and to the full forces of the Longy Club there were added Mr. Fritsche, bass clarinette, Mr. Kloepfel, trumpet, Mr. Ludwig, cymbals, Mr. Rettberg, kettledrums, and Mr. H. Schuecker, harp.

The most important score of the concert was Hahn's Suite, which was fully orchestral, save for the absence of the strings. It called for two flutes, oboe, clarinettes, horns, bassoons, trumpet, kettledrums, cymbals, harp and piano. Nor was the work by Lacroix less "exigeant" in its scoring, for it added English horn and bass clarinette to the usual wind score. One can imagine the rich effect of such instrumentation in such a small auditorium as Potter Hall. Reynaldo Hahn, the young Venezuelan (he is 32 years old) is not a seeker after mysteries or tonal ugliness; he is a melodic and even a sentimental composer, and this Suite has a directness of tune in its short movements that ought to float it to popularity.

It is a free Suite, giving an occasional dance movement of the old type, but also several freer romantic touches. It gives some prominent work to the harp, particularly in the first and last movements. There were some striking glissando effects which were startling and in all his work Mr. Schuecker was very successful. The Ball of Beatrice d'Este may not have been as large as the recent Police Ball but it was more graceful. Some of the dance movements were full of delicacy and finesse. Mr. Lougy directed the little orchestra and read the work finely, giving the pomp and circumstance of the more bombastic movements with appropriate power, yet portraying the quaint old style of the Romanesca equally well. The "Iberienne," in which the trumpet and horn were excellently played, was one of the best points of the Suite. Lacroix's variations were played with fine ensemble. It was interesting to listen to English horn and bass clarinette in Potter Hall, for one cannot study their effects so easily in Symphony Hall, where we generally hear them. The English horn was beautifully played by Mr. C. Lenom in the opening theme, and the bass clarinette stood forth effectively in the first variation. The variations were thoroughly well made music and had the advantage of passing the instruments in review before the auditor, each one becoming prominent in turn. The Octette by Lazzari was also a skilfully made composition, but it scarcely seemed to have a "raison d'etre," it did not convince one of the wisdom of trying to discard the strings. It has some good counterpoint, even to the fugato level, and it was well interpreted. It is not new to Boston, thanks to the Longy Club.

The most effective work of all remains to be spoken of. Judged from the standpoint of virtuosity and of originality, the new sonata, "The Flute of Pan," was the most important number. It was performed by Messrs. Maquarre and De Voto. Mouquet is another of the younger Frenchmen, one of the Conservatoire crop (by the way Hahn also studied there) and, we believe, a winner of the great "Prix de Rome." His "Flute of Pan" is a great addition to the concert repertoire of the flute. The chief difficulty in writng a sonata or concerto for this instrument is that it lacks the varied tone-colors of the stringed instruments, or of the clarinette. It is brilliant in the upper register and sentimental in the lower, and cannot get very far from either of these two qualities. Wherefore the Germans have reviled it and have made the conundrum—"What sounds worse than a flute?" Whereunto the answer is appended, "Two flutes!"

But the French deal more tenderly and wisely with the fine instrument and manage to bring forth beautiful effects from the romantic tube.

Mouquet has written three movements of well-contrasted character. The first jovial, the second ruminative, the finale brilliant. The style of each may be gathered from the mottos added to the movements. They are taken from the Greek and run as follows:

1. (Allegro Giocoso.) Pan and the Shepherds. "Oh Pan! who dwellest in the mountains, sing to us from your sweet lips a song. Sing to us and play upon your pastoral pipe."
2. (Adagio.) Pan and the birds. "Seated in the shade of the solitary wood, Oh, Pan, why dost thou draw from thy flute such delicious sounds."
3. (Allegro.) Pan and the nymphs. "Silence, in the shade of the oak trees. Silence, fountains plashing upon the rocks. Silence, sheep which bleat beside your young. Pan himself sings with his harmonious pipes. Around him with lightest steps dance the nymphs of the waters and of the woods."

Mouquet would have been contented with the debut of his work in Boston, had he heard the performance. Messrs. Maquarre and De Voto played the sonata as if they loved it, and the shading, the phrasing, the ensemble, were all that could be desired. Mr. Maquarre is one of the great flautists of the world, and Mr. De Voto is a most sterling chamber musician whose discretion and care might be studied by some of the world-famous pianists when it comes to uniting with other instruments.

The sonata was free in form. The second movement had a meditative quality, such as Debussy's faun had one afternoon, and its delicacy was splendidly preserved by Messrs. Marquarre and De Voto.

There was much quaintness in the finale, in which the difficult runs were made excellently and the climax was commendably worked up. The work won much applause from the large audience and Mr. Maquarre and Mr. De Voto were recalled several times.

Altogether this was one of the best concerts that the Longy club have ever given and we freely forgive its starting nearly 20 minutes behind time.

Louis C. Elson.

[redacted]

[117]

JANUARY 17, 1907

The interest shown in the playing of Katherine Goodson, the pianist, at yesterday's Symphony rehearsal, where she appeared for the first time in Boston, promises much for her succes at the recital she is to give under Manager Mudgett's direction, at Chickering Hall, next Thursday afternoon. Her programme includes many novelties of the old schools, the several numbers being as follows: Mozart's Sonata A major; Menuett E flat, Beethoven; Arietta, Leonardo Leo (1694-1778); Gavottes by Exaudet (1710-1763), Corelli (1653-1713), and Rameau (1683-1764); Sonata (Moonlight), Beethoven; Andantino and Papillons, Op. 2, Schumann; Rhapsody, Op. 23 "Episodes of a Romance," Arthur Hinton; and Prelude D flat, Waltz G flat, Op. 70, Waltz A flat, Op. 42, and Scherzo in B minor, Op. 20, Chopin.

BOSTON TRAVELER, JANUARY 19, 1907.

NEXT week's rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra will be the last before the orchestra starts on its western trip. It promises to be of special interest from the fact that Mme. Melba is to be the soloist, singing "L'Amero sero costante" from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," and "Ah, for e lui" from Verdi's "La Traviata." This concert will also be marked by the fact that Dr. Muck brings forward another work by an American-and-Boston composer, Mr. Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter." The symphony will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Mr. Ferir playing the solo viola.

On Monday evening next the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony quartet will be given in Chickering Hall, Mr. Victor Benham, pianist, assisting.

Next week Thursday evening is the date for the next Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Prof. Wily Hess being the solo artist.

MUSICAL AMERICA

January 19, 1907

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA PLAYS IN WASHINGTON

Warnke Takes the Place of Adamowski Who is on Sick List.

Glazounoff Symphony Proves to be Most Interesting of Numbers Offered by Dr. Karl Muck—Goltermann Concerto Given by 'Cellist—Mrs. Roosevelt Attends.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 14.—Every seat in the house and practically all the standing room was occupied at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday of last week.

The orchestra has been facing a series of mishaps. Dr. Muck was unable to conduct the rehearsal and concert of the orchestra in Boston on December 28 and 29. The soloist on that occasion was Timothee Adamowski. Last week Dr. Muck had recovered from his cold and was at the conductor's desk, but Mr. Adamowski was too ill to play, and was replaced by the 'cellist, Heinrich Warnke, who gave Goltermann's concerto. The remainder of the programme was devoted to Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony and Elgar's overture, "In the South."

By far the most interesting number of the afternoon was the Glazounoff symphony. In its last movement marched wild defiance of conventional rhythm and accent, where syncopation crowded upon syncopation and lawlessness ran rampant. The second movement, "Scherzo," was full of sparkle and the bright quiver of sunbeams. The "Andante" was of a quiet, meditative loveliness.

It is said that the Elgar overture was conceived on a glorious Spring day in the Valley of Andora, and that it is meant to suggest the joy of living in a balmy climate under sunny skies; and yet nearly half of it sounded frigid. Aside from the descriptive aspect of the music, it was an interesting example of Elgar's style.

The Goltermann concerto was perhaps the least interesting work on the programme. Mr. Warnke played admirably, and Dr. Muck was never more active in the pursuit of perfection.

Mrs. Roosevelt entertained a box party, and many well-known society women and musicians were in the audience.

JANUARY 17, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

REYNALDO HAHN AND BEATRICE D'ESTE

A Vision of "The Sweetest Lady in All Italy" and Her Ball, as Hahn's Music Dances It—H. B. Irving Acts Charles I. in His Father's Play and Again Proves His Ability and Individuality—The Western Trip of the Symphony Orchestra—News of the Day

"The sweetest lady in all Italy," as the poets and the scholars of the Renaissance liked to call her, came very unexpectedly into the concert of the Longy Club and even into Potter Hall, last night. Ariosto and scores of minor poets sung her in her time and long afterwards. She has her place and praise in Castiglione's mirror of perfect courtiers and perfect ladies. Here and now she had no such gallant heralding. "Le Bal de Béatrice d'Este," ran a line of the programme dryly and curtly, "suite by Reynaldo Hahn for two flutes, oboe, two clarinets, two horns, two bassoons, trumpet, tympani, cymbals, harp and piano—first performance." Mr. Longy employs no learned programmist; Hahn printed no note on the titlepage of his music; and so there was no hint of what manner of woman this Beatrice d'Este was, when she lived and how, and why four centuries have remembered her and one man at least—amorist and composer—taken thought of her when he would write music. Yet she still kneels before the Madonna in Zenate's altar-piece in the Brera at Milan—her husband, the black duke, opposite her, and by her side her children. She lies in effigy on her tomb in the great Certosa beyond the city, and in the Louvre is the bust that Christoforo Romano wrought of her when she was still an unwedded girl at Ferrara. She had but twenty-two years to live at most and each artist saw the same round, childish face, lips that pouted a little and nose that tilted a little. The painter gives the animation of her eyes the sculptors, the charm of her irregular features. Her hair platted smoothly over her head in circlets of pearls falls almost to her feet in a long braid with its pearl ropings too—for Beatrice loved ornament. There are pearls about her neck and forehead as well, and her dress rustles with her favorite ribbons.

A child, surely, yet the wife of Ludovico Sferza-Ludovico Il More, so-called for his swarthy complexion and blacker hair—the greatest and richest prince of his time in Italy, the last of the mighty despots, the friend and patron of Leonardo da Vinci and of countless artists and scholars, the lord for few short years, of the most opulent and brilliant court in all Europe. You may see him in that same altar-piece grave, strong, swarthy. By his side through these years sat the young Beatrice. He had married her out of the old red castello of the Estensi that still stands in sleepy Ferrara, he a soldier and a courtier of forty, she a girl of fifteen. He brought her to Milan in such state that even an ostentatious age marvelled at the display. There from 1491 to 1497, she reigned with him, until death cut her down as suddenly and swiftly as a gardener's shears cut a flower.

And she was "the sweetest lady in all Italy." The young poets, the gray-haired scholars, the monitor of courtiers are all agreed upon it. And she loved every innocent pleasure, and she would take every innocent joy of life, and for her it was a full life. The chroniclers of the time are with the tales of her hunts, her fetes, her balls, her plays, her journeys, of every diversion that the passing hour or long preparation might yield. The artists loved her and even designed her dresses. Leonardo himself ordered her masques. The musicians made her beautiful viols and clavichords and even their beauty did not exceed the loveliness of the sound that they drew from them for her delight. The poets made verses for her and in the intervals wrote her plays and pastorals. Scholars sent her some treasure of classic bust or jewel that the earth had newly yielded. There was no dancing like her dancing, and new dances were invented for her. Huntsmen and even the great seigneurs of the court brought their choicest falcons and their bravest horses to her door. Going on embassy, she fascinated the old men of the Venetian Senate and had her will and her husband's of it. The King of France might not speak for the stilling charm of her as she came into his presence. At mere report of her, the pope bade her eat meat when she would. For she was a beautiful pagan. "Vivete lieti!" —take the joy of life—she cried to comrades that were as young and pagan as she. "And when Duchess Beatrice died," wrote the poet, Calmeta, "everything fell into ruin, and that court which had been a joyous paradise was changed into a black inferno."

Wherever the Lady Beatrice dwelt or went, there was dancing. She danced as a child in the great bare rooms of her father's castello. She danced into her marriage and into her capital. In Milan, at her country houses, the fetes were endless. The very evening before she died at midnight Beatrice was dancing. What ball, indeed, in so many, would Reynaldo Hahn recall and picture? Perhaps it was the wondrous fete with which the black Ludovico celebrated the coming of his bride to Milan. It was in the great hall of the castello where the men were wont to play at ball as their sons do to this day in the cities of the Lombard plain and the Apennines. Leonardo himself painted the vaulted roof in azure and gold to imitate the firmament. On the wall, tapestries proclaimed the deeds of arms and statecraft of the Sforza and the Visconti. At the entrance stood a huge arch, and beneath it was the colossal image of Ludovico himself on horseback, and again, perchance, Leonardo made it. To the ball came all the court of Milan and all the wedding guests. And peasant girls from every part of Italy danced before them, and the duchess gave "the palm of Terp-

Be the particular fete what it may, that it in Hahn's imagination comes the great duke in stately procession. There is the sweep of harps, the ordered beat of drums, the acclaim of trumpets; the measured progress of the cortége. The impression is of stately and graceful formality. Then the dances—perhaps the dances of the peasant maidens from every corner of Italy. The games suggest the curious and exotic artistry that has discovered and designed them—a Lesquercade, a Romanesque, and an Ibérienne. They are all archaic dances rhythmed in the vein of formal grace and polished fantasy, or in the Ibérienne, whirling with sharp and fiery motion. Next the classic mask, which was a part of every such pageant in the joyous paganism of the Renaissance. It is Leda and her ruffling swan, subdued by Hahn, polished amorist always, to the tender sentiment that he fancies, perhaps, in his Beatrice; polished in every measure as befits her court. Last, the stately coranto of the duchess and her train, and then the duke departs as he came. The suite is artificial music, deliberately archaic, polished often to the last touch of elegance or piquancy, subdued as often to courtly form, sharpened now and then with fantastic contrast and superficial always. Yet with a little sympathetic imagination the breath of a Renaissance pageant and the faint, far fragrance of Beatrice herself blow lightly through it.

The rest of the programme lent no such piquant spur to fancy. Lazzeri's octet for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, two horns and two bassoons, gave pleasure by the richness of its harmonies and its warm blending of the peculiar voices of the several instruments. Lacroix's symphonic variations for the same instruments, less one bassoon and with a bass clarinet added, was less fertile in melodic invention and harmonic detail, and less wooing in its fused or contrasted tonal colors—an ingenious exercise in music for wind choir and little more. Mouquet's sonata for flute and piano, on the other hand, was notable in its kind. It used the flute in its full and undulating tones and not in the shrill and skipping brevura of many a tawdry show-piece. It gave them the voice of song and it colored them with quick and warm imagination. Pan piped to the shepherds, sung with the birds, beguiled the nymphs, and one or another made him playful answer. Even a flute may inspire to such fancies with Mouquet's feeling for it to shape the music and Mr. Daniel Maquarre's artistry to play it. Perhaps indeed the flowing beauty, the soft fullness and the rippling life of the music lay most of all in his [illegible]. H. T. P.

The Western Trip of the Symphony Orchestra

A week from next Sunday, on Jan. 27, the Symphony Orchestra begins the longest Western trip that it has made in many years. A year ago, last autumn, before the season began here, it journeyed as far as Buffalo, Cleveland and Toronto. Now it is going to Chicago, where it has not played for fifteen years, to Indianapolis and to Cincinnati. The first concert of the little tour takes place at Rochester on Monday evening, Jan. 28; the second at Cleveland on Tuesday, Jan. 29; the third at Chicago on Wednesday, Jan. 30; the fourth at Detroit on Thursday, Jan. 31; the fifth at Indianapolis on Friday, Feb. 1; and the sixth at Cincinnati on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 2. From Cincinnati, the orchestra returns directly to Boston. Dr. Muck, needless to say, is conducting at each concert, and making his first appearance in the several cities to be visited. Mr. Adamowski will be the solo violinist in Rochester, Cleveland and Detroit; and Mr. Hess in Cincinnati. In Chicago, Rudolph Ganz, the pianist, plays with the orchestra; and in Indianapolis the local management wished no soloist at all. The programmes, as usual on the journeys of the orchestra, have been made exclusively from compositions that we in Boston have already heard. Beethoven's seventh symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan," and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" stand on three. Detroit is to hear Glazounoff's fifth symphony; Indianapolis, Brahms's first; and Cincinnati the symphony by Sibelius that made so large an impression here a fortnight ago. In full the programmes are:

At Rochester Jan. 28, and Cleveland Jan. 29—

Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violin in B-minor, No.3. (Mr. Adamowski.)
Beethoven: Symphony in A major, No. 7.

At Chicago Jan. 30—

Wagner: Overture to "Rienzi."
Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Tchaikovsky: Concerto for Piano in B-flat, No. 1. (Mr. Ganz.)
Beethoven: Symphony in A major, No. 7.

At Detroit Jan. 31—

Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violin in B-minor, No.3. (Mr. Adamowski.)
Glazounoff: Symphony in B-flat, No. 5.

At Indianapolis Feb. 1—

Brahms: Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

At Cincinnati Feb. 2—

Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Beethoven: Concerto for Violin in D major. (Mr. Hess.)
Sibelius: Symphony in E minor, No. 1.

[redacted]

Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," after the like-named poem by Walt Whitman, will be played for the first times in Boston at the Symphony concerts of Jan. 25 and 26. It was written in 1904-1905, and it has been played by the Cincinnati and the Philadelphia orchestras. It is the only one of Mr. Converse's more recent compositions in the larger forms that has not yet been heard here.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
JANUARY 17, 1907

THE LONGY CLUB CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Lazzari—Octuor for Wood and Brass wind.
Mouquet—"The Flute of Pan," Sonata for Flute and Piano.
Lacroix—Variations Symphoniques, for Wood and Brass wind.
Hahn—"Le Bal de Beatrice D'Este." Suite for wind orchestra and piano.

Mr. Longy is known for his tact and taste in programme-making and the list of the concert of last night, in Potter Hall, was a striking example of this good quality. Every number on the programme had its points of interest. The scores were larger than usual, the three last numbers were new to Boston, and to the full forces of the Longy Club there were added Mr. Fritsche, bass clarinette, Mr. Kloepfel, trumpet, Mr. Ludwig, cymbals, Mr. Rettberg, kettledrums, and Mr. H. Schuecker, harp.

The most important score of the concert was Hahn's Suite, which was fully orchestral, save for the absence of the strings. It called for two flutes, oboe, clarinettes, horns, bassoons, trumpet, kettledrums, cymbals, harp and piano. Nor was the work by Lacroix less "exigeant" in its scoring, for it added English horn and bass clarinette to the usual wind score. One can imagine the rich effect of such instrumentation in such a small auditorium as Potter Hall. Reynaldo Hahn, the young Venezuelan (he is 32 years old) is not a seeker after mysteries or tonal ugliness; he is a melodic and even a sentimental composer, and this Suite has a directness of tune in its short movements that ought to float it to popularity.

It is a free Suite, giving an occasional dance movement of the old type, but also several freer romantic touches. It gives some prominent work to the harp, particularly in the first and last movements. There were some striking glissando effects which were startling and in all his work Mr. Schuecker was very successful. The Ball of Beatrice d'Este may not have been as large as the recent Police Ball but it was more graceful. Some of the dance movements were full of delicacy and finesse. Mr. Lougy directed the little orchestra and read the work finely, giving the pomp and circumstance of the more bombastic movements with appropriate power, yet portraying the quaint old style of the Romanesca equally well. The "Iberienne," in which the trumpet and horn were excellently played, was one of the best points of the Suite. Lacroix's variations were played with fine ensemble. It was interesting to listen to English horn and bass clarinette in Potter Hall, for one cannot study their effects so easily in Symphony Hall, where we generally hear them. The English horn was beautifully played by Mr. C. Lenom in the opening theme, and the bass clarinette stood forth effectively in the first variation. The variations were thoroughly well made music and had the advantage of passing the instruments in review before the auditor, each one becoming prominent in turn. The Ocíette by Lazzari was also a skilfully made composition, but it scarcely seemed to have a "raison d'etre," it did not convince one of the wisdom of trying to discard the strings. It has some good counterpoint, even to the fugato level, and it was well interpreted. It is not new to Boston, thanks to the Longy Club.

The most effective work of all remains to be spoken of. Judged from the standpoint of virtuosity and of originality, the new sonata, "The Flute of Pan," was the most important number. It was performed by Messrs. Maquarre and De Voto. Mouquet is another of the younger Frenchmen, one of the Conservatoire crop (by the way Hahn also studied there) and, we believe, a winner of the great "Prix de Rome." His "Flute of Pan" is a great addition to the concert repertoire of the flute. The chief difficulty in writng a sonata or concerto for this instrument is that it lacks the varied tone-colors of the stringed instruments, or of the clarinette. It is brilliant in the upper register and sentimental in the lower, and cannot get very far from either of these two qualities. Wherefore the Germans have reviled it and have made the conundrum—"What sounds worse than a flute?" Whereunto the answer is appended, "Two flutes!"

But the French deal more tenderly and wisely with the fine instrument and manage to bring forth beautiful effects from the romantic tube.

Mouquet has written three movements of well-contrasted character. The first jovial, the second ruminative, the finale brilliant. The style of each may be gathered from the mottos added to the movements. They are taken from the Greek and run as follows:

1. (Allegro Giocoso.) Pan and the Shepherds. "Oh Pan! who dwellest in the mountains, sing to us from your sweet lips a song. Sing to us and play upon your pastoral pipe."
2. (Adagio.) Pan and the birds. "Seated in the shade of the solitary wood, Oh, Pan, why dost thou draw from thy flute such delicious sounds."
3. (Allegro.) Pan and the nymphs. "Silence, in the shade of the oak trees. Silence, fountains plashing upon the rocks. Silence, sheep which bleat beside your young. Pan himself sings with his harmonious pipes. Around him with lightest steps dance the nymphs of the waters and of the woods."

Mouquet would have been contented with the debut of his work in Boston, had he heard the performance. Messrs. Maquarre and De Voto played the sonata as if they loved it, and the shading, the phrasing, the ensemble, were all that could be desired.

Mr. Maquarre is one of the great flautists of the world, and Mr. De Voto is a most sterling chamber musician whose discretion and care might be studied by some of the world-famous pianists when it comes to uniting with other instruments.

The sonata was free in form. The second movement had a meditative quality, such as Debussy's faun had one afternoon, and its delicacy was splendidly preserved by Messrs. Marquarre and De Voto.

There was much quaintness in the finale, in which the difficult runs were made excellently and the climax was commendably worked up. The work won much applause from the large audience and Mr. Maquarre and Mr. De Voto were recalled several times.

Altogether this was one of the best concerts that the Longy club have ever given and we freely forgive its starting nearly 20 minutes behind time. Louis C. Elson.

BOOT AND SHOE CLUB

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
JANUARY 19, 1907

The interest shown in the playing of Katherine Goodson, the pianist, at yesterday's Symphony rehearsal, where she appeared for the first time in Boston, promises much for her succes at the recital she is to give under Manager Mudgett's direction, at Chickering Hall, next Thursday afternoon. Her programme includes many novelties of the old schools, the several numbers being as follows: Mozart's Sonata A major; Menuett E flat, Beethoven; Arietta, Leonardo Leo (1694-1778); Gavottes by Exaudet (1710-1763), Corelli (1653-1713), and Rameau (1683-1764); Sonata (Moonlight), Beethoven; Andantino and Papillons, Op. 2, Schumann; Rhapsody, Op. 23 "Episodes of a Romance," Arthur Hinton; and Prelude D flat, Waltz G flat, Op. 70, Waltz A flat, Op. 42, and Scherzo in B minor, Op. 20, Chopin.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
JANUARY 19, 1907.

NEXT week's rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra will be the last before the orchestra starts on its western trip. It promises to be of special interest from the fact that Mme. Melba is to be the soloist, singing "L'Amero sero costante" from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," and "Ah, for e lui" from Verdi's "La Traviata." This concert will also be marked by the fact that Dr. Muck brings forward another work by an American-and-Boston composer, Mr. Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter." The symphony will be Berloiz's "Harold in Italy," Mr. Ferir playing the solo viola.

On Monday evening next the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony quartet will be given in Chickering Hall, Mr. Victor Benham, pianist, assisting.

Next week Thursday evening is the date for the next Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Prof. Wily Hess being the solo artist.

MUSICAL AMERICA

January 19, 1907

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA PLAYS IN WASHINGTON

Warnke Takes the Place of Adamowski Who is on Sick List.

Glazounoff Symphony Proves to be Most Interesting of Numbers Offered by Dr. Karl Muck—Goltermann Concerto Given by 'Cellist—Mrs. Roosevelt Attends.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 14.—Every seat in the house and practically all the standing room was occupied at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday of last week.

The orchestra has been facing a series of mishaps. Dr. Muck was unable to conduct the rehearsal and concert of the orchestra in Boston on December 28 and 29. The soloist on that occasion was Timothee Adamowski. Last week Dr. Muck had recovered from his cold and was at the conductor's desk, but Mr. Adamowski was too ill to play, and was replaced by the 'cellist, Heinrich Warnke, who gave Goltermann's concerto. The remainder of the programme was devoted to Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony and Elgar's overture, "In the South."

By far the most interesting number of the afternoon was the Glazounoff symphony. In its last movement marched wild defiance of conventional rhythm and accent, where syncopation crowded upon syncopation and lawlessness ran rampant. The second movement, "Scherzo," was full of sparkle and the bright quiver of sunbeams. The "Andante" was of a quiet, meditative loveliness.

It is said that the Elgar overture was conceived on a glorious Spring day in the Valley of Andora, and that it is meant to suggest the joy of living in a balmy climate under sunny skies; and yet nearly half of it sounded frigid. Aside from the descriptive aspect of the music, it was an interesting example of Elgar's style.

The Goltermann concerto was perhaps the least interesting work on the programme. Mr. Warnke played admirably, and Dr. Muck was never more active in the pursuit of perfection.

Mrs. Roosevelt entertained a box party, and many well-known society women and musicians were in the audience.

[117]

MUSICAL AMERICA January 19, 1907

Boston Symphony Quartette Introduces Kaun Composition

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTETTE

Reproduced from a New Photograph. The Organization Consists of Willy Hess, First Violin; Otto Roth, Second Violin; Emil Ferir, Viola, and Heinrich Warnke, 'Cello

There was a good attendance at the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartette at Mendelssohn Hall, Friday afternoon, for an interesting programme and excellent soloist had been announced, in addition to the four artists of the quartette, who in themselves have always drawn large and enthusiastic audiences.

The novelty introduced to the patrons of the concert was Hugo Kaun's string quartette in D major. Mr. Kaun, now a resident of Berlin, was for some years active in the musical life of Milwaukee and Chicago.

This latest emanation from his pen is a work of serious merit. In some ways it varies decidedly from the quartette form as conceived by former masters. There are only three movements; the first and last are slow, the second lively. While there is a certain lack of plasticity in the treatment and a tendency to melodic output without a definite result, the quartette held the interest of the audience throughout. The last movement is a splendidly conceived, deeply emotional and superbly written piece, in which the part writing is of the finest description and full of excellent color effects.

Professor Hess and his organization did their best work in the novelty. Breadth of tone and convincing artistry were aided by a deep understanding of the music in securing effects which won warm tributes of applause from the audience. Beethoven's Quartette in F minor Op. 95, was played with power.

Between the two quartettes Mme. von Niessen-Stone sang a group of German songs to a pianoforte accompaniment by Anna Lockwood. The songs—three by Schubert and four by Hugo Wolf—were sung with ripe intelligence and warm temperament, qualities pre-eminent in all the work of this artist, and which stamp a song sung by her with originality. The artist was disclosed as well in the selections, all of which were unhackneyed. They were "Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang" and "Liebhaber in Allen Gestalten," by Schubert, and "Wir rief ich denn?" "Wir haben beide lang Zeit geschwiegen," "Sie blasen zum Abmarsch" and "In den Schatten meiner Locken," by Wolf.

MELBA'S SON ARRIVES.

George N. Armstrong Reaches New York with His Young Wife.

Tall, slim, slightly stoop-shouldered, clad in a gray suit and a gray overcoat and with a fine ruby glowing from a gray silk four-in-hand tie, George Nesbit Armstrong, son of Mme. Melba, descended the gangplank of the Carmania, Sunday, accompanied by his wife, a daughter of Sir Jocelyn Otway, of Otway Hall, Northumberland.

Mme. Melba was not on the pier to greet her son and daughter-in-law, but several persons whom she had delegated to meet the couple were on hand, among them her private secretaries, Misses Murphy and Moore, and Mr. Heck, of Carnegie Hall.

"Which opera do you most like to hear your mother sing?" young Armstrong was asked by one of the newspaper men at the pier.

He considered a moment, and then said: "'La Bohème.'"

"Have you ever heard her say which one she likes best to sing?"

"No," he said, "I have not." Then he added with a laugh: "She would not sing any that she didn't like.'

"Do you sing or play any musical instrument?"

Before he could reply Mrs. Armstrong replied for him. "He does not," she said. "He cannot even play a polyphone."

Mr. and Mrs. Armstrong were driven to Mme. Melba's apartments, at Fifty-ninth street and Seventh avenue, where they will make their home during their stay in New York.

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN:
JANUARY 20, 1907

Other Note and Comment.

The plans for the western trip of the Boston symphony orchestra are now completed. With Dr Muck it will leave Boston Sunday evening, the 27th, and go direct to Rochester, where it will give a concert in the Lyceum theater on Monday evening. The soloist will be T. Adamowski. The next evening it will give a concert in Gray's armory, Cleveland, this being one of the course of seven concerts given by various orchestras in that city. Mr Adamowski will also be the soloist there. Wednesday evening, it will give a concert in the Auditorium, Chicago, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist. Thursday evening, it plays in Light Guard armory, Detroit, with Mr Adamowski as soloist. Friday evening, it gives a concert in the English opera house, Indianapolis, without a soloist, and Saturday afternoon it plays in Music hall, Cincinnati, with Prof Willy Hess as soloist. From Cincinnati it returns directly to Boston.

Mme Olga Samaroff expects to sail for Europe in the early spring and plans are being made whereby in the spring and autumn she will play in London and in the principal cities of the continent. Curiously enough, London is the only European city in which she has ever given a public performance, for her entire career has been passed in this country.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 19, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MENDELSSOHN, SCHUBERT, AND A NEW PIANIST

Miss Katharine Goodson Makes Her Debut in America, Playing Grieg's Concerto—Concerts and Recitals Next Week—Miss von Radecki Returns—The Weeks to Come—More Salon Music

Miss Katharine Goodson, an English pianist of high repute in her own land, and somewhat widely known in various countries of Europe, made her first public appearance in America yesterday afternoon before an unusually enthusiastic and appreciative audience, who brought her back for four hearty recalls. The programme:

Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for Piano.....Grieg
Symphony in C major.....Schubert

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture must always remain an exceedingly striking instance of the rapid and definite crystallization of individuality at an early age in the range of classic musical literature. The youthful Mozart to be sure gave far more phenomenal exhibitions of mere precocity, of amazing fluency of invention and sheer instinct for composition. But considering how much earlier relatively, his life of productivity began, and how incessantly it was stimulated by the fresh impressions of musicians in various musical cities, he achieved nothing that can bear comparison in point of total originality with the Scherzo of Mendelssohn's Octet or this overture. It contains the kernel of all his romanticism, unfolded later in the overtures "To the Tale of Fair Melusina" to "Fingal's Cave" and the calm introduction to the "Meeresstille." Aside from the indisputable freshness of musical invention, the novelty of orchestral effects alone would have rendered it immortal. The imaginative chords in the woodwind at once proclaim a new world of tone; the scheme of using the violins divided for so considerable a time is a sufficiently memorable achievement in itself, although Berlioz, within a few years, was destined independently to use this device in his revolutionary Fantastic Symphony. The discreetly descriptive humor of the low notes of the solo bassoon and horn, followed by the long sustained tone of the ophicleide (played of necessity on the bass tuba) in delicate allusion to the ass's bray from a grotesque contrast to exquisite fairy music that must have been totally and unforgettably new. It would require much study and careful deduction to enumerate in accurate detail the whole significance from the double point of musical and orchestral invention. It is enough to state that in the year of grace, 1907, aided by a marvellously finished performance, it still sounded spontaneously charming and poetically novel. Considering the ruthless advance of time and the rapid evolution of musical style more could scarcely be said.

Miss Goodson made an exceedingly pleasant and forceful impression. The Grieg concerto has been played so frequently in these concerts that there is no necessity for discussing its qualities at length. It presents an opportunity for moderate display of virtuosity, no little poetic temperament and much of that somewhat indefinable quality known as musicianship. Miss Goodson met these tests not only adequately, but with a generous reserve. Her technique is of that ample and fluent nature which is taken for granted as an essential for musical equipment. Her tone is powerful in forte without being hard; it is penetratingly full and singing in piano. Her rhythm is incisive, full of fire and yet when the occasion demands, elastic. In her performance one was conscious not merely of the well-equipped pianist, but also of the curtivated and thoughtful musician. Her interpretation was poetic, supplying that indispensable sense of imaginative atmosphere so absolutely essential to Grieg, while containing precisely that right pitch of bravura abandon, of dramatic sensuousness which the concerto demands. Too often the inexorable standards of technical cultivation and range of repertory combine to crush the development of the finer musical and expressive instincts. This is painfully the case with many pianists of indubitable talent, now before the public. It is a pleasure, therefore, to record that in Miss Goodson the technical and interpretative qualities are balanced to an uncommon degree, and that her performance of the Greig concerto showed the sensitive and responsive musician as well as the skilful pianist; an artistic temperament of vitality and poise. Her forthcoming recital will be awaited with distinct interest.

Dr. Muck's interpretation of the great C major symphony was an object of interested expectation. With some miscalculations of instrumental effect, there are many problems in the performance of this symphony which tax the resources of even the skilful conductor of today. To prevent the woodwind from being overpowered by the strnigs, to keep the trumpets from "cutting through," to allow the trombones to be heard without detriment to the tonal balance of the orchestra, all these are no slight tasks. Dr. Muck's performance of this perennially great work was conspicuously great. The symphony sounded remarkably convincing throughout; the genuine Schubert quality was manifest, and yet the volume of tone, while always well-balanced, was distinctly modern in its richness and dramatic quality. Possibly some exception might be taken to the tempo of the andante con moto as being faster than tradition, somewhat to its disadvantage, but this tempo was not maintained rigorously throughout. Nevertheless the performance of the symphony as a whole was remarkably eloquent and satisfying.

E. B. H.

/ / + / /

[118]

[illegible] Converse's [illegible] tic Trumpeter," and the reappearance of Mme. Melba, after two years of absence, make the chief interest of the thirteenth pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. In another column there is some account of Mr. Converse's music with quotations from the verses by Walt Whitman that suggested it. In New York, at the Manhattan Opera House, and in Boston, at Mrs. McAllister's concert, last Monday, Mme. Melba showed that she is at the very meridian of her powers. Her pieces at the Symphony concerts are the air with flute obbligato from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" and Violetta's showy scena from the first act of Verdi's "La Traviata." The symphony is Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," the first large composition by the Frenchman that Dr. Muck has attempted this winter, and in it Mr. Férir will play the solo viola part that speaks the moods and the musings of Harold.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
JANUARY 20, 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Katharine Goodson the Symphony Soloist.

People's Choral Union Promises Interesting Program.

Busy Week of Recitals—Preludes and Echoes.

Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who made her first appearance in America last week at the Symphony concerts, proved to be an artist whose reputation abroad was evidently based upon merit, if one may judge from her performance of the A minor Grieg concerto and the cordial manner in which she was greeted by the members of the orchestra at the close of her work. The audience, too, was really "wildly enthusiastic," for a Symphony audience; but the reception by her associate players showed pretty plainly that her advance heralding was unlike that of some artists from across the sea, where more fancy than fact appeared in the preliminary notices.

Mme Goodson in every phase of the work appeared to readily respond to its demands and she is fortunately mistress of an arm power that is able to cope with an orchestra and sustain the right balance for the solo instrument in the musical picture.

As for technique and skill in all kinds of finger work the pianist is well endowed. And with the possible exception in the earlier part of the first movement her pedaling was admirably adjusted to the requirements of the finger board. And she is so sincere and unassuming in her performance that she impresses the auditor with being a serious devotee in her chosen field of endeavor an artist whose temperament is thoroughly artistic and who is a student always.

Her tone is very pleasing, whether in piano or fortissimo, and in the first movement of the concerto she gave a splendid exhibition of brilliancy in the long cadenza, which nearly runs the gamut of tonal colors. The bravura passages in the second part and the cantabel, later on, were each thoroughly satisfactory. Very clear and rapid was her arpeggio work in the third part, and the fortissimo finale of the closing movement was as vigorous and well sustained as one would expect to hear at the hands of a woman. She was recalled several times amidst loud plaudits—and Dr Muck smiled as though he enjoyed the tributes of appreciation bestowed upon the English visitor.

The orchestral numbers were the Mendelssohn overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Schubert's grand symphony in C major. The dainty and fairy-like passage for the strings were charmingly played; fairly shimmering in brilliancy and unity of execution in the overture. The Schubert overture, which to some minds should be relieved of a number of the repetitions in its score, deserves high praise. The interpretation was masterly in every way, all the familiar beauties of the composition, and they are very many, being shown in vivid musical colors, and Dr Muck read the score in a loving and sympathetic manner.

Mme Melba will be this week's soloist, singing "L'Amero," from Mozart's opera, "Il Re Pastore" and an aria from Verdi's "Traviata." Mr F. S. Converse will be represented on the program by an orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," given for the first time in Boston. The symphony will be "Harold in Italy," by Berlioz, Mr Fevir playing the solo viola part.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The assisting pianist at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony quartet in Chickering hall tomorrow evening will be Mr Victor Benham of Detroit. The other assisting artist will be Mr George Grisez, first clarinet of the Symphony orchestra. The program contains no novelties, but Mozart's quintet for clarinet and strings is so seldom heard that it will be new to nearly all the audience. The selections will be Brahm's quartet in B-flat major, the Mozart quintet and Tschaikowsky's trio for piano, violin and cello, "To the Memory of a Great Artist."

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONIES.

The next Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre Thursday evening, Jan. [illegible] artist will be Prof Willy Hess. The program will comprise Mozart's overture to [illegible] other Nicode [illegible] Concerto [illegible]

Boston Symphony Quartette Introduces Kaun Composition

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTETTE

Reproduced from a New Photograph. The Organization Consists of Willy Hess, First Violin; Otto Roth, Second Violin; Emil Ferir, Viola, and Heinrich Warnke, 'Cello

There was a good attendance at the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartette at Mendelssohn Hall, Friday afternoon, for an interesting programme and excellent soloist had been announced, in addition to the four artists of the quartette, who in themselves have always drawn large and enthusiastic audiences.

The novelty introduced to the patrons of the concert was Hugo Kaun's string quartette in D major. Mr. Kaun, now a resident of Berlin, was for some years active in the musical life of Milwaukee and Chicago.

This latest emanation from his pen is a work of serious merit. In some ways it varies decidedly from the quartette form as conceived by former masters. There are only three movements; the first and last are slow, the second lively. While there is a certain lack of plasticity in the treatment and a tendency to melodic output without a definite result, the quartette held the interest of the audience throughout. The last movement is a splendidly conceived, deeply emotional and superbly written piece, in which the part writing is of the finest description and full of excellent color effects.

Professor Hess and his organization did their best work in the novelty. Breadth of tone and convincing artistry were aided by a deep understanding of the music in securing effects which won warm tributes of applause from the audience. Beethoven's Quartette in F minor Op. 95, was played with power.

Between the two quartettes Mme. von Niessen-Stone sang a group of German songs to a pianoforte accompaniment by Anna Lockwood. The songs—three by Schubert and four by Hugo Wolf—were sung with ripe intelligence and warm temperament, qualities pre-eminent in all the work of this artist, and which stamp a song sung by her with originality. The artist was disclosed as well in the selections, all of which were unhackneyed. They were "Liebeslauschen," "Schwanengesang" and "Liebhaber in Allen Gestalten," by Schubert, and "Wir rief ich denn?" "Wir haben beide lang Zeit geschwiegen," "Sie blasen zum Abmarsch" and "In den Schatten meiner Locken," by Wolf.

MELBA'S SON ARRIVES.

George N. Armstrong Reaches New York with His Young Wife.

Tall, slim, slightly stoop-shouldered, clad in a gray suit and a gray overcoat and with a fine ruby glowing from a gray silk four-in-hand tie, George Nesbit Armstrong, son of Mme. Melba, descended the gangplank of the Carmania, Sunday, accompanied by his wife, a daughter of Sir Jocelyn Otway, of Otway Hall, Northumberland.

Mme. Melba was not on the pier to greet her son and daughter-in-law, but several persons whom she had delegated to meet the couple were on hand, among them her private secretaries, Misses Murphy and Moore, and Mr. Heck, of Carnegie Hall.

"Which opera do you most like to hear your mother sing?" young Armstrong was asked by one of the newspaper men at the pier.

He considered a moment, and then said: "'La Bohème.'"

"Have you ever heard her say which one she likes best to sing?"

"No," he said, "I have not." Then he added with a laugh: "She would not sing any that she didn't like."

"Do you sing or play any musical instrument?"

Before he could reply Mrs. Armstrong replied for him. "He does not," she said. "He cannot even play a polyphone."

Mr. and Mrs. Armstrong were driven to Mme. Melba's apartments, at Fifty-ninth street and Seventh avenue, where they will make their home during their stay in New York.

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN: JANUARY 20, 1907

Other Note and Comment.

The plans for the western trip of the Boston symphony orchestra are now completed. With Dr Muck it will leave Boston Sunday evening, the 27th, and go direct to Rochester, where it will give a concert in the Lyceum theater on Monday evening. The soloist will be T. Adamowski. The next evening it will give a concert in Gray's armory, Cleveland, this being one of the course of seven concerts given by various orchestras in that city. Mr Adamowski will also be the soloist there. Wednesday evening, it will give a concert in the Auditorium, Chicago, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist. Thursday evening, it plays in Light Guard armory, Detroit, with Mr Adamowski as soloist. Friday evening, it gives a concert in the English opera house, Indianapolis, without a soloist, and Saturday afternoon it plays in Music hall, Cincinnati, with Prof Willy Hess as soloist. From Cincinnati it returns directly to Boston.

Mme Olga Samaroff expects to sail for Europe in the early spring and plans are being made whereby in the spring and autumn she will play in London and in the principal cities of the continent. Curiously enough, London is the only European city in which she has ever given a public performance, for her entire career has been passed in this country.

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 19, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MENDELSSOHN, SCHUBERT, AND A NEW PIANIST

Miss Katharine Goodson Makes Her Debut in America, Playing Grieg's Concerto—Concerts and Recitals Next Week—Miss von Radecki Returns — The Weeks to Come—More Salon Music

Miss Katharine Goodson, an English pianist of high repute in her own land, and somewhat widely known in various countries of Europe, made her first public appearance in America yesterday afternoon before an unusually enthusiastic and appreciative audience, who brought her back for four hearty recalls. The programme:

Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for Piano.....Grieg
Symphony in C major.....Schubert

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture must always remain an exceedingly striking instance of the rapid and definite crystallization of individuality at an early age in the range of classic musical literature. The youthful Mozart to be sure gave far more phenomenal exhibitions of mere precocity, of amazing fluency of invention and sheer instinct for composition. But considering how much earlier relatively, his life of productivity began, and how incessantly it was stimulated by the fresh impressions of musicians in various musical cities, he achieved nothing that can bear comparison in point of total originality with the Scherzo of Mendelssohn's Octet or this overture. It contains the kernel of all his romanticism, unfolded later in the overtures "To the Tale of Fair Melusina" to "Fingal's Cave" and the calm introduction to the "Meeresstille." Aside from the indisputable freshness of musical invention, the novelty of orchestral effects alone would have rendered it immortal. The imaginative chords in the woodwind at once proclaim a new world of tone; the scheme of using the violins divided for so considerable a time is a sufficiently memorable achievement in itself, although Berlioz, within a few years, was destined independently to use this device in his revolutionary Fantastic Symphony. The discreetly descriptive humor of the low notes of the solo bassoon and horn, followed by the long sustained tone of the ophicleide (played of necessity on the bass tuba) in delicate allusion to the ass's bray from a grotesque contrast to exquisite fairy music that must have been totally and unforgettably new. It would require much study and careful deduction to enumerate in accurate detail the whole significance from the double point of musical and orchestral invention. It is enough to state that in the year of grace, 1907, aided by a marvellously finished performance, it still sounded spontaneously charming and poetically novel. Considering the ruthless advance of time and the rapid evolution of musical style more could scarcely be said.

Miss Goodson made an exceedingly pleasant and forceful impression. The Grieg concerto has been played so frequently in these concerts that there is no necessity for discussing its qualities at length. It presents an opportunity for moderate display of virtuosity, no little poetic temperament and much of that somewhat indefinable quality known as musicianship. Miss Goodson met these tests not only adequately, but with a generous reserve. Her technique is of that ample and fluent nature which is taken for granted as an essential for musical equipment. Her tone is powerful in forte without being hard; it is penetratingly full and singing in piano. Her rhythm is incisive, full of fire and yet when the occasion demands, elastic. In her performance one was conscious not merely of the well-equipped pianist, but also of the curtivated and thoughtful musician. Her interpretation was poetic, supplying that indispensable sense of imaginative atmosphere so absolutely essential to Grieg, while containing precisely that right pitch of bravura abandon, of dramatic sensuousness which the concerto demands. Too often the inexorable standards of technical cultivation and range of repertory combine to crush the development of the finer musical and expressive instincts. This is painfully the case with many pianists of indubitable talent, now before the public. It is a pleasure, therefore, to record that in Miss Goodson the technical and interpretative qualities are balanced to an uncommon degree, and that her performance of the Greig concerto showed the sensitive and responsive musician as well as the skilful pianist; an artistic temperament of vitality and poise. Her forthcoming recital will be awaited with distinct interest.

Dr. Muck's interpretation of the great C major symphony was an object of interested expectation. With some miscalculations of instrumental effect, there are many problems in the performance of this symphony which tax the resources of even the skilful conductor of today. To prevent the woodwind from being overpowered by the strnigs, to keep the trumpets from "cutting through," to allow the trombones to be heard without detriment to the tonal balance of the orchestra, all these are no slight tasks. Dr. Muck's performance of this perennially great work was conspicuously great. The symphony sounded remarkably convincing throughout; the genuine Schubert quality was manifest, and yet the volume of tone, while always well-balanced, was distinctly modern in its richness and dramatic quality. Possibly some exception might be taken to the tempo of the andamte con moto as being faster than tradition, somewhat to its disadvantage, but this tempo was not maintained rigorously throughout. Nevertheless the performance of the symphony as a whole was remarkably eloquent and satisfying.

E. B. H.

/ / + / /

[118]

Concerts Next Week

The first performance in Boston of Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasia, "The Mystic Trumpeter," and the reappearance of Mme. Melba, after two years of absence, make the chief interest of the thirteenth pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. In another column there is some account of Mr. Converse's music with quotations from the verses by Walt Whitman that suggested it. In New York, at the Manhattan Opera House, and in Boston, at Mrs. McAllister's concert, last Monday, Mme. Melba showed that she is at the very meridian of her powers. Her pieces at the Symphony concerts are the air with flute obbligato from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" and Violetta's showy scena from the first act of Verdi's "La Traviata." The symphony is Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," the first large composition by the Frenchman that Dr. Muck has attempted this winter, and in it Mr. Férir will play the solo viola part that speaks the moods and the musings of Harold.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE

JANUARY 20, 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Katharine Goodson the Symphony Soloist.

People's Choral Union Promises Interesting Program.

Busy Week of Recitals—Preludes and Echoes.

Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who made her first appearance in America last week at the Symphony concerts, proved to be an artist whose reputation abroad was evidently based upon merit, if one may judge from her performance of the A minor Grieg concerto and the cordial manner in which she was greeted by the members of the orchestra at the close of her work. The audience, too, was really "wildly enthusiastic," for a Symphony audience; but the reception by her associate players showed pretty plainly that her advance heralding was unlike that of some artists from across the sea, where more fancy than fact appeared in the preliminary notices.

Mme Goodson in every phase of the work appeared to readily respond to its demands and she is fortunately mistress of an arm power that is able to cope with an orchestra and sustain the right balance for the solo instrument in the musical picture.

As for technique and skill in all kinds of finger work the pianist is well endowed. And with the possible exception in the earlier part of the first movement her pedaling was admirably adjusted to the requirements of the finger board. And she is so sincere and unassuming in her performance that she impresses the auditor with being a serious devotee in her chosen field of endeavor; an artist whose temperament is thoroughly artistic and who is a student always.

Her tone is very pleasing, whether in piano or fortissimo, and in the first movement of the concerto she gave a splendid exhibition of brilliancy in the long cadenza, which nearly runs the gamut of tonal colors. The bravura passages in the second part and the cantabel, later on, were each thoroughly satisfactory. Very clear and rapid was her arpeggio work in the third part, and the fortissimo finale of the closing movement was as vigorous and well sustained as one would expect to hear at the hands of a woman. She was recalled several times amidst loud plaudits—and Dr Muck smiled as though he enjoyed the tributes of appreciation bestowed upon the English visitor.

The orchestral numbers were the Mendelssohn overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Schubert's grand symphony in C major. The dainty and fairy-like passage for the strings were charmingly played; fairly shimmering in brilliancy and unity of execution in the overture. The Schubert overture, which to some minds should be relieved of a number of the repetitions in its score, deserves high praise. The interpretation was masterly in every way, all the familiar beauties of the composition, and they are very many, being shown in vivid musical colors, and Dr Muck read the score in a loving and sympathetic manner.

Mme Melba will be this week's soloist, singing "L'Amero," from Mozart's opera, "Il Re Pastore" and an aria from Verdi's "Traviata." Mr F. S. Converse will be represented on the program by an orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," given for the first time in Boston. The symphony will be "Harold in Italy," by Berlioz, Mr Fevir playing the solo viola part.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The assisting pianist at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony quartet in Chickering hall tomorrow evening will be Mr Victor Benham of Detroit. The other assisting artist will be Mr George Grisez, first clarinet of the Symphony orchestra. The program contains no novelties, but Mozart's quintet for clarinet and strings is so seldom heard that it will be new to nearly all the audience. The selections will be Brahm's quartet in B-flat major, the Mozart quintet and Tschaikowsky's trio for piano, violin and cello, "To the Memory of a Great Artist."

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONIES.

The next Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theatre Thursday evening, Jan 24. The soloist artist will be Prof Willy Hess, and the program will comprise Mendelssohn's overture to Shakspere's "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Mendelssohn's concerto for violin and Sibelius' symphony in E minor, No. 1.

BOSTON AMERICAN—JANUARY 20, 1907.

WOMAN PIANIST FROM LONDON SCORES HIT.

Miss Katherine Goodson, New to America, Wins Flattering Tribute at Symphony Concert.

SCHUBERT'S IMMORTAL NO. 7 GRANDLY PLAYED

By Kent Perkins.

With a warmth of greeting that was flattering in the extreme Miss Katherine Goodson, a young woman pianist from London, new to America, was welcomed at the twelfth Symphony concert of the season last evening in Symphony Hall.

She played Grieg's concerto in A minor op 16 and rarely has that famous and difficult work been set forth more brilliantly, forcefully or feelingly. Miss Goodson is tall and her head is crowned with a mass of Auburn hair. Her manner is intense, dynamic. In her long simple gown of white satin with copious lace falling from the elbows, she seemed, as she struck powerfully the resounding chords of the Norse harmonies, or tripped with fairy-like lightness over the delicate runs and trills, a very embodiment of a Viking's daughter making music in the great hall while warriors quaffed their mead.

Masterfulness, brilliance and power contrasted with deftness and a singing, velvety tone in lighter passages are Miss Goodson's most striking characteristics. This combination took the audience by storm last night, and the player was recalled many times at the close of her performance, while each movement was greeted with a salvo of applause.

The program was opened with Mendelssohn's delicious overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," which the orchestra played with exquisite delicacy.

After the concerto came Schubert's immortal Symphony in C major, No. 7. It is probable that this glorious masterpiece was never given with more tremendous power than it was last night under the spur of Dr. Muck's leadership. Every note of its triumphant measures, every shimmer of flooding sunlight that is sifted through it, every soaring harmony of the "music of the sphere's" that is heard in the wonderful scherzo was given forth with soul-stirring effect. It was a performance to be remembered as an event of a lifetime.

The assisting pianist at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Chickering Hall, to-morrow evening, January 21, will be Victor Benham of Detroit. Mr. Benham is a musician who, after a considerable career abroad, has settled in Detroit, where his work is greatly admired. The other assisting artist will be Georges Grisez, first clarinet of the Symphony Orchestra.

The next Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening, January 24. The solo artist will be Professor Willy Hess, and the programme will comprise Mendelssohn's overture to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn's concerto for violin and Sibelius's Symphony in E minor, No. 1.

The Boston Journal
JANUARY 22, 1907.

MME. GOODSON TO APPEAR.

An important change has been made in the program of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge next Thursday evening, Jan. 24. The soloist instead of being Professor Willy Hess, will be Madame Katharine Goodson, who had such remarkable success at last week's Symphony concerts here. Madame Goodson will play the Greig Concerto.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
JANUARY 21, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn — "Midsummer-night's Dream." Overture.
Grieg—Concerto in A minor, for Piano.
Miss Katharine Goodson, Pianist.
Schubert—Symphony in C major.

The concert began, as usual, a little later than the advertised hour, which deprived some suburban residents of the magnificent finale of the Schubert symphony. There was quite an exodus before the end. Dr. Muck might well copy the practice of Mr. Lang and Mr. Gericke, who always began concerts on time.

The Mendelssohn overture was most daintily played. Whatever the shortcomings of Mendelssohn may have been, in the domain of musical humor he was second only to Richard Strauss and Wagner. His Scherzos are the finest part of his symphonies and in this overture the delicacy of his humor is more attractive than the grotesqueness of a Beethoven or the prattle of a Haydn. Over two centuries ago the musical Sam Pepys saw the Shakespearian play and wrote:

"To the King's Theatre where we saw 'Midsummer's Night's Dream,' which I had never seen before, nor shall ever again, for it is the most insipid ridiculous play that ever I saw in my life."

But Mendelssohn saw something more in it (after all it is often the German who appreciates Shakespeare best), and has vivified the picture of the fairies of the Athenian actor troupe, and of the translated Bottom.

It is a pity one cannot have the ophicleide, which Mendelssohn called for, to picture the raucous quality of Bottom's snore, but the bass tuba filled its place fairly well on this occasion. It is possible, however, that the older instrument may return to modern scores because of its peculiar tone-color. Strauss has brought back the oboe d' Amore, the old Bassethorn is again coming into use, and it is very likely that the ophicleide will soon be resuscitated.

The overture was much applauded and we found it one of Dr. Muck's best readings, conserving all the delicacy of the fairy touches and contrasting these well with the clumsy and awkward antics of the "Pyramus and Thisbe" troupe.

The nub of the concert was the Grieg concerto with Katherine Goodson as the pianist. We have had this concerto with considerable frequency in recent days. Samaroff played it brilliantly and Dr. Ruebner pedantically. But its full power was only revealed at this concert. Katherine Goodson is spoken of in Hullah's recent life of Leschetizky as "one of the best pupils that Leschetizky has ever had," and she proved this most abundantly at this concert. From the very first phrase (in which the piano entered like a rifle shot) the performance was full of authority. There was tremendous technique in the performance, but the technique was only the means to an end; back of it were poetry and musicianally intelligence. There was remarkable breadth, and when it came to the cadenza the octave and chord-playing was colossal; there was a display of wrist-action such as rivalled D'Albert himself. Yet there was no pounding, no pushing of the piano beyond its capabilities.

The finale has all the heartiness of the Halling, that northern dance in which the men try to kick the overhanging rafters in the Barn where they hold their festival. One of the themes of this Rondo is much like "I dreamt that I dwelt in Marble Halls" translated into Norwegian, but Grieg dreams in a very emphatic manner, and Miss Goodson gave the theme with majestic emphasis. We ought not to forget to praise the work of the horn in the first two movements. The instrument is made very prominent, often having duets with the piano.

At the end of the work Miss Goodson received an ovation such as has been given to very few artists in Boston. The wildest applause and recall after recall followed. We most cordialy join in the popuar verdict in this instance. Barring a slight over-use of pedal the performance of the concerto was perfect. Every point was brought out clearly and there was no straining for undue effect, there were no liberties taken with the composer. Boston will look with much interest for the recital of this great pianist next Thursday. Her Boston debut has certainly been both a popular and artistic triumph.

Of the Schubert C major symphony as a work one can say nothing new; therefore we will confine our remarks strictly to its performance. Dr. Muck gave to it much more of the heroic quality than is usual in the first three movements. He spared an unnecessary repeat in the first movement. There is still too much of repetition in the symphony and we hope that some day some Schubert-lover will curtail it in the interests of the composer. In a somewhat briefer form it would not lose any essential part and would be more than ever a masterpiece.

In the first movement the closing theme was given too loudly, but one felt grateful to Dr. Muck for giving prominence to the trombone passages of the coda, glorious passages like the clashing of swords, which we have seldom had with proper masculine vigor.

But this vigor was rather misplaced in the closing passages of the chief theme of the Andante, where the contrasts were magnified until they suggested Mahler rather than Schubert. The crash just before the measure rest, and the anxious chords which herald the return of the subordinate theme on clarinette with counterpoint on the violins, was made of deafening character. Great praise must be given to oboes and clarinettes which have very important work to do almost all through this movement; their work was excellent.

We found the prominence of some of the less important figures to be a merit in the Andante, but not so in the Scherzo, where the rhythm of merely accompanying figures was sometimes too distinct.

[illegible] among the triumphs of Dr. Muck's interpretations. In the first place it was not rushed in a manner to impair the figure of the violins in the chief theme. Then the four mighty strokes (which Schubert may have borrowed from Beethoven's Violin concerto) a sort of double Spondee, were given with splendid majesty. The final crescendo was also superb. Here in this movement all the virility which Dr. Muck forced to the utmost was quite in place, for this is a finale such as Beethoven ought to have had to his "Eroica;" it certainly balances the heroic character of the first movement of that wonderful work. Dr. Muck was recalled at the end of this and fully deserved the tribute; if we feel that there was an excess of power in the second and third movements we cannot sufficiently praise the coda of the first and the whole of the last movement, both in performance and in reading.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON TRAVELER
JANUARY 21, 1907.

For the Symphony concert Saturday evening Dr. Muck offered Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, Grieg's Concerto in A minor for piano, Miss Katherine Goodson being the pianist, and Schubert's C major symphony. It was a wonderful concert, easily the best of the season to date, one that will compare with the best in the orchestra's record, and one that is not likely to be equalled right away.

Dr. Muck's reading of the Mendelssohn overture was simply superb. It's a choice number in its own right, and when its wonderful beauties are brought out, as they were Saturday night, it must be put on a slightly higher pedestal than ever before. Miss Goodson's debut in the Grieg concerto was an unqualified triumph. Seldom is it Boston's good fortune to greet such an exceptional artist, and never before has it heard the concerto so artistically presented.

The Schubert symphony, grand in itself, never before seemed to make the impression it did at this concert. Was it the magnetism created by that which had gone before, or was it again the revealing of new beauties by Dr. Muck?

This week's rehearsal and concert, the last before the western trip of the orchestra, will be marked by the presentation of the Converse music and and the appearance of Mme. Melba as soloist.

An important change has been made in the progamme of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge next Thursday evening. The soloist, instead of being Prof. Willy Hess, will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, who had such remarkable success at this week's Symphony concerts here. Mme. Goodson will play the Grieg concerto.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, JAN 22, 1907.

VARIETY PLEASED HEARERS.

Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Mozart Compositions Given at Chamber Concert by Symphony Quartet.

The choice of program for the chamber concert last night in Chickering hall reflects additional credit on the conductor of the Symphony quartet, for as much variety was introduced into the production as well could be. The stately and conventional music of Brahms was followed by the ingenious and popular Tschaikowsky, and this by the ever-charming and lasting Mozart.

The string quartet was assisted last evening by Victor Benham, pianist, and Georges Grisez, clarinet, and both won the hearts of their hearers before the program was completed.

The first number was a quartet in B-flat major by Brahms, and the regular quartet, consisting of Prof Willy Hess, Otto Roth, Emile Ferir and Heinrich Warnke, showed complete mastery of this somewhat dignified composition. The viola, played by Emile Ferir had some particularly strong passages to bring out, and the ability with which they were handled showed the beauty that can be obtained from this instrument so little used for the prominent parts.

The trio for piano, violin and violincello in A minor by Tschaikowsky gave Victor Benham the opportunity to show his artistic technique, for the composition was replete with intricacies. Unlike most of Tschaiskowsky's music, this piece had no great and sudden contrasts, but the differences were reached by gradations, which proved as effective as the more startling changes.

Of the last number on the program, a quintet for the clarinet, two violins, viola and violincello, nothing need be said, except that it was on a par with all the rest of the evening's entertainment. The clarinet was handled by Mr Grisez in so fine a manner that it harmonized completely with the other instruments.

Last night's was the fourth of a series of six Monday evening concerts by the quartet, and the full house which enjoyed the performance shows that interest in the series has not lessened during the winter.

A change has been made in the program of the Symphony orchestra in Cambridge next Thursday evening. The soloist, instead of being Prof Willy Hess, will be Mme Katharine Goodson, who had such remarkable success at last week's symphony concerts here. Mme Goodson will play the Grieg concerto.

Boston Transcript
924 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1907

Chickering Hall: The Boston Symphony Quartet

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the fourth concert of its present series last evening in Chickering Hall, before a large and appreciative audience. The quartet was assisted by Mr. Victor Benham, pianist, and Mr. Georges Grisez, clarinet. The programme:

Quartet, Op. 67.....Brahms
Trio, Op. 50.....Tchaikovsky
Quintet for Clarinet and Strings.....Mozart (Köchel 581)

The Brahms Quartet is generally considered his most "genial" example in this form. Upon the whole this classification is accurate, but it contains some pitfalls for the unwary listener. The first movement in spite of an undeniably vivacious opening theme leaves an impression of the skilful and passionless work of a master-builder. There are moments of grace and delicate fancy, the "working-out" section is more than a perfunctory juggling with themes, but the introduction of the "conclusion theme" in two-four time in opposition to the six-eight rynthm seems forced and unspontaneous. There seems to be no compelling sentiment which forced Brahms to utterance in this movement. The performance of this movement left much to be desired both in intonation and roughness of tone. On the other hand it would be hard to find two movements more characteristic of Brahms at his best than the andante and allegretto following. Full of emotion, of sentiment, they have pervasive charm and individuality; skilful treatment is here but the support and sustenance of beauty of idea. The serious depth of the andante, and the fleeting evanescent appeal of the allegretto are equally spontaneous and vivid expressions of Brahms's personality. With the variations which serve as finale there is a tendency to revert to the sounding formalism of the first movement, although there is much ingenuity displayed in the varying of a not altogether striking theme; the bringing back of the opening theme of the first movement by way of coda is so appropriate that one wonders (even while remembering the close of the third symphony) why Brahms did not attempt this sort of innovation oftener. Undoubtedly at that time such a procedure savored of Liszt and his radical followers, now-a-days the dignity of men like César Franck, Vincent d'Indy and even the correct Camille Saint-Saëns has put another aspect on this reactionary device.

The Tchaikovsky trio must remain a work unprecedently isolated by reason of its utter lack of convention in nearly every respect. One does not think of Tchaikovsky as a furious iconoclast. In fact in his own country he was pursued by the Neo-Russian school with a scorn and contumely that placed him second only to Anton Nevertheless the trio, one of the greatest works in this form extant, is far off the beaten track. In form it is distinct by itself, it does not in any way resemble classical chamber music style, in musical sentiment it is more dramatic, more seething with personal emotion and almost incoherently passionate mood than any work of its type in the literature of music. The secret of its greatness is undoubtedly its intense humanity. it is preoccupied with utterance rather than with abstract symmetry. Hence, as last night, it is wise to make judicious cuts in the variations. There is so much breadth and variety of standpoint in these variations that one is tempted to believe that Tschaikovsky was painting different aspects of his friend's life in them. Not unimaginatively, without humor or discrimination, as Hans Koessler did for Brahms, but an illuminating, charitable and kindly view of Rubinstein's traits only to recur inevitably to the profoundly elegiac mood of the first movement. Assuredly this trio is one of the great memorials in the history of music. Mr. Benham played the work with authority, with intelligence and with affection, but his performance suffered from imperfections of technique and occasionally from an unduly hard tone. His conception of the work, however, was large and sincere. Mr. Hess and Mr. Warnke are to be commended for the admirable way in which they surmounted the difficulties of their respective parts.

The well-known Mozart Quintet seemed more than ever of Hellenic serenity and simplicity after the storm and stress of Slavic lamentation and eulogy, pellucidly transparent in outline and construction. While it rises to its greatest height of beauty in the inimitable Larghetto, there is abundance of grace in the first movement, of humor and fancy in the minuetto and variations. It would be difficult to surpass Mr. Grisez's interpretation of the clarinet part. Technical difficulties did not appear to exist, the transitions from one register to another were bridged over with consummate skill, his tones were exquisitely varied and his phrasing was simply perfect. It is a rare treat to hear such clarinet playing, and such an opportunity is but too infrequent. As an important lesson to violinists, to singers and above all to pianists, such an instance of exhaustive melodic art cannot be too heartily commended by close study and sedulous imitation.

E. B. H.

DAILY ADVERTISER
JANUARY 22, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTETTE CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms. Quartette in B-flat. Op. 67.
Tschaikowsky. Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello. A minor. Op. 50.
Pianist, Mr. Victor Benham.
Mozart. Clarinette Quintette.
Clarinette, Mr. G. Grisez.

Spite of the great number of concerts Chickering Hall was well filled last night when the Hess Quartette gave the above programme. There was interest enough in the numbers. The Brahms Quartette is one of his complicated chamber compositions, yet its Adagio is easily followed and is certainly beautiful. The dance-rhythms of its Scherzo are also attractive for all that they are intricately treated. Probably its most Brahmsian movement is the finale, in which a concise theme is varied in that highly developed manner of which Brahms is so complete a master. If one were to judge composers merely by their skill in varying a theme it is quite possible that Brahms would be the chief composer of the world. His infinite variety and skill in this method of musical treatment puts even Beethoven to the blush.

The quartette played the work excellently, the shading of the third movement —the Scherzo—being especially commendable.

To us, however, the Trio was the chief number of the programme in intrinsic merit, although not in performance. It is marked "A la memoire d'un grand artiste," and the artist commemorated is Nicholas Rubinstein, who died of consumption in Paris in 1881. This composition is, we believe, the only piece of chamber music in which Tschaikowsky employed the piano. It may have been this fact, but it probably also was the recollection of his friend, which caused the work to become one of the greatest of its kind, and perhaps the most striking of all his chamber music.

The work is long, yet it consists of only two movements, and like the preceding composition it ends with variations. But these variations are very different from the Brahms set; not so ingenious, but more expressive. The opening movement is an Elegy, and everyone knows how strong Tschaikowsky becomes when pathos or grief are in the foreground.

The last variation is long enough to become a movement in itself, but in reality it forms a lamenting and tragical coda to the set. There is no attempt to preserve anything like sonata-form in this work, and here again it served as an admirable contrast to the opening work of the programme. It was like having Browning and Coleridge side by side to hear Brahms and Tschaikowsky in such a manner.

The theme of the variations of the Trio was eminently fitting in its place, for Tschaikowsky first heard it at a picnic with Nicholas Rubinstein when they had a merry-making among the Russian peasantry. This melody is made into everything from a waltz and a mazurka to fugal work, but its climax is the most noble coda imaginable. Very free it all is and exactly the opposite to Brahms' calm mastery, for it is full of the most changing emotions. One may imagine that there are unrevealed points of intimacy in these variations, as there are in Elgar's Orchestral Variations.

But such a varied subject requires the most versatile and artistic of pianists.

That Mr. Benham should have dared to undertake such a work in a city in which resided Baermann, Stasny, Proctor, Faelten, Perabo, Hopekirk, Szumowska, etc., (any one of whom could have played the work better than he did), reminds one of the farmer's lament over his pet ram who died in butting a locomotive: "I admire your pluck, but damn your judgment!"

Yet Mr. Benham played the final funeral march well, and we will gladly place that much to his credit.

For the rest, he was robust and muscular and very far away from Tschaikowsky.

The Mozart clarinette quintette reminded the hearer that this composer was really the father of the clarinette in the orchestra. Handel had to be, sure, used the old clarinette once in his "Richard I.," but gave it up thereafter as a crude instrument.

Bach never used it. But in Mozart's day it was improved and he not only introduced it into symphony, (in his E-flat symphony, 1788), but wrote the wonderful clarinette parts in "The People that Walked in Darkness" in "The Messiah," as well as this effective quintette. Yet we may doubt whether Mozart knew all the capabilities of the instrument, the ghostly character of its lower register—the Chalumeau —for example. That remained for Mendelssohn and Weber to discover.

Mr. Grisez played his instrument like the master we all know him to be, and he was supported by the strings in good style. So that the transition from the deeply emotional character of Tschaikowsky to the lighter vein of Mozart was not such a jar as it might otherwise have been. The quintette was intrinsically as well as historically interesting, thanks chiefly to Mr. Grisez.

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Post
JANUARY 22, 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

BY OLIN DOWNES

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet took place last night in Chickering Hall, and the programme was one of engrossing interest.

The B flat quartet, Op. 67, is Brahms at his brightest, and Tchaikowsky's trio for piano, violin and 'cello is one of the greatest attainments of that composer in the field of chamber music. Mr. Victor Benham, who took the piano part of this number, played in a great spirit throughout, with surging temperament and an irresistible rhythm which carried everything before it. At times he was inclined to take things into his own hands, but, nevertheless, it was a great performance of noble music.

It is to be regretted that some of these indefatigable explorers who so industriously search for the very newest compositions do not turn around occasionally and delve into the treasure house of Mozart and other older masters, where there is still a wealth of practically undiscovered riches, of which the quintet in A major, for clarinet and strings, played last night, is only one example. In the whole catalogue of chamber music there are few such heaven-born creations as this wonderful work. Mr. Grisez, who assisted, played the clarinet part as only a great artist can, and the way in which he sang the long-sustained cantilena of the slow movement was a treat for the gods.

The audience was not backward in expressing its appreciation of such a performance.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET BOSTON MASS.
SATURDAY, JANUARY 26, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme. Melba's Singing Crowds Out All Other Impressions—The Prime of Her Powers and Their Effect Upon Her Hearers

Rarely at a Symphony concert does interest in the singer or in the virtuoso of the occasion transcend all else. Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasia, "The Mystic Trumpeter," stood on the programme yesterday for its first performance in Boston, and at the end was Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," the first of his larger compositions that Dr. Muck has attempted here. Between the two Mme. Melba sang the air with violin obbligato from Mozart's opera, "The Shepherd King," and Violetta's long and varied scena from Verdi's opera of "La Traviata." The audience listened attentively to Mr. Converse's music and rewarded him warmly, but plainly it had come to hear Mme. Melba. In turn it listened attentively to Berlioz's symphony and testified its pleasure in what it heard, but as plainly it regarded any sequence to Mme. Melba's singing as tame. It had heard her in a still, tense, pervading rapture that seemed almost to burst into the relief and elation of applause that rang and rang again. Sometimes it is a wise reviewer who makes the mood of his audience his own, and yesterday there was no resisting the mood. True Mr. Converse's music abounded in interesting suggestion, and Berlioz's symphony is a tempting test of the enduring and the declining qualities of his work. But there is no discoursing of these things, while the ear hears little but the golden beauty of Mme. Melba's tones, the bright and undulating flow of her song, the long waves of it, the rippling shimmer, the clear depths of it. The listener's ear, the listener's imagination, plunged elatedly into it. There was no other sensation but of supreme vocal beauty and supreme vocal spontaneity. It was as though song were creating itself. And such a mood, and such expectancy of tonight's concert, does not invite to discriminative reviewing.

H. T. P.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN 27, 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Mme Melba, Symphony Orchestra Soloist.

Second of Mr Goodrich's Jordan Hall Orchestra Concerts.

Recitals by Mme Zeisler and Miss Schnitzer.

At 8 o'clock last Friday morning, in a snowstorm, six people took up positions at Symphony hall so as to "be on hand" at the opening of the doors, six hours later, for Mme Melba was to sing with the orchestra, and this little group defied wind and weather for the sake of being among the fortunate five hundred odd entitled to sit in the upper balcony, where very popular prices reign. At both concerts many people were unable to gain admission, the capacity of the hall being taxed to the limit, and this despite inclement weather.

The 13th Symphony program was as follows: "The Mystic Trumpeter," an orchestral fantasy by F. S. Converse, first time in Boston; arias from Mozart's "Shepherd King" and Verdi's "La Traviata," sung by Mme Melba, and the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy." Prof Hess played the violin obligato in the Mozart number. Mme Melba's appearance after a long absence from the city naturally made last week's program unusually interesting, for she is one of the very few great singers of the day and her recent successes in New York at the Manhattan opera house indicated that her glorious art of song was retained with all its wonderful attributes unimpaired.

In the bel canto passages of the two arias the purity and smoothness of execution was again displayed in an almost flawless technique. The florid runs and trills, so fluently voiced as to seem easy of accomplishment, were bounteously showered upon the admiring throng, and all the brightness and sparkle of the bravura measures were given with all the finished art of the gifted singer. The quality of Mme Melba's voice, especially in the upper register, is of that silvery purity so requisite for the proper vocalizing in music of this type, and is probably unsurpassed at the present time. The harmony of voice and violin in the obligato passages was exquisite and in perfect unison. The usual demonstrations of delight and wild applause greeted the singer, her auditors insisting on many returns to the stage.

Mr Converse's fantasy, based on Walt Whitman's poem, is in one movement, made up of five divisions, each one representing an episode in the work. The different phrases are outlined skilfully by the composer, who had handled the proclamations by the brass contingent in such a manner as to suggest the subject that follows. He conjures "war's alarums" in stentorian tones, giving splendid measures for the brasses, which this group executed with great brilliancy and harmonic unity. The love motif and the joyous finale are well defined, the latter being especially effective in its working up to an animated climax, that showed the ensemble skill of the orchestra to be as near perfection as can be reasonably expected.

The Berlioz symphony was played with all the vigor and brilliancy requisite to make "Harold in Italy" remembered pleasantly by the big audience. The impressive "March of the Pilgrims and the "Orgy" deserve special mention, for they appealed most potently to the emotions of the auditors, if appearance be any criterion.

This week the orchestra will be away on its western trip. Feb 8 and 9 the program will be "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Paul Dukas; Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, Mme Olga Samaroff soloist, and for the first time here Tinel's three-tone pictures on Corneille's tragedy, "Polieucte."

The Boston Journal
JANUARY 28, 1907.

TONE POEM WITH THE SYMPHONY

Frederic S. Converse Gives His Musical Setting for Walt Whitman's "Mystic Trumpeter."

Frederic S. Converse's tone poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," based on Walt Whitman's noble poem, was played for the first time in Boston at the thirteenth Symphony concert. Much anticipation had been aroused, for Mr. Converse is now the most-talked-of and the most promising of all our young American composers, while the magnificent lines of Whitman furnish extraordinary opportunities by their variety of emotions and their eloquence for inspired and splendidly-colored music. But it cannot be said that Mr. Converse has at all adequately matched the beauty and power of the poem. His orchestral commentary is really less musical than his subject. His expression of night-calm, love, war, a millenium of joy and truth, is often groping, even while it is always musicianly and dignified—too dignified, it seems, too little the outburst of an aroused imagination.

The trumpet itself—save for a haunting bit at the very beginning, a call or two in the "war" section and some stirring phrases in the finale—is curiously, even studiously, kept out of the way. Not that the tone poem should be a trumpet concerto by any means, but that a little fuller treatment of the instrument would have been more impressive and in keeping. Nor is it easy to find in the "love" section any overwhelming passion or sensuous beauty. The best features of the work are the shimmering, mysterious effects of the opening bars, the resounding pomp of the martial music and the occasional richness of the finale. As a whole, however, the composition disappoints, pos-

Jan 31-07
CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BY FLORENCE E. ALLEN.

One needs a rhyming dictionary and a catalogue of synonyms to describe the playing of the Boston Symphony last night—the vernacular is far too pale and thin.

The matchless quality of the organization, a quality produced by absolute master hands, playing on rare old instruments, was best shown in the accompaniment to the Saint-Saens concerto, with its exquisite harmonies and instrumentation, and in the allegretto of the Beethoven symphony. Usually it is the violins alone, or at any rate the strings, upon which great orchestras base their claim to tonal excellence. With their broader and more appealing literature, and with their consequently more justifiable hopes of soloistic fame, violinists and 'cellists naturally have more general virtuoso attainments than the other members of the usual orchestra. In this Boston Symphony, however, not only the leading lady and man, but the entire cast are voice and part. There was no mere harmonic indication of any fraction of the accompaniment. On following a theme in the woods or brasses, one heard the same fine clearness and resonance of tone, the same crystal clearness of phrasing, as in the strings.

And the combined tone of the orchestra was of such perfection that even those in front could get some adequate impression of its beauty. With players less smooth the mere percussion, the friction, produces so rough an effect that one needs to stand away to appreciate the loveliness of the sound. It is much as one focusses for a Corot picture, and finally discovers that what seemed a characterless splash of paint is really living sunlight. The Boston Symphony reminds one of a Holbein, with an exquisiteness of detail which defies the closest hearing, and yet with big spirit behind it all.

And interpretatively—after all Beethoven is the touchstone, and in his seventh symphony no less than in the "Meistersinger" prelude Karl Muck proved himself a leader of routine, energy and rare fine feeling. At times he paid his men the compliment of dropping his baton and seeming to listen to them, but when he did conduct his simple, unemotional signs directed the orchestra into magnificent playing.

The first movement with its comparatively conventional themes and eternal coda, would require an Apollo to make it plastic. In the rest of the symphony Dr. Muck had more opportunity, and he used it well. One hardly looks to a noted Wagner conductor for the poise demanded by Beethoven. Dr. Muck was neither sentimental nor superficial; he led with eminent reserve There was no maundering over the funereal theme of the allegretto, and yet every profound passage was nobly read. In the final movement he hurled the Titanic chords out with gathering explosive force, building up a climax of mighty power.

Timothee Adamowski, soloist in the Saint-Saens B minor violin concerto, reaped deserved success. His tone at first seemed a trifle sharp, but in the andantino his shapely phrasing and exquisite lyric feeling carried away the audience and in the rollicking finale his clean and rhythmic playing was remarkable. Especially noticeable was his perfect ensemble with the orchestra. Often a soloist, no matter how great an artist seems actually to "butt in" upon the orchestral support. Adamowski's violin seemed simply another voice in the chorus of music ineffable.

[120]

...Y, JAN. 27, 1907.

...ERT THIRTEEN BY THE SYMPHONY

Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," After Whitman's Poem, First Played Here.

WROTE A SERIES OF MUSICAL TABLEAUX

The Romanticism of Berlioz' "Harold" Symphony—Mme. Melba Soloist.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Muck, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

"The Mystic Trumpeter".....Converse
Aria from "Il Re Pastore".....Mozart
"Ah, fors' e lui".....Verdi
Symphony "Harold in Italy".....Berlioz

Mr. Converse composed his fantasy in 1904-05. It was performed for the first time by the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia, March 2, 1905. It has been played in Cincinnati and in New York.

The composer's purpose was to translate into music sections of Whitman's poem which in turn are expressions of mystery and peace, love, war, humiliation, joy, suggested to the poet by a wild trumpeter unseen, imagined, who played for him alone. The fantasy is in corresponding sections, which are connected by phrases for the trumpet.

Whitman in the poem gives little thumb-nail sketches and he utters rhapsodic generalizations. Mr. Converse is too fine a musician to attempt an interlinear translation. He takes in turn the main idea of one of Whitman's sections and thus presents a series of musical tableaux, which, however, have continuity, and by means of thematic treatment there is a close relationship between the episodes.

The work is planned on a large scale. There are pages that are imposing by reason of rich sonority. The most striking portions are the introduction and the song in praise of love. The former is interesting through its original thought and orchestral expression; the latter has a broad imaginative sweep and a true passion which swells to a superb climax. The battle music is more conventional in thought and rhetoric. The other selections seem to me less original and inferior in other ways to Mr. Converse's later works, for they do not have the melodic charm, the surety of development of the orchestral strength, and savor of, say, his music to "Jeanne d'Arc." The composer suffered by a performance on a prima donna night. It is a pity that an unfamiliar work of this importance is played once and then put aside. It would be fairer to composers and hearers if a new work of any value were performed at two concerts in succession, as is often done at the Chatelet and Lamoureux concerts in Paris.

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" was written in 1834. The young romanticists of the thirties were terrible fellows, whether they wrote music, tales or poetry. Anatole France describes these novelists and poets fondly and ironically: "These young and sedentary men of letters, although they led most peaceful lives, made the bourgeois believe that they drank the night long flames of punch from the skull of a mistress! At that time a 'Jeune-France' did not go to the office where he was a copying clerk without crying out with a sarcastic laugh: 'I am damned!'"

Such a man was Petrus Borel, whose "Champavert," a collection of gloomy tales, was published the year before "Harold" was composed. Petrus added a defiant subtitle: "Immoral Stories," but any rooter after immorality in literature would be bitterly disappointed if he finally succeeded in digging out this singular and forgotten volume from the rubbish heaps of Time, who smiles complacently on classics and romances alike. The heroes are all Harolds in misanthropy, but they are far more extravagant in daily routine than Byron's blasé traveller. Passerose, for example, betrayed by his mistress, pays Sanson, the public executioner, a visit: "I come to beg you humbly, and I shall be very much obliged for this condescension, to do me the honor and the friendly deed of guillotining me."

All these young fellows of the young Thirties were honest in their fantastical expression. Read Berlioz's description of the finale in "Harold," the "Orgy of Brigands:" "This furious saturnal in which the drunkenness of wine, blood, joy and rage all shout together ... where the mouths of brass seem to vomit forth curses and reply with blasphemies to entreating voices, where to laugh, drink, strike, bruise, kill ... where in a word they amuse themselves." Here we find another we are men and women of another generation and neither "Champavert" nor "Harold in Italy" is taken by us t... I read the tales of Petr... fortnight ago, and I assure y... reading was for the most part ... The characters are lay figures and ... most passionate or horrible scenes ... the thought of creaking and ... mechanism contrived ... to give a semblance of ... Only one scene ... and that one is not ... The temptation and ... beautiful Jewess of Lyons ... Christmas. Let Petrus ... head, his des... poetes, his lovers ... more real

New York Tribune Sunday Morning

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

F. S. Converse. "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasie.
Mozart. Aria. "L'Amero," from "Il Re Pastore."
Verdi. Recit. ed Aria, from "La Traviata." "Ah, fors' e Lui."

Soloist, Mme. Melba.

Berlioz. Symphony. "Harold in Italy."

Mr. Converse chose a strong subject for his orchestral fantasie in Walt Whitman's poem, which is full of contrasts. In one of its lines the poet cries to the trumpeter—which may indicate that he did not know the difference between a cornet and a trumpet, or it may be a case of what Mrs. Partington would have called "poetical licentiousness." If it is an error Whitman would not be the only poet who has slipped and fallen when upon musical ground. Coleridge, in his "Ancient Mariner," speaks of "the loud bassoon," when he probably meant trombone (for the bassoon is not especially loud nor would it be very prominent at a wedding feast), while Tennyson invites Maud to come into the garden and listen to an awful combination of "Flute, violin, bassoon," which even Richard Strauss has not tried yet, and Browning—the musical Browning—in his "Toccata of Martini Galuppi" speaks of "Sixths diminished, sigh on sigh," whereas few harmony teachers recognize a diminished sixth, and a succession of them would only constitute a set of consecutive fifths, which would make the teacher of harmony sigh.

"Thy cornet, echoing, pealing,"

Out of the Whitman suggestions Mr. Converse has made some fine orchestral contrasts of Mystery, Peace, War and Triumph, but the work is somewhat fragmentary in effect and neither so homogeneous nor so finely developed as his Overture to "Jeanne d' Arc" which was given in Boston recently. But it is a fine example of the composer's skill in orchestration. In brilliancy and good taste in scoring we can rank Mr. Converse as close to Loeffler and Van der Stucken.

The trumpet was not as prominent nor as characteristically used as one might have anticipated. Harp, bass clarinette, piccolo and oboe were quite as much in the foreground as the mystic gentleman of the title. Nor was the trumpet as well sounded as we are accustomed to hear it from our excellent soloist. The harp, oboe, and especially the bass clarinette, were exceedingly well played, and the piccolo gave out its phrase from "Marching through Georgia" with martial fervor. Loeffler has also used this tune as a typical motive in a very advanced vocal work. The musically uneducated Henry C. Work succeeded in writing one of the three chief songs of our Civil War, a fact that recent composers are beginning to recognize. Mr. Converse's Fantasie was abundantly applauded and its spirited character deserved the tribute.

Then came the event of the concert which threw Converse, Berlioz, the orchestra, Dr. Muck and everything else into the shade. A phenomenal voice, a good larynx and a pair of well-trained vocal cords will outweigh all the other musical paraphernalia in existence, with the general public. Nor is this a recent fad; it has existed for 20 centuries. Imperial Rome valued its Gaditanian singers above all other music, and the Roman misses ran after these slaves with the persistency of a modern matinee girl. Cuzzoni and Faustina out-weighed Handel during the opera seasons of nearly 200 years ago. And Melba being now one of the greatest of her kind, has also the right to triumph over everything musical that is placed upon the programme beside her.

Mme. Melba is in her vocal prime. Never has her voice been so easily controlled or so attractive in its timbre. If we say that there was a trace of effort in one or two very high passages we have found the only fault that hyper-criticism could detect. Those who were her rivals are beginning to show the ravages of time, and it is quite possible that Melba is the greatest living soprano today. Therefore it was that people were standing in line at Symphony Hall, in a driving snow-storm, at 7 a.m. on Friday last, waiting for a chance to get in the hall at 2 p.m., when the carriages of those more favored persons, who held tickets, blocked all the adjacent streets.

Melba sang the Mozart number finely, but not phenomenally. The cadenza was very brilliant and Prof. Hess played the violin obbligato with discreet subordination. But in "Fors' e Lui," her foot was upon her native heath and she shone forth resplendent. The much-abused Alfredo was well represented by an amatory violoncello and the orchestral support was excellent. In this aria the "ocoloratura" was of the most brilliant description, yet nothing seemed forced or strained. The trill was liquid and beautiful, like that of Patti in her best days.

Therefore "Fors' e Lui" became the chief number of the concert with many an auditor, Wagner to the contrary notwithstanding. What do all the theories of high art matter to the populace? What boots it to say that the music should more subtly portray the underlying sorrow of Violetta, or that a person in the first stages of tuberculosis would not warble in this manner! It was tuneful, vocally gymnastic, and executed by a great singer, and all the theories in the world cannot abolish this branch of music. In fact, it may be a good thing for art when the leaders recognize the fact that tune is as much an element of music as the notes themselves, and return to writing melodies, adding to them the grand harmonies and orchestration of a Wagner or Strauss. We lost count of how many times Melba was recalled. There was tremendous enthusiasm at the end of the number, and at one time it seemed as if the audience were trying to break through the musical laws of the Boston Medes and Persians, and force an encore.

We were glad to see, however, that there was no exodus at the end of the Verdi confectionery. Evidently the singer's triumph did not abolish an appreciation of higher and more dramatic musical work. The first movement of the "Childe Harold" symphony was made perhaps a trifle too heroic for its theme; but Dr. Muck brought out every point of the complicated score. Mr. Ferir was roundly applauded as he came forward to take the [illegible] part, and he played the [illegible]

Paper Leader-Telegram
City
Date JAN 13 1907 State

The principal interest in this year's appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra centers in Dr. [illegible] Berlin, the new conductor. He is in America on a leave of absence, granted by the German Emperor, whose particular interest in the United States is well known. Dr. Muck's appearance in this city will most likely be limited to this one concert because the Emperor refuses to let him remain in America longer than one season.

The orchestra will leave Boston on Sunday evening, January 27, and will give its first concert in Rochester on the following evening. It will play in Cleveland on Tuesday night, in Chicago on Wednesday, Detroit on Thursday, Indianapolis on Friday and Cincinnati on Saturday afternoon, whence it will return directly to Boston and resume its regular work in the East.

The orchestra will bring to Cleveland seventy-five musicians. This is the number that came last season, but there will be some change in the personnel. When the orchestra was here last it lacked such men as Longy, the first oboe; Grisez, the first clarinet; Sadony, the first bassoon, and Max Hess, the first horn, because these gentlemen had not yet returned from Europe. This year they will be with the orchestra and thus the wind choirs will be more beautiful than they were a year ago.

Professor Willy Hess will be the concert master, Mr. Warnke the first cello and Mr. Ferir the first viola. The soloist will be Timothee Adamowski, who shares the first desk of the violins with Professor Hess, and is a virtuoso of high rank.

It is not going too far to say that this concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by all odds, the most important musical event of the busiest and most prosperous season of music Cleveland has ever known.

Paper Star
City Cincinnati
Date JAN 15 1907 State

At the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music hall, on Saturday afternoon, February 2, the public of Cincinnati will have an opportunity to hear for the first time one of the most eminent violinists of the world—Prof. Willy Hess—who is in his third year as concertmaster of the orchestra. Prof. Hess's career of over thirty years has been crowded with incident and success. He made his debut as soloist in Holland in 1872, when he was but thirteen years old, and, what is still more remarkable, in the same season he won great distinction by his leading of the celebrated Harfen quartet, one of the most famous chamber music organizations of its time. Boy violinists of great talent are not uncommon, but a boy of thirteen who was a successful leader of a string quartet must have been richly endowed.

[12]

...it could not have been better presented. It was the embodiment of the melancholy of "Childe Harold," an emotion that fitted the viola like a glove.

Especially well-shaded were the iridiscent passages bowed near the bridge, ("sull' ponticello") in the second movement.

This entire "March of the Pilgrims" was deliciously interpreted by all. Only we found the horn a little too loud at first in the bell tones (the moment the tone is forced the bell-like quality disappears) and the harp was not nearly loud enough; where we sat it was inaudible.

In the third movement the Pifferari seemed far more natural than even those of Handel ("Messiah") or Liszt ("Christus"), although Berlioz did not, like these two, use an actual Pifferaro tune. In this movement one can speak with praise of the playing of the English horn, of the Harold theme as it appears on the flute, and of the delicate shading of the viola as it plays alone at the close. One seemed to see the Byronic hero standing gloomy and apart, after all the merry-making.

Dr. Muck certainly brought out all the brutality of the finale, and his reading was again of the highest order. Every contrast was finely made, the reminiscence of the "March of the Pilgrims" interrupting the orgie of the brigands as a whiff of pure air might penetrate into a reeking atmosphere. Yet the finale seems fading somewhat. It is possible that we have at present gone so far beyond what, a half-century ago, were considered the extremes of music, that the old outbursts seem tame to us.

And now our orchestra departs to prove to western cities that we have not been standing still in our symphonic achievements. There will therefore be no concerts on Friday and Saturday of this week. Bon voyage! Louis C. Elson.

Paper Staats-Zeitung
City New York
State N Y
Date JAN 12 1907

Boston Symphonie-Quartett.

Vor sehr gut gefülltem Hause fand gestern Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall das diesjährige zweite Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Quartetts, bestehend aus den Herren Prof. Willy Heß, erste, Otto Roth, zweite Violine, Emile Ferir, Viola und Heinrich Warnke, Cello, statt. Als Solistin war die bekannte Gesangsmeisterin Frau Matia von Nießen-Stone gewonnen worden, welche eine Reihe von Liedern sang.

Beethoven's F-moll-Streichquartett, Op. 95, No. 11, eröffnete das Konzert und fand seitens der genannten vier Herren eine prächtige Wiedergabe, aus welcher wir namentlich den zweiten Satz mit seinem überaus feinen Zusammenspiel und das Allegretto agitato des dritten Satzes mit seinem durchgeistigten Piano hervorheben möchten.

Als Novität spielten die Herren das D-dur-Streichquartett, op. 41, No. 2, von Hugo Kaun, das für New York Novität war. Es handelt sich um ein Werk, das von dem üblichen Quartettstyl abweicht, sich aber durch hübsche Erfindung und ganz ausgesprochene Klangschönheiten auszeichnet. Namentlich der letzte Satz des Werkes ist orchestral gedacht, kommt aber in der trefflichen Bearbeitung für vier Stimmen zu bester Geltung. Am Besten hat uns der erste Satz gefallen, ein langsamer Satz mit der Bezeichnung „sehr ruhig, mit innigster Empfindung", eine meisterhaft gearbeitete Fuge auf einem interessanten Doppelthema, das in mächtiger Steigerung äußerst effektvoll abschließt.

Der zweite Satz („sehr lebhaft, mit innerlicher Freude") ist ein prächtiges Scherzo, daß sich im Verlaufe des Satzes zu großer Lebhaftigkeit entwickelt und eine in sehr flottem Tempo gehaltene Coda enthält. Der letzte Satz („ruhig, ernst") ist, wie man sieht, gegen jede Ueberlieferung wieder langsam. Im weiteren Verlaufe des Satzes kommen prächtige Harmonien zum Vorschein und hübsche Effekte, wie z. B. Pizzikato-Akkorde des Cellos zu einer sehr lebhaften Figur der leitenden Stimme. Der Schluß verklingt ungemein stimmungsvoll.

In diesem letzten Satze sind Wagnersche Harmonie-Folgen unverkennbar; man fühlt sich sogar an einige Vorbilder direkt gemahnt („Tristan und Isolde", „Lohengrin", „Parsifal"), doch giebt es darunter auch sehr viel Persönliches und neuartige Klangwirkungen, so daß das Werk uns mit ruhigem Behagen entläßt. Gespielt wurde es von Herrn Heß und Konsorten mit liebevollem Eifer und schönstem Gelingen. Namentlich der letzte Satz erklang im Spiele der Herren in durchsichtiger Tonschönheit. Der Beifall klang aufrichtig und überzeugungstreu.

Frau Matia von Nissen-Stone sang zwischen den beiden Quartetten fünf Lieder von Schubert, unter denen sie namentlich das neckische „Liebhaber in allen Gestalten" sehr charakteristisch wiedergab. Dasselbe war mit vier Liedern von Hugo Wolf der Fall, je zwei aus dem italienischen und dem spanischen Liederbuch. Die Dame besitzt eine klangvolle, mit großem Geschmack verwendete Stimme, die Alt-Charakter aufweist. Sie besitzt ausgesprochene musikalische Intelligenz und feines [illegible]. Auch ist ihre Stimme der charakteristischen [illegible]

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXXI., No. 27.
SUNDAY, JAN. 27, 1907.

CONCERT THIRTEEN BY THE SYMPHONY

Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," After Whitman's Poem, First Played Here.

WROTE A SERIES OF MUSICAL TABLEAUX

The Romanticism of Berlioz' "Harold" Symphony—Mme. Melba Soloist.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

"The Mystic Trumpeter".....Converse
Aria from "Il Re Pastore".....Mozart
"Ah, fors' e lui".....Verdi
Symphony, "Harold in Italy".....Berlioz

Mr. Converse composed his fantasy in 1903-04. It was performed for the first time by the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia, March 3, 1905. It has been played in Cincinnati and in New York.

The composer's purpose was to translate into music sections of Whitman's poem which in turn are expressions of mystery and peace, love, war, humiliation, joy, suggested to the poet by a wild trumpeter unseen, imagined, who played for him alone. The fantasy is in corresponding sections, which are connected by phrases for the trumpet.

Whitman in the poem gives little thumb-nail sketches and he utters rhapsodic generalizations. Mr. Converse is too fine a musician to attempt an interlinear translation. He takes in turn the main idea of one of Whitman's sections and thus presents a series of musical tableaux, which, however, have continuity, and by means of thematic treatment there is a close relationship between the episodes.

The work is planned on a large scale. There are pages that are imposing by reason of rich sonority. The most striking portions are the introduction and the song in praise of love. The former is interesting through its original thought and orchestral expression; the latter has a broad imaginative sweep and a true passion which swells to a superb climax. The battle music is more conventional in thought and rhetoric. The other selections seem to me less original and inferior in other ways to Mr. Converse's later works, for they do not have the melodic charm, the surety of development of the orchestral strength, and savor of, say, his music to "Jeanne d'Arc." The composer suffered by a performance on a prima donna night. It is a pity that an unfamiliar work of this importance is played once and then put aside. It would be fairer to composers and hearers if a new work of any value were performed at two concerts in succession, as is often done at the Chatelet and Lamoureux concerts in Paris.

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" was written in 1834. The young romanticists of the thirties were terrible fellows, whether they wrote music, tales or poetry. Anatole France describes these novelists and poets fondly and ironically: "These young and sedentary men of letters, although they led most peaceful lives, made the bourgeois believe that they drank the night long flames of punch from the skull of a mistress! At that time a 'Jeune-France' did not go to the office where he was a copying clerk without crying out with a sarcastic laugh: 'I am damned!'"

Such a man was Petrus Borel whose "Champavert," a collection of grisly tales, was published the year before "Harold" was composed. Petrus added a defiant subtitle: "Immoral Stories," but any rooter after immorality in literature would be bitterly disappointed if he finally succeeded in digging out this singular and forgotten volume from the rubbish heaps of Time, who smiles compassionately on classics and romanticists alike. The heroes are all Harolds in misanthropy, but they are far more extravagant in daily routine that Byron's blase traveller. Passereau, for example, betrayed by his mistress, pays Sanson, the public executioner, a visit: "I come to beg you humbly, and I shall be very much obliged for this condescension, to do me the honor and the friendly deed of guillotining me."

All these young fellows of the young Thirties were honest in their fantastical expression. Read Berlioz's description of the finale in "Harold," the "Orgy of Brigands:" "This furious orgy in which the drunkenness of wine, blood, joy and rage all shout together * * * where the mouths of brass seem to vomit forth curses and reply with blasphemies to entreating voices, where they laugh, drink, strike, bruise, kill, ravish, where in a word they amuse themselves." Here we find another Petrus.

But we are men and women of another generation and neither "Champavert" nor "Harold in Italy" is taken by us too seriously. I read the tales of Petrus Borel a fortnight ago, and I assure you the reading was for the most part a task. The characters are lay figures and in the most passionate or horrible scenes there was the thought of creaking and whirring internal mechanism contrived by the inventor to give a semblance of life to his automata. Only one scene is truly dramatic, and that one is not easily forgotten: The temptation and murder of the beautiful Jewess of Lyons by a melodramatic boatman. Let Petrus heap horrors on horror's head, his desperate villians are only bogies, his lovers and their sweethearts are no more real Berlioz has not gone down into the darkness of the pit with Petrus Borel and the others. No one listening last night to "Harold in Italy" spent any time in considering Childe Harold and his ways. The viola to the audience was simply a beautiful instrument played with wondrous tone and exquisite art by Mr. Ferir. It was not the voice of Harold, melancholy, dreaming, observing, groaning, sobbing. The music made its effect without any thought of programme, as though it were purely absolute music, a species of viola concerto, and it must not be forgotten that "Harold in Italy" owed its origin to the desire of Berlioz to write a viola piece for Paganini. The music was extraordinary 73 years ago, and although some passages now seem old-fashioned, or even barely tolerable, the work as a whole has vitality and a singular fascination.

There are pages, as in the "Pilgrims' March," that sound as though they might come from a composition by some ultra-modern Frenchman curious in the matter of orchestral experiments. Berlioz, like Hugo, like the elder Dumas, like certain painters of that period, was a man of native and uncommon genius. His romanticism was something more than a cloak and a dark lantern hastily taken up for theatrical effect. "Harold in Italy" is not so remarkable a work as the "Fantastic Symphony"; it is not a masterpiece like "The Damnation of Faust," an epic of marvellous power; but only a romanticist who was also a genius could have written it. The symphony was read by Dr. Muck in the appropriately rhetorical spirit, as a fantastic poem, and not as a symphony for class-room dissection. It was effectively played.

Mme. Melba sang "L'Amero" from Mozart's early little opera and the familiar aria from "La Traviata," which appeared for the first time here on a Symphony concert programme. She was warmly welcomed and enthusiastically applauded. Her voice is the same instrument of golden tones; the tones are still of inimitable and haunting beauty. There has been no voice like it for many years. May it long be spared to give instant delight and pleasure for the memory.

aper Leader Cleveland
ity JAN 13 1907
ate State

The principal interest in this year's appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra centers in Dr. [illegible]lin, the new conductor. He is in America on a leave of absence, granted by the German Emperor, whose particular interest in the United States is well known. Dr. Muck's appearance in this city will most likely be limited to this one concert because the Emperor refuses to let him remain in America longer than one season.

The orchestra will leave Boston on Sunday evening, January 27, and will give its first concert in Rochester on the following evening. It will play in Cleveland on Tuesday night, in Chicago on Wednesday, Detroit on Thursday, Indianapolis on Friday and Cincinnati on Saturday afternoon, whence it will return directly to Boston and resume its regular work in the East.

The orchestra will bring to Cleveland seventy-five musicians. This is the number that came last season, but there will be some change in the personnel. When the orchestra was here last it lacked such men as Longy, the first oboe; Grisez, the first clarinet; Sadony, the first bassoon, and Max Hess, the first horn, because these gentlemen had not yet returned from Europe. This year they will be with the orchestra and thus the wind choirs will be more beautiful than they were a year ago.

Professor Willy Hess will be the concert master, Mr. Warnke the first cello and Mr. Ferir the first viola. The soloist will be Timothee Adamowski, who shares the first desk of the violins with Professor Hess, and is a virtuoso of high rank.

It is not going too far to say that this concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by all odds, the most important musical event of the busiest and most prosperous season of music Cleveland has ever known.

aper Star
ty Cincinnati
te JAN 15 1907 State

At the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music hall, on Saturday afternoon, February 2, the public of Cincinnati will have an opportunity to hear for the first time one of the most eminent violinists of the world—Prof. Willy Hess—who is in his third year as concertmaster of the orchestra. Prof. Hess's career of over thirty years has been crowded with incident and success. He made his debut as soloist in Holland in 1872, when he was but thirteen years old, and, what is still more remarkable, in the same season he won great distinction by his leading of the celebrated Harfen quartet, one of the most famous chamber music organizations of its time. Boy violinists of great talent are not uncommon, but a boy of thirteen who was a successful leader of a string quartet must have been richly endowed.

[12]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
JANUARY 28,
New York Office, Tribune Building.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

F. S. Converse. "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasie.
Mozart. Aria. "L'Amero," from "Il Re Pastore."
Verdi. Recit. ed Aria, from "La Traviata." "Ah, fors' e Lui."

Soloist, Mme. Melba.

Berlioz. Symphony. "Harold in Italy."

Mr. Converse chose a strong subject for his orchestral fantasie in Walt Whitman's poem, which is full of contrasts. In one of its lines the poet cries to the trumpeter—which may indicate that he did not know the difference between a cornet and a trumpet, or it may be a case of what Mrs. Partington would have called "poetical licentiousness." If it is an error Whitman would not be the only poet who has slipped and fallen when upon musical ground. Coleridge, in his "Ancient Mariner," speaks of "the loud bassoon," when he probably meant trombone (for the bassoon is not especially loud nor would it be very prominent at a wedding feast), while Tennyson invites Maud to come into the garden and listen to an awful combination of "Flute, violin, bassoon," which even Richard Strauss has not tried yet, and Browning—the musical Browning—in his "Toccata of Martini Galuppi" speaks of "Sixths diminished, sigh on sigh," whereas few harmony teachers recognize a diminished sixth, and a succession of them would only constitute a set of consecutive fifths, which would make the teacher of harmony sigh.

"Thy cornet, echoing, pealing,"

Out of the Whitman suggestions Mr. Converse has made some fine orchestral contrasts of Mystery, Peace, War and Triumph, but the work is somewhat fragmentary in effect and neither so homogeneous nor so finely developed as his Overture to "Jeanne d' Arc" which was given in Boston recently. But it is a fine example of the composer's skill in orchestration. In brilliancy and good taste in scoring we can rank Mr. Converse as close to Loeffler and Van der Stucken.

The trumpet was not as prominent nor as characteristically used as one might have anticipated. Harp, bass clarinette, piccolo and oboe were quite as much in the foreground as the mystic gentleman of the title. Nor was the trumpet as well sounded as we are accustomed to hear it from our excellent soloist. The harp, oboe, and especially the bass clarinette, were exceedingly well played, and the piccolo gave out its phrase from "Marching through Georgia" with martial fervor. Loeffler has also used this tune as a typical motive in a very advanced vocal work. The musically uneducated Henry C. Work succeeded in writing one of the three chief songs of our Civil War, a fact that recent composers are beginning to recognize. Mr. Converse's Fantasie was abundantly applauded and its spirited character deserved the tribute.

Then came the event of the concert which threw Converse, Berlioz, the orchestra, Dr. Muck and everything else into the shade. A phenomenal voice, a good larynx and a pair of well-trained vocal cords will outweigh all the other musical paraphernalia in existence, with the general public. Nor is this a recent fad; it has existed for 20 centuries. Imperial Rome valued its Gaditanian singers above all other music, and the Roman misses ran after these slaves with the persistency of a modern matinee girl. Cuzzoni and Faustina out-weighed Handel during the opera seasons of nearly 200 years ago. And Melba being now one of the greatest of her kind, has also the right to triumph over everything musical that is placed upon the programme beside her.

Mme. Melba is in her vocal prime. Never has her voice been so easily controlled or so attractive in its timbre. If we say that there was a trace of effort in one or two very high passages we have found the only fault that hyper-criticism could detect. Those who were her rivals are beginning to show the ravages of time, and it is quite possible that Melba is the greatest living soprano today. Therefore it was that people were standing in line at Symphony Hall, in a driving snow-storm, at 7 a.m. on Friday last, waiting for a chance to get in the hall at 2 p.m., when the carriages of those more favored persons, who held tickets, blocked all the adjacent streets.

Melba sang the Mozart number finely, but not phenomenally. The cadenza was very brilliant and Prof. Hess played the violin obbligato with discreet subordination. But in "Fors' e Lui," her foot was upon her native heath and she shone forth resplendent. The much-abused Alfredo was well represented by an amatory violoncello and the orchestral support was excellent. In this aria the "ocoloratura" was of the most brilliant description, yet nothing seemed forced or strained. The trill was liquid and beautiful, like that of Patti in her best days.

Therefore "Fors' e Lui" became the chief number of the concert with many an auditor, Wagner to the contrary notwithstanding. What do all the theories of high art matter to the populace? What boots it to say that the music should more subtly portray the underlying sorrow of Violetta, or that a person in the first stages of tuberculosis would not warble in this manner! It was tuneful, vocally gymnastic, and executed by a great singer, and all the theories in the world cannot abolish this branch of music. In fact, it may be a good thing for art when the leaders recognize the fact that tune is as much an element of music as the notes themselves, and return to writing melodies, adding to them the grand harmonies and orchestration of a Wagner or Strauss. We lost count of how many times Melba was recalled. There was tremendous enthusiasm at the end of the number, and at one time it seemed as if the audience were trying to break through the musical laws of the Boston Medes and Persians, and force an encore.

We were glad to see, however, that there was no exodus at the end of the Verdi confectionery. Evidently the singer's triumph did not abolish an appreciation of higher and more dramatic musical work. The first movement of the "Childe Harold" spmphony was made perhaps a trifle too heroic for its theme, but Dr. Muck brought out every point of the complicated score. Mr. Ferir was roundly applauded as he came forward to take the obbligato viola part, and he played the tender theme with the utmost beauty.

work to do [illegible] very prominent in the [illegible] Fantasie and in the first movement of the "Childe Harold" his support of the viola was exquisitely shaded. But, of course, Mr. Ferir's playing was the most conspicuous and important part of the solo work, and it could not have been better performed; it was the embodiment of the melancholy of "Childe Harold," an emotion that fitted the viola like a glove.

Especially well-shaded were the iridiscent passages bowed near the bridge, ("sull' ponticello") in the second movement.

This entire "March of the Pilgrims" was deliciously interpreted by all. Only we found the horn a little too loud at first in the bell tones (the moment the tone is forced the bell-like quality disappears) and the harp was not nearly loud enough; where we sat it was inaudible.

In the third movement the Pifferari seemed far more natural than even those of Handel ("Messiah") or Liszt ("Christus"), although Berlioz did not, like these two, use an actual Pifferaro tune. In this movement one can speak with praise of the playing of the English horn, of the Harold theme as it appears on the flute, and of the delicate shading of the viola as it plays alone at the close. One seemed to see the Byronic hero standing gloomy and apart, after all the merry-making.

Dr. Muck certainly brought out all the brutality of the finale, and his reading was again of the highest order. Every contrast was finely made, the reminiscence of the "March of the Pilgrims" interrupting the orgie of the brigands as a whiff of pure air might penetrate into a reeking atmosphere. Yet the finale seems fading somewhat. It is possible that we have at present gone so far beyond what, a half-century ago, were considered the extremes of music, that the old outbursts seem tame to us.

And now our orchestra departs to prove to western cities that we have not been standing still in our symphonic achievements. There will therefore be no concerts on Friday and Saturday of this week. Bon voyage! Louis C. Elson.

per Courier Press
y New York
e State N Y
JAN 12 1907

Boston Symphonie-Quartett.

Vor sehr gut gefülltem Hause fand gestern Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall das diesjährige zweite Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Quartetts, bestehend aus den Herren Prof. Willy Heß, erste, Otto Roth, zweite Violine, Emile Ferir, Viola und Heinrich Warnke, Cello, statt. Als Solistin war die bekannte Gesangsmeisterin Frau Matia von Nießen-Stone gewonnen worden, welche eine Reihe von Liedern sang.

Beethoven's F-moll-Streichquartett, Op. 95, No. 11, eröffnete das Konzert und fand seitens der genannten vier Herren eine prächtige Wiedergabe, aus welcher wir namentlich den zweiten Satz mit seinem überaus feinen Zusammenspiel und das Allegretto agitato des dritten Satzes mit seinem durchgeistigten Piano hervorheben möchten.

Als Novität spielten die Herren das D-dur-Streichquartett, op. 41, No. 2, von Hugo Kaun, das für New York Novität war. Es handelt sich um ein Werk, das von dem üblichen Quartettstyl abweicht, sich aber durch hübsche Erfindung und ganz ausgesprochene Klangschönheiten auszeichnet. Namentlich der letzte Satz des Werkes ist orchestral gedacht, kommt aber in der trefflichen Bearbeitung für vier Stimmen zu bester Geltung. Am Besten hat uns der erste Satz gefallen, ein langsamer Satz mit der Bezeichnung „sehr ruhig, mit innigster Empfindung", eine meisterhaft gearbeitete Fuge auf einem interessanten Doppelthema, das in mächtiger Steigerung äußerst effektvoll abschließt.

Der zweite Satz („sehr lebhaft, mit innerlicher Freude") ist ein prächtiges Scherzo, daß sich im Verlaufe des Satzes zu großer Lebhaftigkeit entwickelt und eine in sehr flottem Tempo gehaltene Coda enthält. Der letzte Satz („ruhig, ernst") ist, wie man sieht, gegen jede Ueberlieferung wieder langsam. Im weiteren Verlaufe des Satzes kommen prächtige Harmonien zum Vorschein und hübsche Effekte, wie z. B. Pizzikato-Akkorde des Cellos zu einer sehr lebhaften Figur der leitenden Stimme. Der Schluß verklingt ungemein stimmungsvoll.

In diesem letzten Satze sind Wagnersche Harmonie-Folgen unverkennbar; man fühlt sich sogar an einige Vorbilder direkt gemahnt („Tristan und Isolde", „Lohengrin", „Parsifal"), doch giebt es darunter auch sehr viel Persönliches und neuartige Klangwirkungen, so daß das Werk uns mit ruhigem Behagen entläßt. Gespielt wurde es von Herrn Heß und Konsorten mit liebevollem Eifer und schönstem Gelingen. Namentlich der letzte Satz erklang im Spiele der Herren in durchsichtiger Tonschönheit. Der Beifall klang aufrichtig und überzeugungstreu.

Frau Matia von Nissen-Stone sang zwischen den beiden Quartetten fünf Lieder von Schubert, unter denen sie namentlich das neckische „Liebhaber in allen Gestalten" sehr charakteristisch wiedergab. Dasselbe war mit vier Liedern von Hugo Wolf der Fall, je zwei aus dem italienischen und dem spanischen Liederbuch. Die Dame besitzt eine klangvolle, mit großem Geschmack verwendete Stimme, die Alt-Charakter aufweist. Sie besitzt ausgesprochene musikalische Intelligenz und feines Stylgefühl. Auch ist ihre Stimme der charakteristischen Färbung des Tones in hervorragendem Maße fähig. Die Begleitung klang etwas monoton. Wolf'sche Lieder sind nicht leicht zu begleiten.

Paper Staats Zeitung
City New York
Date JAN 1 [illegible] State NY

[illegible] Symphonie-Concert.

Dr. Muck hat uns gleich von allem Anfang seiner Bostoner Thätigkeit an Achtung abgerungen, ein Gefühl, das sich nach näherer Bekanntschaft bis zur Bewunderung steigerte. Gestern Abend hat er sich uns mit seiner Wiedergabe von Beethoven's Siebenter in's Herz geschlichen. Welch' großzügige und dabei doch so unwiderstehlich-liebenswürdige Darbietung! Man weiß nicht, soll man den berühmten Dirigenten zu diesem Elite-Orchester beglückwünschen, oder das berühmte Orchester zu diesem Elite-Dirigenten?! Beide hatten gestern Ursache auf einander stolz zu sein.

Schon die schwärmerisch-plastische Darlegung der herrlichen romantischen Introduktion nahm uns gefangen. Im Vivace entlockte der Dirigent seinem bewunderungswürdigen Instrument Wendungen stolzer Pracht. Die häufig schroffen Modulationen gestaltete er scharf und umrissen, den oft unvermittelten modulatorischen Effekten und excentrischen Kontrastwirkungen wurde er bis in die feinsten Abtönungen gerecht.

Der berühmte zweite Satz, der, wie uns Ueberlieferungen aus alter Zeit verkünden, stets zur Wiederholung verlangt und gewährt wurde, erklang bezaubernd süß und einschmeichelnd. Die Celli und Bratschen sangen und spannen die sehnsüchtige Melodie über alle Massen vollendet. Den dritten Satz, den Dr. Muck sehr zart und ruhig anfaßte, gestaltete er in meisterhaft diskreter Steigerung zu einem großartigen, feierlichen Schluß-Tongemälde. Die üppigsatte Klangpoesie des unvergleichlichen Orchesters wirkte da mit der Gewalt der Offenbarung. Minutenlang setzte der Dirigent mit dem Taktstock aus, wie bezwungen von der auf ihn eindringenden Klangpracht. Eine wahre Ovation dankte für das künstlerische Erlebnis. Im Finale rückte Dr. Muck das Großzügige und die Kühnheit der thematischen Entwicklung in das hellste Licht.

Die zweite Nummer des gestrigen Beethovenprogramms der Bostoner — selbstverständlich fand die Veranstaltung in Carnegie Hall statt — bildete des Meisters unsterbliches Violin-Konzert, dessen sonnigen, von keiner grübelnden Vernunft angekränkelten Glanz und Abgeklärtheit der Dirigent effektvoll betonte. Die Sologeige ruhte in den Händen des Konzertmeisters Herrn Willy Heß, der eine selten glänzende und inspirirte Leistung bot. Den Anfang spielte er energisch zugreifend und packend, obgleich wir uns dabei mitunter einen volleren Ton gewünscht hätten, die köstliche Melodik des zweiten Themas, wohl die Perle des Werks, erklang überaus rein und warm. Im zweiten Satz verstand er es, der Kantilene Gefühl und Seele einzuhauchen, und namentlich die lang gezogenen Noten des zweiten Themas wirkten mit der gebührenden leichtbeschwingten Nachtigallengrazie. Der Freudentaumel des Schlusses kam überzeugend zur Geltung. Technisch erwies Herr Heß gestern eine sehr bemerkenswerthe Meisterschaft. Die schwierigen Doppelgänge, Trillerketten und das sonstige Teufelszeug der Joachim'schen Kadenz (mit dem Laub'schen Uebergang) kamen mit vollendeter Sauberkeit und Verve zur Geltung. Auf eine Zwischenpausen-Frage, weshalb Prof. Heß nicht seine eigene Kadenz in das Concert eingelegt habe, erwiederte er schlagfertig-launig: „Um das Werk nicht in Schatten zu stellen!" Der Beifall des Publikums wollte nach diesen beiden Nummern kein Ende nehmen.

Mit der kurzen Konstatirung, daß Beethoven's „Egmont"-Ouverture, die den Beginn des Concerts bildete, mit voller Meisterschaft gespielt wurde, wollen wir Schluß machen. Nichts ist so ermüdend als zu viel Lob, und das mußten wir diesmal fast überreichlich ausstreuen.

H.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date
JAN 19 1907 State N. Y.

Plans for a Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now completed. The orchestra, with Dr. Muck, will leave Boston Sunday evening, Jan. 27, and go direct to Rochester, where it will give a concert in the Lyceum Theatre on Monday evening. The soloist will be Mr. T. Adamowski. The next evening it will give a concert in Gray's Armory, Cleveland, this being one of the course of seven concerts given by various orchestras in that city. Mr. Adamowski will also be the soloist there. Wednesday evening it will give a concert in the Auditorium, Chicago, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist. Thursday evening it plays in Light Guard Armory, Detroit, with Mr. Adamowski as soloist. Friday evening it gives a concert in the English Opera House, Indianapolis, without a soloist, and Saturday afternoon it plays in Music Hall, Cincinnati, with Professor Willy Hess as soloist. From Cincinnati it returns directly to Boston.

News
Indianapolis
State
Date JAN 15 1907

NO SOLOIST FOR CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Plan in Keeping with the Views of Conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

It is well known that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided objections to soloists at symphony concerts. His objections are entirely logical, being based on the fact that a soloist, whether a singer or instrumentalist, must necessarily break the symmetry and contour of a program. However, Dr. Muck is a man of the world, and realizes that he can not have all things as he would like them and the public, as a rule, demands a soloist.

Therefore, when Mrs. Ona B. Talbot, in Boston, a few weeks ago told him that Indianapolis did not wish a soloist, he was not only greatly astonished, but vastly pleased. It was hard for him to understand that a Western city had reached the point of musicale development. Immediately, however, he showed more interest in the program than he had done for any other city on the Western trip. The result is, that Indianapolis has as near approach to an ideal program as can be arranged. It is modern music, and shows the best that modern composers have written. Brahms's First Symphony is unquestionably the greatest symphony since Beethoven. Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" is regarded by many as his greatest work, especially by those who can accept his later and more fantastic compositions as music, and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" is unquestionably the most brilliant and most attractive work of its kind. In the interpretation of these three works Dr. Muck, by the common consent of the principal critics of New York, Boston and other Eastern cities, is the master. His reading of Brahams has been termed a re-creation; his Strauss is in its way as extraordinary, while his Wagner must necessarily be all that others are, as he is admittedly one of the two or three great Wagner conductors now living. The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at English's January 29. All mail orders should be addressed to Ona B. Talbot.

Paper Times
City Rochester
Date
JAN 19 1907 State N. Y.

Miss Inga Orner, a member of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, is to give a song recital in Carnegie Lyceum on Sunday afternoon, February 3d.

The plans for the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now completed. The orchestra, with Dr. Muck, will leave Boston Sunday evening, January 27th, and go direct to Rochester, where it will give a concert in the Lyceum Theatre on Monday evening. The soloist will be T. Adamowski. The next evening it will give a concert in Gray's Armory, Cleveland, this being one of the course of seven concerts given by various orchestras in that city. Mr. Adamowski will also be the soloist there. Wednesday evening it will give a concert in the Auditorium, Chicago, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist. Thursday evening it plays in Light Guard Armory, Detroit, with Mr. Adamowski as soloist. Friday evening it gives a concert in the English Opera House, Indianapolis, without a soloist, and Saturday afternoon it plays in Music Hall, Cincinnati, with Prof. Willy Hess as soloist. From Cincinnati it returns directly to Boston.

Paper Times
City Rochester
Date
JAN 19 1907 State N. Y.

DRAMATIC DRIFT

The plans for the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now completed. The orchestra with Dr. Muck, will leave Boston Sunday evening, January 27, and go direct to Rochester, where it will give a concert in the Lyceum Theater on Monday evening, January 28. The soloist will be Mr. T. Adamowski. The next evening it will give a concert in Gray's Armory, Cleveland, this being one of the course of sever concerts given by various orchestras of that city. Mr. Adamowski will also be the soloist there. Wednesday evening, it will give a concert in the Auditorium, Chicago, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist. Thursday evening it will play in Light Guard Armory, Detroit, with Mr. Adamowski as soloist. Friday evening it will give a concert in the English Opera House, Indianapolis, without a soloist, and Saturday afternoon it will play in Music Hall, Cincinnati, with Professor Willy Hess as soloist. From Cincinnati it will return direct to Boston.

Paper Times
City Rochester
Date
JAN 19 1907 State N. Y.

[illegible] the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose concert here will take place at the Lyceum on Monday night, the 28th, is the first conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, from which post he has a year's leave of absence from the German Emperor to be at the head of Boston's famous band. He was born in Wurzburg, Bavaria, where his father, who was a talented amateur musician, gave him his first music lessons, teaching him the violin, piano and counterpoint. At the age of 11 he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later played the violin in the local symphony orchestra.

He became a resident at the University of Heidelberg in 1876, where he stayed one year. Thence he went to Leipsic, where he matriculated in the university and at the same time entered the Conservatory of Music. He made his debut as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert in 1880, the same year in which he received his university degree.

Following his original plan to become a conductor, he took as his first engagement the post of chorus master in the Opera of Zurich, where he stayed during the season of 1880-1882; thence to Brunn, where he held a similar position in 1882-1884. His first post of real importance was the conductorship at Graz in Austria, which he occupied for two years, following his engagement at Brunn. There he gave the first uncut performance of "Die Meistersinger" in Austria. During his stay in Graz he was the conductor of the important Styrian Musical Society and in February, 1886, gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, his performance of which work was one of the sensations of the present musical season in Boston and New York.

DR. KARL MUCK,
Conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum on January 28.

Paper Union
City Brooklyn
Date
JAN 19 1907 State N. Y.

Plans for the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now completed. The orchestra, with Dr. Muck, will leave Boston Sunday evening, Jan. 27, and go direct to Rochester where it will give a concert in the Lyceum Theatre on Monday evening. The soloist will be T. Adamowski. The next evening it will give a concert in Gray's Armory, Cleveland, this being one of the course of seven concerts given by various orchestras in that city. Mr. Adamowski will also be the soloist there. Wednesday evening, it will give a concert in the Auditorium, Chicago, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist. Thursday evening it plays in Light Guard Armory, Detroit, with Mr. Adamowski as soloist. Friday evening it gives a concert in the English Opera House, Indianapolis, without a soloist, and Saturday afternoon it plays in Music Hall, Cincinnati, with Prof. Willy Hess as soloist. From Cincinnati it returns direct to Boston.

Paper News
City Indianapolis

CAREER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FAMOUS MUSICAL ORGANIZATION AND ITS LEADERS.

TO GIVE CONCERT FEBRUARY 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give a concert in English's Opera-house on Friday, February 1, was founded more than twenty-five years ago by Henry L. Higginson.

The first public rehearsal and concert of the orchestra were given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively, October 21 and 22, 1881. The orchestra consisted of seventy musicians, with George Henschel as conductor. Mr. Henschel was then a young, enthusiastic musician admirably fitted for the task before him, because he understood, as few conductors do, the art of making programs. His scheme of programs generally was educational and as an illustration of this, during his incumbency he made it a rule to play all nine of Beethoven's symphonies each season.

Mr. Henschel's term of service ended with the completion of the third season of the orchestra. He had done his work admirably and left the orchestra a firmly established institution which was already gaining a reputation more than local.

Musicians from Vienna.

The successor of Mr. Henschel was Wilhelm Gericke, under whose term of conductorship the orchestra was to take a leading place among such organizations in the world. Mr. Gericke came from Vienna, where he had been one of the conductors of the opera. Coming to America in the prime of life he brought certain qualities which were needed greatly. Mr. Higginson gave him the complete artistic control of the orchestra. He was an absolute ruler to do with it as he pleased. No changes of moment were made in his first season, but in his second he brought from Vienna a number of young musicians to supply needed new material, and he also enlarged the personnel so that it numbered eighty men. Under him the work of the orchestra greatly increased.

Concerts were given regularly in New York, Philadelphia and other Eastern cities as well as in New England and in 1886 a spring trip of three weeks was made to the midle West, which, if not financially successful, was of inestimable benefit to a public to whom orchestra music in its best sense was unknown. Indianapolis was one of the few cities in the middle Western tour.

By the end of Mr. Gericke's first term of service in 1889, when he voluntarily relinquished his position to return to Austria, the orchestra had gained a pre-eminent position, which it has since held. The members were bound by contract to give their exclusive services to the orchestra, and the contracts covered enough months in the year to keep the same personnel, so there was a minimum of change in it. This one fact worked greatly for its efficiency. The question of expense never came under discussion when it was thought necessary to get musicians.

Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur.

The retirement of Mr. Gericke brought to Boston one of the most interesting personalities in the world of music—Arthur Nikisch, who for several years had been the conductor of the Municipal Opera in Leipsic. Mr. Nikisch proved to be the antithesis of his predecessor, a subjective conductor of great personal charm, and under him the orchestra had some of its most prosperous years. During his term of service the Western trips were continued, with much success. The support of the orchestra increased and in one year there was no deficit at the end of the season.

In the spring of 1894, a year before the end of his contract, Mr. Nikisch obtained a release from it and returned to Europe. His departure was unexpected and caused more or less embarrassment, for the time was short in which to get a new conductor for the next season, but in the end the choice fell on Emil Paur, who had succeeded Nikisch in the Leipsic Opera. Mr. Paur's engagement was for five years and his term of service was made notable by the first performance in Boston of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, several of the larger works of Richard Strauss as well as the works of younger and then less known French and Russian composers. He retired at the end of his engagement to become conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York and was succeeded by Mr. Gericke, who returned for eight years, his last appearance with the orchestra having been on Sunday evening, April 29, last, at a concert given for the benefit of the sufferers of the San Francisco disaster.

Engagement of Dr. Muck.

Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, was Mr. Gericke's successor. Dr. Muck, since 189[illegible] had been a principal conductor of the royal opera in Berlin, and in that time had been conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Vienna, of the "Parsifal" performances in Bayreuth, and had been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. Dr. Muck obtained leave of absence from the royal opera for one year.

No conductor has been greeted with such unanimous and enthusiastic praise in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn and other cities than Dr. Muck. His masterly musicianship and his charming personality have made it possible for the orchestra to take a long step toward that ideal state where soloists do not appear on sympony programe and he will leave the orchestra the possessor of even a greater prestige than it had when he came to America last October.

When the orchestra ended its twenty-fifth season last spring it had given a total of 2,399 concerts, which is just short of an average of ninety-six a year. Of these 1,242 had been given in Boston and 1,157 in other cities.

The sale of seats for the appearance of Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city will open at the office of the theater on Tuesday, January 29. Mail orders for seats, which [illegible] should be addressed to Ona B. Talbot.

Of the Boston Symp[illegible]

[122]

Paper Staats Zeitung
City New York
Date JAN 1 State N Y

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Dr. Muck hat uns gleich von allem Anfang seiner Bostoner Thätigkeit an Achtung abgerungen, ein Gefühl, das sich nach näherer Bekanntschaft bis zur Bewunderung steigerte. Gestern Abend hat er sich uns mit seiner Wiedergabe von Beethoven's Siebenter in's Herz geschlichen. Welch' großzügige und dabei doch so unwiderstehlich-liebenswürdige Darbietung! Man weiß nicht, soll man den berühmten Dirigenten zu diesem Elite-Orchester beglückwünschen, oder das berühmte Orchester zu diesem Elite-Dirigenten?! Beide hatten gestern Ursache auf einander stolz zu sein.

Schon die schwärmerisch-plastische Darlegung der herrlichen romantischen Introduktion nahm uns gefangen. Im Vivace entlockte der Dirigent seinem bewunderungswürdigen Instrument Wendungen stolzer Pracht. Die häufig schroffen Modulationen gestaltete er scharf und umrissen, den oft unvermittelten modulatorischen Effekten und excentrischen Kontrastwirkungen wurde er bis in die feinsten Abtönungen gerecht.

Der berühmte zweite Satz, der, wie uns Ueberlieferungen aus alter Zeit verkünden, stets zur Wiederholung verlangt und gewährt wurde, erklang bezaubernd süß und einschmeichelnd. Die Celli und Bratschen sangen und spannen die sehnsüchtige Melodie über alle Massen vollendet. Den dritten Satz, den Dr. Muck sehr zart und ruhig anfaßte, gestaltete er in meisterhaft diskreter Steigerung zu einem großartigen, feierlichen Schluß-Tongemälde. Die üppigsatte Klangpoesie des unvergleichlichen Orchesters wirkte da mit der Gewalt der Offenbarung. Minutenlang setzte der Dirigent mit dem Taktstock aus, wie bezwungen von der auf ihn eindringenden Klangpracht. Eine wahre Ovation dankte für das künstlerische Erlebnis. Im Finale rückte Dr. Muck das Großzügige und die Kühnheit der thematischen Entwicklung in das hellste Licht.

Die zweite Nummer des gestrigen Beethovenprogramms der Bostoner — selbstverständlich fand die Veranstaltung in Carnegie Hall statt — bildete des Meisters unsterbliches Violin-Konzert, dessen sonnigen, von keiner grübelnden Vernunft angekränkelten Glanz und Abgeklärtheit der Dirigent effektvoll betonte. Die Sologeige ruhte in den Händen des Konzertmeisters Herrn Willy Heß, der eine selten glänzende und inspirirte Leistung bot. Den Anfang spielte er energisch zugreifend und packend, obgleich wir uns dabei mitunter einen volleren Ton gewünscht hätten, die köstliche Melodik des zweiten Themas, wohl die Perle des Werks, erklang überaus rein und warm. Im zweiten Satz verstand er es, der Kantilene Gefühl und Seele einzuhauchen, und namentlich die lang gezogenen Noten des zweiten Themas wirkten mit der gebührenden leichtbeschwingten Nachtigallengrazie. Der Freudentaumel des Schlusses kam überzeugend zur Geltung. Technisch erwies Herr Heß gestern eine sehr bemerkenswerthe Meisterschaft. Die schwierigen Doppelgänge, Trillerketten und das sonstige Teufelszeug der Joachim'schen Kadenz (mit dem Laub'schen Uebergang) kamen mit vollendeter Sauberkeit und Verve zur Geltung. Auf eine Zwischenpausen-Frage, weshalb Prof. Heß nicht seine eigene Kadenz in das Concert eingelegt habe, erwiederte er schlagfertig-launig: „Um das Werk nicht in Schatten zu stellen!" Der Beifall des Publikums wollte nach diesen beiden Nummern kein Ende nehmen.

Mit der kurzen Konstatirung, daß Beethoven's „Egmont"-Ouverture, die den Beginn des Concerts bildete, mit voller Meisterschaft gespielt wurde, wollen wir Schluß machen. Nichts ist so ermüdend als zu viel Lob, und das mußten wir diesmal fast überreichlich ausstreuen.

H.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date State N. Y.
JAN 19 1907

Plans for a Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now completed. The orchestra, with Dr. Muck, will leave Boston Sunday evening, Jan. 27, and go direct to Rochester, where it will give a concert in the Lyceum Theatre on Monday evening. The soloist will be Mr. T. Adamowski. The next evening it will give a concert in Gray's Armory, Cleveland, this being one of the course of seven concerts given by various orchestras in that city. Mr. Adamowski will also be the soloist there. Wednesday evening it will give a concert in the Auditorium, Chicago, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist. Thursday evening it plays in Light Guard Armory, Detroit, with Mr. Adamowski as soloist. Friday evening it gives a concert in the English Opera House, Indianapolis, without a soloist, and Saturday afternoon it plays in Music Hall, Cincinnati, with Professor Willy Hess as soloist. From Cincinnati it returns directly to Boston.

Paper News
City Indianapolis
State Iowa Ind

NO SOLOIST FOR CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Plan in Keeping with the Views of Conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

It is well known that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided objections to soloists at symphony concerts. His objections are entirely logical, being based on the fact that a soloist, whether a singer or instrumentalist, must necessarily break the symmetry and contour of a program. However, Dr. Muck is a man of the world, and realizes that he can not have all things as he would like them and the public, as a rule, demands a soloist.

Therefore, when Mrs. Ona B. Talbot, in Boston, a few weeks ago told him that Indianapolis did not wish a soloist, he was not only greatly astonished, but vastly pleased. It was hard for him to understand that a Western city had reached the point of musicale development. Immediately, however, he showed more interest in the program than he has done for any other city on the Western trip. The result is, that Indianapolis has as near approach to an ideal program as can be arranged. It is modern music, and shows the best that modern composers have written. Brahms's First Symphony is unquestionably the greatest symphony since Beethoven. Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" is regarded by many as his greatest work, especially by those who can accept his later and more fantastic compositions as music, and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" is unquestionably the most brilliant and most attractive work of its kind. In the interpretation of these three works Dr. Muck, by the common consent of the principal critics of New York, Boston and other Eastern cities, is the master. His reading of Brahams has been termed a re-creation; his Strauss is in its way as extraordinary, while his Wagner must necessarily be all that others are, as he is admittedly one of the two or three great Wagner conductors now living. The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at English's January 29. All mail orders should be addressed to Ona B. Talbot.

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date State N. Y.
JAN 19 1907

Miss Inga Orner, a member of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, is to give a song recital in Carnegie Lyceum on Sunday afternoon, February 3d.

The plans for the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now completed. The orchestra, with Dr, Muck, will leave Boston Sunday evening, January 27th, and go direct to Rochester, where it will give a concert in the Lyceum Theatre on Monday evening. The soloist will be T. Adamowski. The next evening it will give a concert in Gray's Armory, Cleveland, this being one of the course of seven concerts given by various orchestras in that city. Mr. Adamowski will also be the soloist there. Wednesday evening it will give a concert in the Auditorium, Chicago, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist. Thursday evening it plays in Light Guard Armory, Detroit, with Mr. Adamowski as soloist. Friday evening it gives a concert in the English Opera House, Indianapolis, without a soloist, and Saturday afternoon it plays in Music Hall, Cincinnati, with Prof. Willy Hess as soloist. From Cincinnati it returns directly to Boston.

r Times
Rochester
State N. Y.
JAN 19 1907

DRAMATIC DRIFT

The plans for the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now completed. The orchestra with Dr. Muck, will leave Boston Sunday evening, January 27, and go direct to Rochester, where it will give a concert in the Lyceum Theater on Monday evening, January 28. The soloist will be Mr. T. Adamowski. The next evening it will give a concert in Gray's Armory, Cleveland, this being one of the course of sever concerts given by various orchestras of that city. Mr. Adamowski will also be the soloist there. Wednesday evening, it will give a concert in the Auditorium, Chicago, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist. Thursday evening it will play in Light Guard Armory, Detroit, with Mr. Adamowski as soloist. Friday evening it will give a concert in the English Opera House, Indianapolis, without a soloist, and Saturday afternoon it will play in Music Hall, Cincinnati, with Professor Willy Hess as soloist. From Cincinnati it will return directly to Boston.

Paper Times
City Rochester
Date State N. Y.
JAN 19 1907

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose concert here will take place at the Lyceum on Monday night, the 28th, is the first conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, from which post he has a year's leave of absence from the German Emperor to be at the head of Boston's famous band. He was born in Wurzburg, Bavaria, where his father, who was a talented amateur musician, gave him his first music lessons, teaching him the violin, piano and counterpoint. At the age of 11 he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later played the violin in the local symphony orchestra.

He became a resident at the University of Heidelberg in 1876, where he stayed one year. Thence he went to Leipsic, where he matriculated in the university and at the same time entered the Conservatory of Music. He made his debut as a pianist at a Gewandhuus concert in 1880, the same year in which he received his university degree.

Following his original plan to become a conductor, he took as his first engagement the post of chorus master in the Opera of Zurich, where he stayed during the season of 1880-1882; thence to Brunn, where he held a similar position in 1882-1884. His first post of real importance was the conductorship at Graz in Austria, which he occupied for two years, following his engagement at Brunn. There he gave the first uncut performance of "Die Meistersinger" in Austria. During his stay in Graz he was the conductor of the important Styrian Musical Society and in February, 1886, gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, his performance of which work was one of the sensations of the present musical season in Boston and New York.

DR. KARL MUCK,
Conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum on January 28.

Paper Union
City Brooklyn
Date State N. Y.
JAN 19 1907

Plans for the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now completed. The orchestra, with Dr. Muck, will leave Boston Sunday evening, Jan. 27, and go direct to Rochester where it will give a concert in the Lyceum Theatre on Monday evening. The soloist will be T. Adamowski. The next evening it will give a concert in Gray's Armory, Cleveland, this being one of the course of seven concerts given by various orchestras in that city. Mr. Adamowski will also be the soloist there. Wednesday evening, it will give a concert in the Auditorium, Chicago, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist. Thursday evening it plays in Light Guard Armory, Detroit, with Mr. Adamowski as soloist. Friday evening it gives a concert in the English Opera House, Indianapolis, without a soloist and Saturday afternoon it plays in Music Hall, Cincinnati, with Prof. Willy Hess as soloist. From Cincinnati it will return direct to Boston.

Paper News
City Indianapolis

CAREER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FAMOUS MUSICAL ORGANIZATION AND ITS LEADERS.

TO GIVE CONCERT FEBRUARY 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give a concert in English's Opera-house on Friday, February 1, was founded more than twenty-five years ago by Henry L. Higginson.

The first public rehearsal and concert of the orchestra were given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively, October 21 and 22, 1881. The orchestra consisted of seventy musicians, with George Henschel as conductor. Mr. Henschel was then a young, enthusiastic musician admirably fitted for the task before him, because he understood, as few conductors do, the art of making programs. His scheme of programs generally was educational and as an illustration of this, during his incumbency he made it a rule to play all nine of Beethoven's symphonies each season.

Mr. Henschel's term of service ended with the completion of the third season of the orchestra. He had done his work admirably and left the orchestra a firmly established institution which was already gaining a reputation more than local.

Musicians from Vienna.

The successor of Mr. Henschel was Wilhelm Gericke, under whose term of conductorship the orchestra was to take a leading place among such organizations in the world. Mr. Gericke came from Vienna, where he had been one of the conductors of the opera. Coming to America in the prime of life he brought certain qualities which were needed greatly. Mr. Higginson gave him the complete artistic control of the orchestra. He was an absolute ruler to do with it as he pleased. No changes of moment were made in his first season, but in his second he brought from Vienna a number of young musicians to supply needed new material, and he also enlarged the personnel so that it numbered eighty men. Under him the work of the orchestra greatly increased.

Concerts were given regularly in New York, Philadelphia and other Eastern cities as well as in New England and in 1886 a spring trip of three weeks was made to the midle West, which, if not financially successful, was of inestimable benefit to a public to whom orchestral music in its best sense was unknown. Indianapolis was one of the few cities in the middle Western tour.

By the end of Mr. Gericke's first term of service in 1889, when he voluntarily relinquished his position to return to Austria, the orchestra had gained a pre-eminent position, which it has since held. The members were bound by contract to give their exclusive services to the orchestra, and the contracts covered enough months in the year to keep the same personnel, so there was a minimum of change in it. This one fact worked greatly for its efficiency. The question of expense never came under discussion when it was thought necessary to get musicians.

Arthur Nickisch and Emil Paur.

The retirement of Mr. Gericke brought to Boston one of the most interesting personalities in the world of music—Arthur Nikisch, who for several years had been the conductor of the Municipal Opera in Leipsic. Mr. Nikisch proved to be the antithesis of his predecessor, a subjective conductor of great personal charm, and under him the orchestra had some of its most prosperous years. During his term of service the Western trips were continued, with much success. The support of the orchestra increased and in one year there was no deficit at the end of the season.

In the spring of 1894, a year before the end of his contract, Mr. Nikisch obtained a release from it and returned to Europe. His departure was unexpected and caused more or less embarrassment, for the time was short in which to get a new conductor for the next season, but in the end the choice fell on Emil Paur, who had succeeded Nikisch in the Leipsic Opera. Mr. Paur's engagement was for five years and his term of service was made notable by the first performance in Boston of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, several of the larger works of Richard Strauss as well as the works of younger and then less known French and Russian composers. He retired at the end of his engagement to become conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York and was succeeded by Mr. Gericke, who returned for eight years, his last appearance with the orchestra having been on Sunday evening, April 29, last, at a concert given for the benefit of the sufferers of the San Francisco disaster.

Engagement of Dr. Muck.

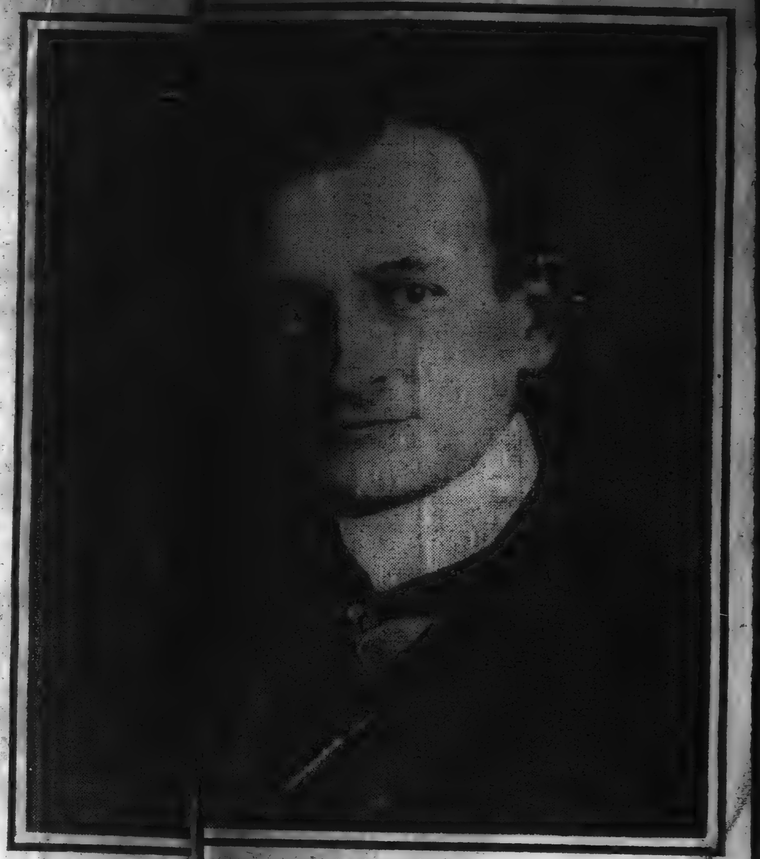
Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, was Mr. Gericke's successor. Dr. Muck, since 1892 had been a principal conductor of the royal opera in Berlin, and in that time had been conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Vienna, of the "Parsifal" performances in Bayreuth, and had been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. Dr. Muck obtained leave of absence from the royal opera for one year.

No conductor has been greeted with such unanimous and enthusiastic praise in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn and other cities than Dr. Muck. His masterly musicianship and his charming personality have made it possible for the orchestra to take a long step toward that ideal state where soloists do not appear on sympony programs and he will leave the orchestra the possessor of even a greater prestige than it had when he came to America last October.

When the orchestra ended its twenty-fifth season last spring it had given a total of 2,399 concerts, which is just short of an average of ninety-six a year. Of these 1,242 had been given in Boston and 1,157 in other cities.

The sale of seats for the appearance of Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city will open at the box office of the theater on Tuesday, January 29. Mail orders for seats, with checks, should be addressed to Ona B. Talbot.

FAMOUS MUSICAL CONDUCTOR



DR. KARL MUCK,
Of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play in Indianapolis February 1.

[122]

Paper Express
City Rochester
Date State N.Y.
JAN 19 1907

[illegible] Symphony orchestra will give [illegible] at the Lyceum on the evening of [illegible] the 28th instant. The program consists of three works; the [illegible] Overture, Beethoven's [illegible] Symphony, and the Saint Saens [illegible] Concerto in which Timothee [illegible]wski will be the soloist. The following notes on the Boston Symphony from [illegible]wen of William E. Walter, of Boston, are to the point:

"It was said a year or so ago that the fame of the wonderful playing of the [illegible] Symphony orchestra lay not merely in its being a "virtuoso orchestra," but [illegible]orchestra of virtuosi." And one of the [illegible] published comments on the or[illegible]a by Dr. Karl Muck, the new con[illegible] was in praise of the way the dif[illegible] choirs had been selected. The brass [illegible]s composed almost entirely of Ger[illegible]; the wood-wind of Slavs, Germans, [illegible]rians and Americans, and the strings [illegible]Frenchmen who were the leading ar[illegible]s in Paris, the best products of the [illegible]t teachers of Brussels, Prague, Vienna [illegible] Berlin.

"But the end is not reached merely with accomplished musicians. These musicians must have good tools to work with and must have been together long enough to get thoroughly en rapport with each other. It is questionable whether any orchestra in the world counts so many valuable violins, violas, and 'cellos as the Boston Symphony. In this fact is one of the secrets of the extraordinary brilliancy of its strings. It has been said, with truth that there is not a mediocre instrument in the string choirs while most of them are choicest examples of the great masters. So, too, it is with the wind choirs, wood-wind and brass. Greatest care has been used in the selection of the instruments and every improvement which has proved its worth been adopted.

"The other factor in the making of a successful orchestra, that of keeping the same personnel from year to year, is another point in which the Boston Symphony orchestra has been most fortunate. There are some men now in the orchestra who played in the first concert in 1881. Seventy-five per cent. of the men have been in the orchestra for over ten years and the changes among the leading musicians have been very few indeed. There have been but four concert masters—Bernhard Listemann, now of Chicago, who held the post during the first four seasons; Franz Kneisel who succeeded him and held the post until the spring of 1903; E. Fernandes-Arbos who was concert master in 1903-1904, and Willy Hess who is now at the head of the string choir. The leading 'cellists have been Jean Hekking, Schroeder, Krasselt and Warnke. The brass and wood-winds have seen few changes in the last few years, although the latter had to be almost entirely reorganized in the fall of 1898, as several of its most talented musicians were victims of the La Bourgogne catastrophe. As an illustration of the quality of the orchestra, of the sixteen first violins, over half have appeared on symphony programmes as soloists. Such men as Hess, Adamowski, Roth, Moldauer, Hoffmann, Strube, Spidler and Bak are recognized virtuosi in Europe. It was the leader of the second violins, Mr. Barleben, who first played in Boston the whole of Tschaikowsky's concerto for the violin. Emil Ferir[illegible] Max Zach of the violas and Warnke, Heindler, Nagel and Barth of the 'cellos are [illegible]men who held high positions in Europe before they were brought to Boston.

"It has been said by good judges that the wood-wind choir of the Boston Symphony is the best of any orchestra in the world. This important department has always been cared for most watchfully by the conductors and it includes some of the greatest artists of Europe. Georges Longy, the first oboe, came to the orchestra in 1898 from Paris, where he was regarded as the greatest oboe that the Conservatoire had produced. He won the first prize in the Conservatoire in 1886 and was successively first oboe of the Lamoureux orchestra, the Opera-Comique and the Colonne orchestra. Andre Maquarre, the first flute, succeeded Jacquet, one of the Bourgogne's victims. He was the winner of the first prize for solfeggio in the Conservatoire in 1882 and for the flute in 1885. He came to Boston from the Lamoureux orchestra, in which he was first flute. Georges Grisez, the first clarinet, is a comparatively late-comer, having succeeded Lebailly in the fall of 1904. His master was Leon Grisez, the greatest clarinetist of France, and he himself was a winner of the first prize in the Conservatoire. When he was engaged for Boston he was the first clarinet of the famous Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, the finest orchestra in France. Curiously enough, the first, second and third bassoons of the orchestra are Germans, while the fourth or contra-bassoon, is a French-[illegible]. Peter Sarony, the first bassoon, came to Boston in the fall of 1905 from [illegible] where he was professor in the [illegible]tory and first bassoon of the celebrated Gurzenich Orchestra. He brought with him the reputation of being the finest [illegible] in Germany, which he has fully [illegible] since he has been with the Boston [illegible]

[illegible]rth and Max Hess, the two first violins, the first trumpet and [illegible] trombonist, are all of them [illegible] more than ordinary artistry.

[illegible] of the orchestra. As a direct result of this has been the development of a distinguished creative talent, Charles Martin Loeffler, who in 1903 left the first desk of the first violins, where he had sat for twenty years to devote himself entirely to composition and teaching. Another remarkable talent which has been developed in the orchestra is Gustav Strube, now one of the first violins, whose works have won for him much admiration. Andre Maquarre, the first flute, and Clement Lenom, the alternate first oboe, have also made their marks as composers.

"Altogether, the Boston Symphony orchestra is composed of a very remarkable and unusual set of musicians. And how highly membership in it is prized is seen in the very long waiting list of applicants which is continually on file in the office of Mr. Hess, the concert-master. As an illustration of this, last spring at the close of the season he had over one hundred and fifty applications from violinists alone."

DR. KARL MUCK

Paper News
City Indianapolis
JAN 20 1907 State Ind

NIGHT OF PLEASURE FOR LOCAL MUSIC LOVERS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING ON FEBRUARY 1.

FIRST CONCERT IN 20 YEARS

On May 3, 1887, The Indianapolis News contained a notice of a concert given the evening before at Dickson's Grand Opera-house." The article began thus: "The initial performance in this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night before a large and brilliant audience, and it is to be hoped that it was the beginning of an acquaintance that shall be renewed yearly."

Almost twenty years have passed and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not again visited this city, but it will visit it on Friday evening of next week, when it is to give a concert at English's Opera-house, with Dr. Carl Muck, of the Berlin Royal Opera, conducting. At the concert of twenty years ago Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conducted. In the miscellaneous program performed there was no symphony. There were played the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Handel's "Largo," the march from Raff's "Lenore" symphony, Bizet's "l'Arlesienne" suite, the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi" and the "Wedding March" of Mendelssohn. Solo numbers were contributed by Mme. Helen Hastreiter, contralto, Miss Aus der Ohe, pianist, and Fritz Giese, violoncellist.

Program for Coming Concert.

The advance in musical culture in the community is indicated in the program to be played at the approaching concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68....Brahms
(a) Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
(b) Andante sostenuto.
(c) Un poco allegretto e grazioso
L'istesso tempo.
(d) Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.....Richard Strauss
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of twenty years ago was a very different organization, though it always has been supreme in this country. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the concert master then, and for many years after. Prof. Willy Hess is now the concert master. Mr. Heinrich Warnke is the present first violoncellist; then, the lamented Fritz Giese held that position.

A Cosmopolis of Virtuosi.

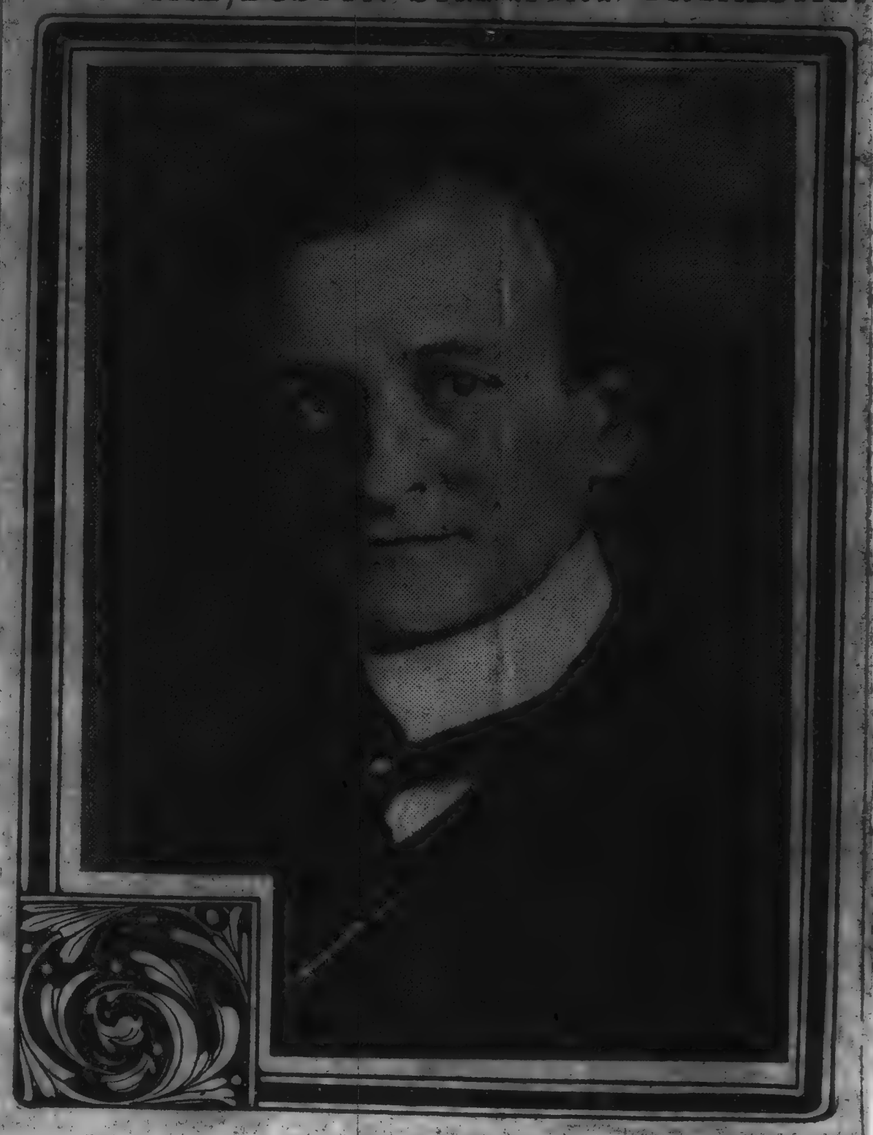
The personnel of the orchestra now is almost twice as large as it was in the old days. Its members now are drawn from the best players available in all countries; it is a veritable cosmopolis of virtuosi.

There is now substantial foundation for the hope that the orchestra will revisit Indianapolis annually. It comes in the regular series of concerts, under the direction of Clark B. Talbot.

The sale of seats will open at the box office of English's Opera-house on next Tuesday morning. A great interest in the concert is being taken by music lovers throughout the State, and the interurban railroad companies will provide [illegible] cars on all the lines. Mail orders for [illegible] will be filled in the order of the day of the

Paper Press
City Detroit
Date State
JAN 20 1907 Mich.

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR WHO IS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA



DR. KARL MUCK.

Coming to Detroit with the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will give the fourth in the series of orchestral association concerts, the evening of Thursday, January 31, is Dr. Karl Muck, the famous Bavarian conductor.

Dr. Muck was a famous conductor long before he came to this country. As far back as 1886, when he was called to Prague and before he had got out of his twenties, he had attracted attention of the connoisseurs of Europe through his work, orchestral and operatic, in Brunn and Graz, his first important posts. In the six years he was at Prague, the chief conductor of the German opera in the city and the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, he made a name for himself for sound scolarship, fine workmanship and valuable temperamental qualities. During that time his reputation increased so rapidly that when there came a vacancy in the ranks of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, the post was given to him. He was then, in 1892, 33 years old.

From Berlin his fame spread through Europe. He became the principal conductor of the "Parsifal" performances at Bayreuth. He became one of the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts. He was, for a season, conductor of German opera at Covent Garden, London. He appeared as guest conductor with the principal orchestras of London, Paris, Brussels, Madrid, Budapest, Copenhagen, St. Petersburg and Moscow and was generally recognized as belonging to that small group of men who are pre-eminent in that particular field, such men as Richter, Mahler, Nikisch, Mott and Richard Strauss.

Dr. Muck's was one of the three or four names seriously considered last spring as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in succession to Mr. Gericke. It was believed at the time that no experiment with a young man of short experience, no matter how talented he might be, could be made and that it was necessary to secure a conductor of established reputation. From the beginning the choice practically settled on Dr. Muck, but there were doubts whether it would be possible to get him. He was the favorite conductor of the German emperor; in fact, enjoyed his personal friendship. Then most powerful influences were brought to bear on him and in the end he told Dr. Muck that he might go to Boston for a year, but no longer; that his (the emperor's) consent was given to this most unwillingly and that he would have allowed him to go to no other orchestra than the Boston Symphony.

The feeling in Boston is that Dr. Muck's coming to America for so short a time is both good fortune and misfortune, good fortune in that it has resulted in the most splendid concerts the orchestra has given in the whole twenty-five years of its existence; misfortune in that the profound impression he has made will make it almost impossible to find a man equal to the task of taking his place.

Dr. Muck is in America for the first time, but this has not been for lack of chances to come here. Maurice Grau a few years ago offered him an almost fabulous sum to become chief conductor of the Metropolitan Opera in New York, but he did not care to leave Berlin. Later he has had other flattering offers, but none appealed to him until he was asked to be conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

While Dr. Muck has been primarily concerned with opera, his experience in the concert field has been very thorough, for beginning with his engagement in Graz he has always supplemented his operatic by purely orchestral work. His success in America although not unexpected, has been most gratifying to his friends and admirers and he seems to have proved most thoroughly what Lilli Lehmann and Milka Ternina said to Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, in Germany last spring, that he was "the man of all men fitted to take charge of Boston's great orchestra."

Paper Express
City Rochester
Date State
JAN 21 1907

IN' THE THEATERS.

Seats for the engagement of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Lyceum on next Monday night go on sale to-morrow. The orchestra will come here seventy-six men strong, and it will be practically of the same make up as last season, except ing that Dr. Karl Muck will be the conductor instead of Mr. Gericke.

Paper Star
City Cincinnati
Date State
JAN 2 2 [illegible]

The reputation which this [illegible] justly acquired for being a [illegible] center will have ample opportunity of being put to the test during the next few weeks, for during that time son several greatest pianists [illegible] heard here in recital, and the most orchestra in the country, perhaps in the world, will visit us. Lhevinne, who played here in [illegible] last year, is announced as soloist the next Symphony concert, and for a recital which occurs on Friday evening, February 2. Lhevinne's status as a player may be classed in the first rank. In delicacy of coloring and smoothness of technic he more nearly approaches to Paderewski than any other player who has visited America since the golden aureoled Pole retired to the fastness of a Swiss villa in order to commune with nature and cultivate the muse. Lhevinne, however, possesses an infallible and unerring technic, such satin smoothness and emotional beauty that his hearers listen and are raptured to the tones he evokes. For all that, the Russian is of [illegible] substantial fabric than the [illegible] Lhevinne is intensely human, and though a pianist, entirely domestic in his tastes. Needless to add to the comment, that he is accompanied by Madame Lhevinne, herself a splendid artist, and by the small Lhevinne, whom the two pianists, his father and his mother, consider to be the most remarkable infant in the world, and a coming pianist of the first magnitude. Following Lhevinne's [illegible] the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at [illegible] afternoon, February 2, and with Dr. Karl Muck as conductor and Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the band, as soloist.

For several years the Boston orchestra has made no Western tours, and their local appearance is one of a series of fortunate events which permitted the tour of a single week during an entire season. Dr. Muck is one of the great orchestral leaders who has devoted himself exclusively to conducting and who has never attempted composition. He will present for the first time in this city the Sibelius Symphony No. 1, the first pretentious work of the Finnish composer whose writings are a musical epic of the genius of his people and their untoward fate. Dr. Muck has but a single year's leave of absence from his post in Berlin, where he is conductor of the royal opera, and as permission to come to this country was most reluctantly granted by the emperor of Germany, it is entirely improbable that Dr. Muck will visit this country again as the leader of an orchestra. The Boston orchestra has been called an orchestra of virtuosi, as in fact they are. Prof. Willy Hess, who will play the Beethoven concerto for violin and orchestra, is a soloist of the first rank, whose interpretation of this colossal work may be loked forward to as that by a masterhand.

From the East, where stars rise comes the news of a new planet dawning on the horizon of art. This time it is a young girl not yet in her twentieth year, about whose playing the critics of New York and Boston have completely lost their heads. One hears so much of pianists, all of whom are supplied with remarkable advance notices, that this young girl preferred to play her first recital in Boston comparatively unheralded. After that she needed no further introduction, and has been hailed as a second Carreno, one of those rare geniuses who occasionally appear and who instantly conquer. Germaine Schnitzer is an Alsatian by birth, but was educated in Paris and [illegible] The greatest interest has been aroused for her recital, which is at the Lyric Theater on the afternoon of February 7.

N.

[123]

Paper Express
City Rochester
Date State N.Y.

JAN 19 1907

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert at the Lyceum on the evening of Monday, the 28th instant. The programme consists of three works; the Meistersinger Overture, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and the Saint Saens Violin Concerto in which Timothee Adamowski will be the soloist. The following notes on the Boston Symphony from the pen of William E. Walter, of Boston, are to the point:

"It was said a year or so ago that the secret of the wonderful playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra lay not merely in its being a "virtuoso orchestra," but "an orchestra of virtuosi." And one of the first published comments on the orchestra by Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor, was in praise of the way the different choirs had been selected. The brass choir is composed almost entirely of Germans; the wood-wind of Slavs, Germans, Austrians and Americans, and the strings of Frenchmen who were the leading artists in Paris, the best products of the great teachers of Brussels, Prague, Vienna and Berlin.

"But the end is not reached merely with accomplished musicians. These musicians must have good tools to work with and must have been together long enough to get thoroughly en rapport with each other. It is questionable whether any orchestra in the world counts so many valuable violins, violas, and 'cellos as the Boston Symphony. In this fact is one of the secrets of the extraordinary brilliancy of its strings. It has been said with truth that there is not a mediocre instrument in the string choirs while most of them are choicest examples of the great masters. So, too, it is with the wind choirs, wood-wind and brass. Greatest care has been used in the selection of the instruments and every improvement which has proved its worth is adopted.

The other factor in the making of a successful orchestra, that of keeping the same personnel from year to year, is another point in which the Boston Symphony orchestra has been most fortunate. There are some men now in the orchestra who played in the first concert in 1881. Seventy-five per cent. of the men have been in the orchestra for over ten years and the changes among the leading musicians have been very few indeed. There have been but four concert masters—Bernhard Listemann, now of Chicago, who held the post during the first four seasons; Franz Kneisel who succeeded him and held the post until the spring of 1903; E. Fernandez-Arbos who was concert master in 1903-1904, and Willy Hess who is now at the head of the string choir. The leading 'cellists have been Giese, Hekking, Schroeder, Krasselt and Warnke. The brass and wood-winds have seen few changes in the last few years, although the latter had to be almost entirely reorganized in the fall of 1898, as several of its most talented musicians were victims of the La Bourgogne catastrophe.

"As an illustration of the quality of the orchestra, of the sixteen first violins, over half have appeared on symphony programmes as soloists. Such men as Hess, Adamowski, Roth, Moldauer, Hoffmann, Struhe, Fiedler and Bak are recognized virtuosi in Europe. It was the leader of the second violins, Mr. Barleben, who first played in Boston the whole of Tschaikowsky's concerto for the violin. Emil Ferir and Max Zach of the violas and Warnke, Koller, Nagel and Barth of the 'cellos are men who held high positions in Europe before they were brought to Boston.

"It has been said by good judges that the wood-wind choir of the Boston Symphony is the best of any orchestra in the world. This important department has always been cared for most watchfully by the conductors and it includes some of the greatests artists of Europe. Georges Longy, the first oboe, came to the orchestra in 1898 from Paris, where he was regarded as the greatest oboe that the Conservatoire had produced. He won the first prize in the Conservatoire in 1886 and was successively first oboe of the Lamoureuz orchestra, the Opera-Comique and the Colonne orchestra. Andre Maquarre, the first flute, succeeded Jacquet, one of the Bourgogne's victims. He was the winner of the first prize for solfeggio in the Conservatoire in 1892 and for the flute in 1893. He came to Boston from the Lamoureux orchestra, in which he was first flute. Georges Grisez, the first clarinet, is a comparatively late-comer, having succeeded Lebailly in the fall of 1904. His father was Leon Grisez, the greatest clarinetist of France, and he himself was a winner of the first prize in the Conservatoire. When he was engaged for Boston he was the first clarinet of the famous Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, the finest orchestra in France. Curiously enough, the first, second and third bassoons of the orchestra are Germans, while the fourth or contra-bassoon, is a Frenchman. Peter Sarony, the first bassoon, came to Boston in the fall of 1905 from Cologne, where he was professor in the Conservatory and first bassoon of the celebrated Gurzenich Orchestra. He brought with him the reputation of being the finest bassoon in Germany, which he has fully sustained since he has been with the Boston Symphony.

"Hackebarth and Max Hess, the two first horns, Kloepfel, the first trumpet and Rettberg, the tympanist, are all of them men of far more than ordinary artistry.

...been the policy of Mr. Higginson and of the conductors to encourge composition among the members of the orchestra. As a direct result of this has been the development of a distinguished creative talent, Charles Martin Loeffler, who in 1903 left the first desk of the first violins, where he had sat for twenty years to devote himself entirely to composition and teaching. Another remarkable talent which has been developed in the orchestra is Gustav Strube, now one of the first violins, whose works have won for him much admiration. Andre Maquarre, the first flute, and Clement Lenom, the alternate first oboe, have also made their marks as composers.

"Altogether, the Boston Symphony orchestra is composed of a very remarkable and unusual set of musicians. And how highly membership in it is prized is seen in the very long waiting list of applicants which is continually on file in the office of Mr. Hess, the concert-master. As an illustration of this, last spring at the close of the season he had over one hundred and fifty applications from violinists alone."

DR. KARL MUCK

Paper News
City Indianapolis
JAN 20 1907 State Ind.

NIGHT OF PLEASURE FOR LOCAL MUSIC LOVERS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING ON FEBRUARY 1.

FIRST CONCERT IN 20 YEARS

On May 3, 1887, The Indianapolis News contained a notice of a concert given the evening before at Dickson's Grand Opera-house." The article began thus: "The initial performance in this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night before a large and brilliant audience, and it is to be hoped that it was the beginning of an acquaintance that shall be renewed yearly."

Almost twenty years have passed and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not again visited this city, but it will visit it on Friday evening of next week, when it is to give a concert at English's Opera-house, with Dr. Carl Muck, of the Berlin Royal Opera, conducting. At the concert of twenty years ago Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conducted. In the miscellaneous program performed there was no symphony. There were played the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Handel's "Largo," the march from Raff's "Lenore" symphony, Bizet's "l'Arlesienne" suite, the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi" and the "Wedding March" of Mendelssohn. Solo numbers were contributed by Mme. Helen Hastreiter, contralto, Miss Aus der Ohe, pianist, and Fritz Giese, violoncellist.

Program for Coming Concert.

The advance in musical culture in the community is indicated in the program to be played at the approaching concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68....Brahms
(a) Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
(b) Andante sostenuto.
(c) Un poco allegretto e grazioso
L'istesso tempo.
(d) Adagio; Allegro non troppe, ma con brio.
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.....Richard Strauss
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of twenty years ago was a very different organization, though it always has been supreme in this country. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the concert master then, and for many years after. Prof. Willy Hess is now the concert master. Mr. Heinrich Warnke is the present first violoncellist; then, the lamented Fritz Giese held that position.

A Cosmopolis of Virtuosi.

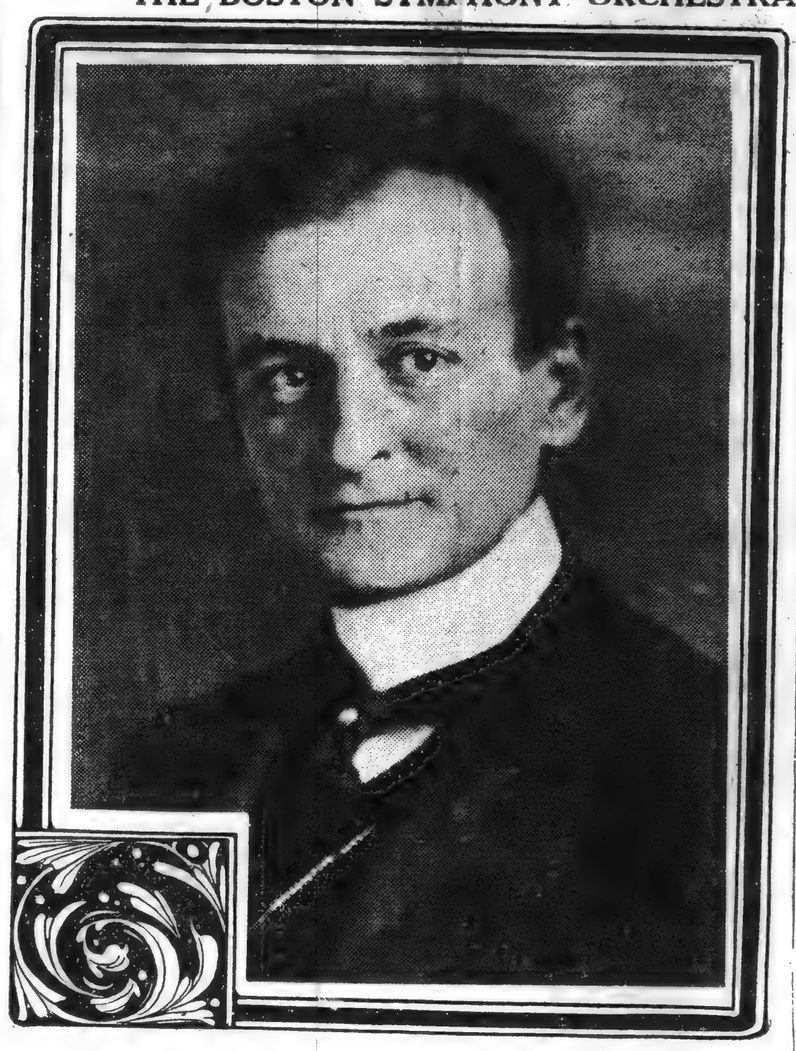
The personnel of the orchestra now is almost twice as large as it was in the old days. Its members now are drawn from the best players available in all countries; it is a veritable cosmopolis of virtuosi.

There is now substantial foundation for the hope that the orchestra will revisit Indianapolis annually. It comes in the regular series of concerts, under the direction of Ona B. Talbot.

The sale of seats will open at the box office of English's Opera-house on next Tuesday morning. A great interest in the concert is being taken by music lovers throughout the State, and the inter-urban railroad companies will provide late cars on all the lines. Mail orders for tickets, with checks, will be filled in the order of their receipt, on the day of the opening of the sale.

Paper Press
City Detroit
Date State
JAN 20 1907 Mich.

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR WHO IS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA



DR. KARL MUCK.

Coming to Detroit with the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will give the fourth in the series of orchestral association concerts, the evening of Thursday, January 31, is Dr. Karl Muck, the famous Bavarian conductor.

Dr. Muck was a famous conductor long before he came to this country. As far back as 1886, when he was called to Prague and before he had got out of his twenties, he had attracted attention of the connoisseurs of Europe through his work, orchestral and operatic, in Brunn and Graz, his first important posts. In the six years he was at Prague, the chief conductor of the German opera in the city and the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, he made a name for himself for sound scolarship, fine workmanship and valuable temperamental qualities. During that time his reputation increased so rapidly that when there came a vacancy in the ranks of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, the post was given to him. He was then, in 1892, 33 years old.

From Berlin his fame spread through Europe. He became the principal conductor of the "Parsifal" performances at Bayreuth. He became one of the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts. He was, for a season, conductor of German opera at Covent Garden, London. He appeared as guest conductor with the principal orchestras of London, Paris, Brussels, Madrid, Budapest. Copenhagen, St. Petersburg and Moscow and was generally recognized as belonging to that small group of men who are pre-eminent in that particular field, such men as Richter, Mahler, Nikisch, Mott and Richard Strauss.

Dr. Muck's was one of the three or four names seriously considered last spring as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in succession to Mr. Gericke. It was believed at the time that no experiment with a young man of short experience, no matter how talented he might be, could be made and that it was necessary to secure a conductor of established reputation. From the beginning the choice practically settled on Dr. Muck, but there were doubts whether it would be possible to get him. He was the favorite conductor of the German emperor; in fact, enjoyed his personal friendship. Then most powerful influences were brought to bear on him and in the end he told Dr. Muck that he might go to Boston for a year, but no longer; that his (the emperor's) consent was given to this most unwillingly and that he would have allowed him to go to no other orchestra than the Boston Symphony.

The feeling in Boston is that Dr. Muck's coming to America for so short a time is both good fortune and misfortune, good fortune in that it has resulted in the most splendid concerts the orchestra has given in the whole twenty-five years of its existence; misfortune in that the profound impression he has made will make it almost impossible to find a man equal to the task of taking his place.

Dr. Muck is in America for the first time, but this has not been for lack of chances to come here. Maurice Grau a few years ago offered him an almost fabulous sum to become chief conductor of the Metropolitan Opera in New York, but he did not care to leave Berlin. Later he has had other flattering offers, but none appealed to him until he was asked to be conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

While Dr. Muck has been primarily concerned with opera, his experience in the concert field has been very thorough, for beginning with his engagement in Graz he has always supplemented his operatic by purely orchestral work. His success in America although not unexpected, has been most gratifying to his friends and admirers and he seems to have proved most thoroughly what Lilli Lehmann and Milka Ternina said to Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, in Germany last spring, that he was "the man of all men fitted to take charge of Boston's great orchestra."

Paper Express
City Rochester
Date State

IN THE THEATERS.

Seats for the engagement of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Lyceum on next Monday night go on sale to-morrow. The orchestra will come here seventy-six men strong, and it will be practically of the same make up as last season, excepting that Dr. Karl Muck will be the conductor instead of Mr. Gericke.

Paper Star
City Cincinnati
Date State

The reputation which this city has justly acquired for being a musical center will have ample opportunity of being put to the test during the next few weeks, for during that season several greatest pianists will be heard here in recital, and the foremost orchestra in the country, perhaps in the world, will visit us. Josef Lhevinne, who played here in recital last year, is announced as soloist of the next Symphony concert, and also for a recital which occurs on Friday evening, February 2. Lhevinne's status as a player may be classed as in the first rank. In delicacy of coloring and smoothness of technic he more nearly approaches to Paderewski than any other player who has visited America since the golden aureoled Pole retired to the fastness of a Swiss villa in order to commune with nature and cultivate the muse. Lhevinne, however, possesses an infallible and unerring technic of such satin smoothness and emotional beauty that his hearers listen enraptured to the tones he evokes. For all that, the Russian is of a more substantial fabric than the Pole. Lhevinne is intensely human, and, although a pianist, entirely domestic in his tastes. Needless to add to this comment, that he is accompanied by Madame Lhevinne, herself a splendid artist, and by the small Lhevinne, whom the two pianists, his father and his mother, consider to be the most remarkable infant in the world, and a coming pianist of the first magnitude. Following Lhevinne comes the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall on Sunday afternoon, February 2, and with it Dr. Karl Muck as conductor and Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the band, as soloist.

For several years the Boston orchestra has made no Western tours, and their local appearance is one of a series of fortunate events which permitted the tour of a single week during an entire season. Dr. Muck is one of the great orchestral leaders who has devoted himself exclusively to conducting and who has never attempted composition. He will present for the first time in this city the Sibelius Symphony No. 1, the first pretentious work of the Finnish composer whose writings are a musical epic of the genius of his people and their untoward fate. Dr. Muck has but a single year's leave of absence from his post in Berlin, where he is conductor of the royal opera, and as permission to come to this country was most reluctantly granted by the emperor of Germany, it is entirely improbable that Dr. Muck will visit this country again as the leader of an orchestra. The Boston orchestra has been called an orchestra of virtuosi, as in fact they are. Prof. Willy Hess, who will play the Beethoven concerto for violin and orchestra, is a soloist of the first rank, whose interpretation of this colossal work may be loked forward to as that by a masterhand.

From the East, where stars arise, comes the news of a new planet dawning on the horizon of art. This time it is a young girl not yet in her twentieth year, about whose playing the critics of New York and Boston have completely lost their heads. One hears so much of pianists, all of whom are supplied with remarkable advance notices, that this young girl preferred to play her first recital in Boston comparatively unheralded. After that she needed no further introduction, and has been hailed as a second Carreno, one of those rare geniuses who occasionally appear and who instantly conquer. Germaine Schnitzer is an Alsatian by birth, who was educated in Paris and Vienna. The greatest interest has been aroused for her recital, which occurs at the Lyric Theater on the afternoon of February 7.

N.P.

[123]

THE SINFONIA DOMESTICA

STRAUSS'S TONE-POEM AT THE NEXT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Music That Is New to Boston—"A Day in Strauss's Family Life," with Father, Mother and Baby Sharing in It—The Programme That the Composer Suggested—The General Scheme and Form of the Piece—Strauss's Purpose and Traits in It, According to Mr. Baughan—Symbolism and Realism

Two of Richard Strauss's larger compositions have still to be heard in Boston—his opera, "Salome," and the tone-poem that he named "Symphonia Domestica." (Why he wrote "Symphonia" instead of the usual and linguistically correct "Sinfonia" he has never disclosed). "Salome" we may hear when the company of the Metropolitan Opera House is singing at the Boston Theatre in April. The "Sinfonia Domestica" we are certain to hear at the Symphony concerts next week. Our orchestra was the first in America to play Strauss's "Don Quixote," and, if we remember rightly, his "Thus Spake Zarathustra," but it has been sluggish with the "Sinfonia Domestica." Strauss worked on the tone-poem through 1903; he dates it as finished on Dec. 31 of that year. In the following spring he visited America, and in New York, on March 21, 1904, with the composer conducting the Wetzler Orchestra, the "Sinfonia Domestica" was played for the first time at any concert. Since then it has gone the round of the major and the minor orchestras of Europe, but in New York no band has repeated it, and next week we in Boston are to hear it for the first time. It is the largest and most important new composition that Dr. Muck is undertaking this season. He admits that he has no warm admiration for it; but the more, for that reason, he wishes to bring it to notable performance.

FORM AND INSTRUMENTS

The "Sinfonia Domestica: A Day in My Family Life," runs in one movement fifty minutes long, with three subdivisions indicated by the composer; an introduction and scherzo; an adagio; and a double fuge and finale. Three themes, typifying Strauss himself, his wife and his little son, as father, mother and baby, provide him with melodic material, and the theme of the father comprises three contrasting sections, labelled by the composer "comfortable" (gemächlich), "pensive" (träumerisch) and "fiery" (feurig). Practically out of these three, Strauss builds a huge and intricate polyphonic structure. To rear it before the ears of his hearers he asks an orchestra comprising a piccolo flute, three large flutes, two oboes, oboe d'amore, English horn, clarinet in D, clarinet in A, two clarinets in B-flat, bass clarinet, four bassoons, contra-bassoon, four saxophones, eight horns, four trumpets, three trombones, bass-tuba, four kettledrums, triangle, tambourine, glockenspiel, cymbals, big drum, two harps, violins, violas, violoncellos, and basses. In all Strauss wishes a band of 108 players, but he is reasonably content with an orchestra of the normal dimensions of ours. The saxophones, for example, which give nothing that the average ear may discover in the tonal coloring, will not be added. The oboe d'amore will, for through it speaks the plaintive voice of the child. As usual, outside a few sparse annotations in the score like the "assertion" and "counter-assertion" above the themes of the double fugue, Strauss has made no "programme" for the "Sinfonia Domestica," though plainly he followed one in imagination as he wrote. His only authentic saying about its contents he confided to the Musical Standard in London when the new tone-poem was first played there. "The 'Domestic Symphony,'" he then said, "is intended to be a picture of married life. I know that some people think the work to be a funny presentation of domestic bliss, but I confess that I had no desire to be funny when I was composing it. After all, what can be more serious than married life? Marriage is the most earnest thing in life, and the sacred joy of such a union is increased by the advent of a child. It is this bliss that I have endeavored to illustrate in my music. Home life, too, has its humors, and these also I have introduced into the work in order to brighten it. But I really want the symphony to be regarded in a serious spirit."

On the other hand, Mr. Richard Aldrich, the musical reviewer of the New York Times, printed in that newspaper on March 22, 1904, "on the authority of the composer himself," many "intimate details of the 'Sinfonia Domestica' and of the succession of episodes" it was intended to disclose. Some such programme is essential, if the hearer is to gather much of the emotional and humorous import of the music, if indeed he is not often to feel that he is vaguely "missing something." Mr. Aldrich gives it as follows: "To begin with, Strauss makes a sub-title of the work 'Ein Tag aus meinem Familienleben' ('A Day in My Family Life') introducing at once the personal element that is generally recognized to enter into 'A Hero's Life' and making the new tone poem, as it were, the familiar and humorous everyday counterpart of that stately picture. Its three principal themes represent 'Papa, Mamma, et Bébé,' the father, the mother and the child. The humorous strain, the spirit of sportiveness run through it, with certain passages of nobler and more serious significance as well as many more that the most anxious desire to follow Dr. Strauss cannot make other than ugly and perplexing. The humor of it is very elaborately and sometimes very strenuously voiced, and the players of the orchestra, as well as most of the audience, doubtless found it a most serious matter.

"The introduction presents the three themes that are representative of the husband, the wife and the child. The husband's theme comprises three contrasted sections. These are expounded in the order mentioned, the child theme being represented by the tender and gracious tones of the oboe d'amore, which Strauss has awakened from its long slumber of a century and a half to take a place in the modern orchestra. A curious detail is disclosed in the score. The only (?) hint that its pages present of any incident depicted in the music is a passage in which the aunts are represented as saying, 'Just like the father,' 'Just like the mother.' The scherzo that follows is a development of these three themes, 'like a playing of the father and mother with the child,' as Strauss has described it; and the third theme, the child's, is carried out to a special elaboration. A 'merry episode' closes this movement, in which—and this is on the authority of the composer—the child is washed and put to bed with a cradle song. The clock strikes seven.

"The adagio shows us papa alone. He is in a reverie. He even is at work, and being a composer he is composing music, so that Strauss may attempt an ultra-refinement of the programme idea and show, through music, himself in the act of composing it. At the least the orchestra throbs with excitement. A love scene follows between husband and wife; but he is troubled with the cares of his family. He dreams. Then the third part brings us to the next morning. The clock again strikes seven. The baby wakes and cries realistically. Finally there comes a dispute between papa and mamma over the bringing-up of the child; it is represented by a double fugue. Its subjects are, first, a version of the child's theme in 'diminution,' as the musicians call it; and, second, a theme in sharply accentuated, excited sixteenth notes—clearly a feminine argument! It is carried on with great animation, rising finally to a tremendous orchestral clash. There is then reconciliation and peace. A simple song-like passage is developed from the child-theme. But then comes again more orchestral chaos. There is an incoherent tossing-about of all the themes, apparently in every key, in every interlocking rhythm, and with an effect that can only be described as a bedlam of sound. this strange fantasy of 'real life' comes to an end."

THE DANGER OF DETAIL

To go further in programme-making is to lessen the legitimate significance and appeal of the music. Strauss wished the "Sinfonia Domestica" to be heard with as little explanation as possible. The listener who is searching for the moment when the muted trumpets indicate the baby's dislike of its bath, or where the glockenspiel strikes seven, is nearly sure to lose the larger voice of the music. He is in no better case than the hearer whose mind is engrossed in polyphonic combinations or in instrumental detail. Strauss does not write to display his mastery and resource with either. He is seeking, like any other composer, to impart thought and emotion, and they are but his means. He is eager, as he said often in private talk, that his hearers should grasp the substance of his orchestral speech. He does not care whether they apprehend the method of it. It is not he that has made the "programmes" that reduce his music to an accumulation of details. He has left that task to dry-as-dust pedants and to humorless hero-worshippers. The great voice of his music, if the listener will only hear it, blows them away. Moreover, since the "Sinfonia Domestica" is a serious composition, seriously written for serious hearers, it is impertinent to the composer and to them to exercise an easy comic-paper wit. The jests that relieve toilsome rehearsals—there Strauss snaps out "Potztausend"; there he "biffs" the baby, and all the rest—may be left to the orchestra ante-room and to the few that imagine that the chief object of Strauss in the "Sinfonia Domestica" was to write "realistic" music for the sport of "realistic" humor. It is indeed because Mr. Baughan, the reviewer of the London Daily News, sees the tone-poem as a whole, and sees it seriously and sympathetically, that he is so well worth quoting about its general aspects. Mr. Baughan, moreover, is no militant apostle of Strauss, and no pursuer of new and strange things for the sake of their strangeness. Sanity and temperance almost always commend him.

STRAUSS'S PURPOSE

"In his latest music" Mr. Baughan writes in one of his articles in his "Music and Musicians" (New York, John Lane), "Strauss is not an esoteric composer. Indeed, in Germany he has rather failed to arouse the enthusiasm of his fervent admirers by the 'Sinfonia Domestica.' The ideas expressed by the music are not cryptic; the composer has had the audacity to be clear in his intentions, to deal with elementary emotions and to be beautiful. Nietzsche's influence has been thrown off. There is nothing of the 'overman' in the 'Sinfonia Domestica'; Zarathustra has nothing to say in this symphonic-poem. Some German critics have even expressed the fear that Richard Strauss is about to become quite bourgeois; that he may deteriorate into writing music that will please. They forget, of course, that an artist's character has many facets; that his inspiration does not run in well-marked grooves. After all, did not Wagner write the 'Meistersinger' after 'Tristan,' and in the midst of composing the 'Ring?' The half-hearted appreciation of the 'Sinfonia Domestica' from those who hail 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' and 'Don Quixote' as the chief masterpieces of Strauss is instructive, because in no essential is the new work a real departure from the methods and style of the old. The character of the music is more direct, simply because the subject illustrated is more direct. Besides, there is not really any new Strauss in the music. The same lyrical quality is to be found in many of his songs, the same simplicity, and the same tenderness, only hitherto he has kept his symphonic-poems for the expression of

"As usual with Strauss's compositions, a closer acquaintance removes many points that seemed questionable at first, and makes the poetic appeal much clearer. At the same time one can the better appreciate the wonderful workmanship of the symphony. I sometimes think that it would be a good thing if no explanatory programmes were published; they necessarily draw attention to details that are important enough in many respects, but have no bearing on the poetic appreciation of the music. Thus when the amateur is told that certain passages are a marvel of polyphonic skill he prepares himself to be surprised; and then, again, when he is informed that the father, mother and child's themes are wonderfully combined he feels he ought to admire the complications for their own sake; whereas these matters are often merely the means by which the composer works, the threads by which he weaves his texture together. Often they have a poetic significance, but unless that is clear to the uninstructed ear the composer has failed to convey his meaning. The word goes round that Strauss is a demon of complication, and many no doubt imagine that his symphonic-poems are all brain work. As an instance, I have often seen it stated that his polyphonic complications are all very well on paper, but that they do not come out in performance. Now I venture to say that Richard Strauss does not mean them to come out in that sense. He wants to paint a background of shifting musical colors, to produce atmosphere, and what is more natural than that he should make use of the themes he has already invented? The ear is not meant to distinguish them clearly.

The public is not informed as to the precise colors used by a painter; why should it be confused in listening to a composition of music by explanations of a composer's methods of obtaining his effects? It is not how the creative artist wishes his music to be heard. Strauss's strength is that although his music is as complicated as music can well be it is simple enough in appeal, and in achieving this I think he shows his great mastery over his material. I am quite sure that the cause of Strauss's music is not advanced by the minute analysis of his technique which is always offered to us by way of explanation. Indeed, it has often come to my knowledge that the whole point of his composition has been lost by an attempt to follow analytical explanations. He makes use of strange effects, it is true—his works are full of unconventional harmonies, and his knowledge of instrumental timbre leads him to employ strange orchestral devices—but the ear soon becomes accustomed to the most Straussian flights of eccentricity, and then it is seen that what appeared merely bizarre is really a sound piece of calculated and inspired artistry. In all reported conversations the composer is invariably stated to have been surprised that his music should be considered strange. It really is not strange except in a very superficial aspect.

STRAUSS SINCERE?

"In the Domestica there is no pose. Richard Strauss has written an abstract poem on the life of himself, his wife, and their child. Shortsighted critics, in love with their own logic, tell us that Strauss has gone backwards in his last work, but what has really happened is that he has conditioned his expression by his material. That is simpler than the subject of Zarathustra, or rather is more subjective and I must confess that I find the Domestica more genuine and moving. By nature Strauss is a lyrical poet, with all a lyrical poet's sensitiveness and love of beauty; his mind, on the other hand, is in love with the big, the magnificent, the epic, the dramatic. His technique enables him to work easily in a medium which is rather foreign to him. Naturally one admires that skill and that imagination, but Strauss is able to express himself with truth only when he is true to his lyrical temperament. The struggle between his two natures is largely the cause of the sense of strain which his attempts at grandeur produce. He then shrieks rather than declaims with noble ease.

"Except for a few episodes the 'Sinfonia Domestica' is practically woven out of three themes, representing the father, the mother and child, and in the play of variation and development to a climax there is almost an excess of form. It would not be easy to classify it, for it is partly a kind of Rondo, but without any restrictions as to the number of appearances of the principal theme or as to the number of the subjects and episodes. Then, again, it has, of course, much of the variation form, and in the exposition of the themes and their development has something in common with the first movement form of a sonata. But the necessity of illustrating a "programme" makes for great plasticity. The appearance of formlessness is due to the dictation of tonal form by the expression of the poetical ideas the composer is illustrating. The old composers often managed to give an appearance of cohesion by their use of keys to which the ear had been accustomed. Strauss seems to be anarchic in his sudden transitions and in his ever-shifting tonality. If it were true that the ear cannot follow his musical line as music, the symphonic-poems would be a mistake in art. But it is not true, and least of all of his latest work."

SYMBOLISM AND REALISM

"We do not question the poet's right to dwell on some intrinsically trivial matter, or to expand his thought to an expression quite out of proportion to the subject which nominally inspired him. Literature is full of such cases. Why, then, should a composer be forbidden the same license? Strauss began by contemplating himself, his wife, and his child, but by sublimating his thought to its emotional content (in Wagner's clumsy but expressive phrase) he soon left realism behind. After all, is not the greater part of life symbolized by the man and woman, and their child? In his 'Heldenleben,' Strauss drew a picture of the battle of life with its ultimate peace when the sword drops from the tired hand. In his 'Sinfonia Domestica' he takes up the parable, but in a more optimistic spirit. There is the same clash in the domestic world as in the outer world; the same war of will against will, but the new soul, the baby, has not to fight against senseless opposition, as the hero in the 'Heldenleben' had to fight—love will direct the development. Those who are against Strauss and all that Strauss means will reply that this explanation is very ingenious, but it does not take into account the many touches of realism to be found in the score. Why, if the symphony has this abstract aim, does the composer now and then indulge in discordant effects, as if he were illustrating the domestic scenes of a Brobdingnagian family? I will confess that some of these passages are a trifle disconcerting, and give some justification to the charge brought against the composer of having perpetrated a gigantic and ponderous joke. But a little reflection removes the objection. Although Strauss has treated the subject in a broad and abstract vein, he does not wish to let go of the realistic idea on which he has built his work. In some respects it gave him his form, the motive power that enabled him to move from phase to phase of his music, so that he was not obliged to call in any of the stereotyped musical expedients.

"And, apart from that consideration, may not a composer build up his symbolical structure on realism? This is done every day by sculptors and painters. A Holy Family is not the less symbolical because the realistic details of the mother and child are insisted on. Although Rodin's statuary is symbolical in aim, it is nevertheless realistic in presentment. The freakishness of Richard Strauss must not be forgotten also. He wants you to see that he is expressing all that himself and his wife and child mean to him. In this sense the work is a caprice. There is a curious vein of ironical reflection running through it. But the expression of this freakishness is very far from being a ponderous joke, Teutonic or otherwise."

COMING CONCERTS

A Week of Minor Recitals—Miss Peppercorn, the Pianist, Returns—A Miscellaneous Concert by the Handel and Haydn Society—Mr. Hess Makes a Promising Programme

Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" is to be played for the first times in Boston at the fifteenth pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. It is the largest and most important new orchestral composition to be heard in Boston in the current musical year, and in another column is some account of it and comment upon it. The "Sinfonia Domestica" stands first on the programme, and it continues for fifty minutes without a pause. Latecomers, therefore, will have a long wait to endure in the corridors, and a slip inserted in the programme books of the concerts of yesterday and today urges them to promptness. Brahms's concerto in E-flat major follows the "Sinfonia Domestica" with Mr. Gabrilowitsch to play the solo part, and for ending comes Brahms's familiar "Academic" overture. Mr. Gabrilowitsch should be interesting in Brahms's music. Usually he has cultivated more romantic composers.

The Symphony Quartet—Messrs. Hess, Roth, Férir and Warnke of the Symphony Orchestra—give the fifth Sunday chamber concert of the current series tomorrow afternoon at 3.30 in Chickering Hall. Two string quartets and fragments of two more make the programme. The full quartets are Tschaikovski's in D major (Op. 11, No. 1) and Greig's in G minor (Op. 27), both familiar and both suiting the warmth of expression the four players usually summon. The fragments are the andante and variations from Beethoven's quartet in A major (Op. 18, No. 5), and three parts—allegretto capriccioso, tranquillo, and allegro scherzando—of a serenade by Jaques-Dalcroze, the Swiss composer, whose music is beginning to make its way for its boldness of design, its piquant harmonies and its individual fancy. No part of the serenade has hitherto been played here.

[124]

Paper Zeitgeist
City Indianapolis
JAN 24 1907 State Ind

THE BOSTON CONDUCTOR

DR. KARL MUCK.

A Chicago paper has the following to say of Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are to appear at English's Opera-house on Friday night of next week:

"The event of the season, musically as well as socially, will be the visit to Chicago, the first time in fifteen years, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Dr. Karl Muck, at the Auditorium, January 30. Dr. Muck, who is at the head of the orchestra for the present season, is one of the greatest conductors of Germany. Chicago's undertaking will, it is understood, amount close to [illegible]. But such is Mr. Neumann's faith in the interest he believes the Chicago public will take in this concert for which he has assumed such a heavy risk."

Paper Star
City Cincinnati
Date State 6
JAN 24 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST HAS WORLD-WIDE REPUTATION

Willy Hess Has Appeared in Many European and American Cities.

Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will be the soloist at the concert at Music hall on Saturday afternoon, February 2, is well known, at least by reputation, by the music public of Cincinnati. His career has been long and interesting, for, despite the fact that he is but forty-seven years old, he has been playing in public nearly thirty-five years. His positions with the great orchestras of Frankfort, Cologne, London and Manchester, and his many tours through Europe as a virtuoso, have served to give him the reputation of being one of the leading violinists of the world, and this reputation has been fully confirmed in the two years and a half he has been with the Boston Symphony orchestra. At the Boston Symphony concert he will play Beethoven's concerto for violin in D major, a work which, singularly enough, has not been heard in Cincinnati since Kreisler played it with the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, three years ago. Prof. Hess is a violinist of the severely classical style, representing a school which, unhappily, has now few representatives.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date State N
JAN 24 1907

Mme. Melba in Maine.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

PORTLAND, Me., Wednesday.—The most brilliant concert that Portland has had in several years was that given in the City Hall to-night by Mme. Melba and her concert company, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis. Parties came from towns thirty and forty miles away to hear the great prima donna and enthusiasm ran high.

Mme. Melba sang the "Ah, Fors e Lui" from "La Traviata," and the prayer from "Tosca," the "Aubade" from "Le Roi d'Y" and the mad scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor."

Mme. Melba has sung in Portland several times in the past, but never has she seemed to be in such glorious voice as she was to-night. Mme. Melba was assisted by a most capable company, which comprised Mr. Felix Hughes, barytone; Miss Ada Sassoli, harpist; Miss Laura Hawkins, pianist, and Mr. Andre Maquarre, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flautist.

Paper Post
City Chicago
Date State Ill
JAN 26 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, consisting of ninety-eight artists and Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, and Rudolph Ganz, soloist, will give its concert at the Auditorium next Wednesday evening under the direction of F. Wight Neumann. The coming of this orchestra to Chicago will be without question a great musical event in the history of Chicago. The Auditorium is nearly sold out, and it is probable that by Wednesday evening every seat will be disposed of. Not only the music lovers but society people have taken an interest in the coming of this great orchestra, as many boxes have been disposed of. The programme that Dr. Muck has prepared for this visit to Chicago is attractive. Mr. Ganz, who will play the Tschaikowsky concerto, will no doubt increase his great popularity thereby. The programme is as follows: Overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; tone poem, "Don Juan," opus 20, Richard Strauss; Concerto for Pianoforte, B flat minor, No. 1, Tschaikowsky, and Symphony No. 7, A major, opus 92, Beethoven.

Paper News
City Indianapolis
Date State Ind
JAN 26 1907

To Entertain Dr. and Mrs. Muck.

When Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck arrive Friday for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which Dr. Muck directs, some social attention will be given them. They are expected to arrive in the morning. At 2:30 o'clock there will be a trolley ride in Mr. McGowan's private car, that will take a route to show some of the principal buildings and steets of the city. The car will stop at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Henry Jameson where, from 4 to 5 o'clock, there will be an informal tea, which will be open to the public without invitation.

To this especially, it is hoped, will come the patrons of the concert that have made it possible to bring the great orchestra to Indianapolis, and all lovers of music who desire to meet the distinguished visitors. As Dr. Muck does not speak English, a few leading German-speaking patrons of the concert will be invited to go on the trolley ride with the honor guests. After the concert in the evening there will be an informal social affair at the German House for Dr. and Mrs. Muck, where members of the German House will be the hosts.

In this tour of a week of the orchestra, Indianapolis is the only place where Dr. and Mrs. Muck and the musicians will spend a day. They will leave Saturday morning for Cincinnati, where they will give the last concert of the tour that afternoon and will leave in the evening for Boston.

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date JAN 26 1907 State N Y

The Boston Symphony Orchestra starts to-morrow on a week's tour of the Middle West. The cities to be visited are Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati. Dr. Karl Muck's programmes for the trip include Beethoven's seventh, Brahms's first, Sibelius's first and Glazounoff's fifth symphonies.

Paper Express
City Rochester
Date Jan 20. 07

The Musical Circles

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in the Lyceum on Monday evening. It is the duty as well as the privilege of everyone who loves music to be there; for the greater the success of the concert, the greater the incentive to this unrivalled organization to return, and the oftener it visits Rochester the better for all of us. The term 'an orchestra of virtuosi' has been applied to the Boston Symphony. This is not hyperbole, but sober fact. Willy Hess, the concert-master, has led some of the greatest orchestras in Europe and is the organizer of one of the most famous Old World quartettes. Timothee Adamowski, who will be the soloist on Monday night, playing the Saint Saens Concerto in B minor, came to America as a young man twenty-odd years ago, and he has been with the orchestra since 1884, but in that time he has played much abroad as a soloist, with Nikisch and the Philharmonic Orchestra in London, with the Colonne Orchestra in Paris and with the principal orchestras of Russia and Poland. Emile Ferir, the leader of the violas, has been with the orchestra since 1903. He is a Belgian by birth and a prize winner in the Brussels Conservatory. Mr. Ferir has never played the violin; he began with the viola. He has been principal viola in the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris, in the Glasgow Philharmonic orchestra and in the Queen's Hall and Covent Garden orchestras of London. He is the viola of the Boston Symphony quartette of which Professor Hess is leader, and, while in London, was a member of the famous Kruse quartette. Heinrich Warnke, the leading 'cellist, succeeded Mr. Krasselt in the fall of 1905. He was brought to Boston from the famous Kaim Orchestra in Munich, on the warm recommendation of Weingartner and Richard Strauss, with whom he has been closely associated in that city. Mr. Warnke is thirty-five years old, a native of Schleswig-Holstein. He is a pupil of Gowa of Hamburg and Klengal of Leipsic and ranks high among the masters of his instrument.

TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI.

A very interesting set of men are found among the wood winds. Most of them are Frenchmen, for it is generally recognized that the French school of wood-winds is the best in the world. Georges Longy, the first oboe, is generally regarded as the finest oboist in the world. He was born in 1868 and won the first prize for oboe in the Paris Conservatoire in 1886. He has been first oboe of the Lamoureux, Colonne and Opera Comique Orchestra and re-established in Paris in 1895 the famous "Societe de Musique de Chambre pour Instruments a vent." He became the first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. He is the conductor of the Boston Orchestral club, composed of talented amateurs and is the organizer and leader of the Longy club, which gives chamber music for wood-wind instruments and is composed of the principal players of wood-wind instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Andre Maquarre, the first flute, is a Belgian. He won first prize in solfeggiy in the Paris Conservatoire in 1892 and a year later took the first prize for flute. He also has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1898. Georges Grisez, the first clarinet, joined the orchestra in 1904. He began his musical studies as a 'cellist, then as a pianist and finally as a clarinetist. He took first prize in that instrument in the Paris Conservatoire when he was eighteen years old and immediately was made first clarinet of the famous Conservatoire Orchestra, which post he gave up to come to America.

The orchestral numbers will be two, the Overture to "Die Meistersinger" and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. With the Wagner Overture Rochester is familiar. The Beethoven Symphony is also fairly well known. A Beethoven symphony demands many hearings before it is understood. You might as well hope to fathom "Othello" at a single reading as to grasp the significance of a Beethoven masterpiece at a single hearing. More than that, the music of Beethoven is like the heart of a woman; only the lover can understand, and there are depths of unfathomed mystery even for him. Poetic enthusiasts try to read their own pet commentaries into the notes; but they remain elusive. Beethoven's words "Mehr empfindung als Malerei" indicate the attitude of mind in which the master approached the form of music in which he is at his greatest. Wagner perhaps best divines what was in Beethoven's heart when he wrote this Seventh Symphony. This is what he says in "The Art Work of the Future," in the translation of William [illegible] of joy, which snatches us away with barbarian might and bears us through the roomy space of Nature, through all the storms and seas of life, shouting in glad self-consciousness as we tread throughout the universe the daring measures of this human sphere-dance. This symphony is the Apotheosis of Dance herself; it is dance in her highest aspect, as it were the loftiest deed of bodily motion incorporated in an ideal mould of tone. Melody and Harmony unite around the sturdy bones of Rhythm to firm and fleshy human shapes, which now with giant limbs' agility, and now with soft, elastic pliance, almost before our very eyes, close up the supple, teeming ranks; the while now gently, now with daring, now serious, now wanton, now pensive, and again exulting, the deathless strain sounds forth and forth; until, in the last whirl of delight, a kiss of triumph seals the last embrace.

The following technical analysis of the symphony is by Philip Hale. It is precise and the music-lover who cares to go over the work with its assistance will be greatly helped in his appreciation.

The symphony is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, kettledrums, strings.

I. The first movement opens with an introduction, poco sostenuto, A major, 4-4. A melodic phrase is given to the oboe, then clarinets, horns, bassoons, against crashing chords of the full orchestra. This figure is worked contrapuntally against alternate ascending scale passages in violins and in basses. There is a modulation to C major. A more melodious motive, a slow and delicate dance theme, is given out by wood-wind instruments, then repeated by the strings, while double-basses, alternating with oboe and bassoon, maintain a rhythmic accompaniment. (A theme of the first movement is developed out of this rhythmic figure, and some go so far as to say that all the movements of this symphony are in the closest relationship with this same figure.) The initial motive is developed by the whole orchestra fortissimo, A major; there is a repetititon of the second theme, F major; and a short coda leads to the main portion of the movement.

This main body, Vivace, A major, 6-8, is distinguished by the persistency of the rhythm of the "dotted triplet." The tripping first theme is announced, piano, by wood-wind instruments and horns, accompanied by the strings. It is repeated by the full orchestra fortissimo. The second theme, of like rhythm and hardly distinguishable from the first, enters piano in the strings, C-sharp minor, goes through E-flat major in the wood-wind to E major in the full orchestra, and ends quietly in C major. The conclusion theme is made up of figures taken from the first. The first part of the movement is repeated. The free fantasia is long and elaborate. The third section is in othodox relationship with the first, although the first theme is developed at greater length. The coda is rather long.

II. Allegretto, A minor, 2-4. The movement begins with a solemn first theme played in harmony by violas, violoncellos, and double-basses. The strongly marked rhythm goes almost throughout the whole movement. The second violins take up the theme, and violas and violoncellos sing a counter-theme. The first violins now have the chief theme, while the second violins play the counter-theme. At last wood-wind instruments and horns sound the solemn, march-like motive, and the counter-theme is given to the first violins. The rhythm of the accompaniment grows more and more animated with the entrance in turn of each voice. A tuneful second theme, A major, is given to wood-wind instruments against arpeggios for the first violins, while the persistent rhythm is kept up by the basses. There is a modulation to C major, and a short transition passage leads to the second part. This is a repetition of the counter-theme in wood-wind instruments against the first theme in the basses and figuration for the other strings. There is a short fugato on the same theme, and the second theme enters as before. There is a short coda.

III. The third movement, Presto, F major, 3-4, is a brilliant scherzo. The theme of the trio, assai meno presto, D major, 3-4, is said to be that of an old pilgrim hymn in Lower Austria. "This scherzo in F major is noteworthy for the tendency the harmony has to fall back into the principal key of the symphony, A major." A high-sustained A runs through the trio.

IV. The Finale, Allegro con brio, A major, 2-4, is a wild rondo on two themes. Here, according to Mr. Prod'homme and others, as Beethoven achieved in the Scherzo the highest and fullest expression of exuberant joy,—"unbuttoned joy," as the composer himself would have said,—so in the Finale the joy becomes orgiastic. The furious, bacchantic first theme is repeated after the exposition, and there is a sort of coda to it, "as a chorus might follow upon the stanzas of a song." There is imitative contrapuntal development of a figure taken from the bacchantic theme. A second theme of a more delicate nature is announced by the strings and then given to wind instruments. There are strong accents in this theme, accents empuarised by full orchestra, on the second beat of the measure. Brilliant passage-work for the orchestra, constantly increasing in strength, includes a figure from the first theme. There is a repeat. The first theme is then developed in an elaborate manner, but the theme itself returns, so that the rondo character is preserved. There is a return to the first theme in A major. The third part of the movement is practically a repetition of the first, but the second theme is now in A minor. There is a long coda with a development of the figure from the first theme over a bass which changes from E to D-sharp and back again. The concluding passage of the theme is used fortissimo, and the movement ends with a return of the conspicuous figure from the main theme.

[125]

Paper Sentinel

City Indianapolis

Date JAN 24 1907 State Ind

ARTIST'S IMPRESSION OF THE BOSTON CONDUCTOR

DR. KARL MUCK.

A Chicago paper has the following to say of Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are to appear at English's Opera-house on Friday night of next week:

"The event of the season, musically as well as socially, will be the visit to Chicago, the first time in fifteen years, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Dr. Karl Muck, at the Auditorium, January 30. Dr. Muck, who is at the head of the orchestra for the present season, is one of the greatest conductors of Germany. Chicago's undertaking will, it is understood, amount close to $6,000. But such is Mr. Neumann's faith in the interest he believes the Chicago public will take in this concert for which he has assumed such a heavy risk."

Paper Star

City Cincinnati State O

Date JAN 24 '07

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST HAS WORLD-WIDE REPUTATION

Willy Hess Has Appeared in Many European and American Cities.

Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will be the soloist at the concert at Music hall on Saturday afternoon, February 2, is well known, at least by reputation, by the music public of Cincinnati. His career has been long and interesting, for, despite the fact that he is but forty-seven years old, he has been playing in public nearly thirty-five years. His positions with the great orchestras of Frankfort, Cologne, London and Manchester, and his many tours through Europe as a virtuoso, have served to give him the reputation of being one of the leading violinists of the world, and this reputation has been fully confirmed in the two years and a half he has been with the Boston Symphony orchestra. At the Boston Symphony concert he will play Beethoven's concerto for violin in D major, a work which, singularly enough, has not been heard in Cincinnati since Kreisler played it with the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, three years ago. Prof. Hess is a violinist of the severely classical style, representing a school which, unhappily, has now few representatives.

Paper Herald

City New York

Date JAN 24 1907 State N

Mme. Melba in Maine.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

PORTLAND, Me., Wednesday.—The most brilliant concert that Portland has had in several years was that given in the City Hall to-night by Mme. Melba and her concert company, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis. Parties came from towns thirty and forty miles away to hear the great prima donna and enthusiasm ran high.

Mme. Melba sang the "Ah, Fors e Lui" from "La Traviata," and the prayer from "Tosca," the "Aubade" from "Le Roi d'Y" and the mad scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor."

Mme. Melba has sung in Portland several times in the past, but never has she seemed to be in such glorious voice as she was to-night. Mme. Melba was assisted by a most capable company, which comprised Mr. Felix Hughes, barytone; Miss Ada Sassoli, harpist; Miss Laura Hawkins, pianist, and Mr. Andre Maquarre, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flautist.

Paper Post

City Chicago

Date JAN 26 1907 State Ill

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, consisting of ninety-eight artists and Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, and Rudolph Ganz, soloist, will give its concert at the Auditorium next Wednesday evening under the direction of F. Wight Neumann. The coming of this orchestra to Chicago will be without question a great musical event in the history of Chicago. The Auditorium is nearly sold out and it is probable that by Wednesday evening every seat will be disposed of. Not only the music lovers but society people have taken an interest in the coming of this great orchestra, as many boxes have been disposed of. The programme that Dr. Muck has prepared for this visit to Chicago is attractive. Mr. Ganz, who will play the Tschaikowsky concerto, will no doubt increase his great popularity thereby. The programme is as follows: Overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; tone poem, "Don Juan," opus 20, Richard Strauss; Concerto for Pianoforte, B flat minor, No. 1, Tschaikowsky, and Symphony No. 7, A major, opus 92, Beethoven.

Paper News

City Indianapolis

Date JAN 26 1907 State Ind

To Entertain Dr. and Mrs. Muck.

When Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck arrive Friday for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which Dr. Muck directs, some social attention will be given them. They are expected to arrive in the morning. At 2:30 o'clock there will be a trolley ride in Mr. McGowan's private car, that will take a route to show some of the principal buildings and steets of the city. The car will stop at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Henry Jameson where, from 4 to 5 o'clock, there will be an informal tea, which will be open to the public without invitation.

To this especially, it is hoped, will come the patrons of the concert that have made it possible to bring the great orchestra to Indianapolis, and all lovers of music who desire to meet the distinguished visitors. As Dr. Muck does not speak English, a few leading German-speaking patrons of the concert will be invited to go on the trolley ride with the honor guests. After the concert in the evening there will be an informal social affair at the German House for Dr. and Mrs. Muck, where members of the German House will be the hosts.

In this tour of a week of the orchestra, Indianapolis is the only place where Dr. and Mrs. Muck and the musicians will spend a day. They will leave Saturday morning for Cincinnati, where they will give the last concert of the tour that afternoon and will leave in the evening for Boston.

aper Evening World

ty New York

)ate State N Y

The Boston Symphony Orchestra starts to-morrow on a week's tour of the Middle West. The cities to be visited are Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati. Dr. Karl Muck's programmes for the trip include Beethoven's seventh, Brahms's first, Sibelius's first and Glazounoff's fifth symphonies.

er Express Jan 30 '07

Rochester

In Musical Circles

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in the Lyceum on Monday evening. It is the duty as well as the privilege of everyone who loves music to be there; for the greater the success of the concert, the greater the incentive to this unrivalled organization to return, and the oftener it visits Rochester the better for all of us. The term "an orchestra of virtuosi" has been applied to the Boston Symphony. This is not hyperbole, but sober fact. Willy Hess, the concert-master, has led some of the greatest orchestras in Europe and is the organizer of one of the most famous Old World quartettes. Timothee Adamowski, who will be the soloist on Monday night, playing the Saint Saens Concerto in B minor, came to America as a young man twenty-odd years ago, and he has been with the orchestra since 1884, but in that time he has played much abroad as a soloist, with Nikisch and the Philharmonic Orchestra in London, with the Colonne Orchestra in Paris and with the principal orchestras of Russia and Poland. Emile Ferir, the leader of the violas, has been with the orchestra since 1903. He is a Belgian by birth and a prize winner in the Brussels Conservatory. Mr. Ferir has never played the violin; he began with the viola. He has been principal viola in the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris, in the Glasgow Philharmonic orchestra and in the Queen's Hall and Covent Garden orchestras of London. He is the viola of the Boston Symphony quartette of which Professor Hess is leader, and, while in London, was a member of the famous Kruse quartette. Heinrich Warnke, the leading 'cellist, succeeded Mr. Krasselt in the fall of 1905. He was brought to Boston from the famous Kaim Orchestra in Munich, on the warm recommendation of Weingartner and Richard Strauss, with whom he has been closely associated in that city. Mr. Warnke is thirty-five years old, a native of Schleswig-Holstein. He is a pupil of Gowa of Hamburg and Klengal of Leipsic and ranks high among the masters of his instrument.

TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI.

A very interesting set of men are found among the wood winds Most of them are Frenchmen, for it is generally recognized that the French school of wood-winds is the best in the world. Georges Longy, the first oboe, is generally regarded as the finest oboist in the world. He was born in 1868 and won the first prize for oboe in the Paris Conservatoire in 1886. He has been first oboe of the Lamoureux, Colonne and Opera Comique Orchestra and re-established in Paris in 1895 the famous "Societe de Musique de Chambre pour instruments a vent." He became the first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. He is the conductor of the Boston Orchestral club, composed of talented amateurs and is the organizer and leader of the Longy club, which gives chamber music for wood-wind instruments and is composed of the principal players of wood-wind instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Andre Maquarre, the first flute, is a Belgian. He won first prize in solfeggiv in the Paris Conservatoire in 1892 and a year later took the first prize for flute. He also has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1898. Georges Grisez, the first clarinet, joined the orchestra in 1904. He began his musical studies as a 'cellist, then as a pianist and finally as a clarinetist. He took first prize in that instrument in the Paris Conservatoire when he was eighteen years old and immediately was made first clarinet of the famous Conservatoire Orchestra which post he gave up to come to America.

The orchestral numbers will be two, the Overture to "Die Meistersinger" and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. With the Wagner Overture Rochester is familiar. The Beethoven Symphony is also fairly well known. A Beethoven symphony demands many hearings before it is understood. You might as well hope to fathom "Othello" at a single reading as to grasp the significance of a Beethoven masterpiece at a single hearing. More than that, the music of Beethoven is like the heart of a woman; only the lover can understand, and there are depths of unfathomed mystery even for him. Poetic enthusiasts try to read their own pet commentaries into the notes; but they remain elusive. Beethoven's words "Mehr empfindung als Malerei" indicate the attitude of mind in which the master approached the form of music in which he is at his greatest. Wagner perhaps best divines what was in Beethoven's heart when he wrote this Seventh Symphony. This is what he says in "The Art Work of the Future," in the translation of William Ashton Ellis:

To give his tone-shapes [illegible] pastless, that direct [illegible] clearly sure stability [illegible] nessed with such [illegible] own phenomena—[illegible] soul of the joyous impulse which created for us that glorious work, the Symphony in A major. All tumult, all yearning and storming of the heart, become here the blissful insolence of joy, which snatches us away with bacchanalian might and bears us through the roomy space of Nature, through all the streams and seas of life, shouting in glad self-consciousness as we tread throughout the universe the daring measures of this human sphere-dance. This symphony is the Apotheosis of Dance herself; it is dance in her highest aspect, as it were the loftiest deed of bodily motion incorporated in an ideal mould of tone. Melody and Harmony unite around the sturdy bones of Rhythm to firm and fleshy human shapes, which now with giant limbs' agility, and now with soft, elastic pliance, almost before our very eyes, close up the supple, teeming ranks; the while now gently, now with daring, now serious, now wanton, now pensive, and again exulting, the deathless strain sounds forth and forth; until, in the last whirl of delight, a kiss of triumph seals the last embrace.

The following technical analysis of the symphony is by Philip Hale. It is precise and the music-lover who cares to go over the work with its assistance will be greatly helped in his appreciation.

The symphony is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, kettledrums, strings.

1. The first movement opens with an introduction, poco sostenuto, A major, 4-4. A melodic phrase is given to the oboe, then clarinets, horns, bassoons, against crashing chords of the full orchestra. This figure is worked contrapuntally against alternate ascending scale passages in violins and in basses. There is a modulation to C major. A more melodious motive, a slow and delicate dance theme, is given out by wood-wind instruments, then repeated by the strings, while double-basses, alternating with oboe and bassoon, maintain a rhythmic accompaniment. (A theme of the first movement is developed out of this rhythmic figure, and some go so far as to say that all the movements of this symphony are in the closest relationship with this same figure.) The initial motive is developed by the whole orchestra fortissimo, A major; there is a repetititon of the second theme, F major; and a short coda leads to the main portion of the movement.

This main body, Vivace, A major, 6-8, is distinguished by the persistency of the rhythm of the "dotted triplet." The tripping first theme is announced, piano, by wood-wind instruments and horns, accompanied by the strings. It is repeated by the full orchestra fortissimo. The second theme, of like rhythm and hardly distinguishable from the first, enters piano in the strings, C-sharp minor, goes through E-flat major in the wood-wind to E major in the full orchestra, and ends quietly in C major. The conclusion theme is made up of figures taken from the first. The first part of the movement is repeated. The free fantasia is long and elaborate. The third section is in othodox relationship with the first, although the first theme is developed at greater length. The coda is rather long.

II. Allegretto, A minor, 2-4. The movement begins with a solemn first theme played in harmony by violas, violoncellos, and double-basses. The strongly marked rhythm goes almost throughout the whole movement. The second violins take up the theme, and violas and violoncellos sing a counter-theme. The first violins now have the chief theme, while the second violins play the counter-theme. At last wood-wind instruments and horns sound the solemn, march-like motive, and the counter-theme is given to the first violins. The rhythm of the accompaniment grows more and more animated with the entrance in turn of each voice. A tuneful second theme, A major, is given to wood-wind instruments against arpeggios for the first violins, while the persistent rhythm is kept up by the basses. There is a modulation to C major, and a short transition passage leads to the second part. This is a repetition of the counter-theme in wood-wind instruments against the first theme in the basses and figuration for the other strings. There is a short fugato on the same theme, and the second theme enters as before. There is a short coda.

III. The third movement, Presto, F major, 3-4, is a brilliant scherzo. The theme of the trio, assai meno presto, D major, 3-4, is said to be that of an old pilgrim hymn in Lower Austria. "This scherzo in F major is noteworthy for the tendency the harmony has to fall back into the principal key of the symphony, A major." A high-sustained A runs through the trio.

IV. The Finale, Allegro con brio, A major, 2-4, is a wild rondo on two themes. Here, according to Mr. Prod'homme and others, as Beethoven achieved in the Scherzo the highest and fullest expression of exuberant joy,—"unbuttoned joy," as the composer himself would have said,—so in the Finale the joy becomes orgiastic. The furious, bacchantic first theme is repeated after the exposition, and there is a sort of coda to it, "as a chorus might follow upon the stanzas of a song." There is imitative contrapuntal development of a figure taken from the bacchantic theme. A second theme of a more delicate nature is announced by the strings and then given to wind instruments. There are strong accents in this theme, accents emphasized by full orchestra, on the second beat of the measure. Brilliant passage-work for the orchestra, constantly increasing in strength, includes a figure from the first theme. There is a repeat. The first theme is then developed in an elaborate manner, but the theme itself returns, so that the rondo character is preserved. There is a return to the first theme in A major. The third part of the movement is practically a repetition of the first, but the second theme is now in A minor. There is a long coda with a development of the figure from the first theme over a bass which changes from E to D-sharp and back again. The concluding passage of the theme is used fortissimo, and the movement ends with a return of the conspicuous figure from the main theme.

[125]

Paper [illegible] Journal
City Indianapolis
Date JAN 26 1907 State Ind

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

PROF. WILLY HESS, First Violin. OTTO ROTH, Second Violin.
EMILE FERIR, Viola. HEINRICH WARNKE, Violoncello.

Paper Town Topics
City Cleveland
Date JAN 26 1907 State O

DR. KARL MUCK

Conductor, The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Grays' Armo
Tuesday Evening, January Twenty-ninth, at eight o'clock

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston tomorrow evening for a week's tour in the Middle West. Six concerts will be given: in the Lyceum Theatre, Rochester, on Monday night; in Grays' Armory, Cleveland, on Tuesday night; in the Auditorium, Chicago, on Wednesday night; in the Light Guard Armory, Detroit, on Thursday night; in English's Opera House, Indianapolis, on Friday night; and in the Springer Music Hall, Cincinnati, on Saturday afternoon. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct all six concerts. Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the soloist in Rochester, Cleveland and Detroit; Mr. Rudolph Gans in Chicago and Professor Willy Hess in Cincinnati. There will be no soloist in Indianapolis. The symphonies will be: Beethoven's Seventh in Rochester, Cleveland and Chicago; Brahms' First, in Indianapolis; Sibelius' First, in E minor, in Cincinnati, and Glazounoff's Fifth, in B-flat major, in Detroit.

Paper News
City Indianapolis
Date JAN 26 1907 State Ind

THREE WORLD-FAMOUS MUSICAL COMPOSITIONS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAM FOR FEBRUARY 1.

BRAHMS, STRAUSS, WAGNER

At the concert at English's next Friday evening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Berlin Royal Opera—the most important musical event in Indianapolis since the great May festivals—an all-modern program is to be performed. The works to be heard are the First Symphony of Brahms, the "Don Juan" tone-poem of Richard Strauss and the prelude to Wagner's "The Master-Singers of Nuremberg." No better preparation for the enjoyment of the program can be made than reading Philip Hale's comment on the several compositions. Mr. Hale writes the descriptive notes for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program book, and is one of the best informed and most sympathetic of critics, whether of Europe or America. That which follows is largely a reduction of his articles.

Brahms was in no hurry to write a symphony. As early as 1854 Schumann wrote to Joachim: "But where is Johannes? Is he flying high or only under the flowers? Is he not yet ready to let drums and trumpets sound? He should always keep in mind the beginning of the Beethoven symphonies; he should try to make something like them. The beginning is the main thing; if only one makes a beginning, then the end comes of itself."

Known as "Cambridge Symphony."

Brahms made sketches of the First symphony and kept at his other work. The symphony was not produced until November 4, 1876. In 1877, Cambridge University offered Brahms a degree. If he had accepted it he would have been obliged to go to England, for it is one of the university's statutes that degrees may not be conferred on absent persons. He did not go, but Joachim conducted his First symphony at Cambridge in that year, and it has since been known in England as the "Cambridge symphony."

Dr. Herman Deiters, an enthusiastic admirer of Brahms, wrote the following analysis of this symphony: "The First symphony strikes a highly pathetic chord. As a rule, Brahms begins simply and clearly, and gradually reveals more difficult problems; but here he receives us with a succession of harsh discords, the picture of a troubled soul gazing longingly into vacancy, striving to catch a glimpse of an impossible peace and growing slowly and hopelessly resigned to an inevitable fate. The development is carried out quite logically and with wonderful skill; we feel involuntarily that a strong will rules here, able to cope with any adverse circumstances that may arise. The melodious adagio, with its simple opening, a vein of deep sentiment running throughout, is full of romance. To this movement succeeds the naive grace of an allegretto. The last movement, the climax of the work, is introduced by a solemn adagio of highly tragic expression. After a short pause, the horn is heard giving the signal for the conflict and now the allegro comes in with its truly grand theme. This closing movement, supported by all the power and splendor of the orchestra, depicts the conflict, with its moment of doubt, its hope of victory and moves on before us like a triumphal procession."

The Strauss "Don Juan" Tone-Poem.

Richard Strauss, whom James Huneker has called the "Anarch of Music," is a colleague of Dr. Muck at the Berlin Royal Opera, and frequently serves as guest-conductor in other cities. At the beginning of his career as a composer he was anything but the Richard Strauss of the revolutionary tone-poems that he has written in recent years. He grew up with Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, and through Mendelssohn reached by way of Schumann and Chopin to Brahms. Alexander Ritter pointed out to him the new epoch introduced by Wagner and Liszt, and interested him in Schopenhauer and the other modern philosophers. The first of his tone-poems, the one to be played here, "Don Juan," was first performed at Weimar in 1889. Many dramas, poems and musical compositions have been founded on the "Don Juan" legend. Strauss took his plot from the morbid Hungarian poet, Lenau, who died insane in 1850. Lenau said of his poem in comparison with others: "Each poet, as each human being, is an individual ego.' My Don Juan is no hot-blooded man eternally pursuing women. It is the longing in him to find a woman that is to him incarnate womanhood and to enjoy in the one all the women on earth, whom he can not as individuals possess. Because he does not find her, though he reels from one to another, at last disgust seizes him, and this disgust is the devil that fetches him."

A Dramatic Finale.

Lenau's hero is the man that seeks the sensual ideal. He is constantly disappointed. He is repeatedly sick of himself, men, women and the world, and when at last he fights a duel with Dom Pedro, the avenging son of the grand commander, he throws away his sword and permits his adversary to kill him. In Mr. Hale's fine analysis of the tone-poem he says of the finale, after discussing the passionate music that depicts the adventures of the hero: "Then comes the duel, with the death scene. The theme of disgust dominates. There is a tremendous crash; there is a long and eloquent silence. A pianissimo chord in A minor is cut into by a piercing trumpet F and then there is a last, high, mourning dissonance and resolution (trombones) into E minor.

Exhausted is the fuel,
And on the hearth the cold is fiercely cruel.

"Don Juan" is gorgeously orchestrated. The score calls for three flutes, one interchangeable with piccolo, two oboes, one English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, one double bassoon, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, one bass tuba, three kettledrums, triangle, cymbals, glockenspiel, harp and the usual

Tiersot on Wagner's Comic Opera.

Of the marvelous musical problem propounded and solved here by Wagner, Tiersot has written:

"And is it true that in this overture there are only contrapuntal combinations? By no means; enthusiasm, hidden but full of ardor, expands under formulas that are voluntarily conventional. The expression of this enthusiasm is truly emotional in two passages of the overture: the episode that follows the first exposition of the theme of the guild of the master singers, when the violins sing with dazzling brilliance the long phrase derived from the theme of the masters; then, toward the end of the piece, when, after three superposed themes are combined, the basses solemnly and powerfully unroll this same theme, while the violins seem to abandon themselves to a joyous, inspired improvisation, leap up as rockets that mount higher and higher, prepare the triumphant explosion of the peroration, which finally will become that of the whole work, when the brilliance and power are redoubled by the addition of the shouts of the populace, a veritable and splendid hymn in honor of art."

The sale of seats for the concert will open on next Tuesday morning, at the box office of English's. Mail orders with checks will be filled in the order of their receipt. Late cars will be run out of Indianapolis on all the interurban lines after the concert. The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to this city under the direction of Ona B. Talbot.

The Boston Journal
JANUARY 26, 1907.

Melba Proves Strong Magnet

Noted Singer Pleases Large Audience at Concert in Symphony Hall.

Melba proved a strong magnet yesterday and drew to Symphony Hall several hundred too many to gain entrance. She was in great form and sang mellifluously, besides she filled the eye physically. From my seat I should say her gown was black net, made over pearl silk; her hat a large Gainsborough in effect, with black vulture feathers and a pink rose beneath the crown the only bit of color. She wore a string of rare pearls and long white gloves. The audience was demonstrative.

Noted in the throng were Ethel Barrymore, Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Jr., and daughter, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Eben Sumner Draper, Miss Draper, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. George Stoddard, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr. (Madeleine Jackson), Rosamond Dixey, Barbara Higginson, Colette Dumaresq, Rosamond Gibson, Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. William P. Fay, Olivia Thorndike, Louisa Wells, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. Gordon Abbott, Mrs. Charles Arthur Sinclair and daughter Marie, Misses Dorothy and Mary Fay, Mrs. James Jackson, Jr., Maj. Henry L. Higginson, Robert Jordan, Mrs. Carl Muck, Hannah Stevenson, Mrs. Frederick Warren, Mrs. David P. Kimball, Mrs. Anna D. West, Mrs. Edmund B. Cowles, Mrs. C. H. Cushman, Mrs. Boylston Beal, Mrs. Josiah Hayden, Mrs. F. S. Converse, Mrs. Bryce Allan, Miss Constance Amory, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce, Amy Lowell, and others equally prominent.

Ethel Barrymore was a picture in coral pink cloth, with long, loose coat of same color, and large black hat laden with feathers.

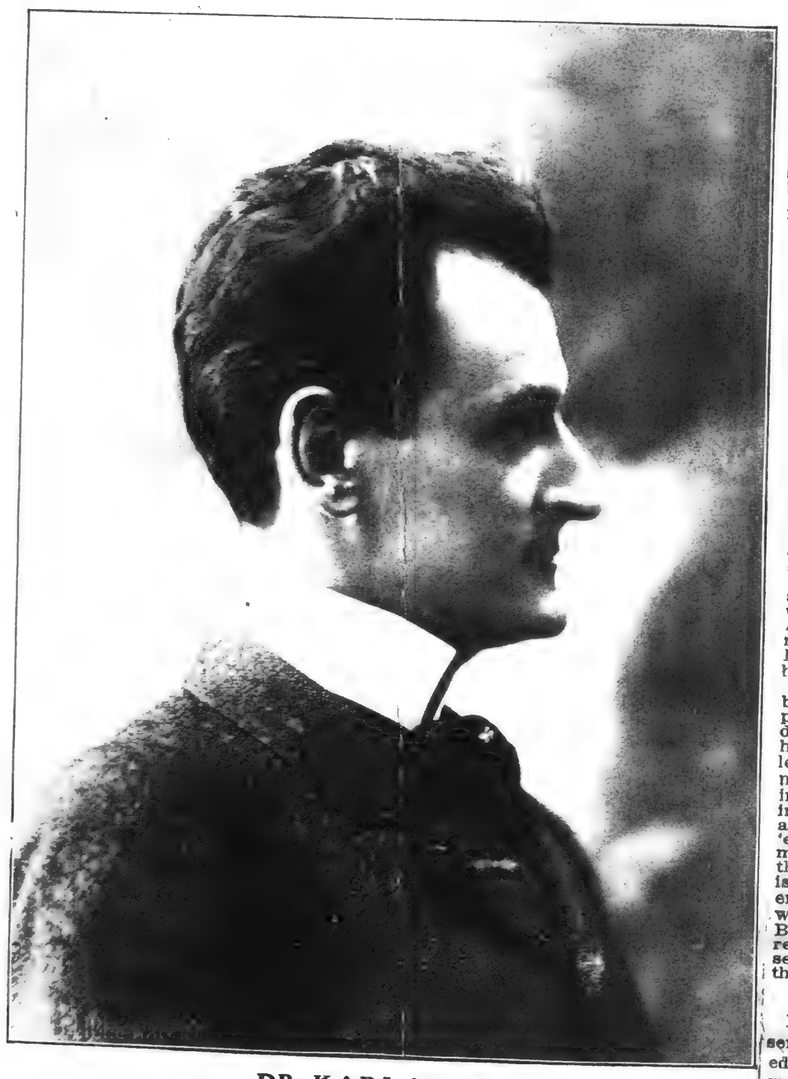
[126]

Paper [illegible]
City Indianapolis
Date JAN 26 1907 State Ind

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

PROF. WILLY HESS, First Violin. OTTO ROTH, Second Violin.
EMILE FERIR, Viola. HEINRICH WARNKE, Violoncello.

Paper Louisville Courier
City Cleveland
Date JAN 26 1907 State



DR. KARL MUCK
Conductor, The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Grays' Armo
Tuesday Evening, January Twenty-ninth, at eight o'clock

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston tomorrow evening for a week's tour in the Middle West. Six concerts will be given: in the Lyceum Theatre, Rochester, on Monday night; in Grays' Armory, Cleveland, on Tuesday night; in the Auditorium, Chicago, on Wednesday night; in the Light Guard Armory, Detroit, on Thursday night; in English's Opera House, Indianapolis, on Friday night; and in the Springer Music Hall, Cincinnati, on Saturday afternoon. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct all six concerts. Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the soloist in Rochester, Cleveland and Detroit; Mr. Rudolph Gans in Chicago and Professor Willy Hess in Cincinnati. There will be no soloist in Indianapolis. The symphonies will be: Beethoven's Seventh in Rochester, Cleveland and Chicago; Brahms' First, in Indianapolis; Sibelius' First, in E minor, in Cincinnati, and Glazounoff's Fifth, in B-flat major, in Detroit.

[126]

Paper News
City Indianapolis
Date JAN 26 1907 State Ind

THREE WORLD-FAMOUS MUSICAL COMPOSITIONS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAM FOR FEBRUARY 1.

BRAHMS, STRAUSS, WAGNER

At the concert at English's next Friday evening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Berlin Royal Opera—the most important musical event in Indianapolis since the great May festivals—an all-modern program is to be performed. The works to be heard are the First Symphony of Brahms, the "Don Juan" tone-poem of Richard Strauss and the prelude to Wagner's "The Master-Singers of Nuremberg." No better preparation for the enjoyment of the program can be made than reading Philip Hale's comment on the several compositions. Mr. Hale writes the descriptive notes for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program book, and is one of the best informed and most sympathetic of critics, whether of Europe or America. That which follows is largely a reduction of his articles.

Brahms was in no hurry to write a symphony. As early as 1854 Schumann wrote to Joachim: "But where is Johannes? Is he flying high or only under the flowers? Is he not yet ready to let drums and trumpets sound? He should always keep in mind the beginning of the Beethoven symphonies; he should try to make something like them. The beginning is the main thing; if only one makes a beginning, then the end comes of itself."

Known as "Cambridge Symphony."

Brahms made sketches of the First symphony and kept at his other work. The symphony was not produced until November 4, 1876. In 1877, Cambridge University offered Brahms a degree. If he had accepted it he would have been obliged to go to England, for it is one of the university's statutes that degrees may not be conferred on absent persons. He did not go, but Joachim conducted his First symphony at Cambridge in that year, and it has since been known in England as the "Cambridge symphony."

Dr. Herman Deiters, an enthusiastic admirer of Brahms, wrote the following analysis of this symphony: "The First symphony strikes a highly pathetic chord. As a rule, Brahms begins simply and clearly, and gradually reveals more difficult problems; but here he receives us with a succession of harsh discords, the picture of a troubled soul gazing longingly into vacancy, striving to catch a glimpse of an impossible peace and growing slowly and hopelessly resigned to an inevitable fate. The development is carried out quite logically and with wonderful skill; we feel involuntarily that a strong will rules here, able to cope with any adverse circumstances that may arise. The melodious adagio, with its simple opening, a vein of deep sentiment running throughout, is full of romance. To this movement succeeds the naive grace of an allegretto. The last movement, the climax of the work, is introduced by a solemn adagio of highly tragic expression. After a short pause, the horn is heard giving the signal for the conflict and now the allegro comes in with its truly grand theme. This closing movement, supported by all the power and splendor of the orchestra, depicts the conflict, with its moment of doubt, its hope of victory and moves on before us like a triumphal procession."

The Strauss "Don Juan" Tone-Poem.

Richard Strauss, whom James Huneker has called the "Anarch of Music," is a colleague of Dr. Muck at the Berlin Royal Opera, and frequently serves as guest-conductor in other cities. At the beginning of his career as a composer he was anything but the Richard Strauss of the revolutionary tone-poems that he has written in recent years. He grew up with Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, and through Mendelssohn reached by way of Schumann and Chopin to Brahms. Alexander Ritter pointed out to him the new epoch introduced by Wagner and Liszt, and interested him in Schopenhauer and the other modern philosophers.

The first of his tone-poems, the one to be played here, "Don Juan," was first performed at Weimar in 1889. Many dramas, poems and musical compositions have been founded on the "Don Juan" legend. Strauss took his plot from the morbid Hungarian poet, Lenau, who died insane in 1850. Lenau said of his poem in comparison with others: "Each poet, as each human being, is an individual 'ego.' My Don Juan is no hot-blooded man eternally pursuing women. It is the longing in him to find a woman that is to him incarnate womanhood and to enjoy in the one all the women on earth, whom he can not as individuals possess. Because he does not find her, though he reels from one to another, at last disgust seizes him, and this disgust is the devil that fetches him."

A Dramatic Finale.

Lenau's hero is the man that seeks the sensual ideal. He is constantly disappointed. He is repeatedly sick of himself, men, women and the world, and when at last he fights a duel with Dom Pedro, the avenging son of the grand commander, he throws away his sword and permits his adversary to kill him. In Mr. Hale's fine analysis of the tone-poem he says of the finale, after discussing the passionate music that depicts the adventures of the hero: "Then comes the duel, with the death scene. The theme of disgust dominates. There is a tremendous crash; there is a long and eloquent silence. A pianissimo chord in A minor is cut into by a piercing trumpet F and then there is a last, high, mourning dissonance and resolution (trombones) into E minor.

Exhausted is the fuel,
And on the hearth the cold is fiercely cruel.

"Don Juan" is gorgeously orchestrated. The score calls for three flutes, one interchangeable with piccolo, two oboes, one English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, one double bassoon, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, one bass tuba, three kettledrums, triangle, cymbals, glockenspiel, harp and the usual strings.

Of the Meistersinger, to frequently referred to as Wagner's "comic opera," its spirit is is far removed from what is meant by that term nowadays. In it Wagner has a great deal of fun at the expense of the musical conventionalists that attacked him so bitterly, representing them as the old minnesingers, but the opera does not lack for romantic sentiment and a love motive is supplied by Walter, who, with his prize-song, is finally triumphant over the dry-as-dust "masters," and Eva. The prelude to the opera, to be performed at the approaching concert mirrors the action and is undoubtedly the best possible excerpt for concert use from Wagner's works.

Tiersot on Wagner's Comic Opera.

Of the marvelous musical problem propounded and solved here by Wagner, Tiersot has written:

"And is it true that in this overture there are only contrapuntal combinations? By no means; enthusiasm, hidden but full of ardor, expands under formulas that are voluntarily conventional. The expression of this enthusiasm is truly emotional in two passages of the overture; in the episode that follows the first exposition of the theme of the guild of the master singers, when the violins sing with dazzling brilliance the long phrase derived from the theme of the masters; then, toward the end of the piece, when, after three superposed themes are combined, the basses solemnly and powerfully unroll this same theme, while the violins seem to abandon themselves to a joyous, inspired improvisation, leap up as rockets that mount higher and higher, prepare the triumphant explosion of the peroration, which finally will become that of the whole work, when the brilliance and power are redoubled by the addition of the shouts of the populace, a veritable and splendid hymn in honor of art."

The sale of seats for the concert will open on next Tuesday morning, at the box office of English's. Mail orders with checks will be filled in the order of their receipt. Late cars will be run out of Indianapolis on all the interurban lines after the concert. The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to this city under the direction of Ona B. Talbot.

The Boston Journal
JANUARY 26, 1907.

Melba Proves Strong Magnet

Noted Singer Pleases Large Audience at Concert in Symphony Hall.

Melba proved a strong magnet yesterday and drew to Symphony Hall several hundred too many to gain entrance. She was in great form and sang mellifluously, besides she filled the eye physically. From my seat I should say her gown was black net, made over pearl silk; her hat a large Gainsborough in effect, with black vulture feathers and a pink rose beneath the crown the only bit of color. She wore a string of rare pearls and long white gloves. The audience was demonstrative.

Noted in the throng were Ethel Barrymore, Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Jr., and daughter, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Eben Sumner Draper, Miss Draper, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. George Stoddard, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr. (Madeleine Jackson), Rosamond Dixey, Barbara Higginson, Colette Dumaresq, Rosamond Gibson, Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Mrs. Arthur Aster Carey, Mrs. William P. Fay, Olivia Thorndike, Louisa Wells, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. Gordon Abbott, Mrs. Charles Arthur Sinclair and daughter Marie, Misses Dorothy and Mary Fay, Mrs. James Jackson, Jr., Maj. Henry L. Higginson, Robert Jordan, Mrs. Carl Muck, Hannah Stevenson, Mrs. Frederick Warren, Mrs. David P. Kimball, Mrs. Anna D. West, Mrs. Edmund B. Cowles, Mrs. C. H. Cushman, Mrs. Boylston Beal, Mrs. Josiah Hayden, Mrs. F. S. Converse, Mrs. Bryce Allan, Miss Constance Amory, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce, Amy Lowell, and others equally prominent.

Ethel Barrymore was a picture in coral pink cloth, with long, loose coat of same color, and large black hat laden with feathers.

Paper Revue Mail
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 27 1907

Josefy wehrt sich.

Die nicht gehaltenen Versprechungen des „Brooklyn Institute".

Absichtliche Täuschung?

Herr Josefy hat einer Brooklyner Zeitung folgende entrüstete Erklärung eingesandt:

Es ist zu meiner Kenntniß gekommen, daß das „Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences" mich für ein Concert am 22. Januar angekündigt hat.

Um mir selbst und vielen Brooklynern gegenüber gerecht zu werden, möchte ich bemerken, daß kein derartiges Arrangement getroffen worden ist, noch auch ich gefragt worden bin, ob ich in dem genannten Concert spielen würde.

Mir scheint, daß es dem Institut wohl angestanden hätte, wenn es seinen Gönnern eine Erklärung über diese ungerechtfertigte Ankündigung geben würde.

Mit großer Hochachtung

Rafael Joseffy.

New York, 24. Januar 1907."

Nichtfertige Ankündigungen.

Dieser Vorfall ist nicht das erste Anzeichen dafür, daß die Maschinerie, die Solisten für die „Boston Symphonie Concerte" liefern soll, nicht fungirt und wahrscheinlich stark außer Ordnung ist.

Die angekündigten Solisten sind sämmtlich nicht erschienen. Gegen einen entsprechenden Prospekt, den das Institut erließ, sind nicht erschienen:

Am 7. Dezember Frau Samaroff.

Am 11. Januar Paderewski. Er ist in Europa.

Am 31. Januar wird Madame Melba nicht singen, wie sie ankündet."

Joseffy's Brief ist also eigentlich nur eine Bestätigung.

Faule Ausreden.

Der „Professor" Franklin W. Hooper, Director des Instituts, der gelegentlich auch mit den Deutschen von Brooklyn geliebäugelt, der sie immer wieder abgewiesen hat, wenn sie ihm, resp. dem Institute, Freundlichkeiten erwiesen hatten, wurde über die ganze Angelegenheit befragt, und statt zu erklären, daß und wie mit der Versendung des Jahresprogramms keine absichtliche Täuschung des Publikums verbunden gewesen sei, ging er in wüthender Weise über die Zeitungen los, welche „das Institut schädigten", indem sie das Ausbleiben der Solisten entweder nachträglich meldeten, oder im Interesse des Publikums vorher meldeten.

Der „Professor" wurde schließlich, in die Enge getrieben, von der Unhaltbarkeit seiner Position überzeugt, und äußerte hämischer Weise noch, Josefy sei lange krank gewesen und noch „erratisch". Melba werde später erscheinen und für Samaroff am 22. Februar Paderewski eingeschoben werden. Im Uebrigen sei nicht er, sondern Herr Ellis vom Boltoner Symphonie-Orchester für das Nichtenthalten des Programms verantwortlich.

Diese Erklärung wird schwerlich stehen, insofern die Programme vom Institut in Druck gelegt und versandt wurden; die Ankündigungen selbstverständlich einen direkten Einfluß auf die Subscriptionen ausübten und die Mitglieder zu den sogenannten wissenschaftlichen oder illustrirten Vorträgen oder sonstigen Affangereien im Institut, den Gegenwerth ihres Geldes nicht erhalten.

Paper Plain Dealer
City Cleveland
Date State O
JAN 27 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which appears here at Grays' armory on Tuesday night, is probably the greatest orchestra in all this great world. William J. Henderson, critic of the New York Sun, ascribed the secret of its marvelous playing not only to its being a "virtuoso orchestra," but to its being "an orchestra of virtuosi." And indeed, the brasses, reeds and strings alige number the most brilliant representatives of the European schools, over half of the sixteen first violins having appeared on symphony programs as soloists.

Karl Muck, who certainly has had experience with splendid orchestras—the Berlin Royal and the Philharmonic—said "the wind choirs are beautiful and the strings—I never heard such strings." That is the way one feels about the Boston orchestra—not merely that it plays with the utmost polish and finesse, with magic beauty of tone—but its effects are so wonderful that we can only admit that we have never heard nor dreamed of hearing music which so perfectly unites all the great qualities of exquisite sound, mental symmetry and emotional inspiration.

To hear the Boston Symphony in the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," and the Beethoven seventh symphony, with Adamowski in the exquisite Saint-Saens violin concerto, will be the biggest event in our concert season.

Paper Plain Dealer
City Cleveland
Date State O
JAN 27 1907

PENSIONS FOR ORCHESTRAS

One of the arguments which foreign musicians always make in favor of European engagements is that despite the comparatively low wages their future is always secure on account of the pensions which come to them after a certain term of service. These pensions are made possible through the fact that nearly all the great continental orchestras and operas are subsidized by the government or municipality and thus are in a sense under civil service rules.

Nothing of a similar nature was attempted in America until four years ago when, at the suggestion of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, a plan was perfected which will put the members of that orchestra on as favorable a footing as to the future as exists in Europe. The establishment of a pension fund in America is possible only in such organizations as the Boston Symphony which are on a thoroughly "permanent" basis. In the case of the Boston Symphony, the great majority of the musicians have been with the orchestra for many years and changes in the personnel are very few.

It was decided from the beginning not to ask for contributions, but the plan called for a certain percentage of the salary of each member and the giving of at least two special concerts each season, the entire proceeds from which go to the fund. The plan has worked admirably. A pension fund concert in Boston means Symphony hall crowded to its uttermost and there is already invested a very large sum of money.

A member of the orchestra becomes eligible to a pension after he has served twenty-five years; but by mutual agreement, although several are already eligible, the payments will not begin for four or five years, or until the fund reaches a size sufficient to warrant the expenditure of a part or the whole of the income. The growth of the fund is very rapid and it is well known that several rich patrons of the orchestra have provided to leave it very considerable legacies.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 27 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston this evening for a week's tour in the Middle West. Six concerts will be given—in the Lyceum Theatre, Rochester, on Monday night; in Grays' Armory, Cleveland, on Tuesday night; in the Auditorium, Chicago, on Wednesday night; in the Light Guard Armory, Detroit, on Thursday night; in English's Opera House, Indianapolis, on Friday night, and in the Springer Music Hall, Cincinnati, on Saturday afternoon. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct all six concerts. Mr. Timothee Adamowski will be the soloist in Rochester, Cleveland and Detroit; Mr. Rudolph Ganz in Chicago, and Professor Willy Hess, in Cincinnati. There will be no soloist in Indianapolis. The symphonies will be Beethoven's seventh, in Rochester, Cleveland and Chicago, Brahms's second in Indianapolis, Sibelius's first, in E minor, in Cincinnati, and Glazounoff's fifth, in B flat in Detroit.

MONDAY, JANUARY 28, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Mr. Converse's New Fantasy

The second hearing of Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter" at the Symphony concert on Saturday, confirmed the impression of unevenness that that music left on Friday afternoon. In the poem that suggested it, Walt Whitman hears "some strange musician, hovering unseen in air vibrating capricious tunes." The trumpeter blows of "holy calm," of "old pageants," of "love that is all the earth to lovers," of "war's wild alarums" and "sights of fear," of defeat, despair and resolution still upspringing, and last of "joy, joy, all-over joy." Here plainly are poetic ideas and visions that unite expression in music as well as in words and that stimulate the composer to his work. Sooner or later, the verses are sure to suggest a fantasy, not for orchestra, but for trumpet with orchestral accompaniment. With finer instinct Mr. Converse has avoided such obvious treatment. As an instrument his trumpet is relatively subordinate, linking the fantasy section by section, while out of its song spring the dominating melodies of the music. Throughout he is concerned imaginatively and expressively with the mystery of the trumpeter and the moods of his song and of the listening poet. The mystery shapes and fills the opening measures of the fantasy. There is suggestion of still, weird, expectant calm. Then ensue in the music, the exaltation of love, the clamor of war, the sorrow of defeat, and the uplifting song of joy. The form throughout is of the freest; yet there is no lack of musical or imaginative coherence. Mr. Converse plainly deserves the freedom that he has chosen because he can control it. In none of his music has he been surer or more elastic. Whatever he wills he may say.

Rather it is invention and imagination that seem at moments to fail him. The section "of war's alarums," for example, seems no more than a rather conventional and rhetorical expression of the mood of the verse. The transitional passages, besides, are only transitions, and perhaps it is unfair to ask more of them. Yet in one or two it is hard to resist the impression that they are mere means to enable the composer to get on toward the next mood that has seized him and the next idea that it has stirred in him. There are indeed moments in the music that after the scant test of two hearings leave little lasting impression. In the beginning of the fantasy, on the other hand, Mr. Converse is writing in tones the poetry and the poignancy of mystery. The section that sings of love glows with cumulative power and elation in the melodic contours, in the harmonic development and in the brightness and warmth of the instrumental colors. In the rhythmic accent, as well, comes a curious impression that the music is American and nothing else; that only an American in America could have written it for such a mood. Perhaps the notion is fantastic, but twice the music has brought it. A similar throbbing elation and a similar American accent fill the final apotheosis of joy. It is joy, not as the conventions of music express it, not as other composers of other races have given it utterance in tones, but joy of an American spirit in its own youth and lusthood, in the youth and lusthood of its race and in the promise of a boundless future. Not before in all his work has Mr. Converse written such American music. Perhaps he could not do otherwise with Whitman for his inspiration.

H. T. P.

Paper Tribune
City Detroit
Date State Mich
JAN 28 1907

Mrs. Karl Muck, wife of the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be the guest of Mrs. N. J. Corey, Thursday.

Paper Star
City Cincinnati
Date State O
JAN 28 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SEAT SALE OPENED ON MONDAY

Concert Will Be Event of Saturday in Music Hall.

Sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concert in Music hall Saturday afternoon at 2:30 opens at Smith & Nixon's music store Monday. The orchestra left Boston Sunday night. In the Auditorium on Thursday night Rudolph Ganz, the pianist, will be the soloist. As already announced, Willy Hess, concert master, will be soloist here, playing Beethoven's concerto for violin. The symphony here will be Sibelius's in E minor No.

[127]

Paper Revue
City New York
Date JAN 27 1907 State N Y

Joseffy wehrt sich.

Die nicht gehaltenen Versprechungen des „Brooklyn Institute".

Absichtliche Täuschung?

Rafael Joseffy hat einer Brooklyner Zeitung folgende entrüstete Erklärung übersandt:

„Es ist zu meiner Kenntniß gekommen, daß das „Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences" mich für ein Concert am 22. März angekündigt hat.

„Um mir selbst und vielen Brooklyner Freunden gerecht zu werden, möchte ich erklären, daß kein derartiges Arrangement getroffen worden ist, noch auch ich nur gefragt worden bin, ob ich in dem genannten Concert spielen würde.

„Mir scheint, daß es dem Institut wohl anstehen würde, wenn es seinen Gönnern eine Erklärung über diese ungerechtfertigte Ankündigung geben würde.

Mit großer Hochachtung
Rafael Joseffy.

New York, 24. Januar 1907."

Leichtfertige Ankündigungen.

Dieser Vorfall ist nicht das erste Anzeichen dafür, daß die Maschinerie, welche Solisten für die „Boston Symphonie-Concerte" liefern soll, nicht fungirt und wahrscheinlich stark außer Ordnung ist.

Die angekündigten Solisten sind sämmtlich nicht erschienen. Gegen einen vielversprechenden Prospekt, den das Institut erließ, sind nicht erschienen:

„Am 7. Dezember Frau Samaroff.

„Am 11. Januar Paderewski. Er weilt in Europa.

„Am 31. Januar wird Madame Melba nicht singen, wie sie ankündet."

Joseffy's Brief ist also eigentlich nur die Klimax.

Faule Ausreden.

„Professor" Franklin W. Hooper, Direktor des Instituts, der gelegentlich auch mit den Deutschen von Brooklyn geliebäugelt, der sie immer wieder abgeschüttelt hat, wenn sie ihm, resp. dem Institute, Freundlichkeiten erwiesen hatten, wurde über die ganze Angelegenheit gefragt, und statt zu erklären, daß und wieso mit der Versendung des Jahresprogramms keine absichtliche Täuschung des Publikums verbunden gewesen sei, zog er in wüthender Weise über die Zeitungen los, welche „das Institut schädigten", indem sie das Ausbleiben der Solisten entweder nachträglich meldeten, oder im Interesse des Publikums vorher meldeten.

Der „Professor" wurde schließlich, in die Enge getrieben, von der Unhaltbarkeit seiner Position überzeugt, und äußerte hämischer Weise noch, Joseffy sei lange krank gewesen und noch „erratisch". Melba werde später erscheinen und für Samaroff am 22. Februar Adamoski eingeschoben werden. Im Uebrigen sei nicht er, sondern Herr Ellis vom Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester für das Nichteinhalten des Programms verantwortlich.

Diese Erklärung wird schwerlich ziehen, insofern die Programme vom Institut in Druck gelegt und versandt wurden: die Ankündigungen selbstverständlich einen direkten Einfluß auf die Subskriptionen ausübten und die Mitglieder in den sogenannten wissenschaftlichen, oder illustrirten Vorträgen oder sonstigen Alfanzereien im Institut, den Gegenwerth ihres Geldes nicht erhalten.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y

Paper Plain Dealer
City Cleveland
Date JAN 27 1907 State O

JAN 27 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which appears here at Grays' armory on Tuesday night, is probably the greatest orchestra in all this great world. William J. Henderson, critic of the New York Sun, ascribed the secret of its marvelous playing not only to its being a "virtuoso orchestra," but to its being "an orchestra of virtuosi." And indeed, the brasses, reeds and strings alige number the most brilliant representatives of the European schools, over half of the sixteen first violins having appeared on symphony programs as soloists.

Karl Muck, who certainly has had experience with splendid orchestras—the Berlin Royal and the Philharmonic—said "the wind choirs are beautiful and the strings—I never heard such strings." That is the way one feels about the Boston orchestra—not merely that it plays with the utmost polish and finesse, with magic beauty of tone—but its effects are so wonderful that we can only admit that we have never heard nor dreamed of hearing music which so perfectly unites all the great qualities of exquisite sound, mental symmetry and emotional inspiration.

To hear the Boston Symphony in the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," and the Beethoven seventh symphony, with Adamowski in the exquisite Saint-Saens violin concerto, will be the biggest event in our concert season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston this evening for a week's tour in the Middle West. Six concerts will be given—in the Lyceum Theatre, Rochester, on Monday night; in Grays' Armory, Cleveland, on Tuesday night; in the Auditorium, Chicago, on Wednesday night; in the Light Guard Armory, Detroit, on Thursday night; in English's Opera House, Indianapolis, on Friday night, and in the Springer Music Hall, Cincinnati, on Saturday afternoon. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct all six concerts. Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the soloist in Rochester, Cleveland and Detroit; Mr. Rudolph Ganz in Chicago, and Professor Willy Hess, in Cincinnati. There will be no soloist in Indianapolis. The symphonies will be Beethoven's seventh, in Rochester, Cleveland and Chicago, Brahms's first in Indianapolis, Sibelius's first, in E minor, in Cincinnati, and Glazounoff's fifth, in B flat major, in Detroit.

Paper Plain Dealer
City Cleveland
Date State O

JAN 27 1907

PENSIONS FOR ORCHESTRAS.

One of the arguments which foreign musicians always make in favor of European engagements is that despite the comparatively low wages their future is always secure on account of the pensions which come to them after a certain term of service. These pensions are made possible through the fact that nearly all the great continental orchestras and operas are subsidized by the government or municipality and thus are in a sense under civil service rules.

Nothing of a similar nature was attempted in America until four years ago when, at the suggestion of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, a plan was perfected which will put the members of that orchestra on as favorable a footing as to the future as exists in Europe. The establishment of a pension fund in America is possible only in such organizations as the Boston Symphony which are on a thoroughly "permanent" basis. In the case of the Boston Symphony, the great majority of the musicians have been with the orchestra for many years and changes in the personnel are very few.

It was decided from the beginning not to ask for contributions, but the plan called for a certain percentage of the salary of each member and the giving of at least two special concerts each season, the entire proceeds from which go to the fund. The plan has worked admirably. A pension fund concert in Boston means Symphony hall crowded to its uttermost and there is already invested a very large sum of money.

A member of the orchestra becomes eligible to a pension after he has served twenty-five years; but by mutual agreement, although several are already eligible, the payments will not begin for four or five years, or until the fund reaches a size sufficient to warrant the expenditure of a part or the whole of the income. The growth of the fund is very rapid and it is well known that several rich patrons of the orchestra have provided to leave it very considerable legacies.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
MONDAY, JANUARY 28, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Mr. Converse's New Fantasy

The second hearing of Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter" at the Symphony concert on Saturday, confirmed the impression of unevenness that that music left on Friday afternoon. In the poem that suggested it, Walt Whitman hears "some strange musician, hovering unseen in air vibrating capricious tunes." The trumpeter blows of "holy calm," of "old pageants," of "love that is all the earth to lovers," of "war's wild alarums" and "sights of fear," of defeat, despair and resolution still upspringing, and last of "joy, joy, all-over joy." Here plainly are poetic ideas and visions that unite expression in music as well as in words and that stimulate the composer to his work. Sooner or later, the verses are sure to suggest a fantasy, not for orchestra, but for trumpet with orchestral accompaniment. With finer instinct Mr. Converse has avoided such obvious treatment. As an instrument his trumpet is relatively subordinate, linking the fantasy section by section, while out of its song spring the dominating melodies of the music. Throughout he is concerned imaginatively and expressively with the mystery of the trumpeter and the moods of his song and of the listening poet. The mystery shapes and fills the opening measures of the fantasy. There is suggestion of still, weird, expectant calm. Then ensue in the music, the exaltation of love, the clamor of war, the sorrow of defeat, and the uplifting song of joy. The form throughout is of the freest; yet there is no lack of musical or imaginative coherence. Mr. Converse plainly deserves the freedom that he has chosen because he can control it. In none of his music has he been surer or more elastic. Whatever he wills he may say.

Rather it is invention and imagination that seem at moments to fail him. The section "of war's alarums," for example, seems no more than a rather conventional and rhetorical expression of the mood of the verse. The transitional passages, besides, are only transitions, and perhaps it is unfair to ask more of them. Yet in one or two it is hard to resist the impression that they are mere means to enable the composer to get on toward the next mood that has seized him and the next idea that it has stirred in him. There are indeed moments in the music that after the scant test of two hearings leave little lasting impression. In the beginning of the fantasy, on the other hand, Mr. Converse is writing in tones the poetry and the poignancy of mystery. The section that sings of love glows with cumulative power and elation in the melodic contours, in the harmonic development and in the brightness and warmth of the instrumental colors. In the rhythmic accent, as well, comes a curious impression that the music is American and nothing else; that only an American in America could have written it for such a mood. Perhaps the notion is fantastic, but twice the music has brought it. A similar throbbing elation and a similar American accent fill the final apotheosis of joy. It is joy, not as the conventions of music express it, not as other composers of other races have given it utterance in tones, but joy of an American spirit in its own youth and lusthood, in the youth and lusthood of its race and in the promise of a boundless future. Not before in all his work has Mr. Converse written such American music. Perhaps he could not do otherwise with Whitman for his inspiration.

H. T. P.

Paper Tribune
City Detroit
Date JAN 28 1907 State Mich

Mrs. Karl Muck, wife of the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be the guest of Mrs. N. J. Corey, Thursday.

Paper Star
City Cincinnati
Date State O

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SEAT SALE OPENED ON MONDAY

Concert Will Be Event of Saturday in Music Hall.

Sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concert in Music hall Saturday afternoon at 2:30 opens at Smith & Nixon's music store Monday. The orchestra left Boston Sunday night. In the Auditorium on Thursday night Rudolph Gonz, the pianist, will be the soloist. As already announced, Willy Hess, concert master, will be soloist here, playing Beethoven's concerto for violin. The symphony here will be Sibelius's in E minor No. 1.

[127]

Paper Leader
City Cleveland
Date JAN 27 1907 State O.

Minneapolis Star.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 27, 1907.

ORCHESTRA LEAVES ON ITS TOUR TODAY

Boston Symphonies to Appear in Indianapolis Next Friday Night.

CARRIES FAMOUS MUSICIANS

Muck Will Be Heard Here for First Time.

The principal musical event of the coming week, and by all odds one of the most important musical events of several years past, will be the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in English's Opera House on next Friday evening, Feb. 1. The sale of tickets for this concert will open at the box office of the opera house on next Tuesday morning, Jan. 29. Mail orders should be addressed to Ona B. Talbott.

The orchestra leaves Boston today, traveling in three of the largest size Pullmans and carrying its own baggage car for its instruments. A large part of its traveling will be done by special train. Tomorrow night it plays in Rochester, Tuesday night in Cleveland, Wednesday night in Chicago, Thursday night in Detroit and Friday night here. Its last concert in the West will be in Cincinnati on Saturday afternoon.

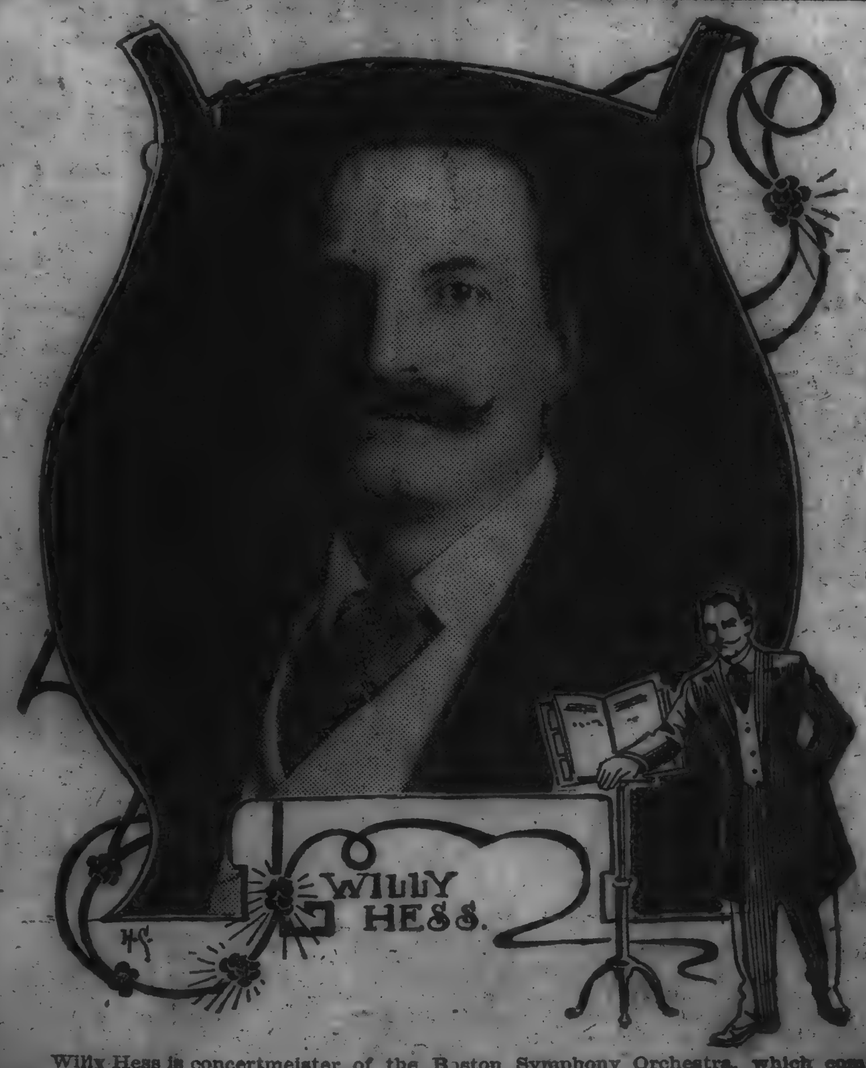
As it is twenty years since the orchestra played in Indianapolis, and then but once, to the vast majority of the music lovers of this city it will be entirely a novelty. The orchestra represents twenty-five years of careful building up under skilled conductors, who have never been stinted in money when it has been a question of getting artists. Consequently it counts in its ranks a greater number of famous musicians than any other orchestra in the world, barring none.

So great has been the demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony that four weeks in the West could be as easily filled as one. But it is not a traveling orchestra. Its concerts outside of Boston are entirely incidental to the Boston season, where it gives twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts between Oct. 1 and May 1. As it makes five monthly trips during the season to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn a week is all the time it can give to concerts in this part of the country, and to give this makes the last Boston concerts fall in to May.

Dr. Muck's First Appearance.

Particular interest has been aroused in this concert because it will mark the first appearance in this city of Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who brought to America a great reputation and has increased it materially since he arrived here. [illegible] considerable interest [illegible] Indianapolis concert [illegible]

Concertmeister With Boston Orchestra



Willy Hess is concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to English's Friday night, Feb. 1, with Dr. Karl Much.

Brahms—Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68:
1. Un poco sostenuto. (Allegro.)
2. Andante sostenuto.
3. Un poco allegretto e grazioso L'istesso tempo.
4. Adagio. Allegro non troppo ma con brio.
(An intermission of ten minutes.)
Richard Strauss—Tone Poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau.) Op. 20.
Wagner—Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."

It was in his performance of this symphony by Brahms that Eastern critics first recognized that in Dr. Muck the Boston Symphony Orchestra had secured a man of interpretive genius. He had made a profound impression with Beethoven's C minor symphony and with Haydn and Mozart, but his performance of Brahms's created nothing short of a sensation. It was freely said in the papers of New York and Boston that Brahms had never before been known. And little short of his success in this was that which greeted his performance of Strauss's "Don Juan." As for the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" Dr. Muck has long been regarded as one of the greatest interpreters of Wagner.

Brahms symphony in C minor was first performed in Carlsruhe on Nov. 4, 1876. [illegible] but other performances in [illegible]

Quiet Munich Man a Revelation.

"Don Juan" is known as the first of Richard Strauss's tone poems, although "Macbeth," which was published later, was written first. It was "Don Juan" that revealed to the world that in this quiet man of Munich had arrived some one who had something new to say in music. It had its first performance in the fall of 1889, and for ten years the battle raged furiously for and against the daring genius who did things in music that no one else had dared. Even today there is still rimblings of controversial artillery, but when one sees the triumphant sweep of Strauss's latest work, his opera "Salome," which is in many respects the most daring of all, it must be admitted that Strauss has won his battle.

"Don Juan" does not go to the extremes of some of Strauss's later works, and by many is for this reason considered his greatest. It seeks to give a series of musical pictures of the career of the great libertine immortalized by Moliere and Mozart; although the Lenau poem gives a different version of his adventures. It has never been played in Indianapolis.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" is justly considered one of [illegible] brilliant works in the literature [illegible]

[128]

Paper News
City Indianapolis
Date JAN 28 1907 State Ind.

Many to Attend Concert.

Much interest is shown throughout the State in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given here Friday night, and many persons from outside towns will attend. Among them will be Miss Anna Birchard, of Anderson, with the seventeen members of a small orchestra she has organized in that city. The Study Club, of Shelbyville, that has seventeen members, will be here. There were thirty-five persons from Shelbyville here for the concert of the Pittsburg Orchestra in November. Dr. Stone, president of Purdue, with Mrs. Stone and a party, will come from Lafayette. Charles D. Campbell, of the State University, and parties from Richmond, Greenfield, Muncie, Marion and many other places have already bought tickets for the concert.

Paper Express
City Rochester
Date JAN 28 1907 State N. Y.

IN THE THEATERS.

An audience large in numbers and representing the musical culture of not only Rochester, but of many Western New York towns as well, will be at the Lyceum theater to-night, for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. To-night's event will be the only opportunity offered here for making the acquaintance of Dr. Karl Muck, the eminent Berlin conductor, whose stay in this country is limited to the present season. The concert will begin sharply at 8:15, and it is requested by the management that the audience be seated at that time.

Paper Leader
City Cleveland
Date JAN 27 1907 State O.

Few of those who will attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert, Tuesday evening at the Armory, have any idea of the amount of work it has done since its first concert in Boston, October 21, 1881.

Its first quarter century ended April last, when, under Mr. Gericke, it gave a special concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, in aid of the sufferers from the San Francisco catastrophe. The number in the audience was 2,399, making the average concerts per season just short of 2,400. Of this total, 1,196 were regular subscription concerts in Boston, the public rehearsals on Friday afternoons counting as concerts; forty-six were special concerts given in Boston. Of the 1,127 concerts given outside of Boston, Cambridge, Mass., had 193; Philadelphia, 158; New York, 135; Brooklyn, 110; Providence, 100; Baltimore, 98, and Washington, 62. The remaining concerts had been given in forty different cities as far west as St. Louis and St. Paul.

It is unfortunate that a complete record of the out-of-town concerts has not been preserved, so that an accurate record of the works performed at all these concerts could be obtained; but the first two of the three years are lacking. It is possible, however, to make an estimate of the total amount of work which the orchestra has done from the record of the regular concerts in Boston, because it has been a rule violated only in a very few cases that no work should be played outside of Boston which had not been played in that city at one of the regular concerts.

In the regular Boston concerts in the twenty-five years ending last spring were given a total of 5,385 performances of 1,125 works by 238 composers. Consequently, the total number of performances for all the concerts must be close to 11,000, with a certain increase in the total number of composers and works, due almost entirely to soloists who appeared in out-of-town concerts, and not in Boston.

The list of works and their composers that have appeared on Boston programs makes most interesting reading, showing how completely the literature of orchestral music has been covered, and how very catholic has been the taste of the conductors. Naturally, the major part of attention has been paid to the "classics," and at the head of the list, both in number of works performed and in the number of performances, stands the name of Beethoven. As a curious illustration of how opera has encroached on the concert field, Wagner is close behind the great master, Beethoven being credited with 560 performances of 47 works, and Wagner with 424 performances of 45 works (the works of the latter comprising purely orchestral, orchestral and vocal, and purely vocal excerpts from his music dramas, the only works of absolute music being his youthful symphony, his "Faust" overture and "Siegfried Idyll").

After Wagner comes Brahms, with 360 performances of 41 works; and then in order, Mozart, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Liszt, Dvorak, Weber, Berlioz, Tschaikowsky, Saint-Saens, Haydn, Bach, Rubinstein, Goldmark, Handel, Richard Strauss and so on through the long list. Unfamiliar names are many, most of them being credited with only two performances, showing that comparitively few of the "novelties" played have been deemed worthy of repetition.

Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the orchestra, has said that "in one's search for true beauty, one must still go back to the great masters." That, evidently, has been the belief of all his predecessors, for the great symphonies and overtures lead all other works in the number of performances. Beethoven's first symphony was played 32 times; his second, 28 times; his third, the "Eroica," 26 times; the fourth, 20 times; the fifth, 35 times; the sixth, 33 times; the seventh, 32 times; the eighth, 24 times and the ninth, 18 times. Schubert's "Unfinished" has had the greatest number of performances to its credit, 36. His great symphony in C major has been played 20 times. Brahms' first has had 30 performances, his second, 26, his third 24 and his fourth 27; while Schumann's first has been played 31 times, his second 23 times, his third 20 times and his fourth 23 times.

Altogether the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played at its regular concerts in Boston in the years of 1881-1906 a total of 128 symphonies by 59 composers 1,189 times; 188 overtures by 82 composers 1,208 times and 360 other orchestral works by 196 composers, 1,282 times. It is only natural that Germany leads all other countries in number of composers, the number of works and the number of times performed, the figures being, respectively, 21, 458 and 2,742. Then comes in order, France, Austria, Russia, the United States and Italy, the United States being represented by 57 works by 20 composers, performed 186 times.

The library of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the most complete in the world and a conservative estimate of its value is $100,000. Many of the works in it cannot be bought now at any price, orchestras being compelled to rent from publishers many of the scores which the Boston Symphony owns. Dr. Muck says he came to this country was astonished to find in America such a collection, and said it was doubtful if it could be duplicated by any orchestra on the continent.

The program for Tuesday night comprises three numbers:

Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg" .....
Concerto for violin in D minor, Op. 61 .....
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andantino quasi Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.
Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92 ... Beethoven
I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto; Presto meno assai.
IV. Allegro con brio.

Paper Leader
City Cleveland
Date J/ 1907 State O

MUSIC

A New Ca

Dr. KARL MUCK,
Conductor
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA.

Minneapolis Star.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 27, 1907.

ORCHESTRA LEAVES ON ITS TOUR TODAY

Boston Symphonies to Appear in Indianapolis Next Friday Night.

CARRIES FAMOUS MUSICIANS

Muck Will Be Heard Here for First Time.

The principal musical event of the coming week, and by all odds one of the most important musical events of several years past, will be the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in English's Opera House on next Friday evening, Feb. 1. The sale of tickets for this concert will open at the box office of the opera house on next Tuesday morning, Jan. 29. Mail orders should be addressed to Ona B. Talbott.

The orchestra leaves Boston today, traveling in three of the largest size Pullmans and carrying its own baggage car for its instruments. A large part of its traveling will be done by special train. Tomorrow night it plays in Rochester, Tuesday night in Cleveland, Wednesday night in Chicago, Thursday night in Detroit and Friday night here. Its last concert in the West will be in Cincinnati on Saturday afternoon.

As it is twenty years since the orchestra played in Indianapolis, and then but once, to the vast majority of the music lovers of this city it will be entirely a novelty. The orchestra represents twenty-five years of careful building up under skilled conductors, who have never been stinted in money when it has been a question of getting artists. Consequently it counts in its ranks a greater number of famous musicians than any other orchestra in the world, barring none.

So great has been the demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony that four weeks in the West could be as easily filled as one. But it is not a traveling orchestra. Its concerts outside of Boston are entirely incidental to the Boston season, where it gives twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts between Oct. 1 and May 1. As it makes five monthly trips during the season to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn a week is all the time it can give to concerts in this part of the country, and to give this makes the last Boston concerts fall in to May.

Dr. Muck's First Appearance.

Particular interest has been aroused in this concert because it will mark the first appearance in this city of Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who brought to America a great reputation and has increased it mightily since he arrived here. He has made a remarkably interesting program for the Indianapolis concert. It is as follows:

Brahms—Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68:
1. Un poco sostenuto. (Allegro.)
2. Andante sostenuto.
3. Un poco allegretto e grazioso L'istesso tempo.
4. Adagio. Allegro non troppo ma con brio.

(An intermission of ten minutes.)

Richard Strauss—Tone Poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau.) Op. 20.

Wagner—Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."

It was in his performance of this symphony by Brahms that Eastern critics first recognized that in Dr. Muck the Boston Symphony Orchestra had secured a man of interpretive genius. He had made a profound impression with Beethoven's C minor symphony and with Haydn and Mozart, but his performance of Brahms's created nothing short of a sensation. It was freely said in the papers of New York and Boston that Brahms had never before been known. And little short of his success in this was that which greeted his performance of Strauss's "Don Juan." As for the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" Dr. Muck has long been regarded as one of the greatest interpreters of Wagner.

Brahms symphony in C minor was first performed in Carlsruhe on Nov. 4, 1876. It immediately had other performances in Germany and roused the bitterest discussion, which even now has not entirely died away. Yet Von Buelow called it "the tenth symphony," which was sufficiently complimentary to please the most exact-

Quiet Munich Man a Revelation.

"Don Juan" is known as the first of Richard Strauss's tone poems, although "Macbeth," which was published later, was written first. It was "Don Juan" that revealed to the world that in this quiet man of Munich had arrived some one who had something new to say in music. It had its first performance in the fall of 1889, and for ten years the battle raged furiously for and against the daring genius who did things in music that no one else had dared. Even today there is still rimblings of controversial artillery, but when one sees the triumphant sweep of Strauss's latest work, his opera "Salome," which is in many respects the most daring of all, it must be admitted that Strauss has won his battle.

"Don Juan" does not go to the extremes of some of Strauss's later works, and by many is for this reason considered his greatest. It seeks to give a series of musical pictures of the career of the great libertine immortalized by Moliere and Mozart, although the Lenau poem gives a different version of his adventures. It has never been played in Indianapolis.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" is justly considered one of the most brilliant works in the literature of operatic music.

128

Concertmeister With Boston Orchestra

Willy Hess is concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to English's Friday night, Feb. 1, with Dr. Karl Muck.

Paper Press
City Indianapolis
Date State Ind
JAN 28 1907

Many to Attend Concert.

Much interest is shown throughout the State in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given here Friday night, and many persons from outside towns will attend. Among them will be Miss Anna Birchard, of Anderson, with the seventeen members of a small orchestra she has organized in that city. The Study Club, of Shelbyville, that has seventeen members, will be here. There were thirty-five persons from Shelbyville here for the concert of the Pittsburg Orchestra in November. Dr. Stone, president of Purdue, with Mrs. Stone and a party, will come from Lafayette. Charles D. Campbell, of the State University, and parties from Richmond, Greenfield, Muncie, Marion and many other places have already bought tickets for the concert.

Paper Express
City Rochester
Date State N. Y

IN THE THEATERS.

An audience large in numbers and representing the musical culture of not only Rochester, but of many Western New York towns as well, will be at the Lyceum theater to-night, for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. To-night's event will be the only opportunity offered here for making the acquaintance of Dr. Karl Muck, the eminent Berlin conductor, whose stay in this country is limited to the present season. The concert will begin sharply at 8:15, and it is requested by the management that the audience be seated at that time.

Paper Leader
City Cleveland
Date State O
JAN 27 1907

Few of those who will listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its coming concert, Tuesday evening at the Grays' Armory, have any idea of the vast amount of work it has done since its first concert in Boston, October 21, 1881.

Its first quarter century ended April 20 last, when, under Mr. Gericke, it gave a special concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, in aid of the sufferers from the San Francisco catastrophe. The number of that concert was 2,399, making the average of concerts per season just short of 96. Of this total, 1,196 were regular subscription concerts in Boston, the public rehearsals on Friday afternoons counting as concerts; forty-six were special concerts given in Boston. Of the 1,157 concerts given outside of Boston, Cambridge, Mass., had 198; Philadelphia, 136; New York, 135; Brooklyn, 110; Providence, 101; Baltimore, 88, and Washington, 62. The remaining concerts had been given in forty different cities as far west as St. Louis and St. Paul.

It is unfortunate that a complete record of the out-of-town concerts has not been preserved, so that an accurate record of the works performed at all these concerts could be obtained; but the first two or three years are lacking. It is possible, however, to make an estimate of the total amount of work which the orchestra has done from the record of the regular concerts in Boston, because it has been a rule violated only in a very few cases that no work should be played outside of Boston which had not been played in that city at one of the regular concerts.

In the regular Boston concerts in the twenty-five years ending last spring were given a total of 5,385 performances of 1,125 works by 236 composers. Consequently, the total number of performances for all the concerts must be close to 11,000, with a certain increase in the total number of composers and works, due almost entirely to soloists who appeared in out-of-town concerts, and not in Boston.

The list of works and their composers that have appeared on Boston programs makes most interesting reading, showing how completely the literature of orchestral music has been covered, and how very catholic has been the taste of the conductors. Naturally, the major part of attention has been paid to the "classics," and at the head of the list, both in number of works performed and in the number of performances, stands the name of Beethoven. As a curious illustration of how opera has encroached on the concert field, Wagner is close behind the great master, Beethoven being credited with 560 performances of 47 works, and Wagner with 424 performances of 45 works (the works of the latter comprising purely orchestral, orchestral and vocal, and purely vocal excerpts from his music dramas, the only works of absolute music being his youthful symphony, his "Faust" overture and "Siegfried Idyll").

After Wagner comes Brahms, with 302 performances of 41 works; and then in order, Mozart, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Liszt, Dvorak, Weber, Berlioz, Tschaikowsky, Saint-Saens, Haydn, Bach, Rubinstein, Goldmark, Handel, Richard Strauss and so on through the long list. Unfamiliar names are many, most of them being credited with only two performances, showing that comparitively few of the "novelties" played have been deemed worthy of repetition.

Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the orchestra, has said that "in one's search for true beauty, one must still go back to the great masters." That, evidently, has been the belief of all his predecessors, for the great syuphonies and overtures lead all other works in the number of performances. Beethoven's first symphony was played 22 times; his second; 28 times; his third, the "Eroica," 36 times; the fourth, 20 times; the fifth, 36 times; the sixth, 33 times; the seventh, 32 times; the eighth, 34 times and the ninth, 18 times. Schubert's "Unfinished" has had the greatest number of performances to its credit, 38. His great symphony in C major has been played 30 times. Brahms' first has had 30 performances, his second, 28, his third 24 and his fourth 27; while Schumann's first has been played 31 times, his second 28 times, his third 20 times and his fourth 28 times.

Altogether the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played at its regular concerts in Boston in the years of 1881-1906 a total of 138 symphonies by 59 composers 1,189 times; 188 overtures by 82 composers 1,208 times and 300 other orchestral works by 106 composers, 1,282 times. It is only natural that Germany leads all other countries in number of composers, the number of works and the number of times performed, the figures being, respectively, 71, 458 and 2,742. Then comes in order, France, Austria, Russia, the United States and Italy, the United States being represented by 57 works by 20 composers, performed 166 times.

The library of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the most complete in the world and a conservative estimate of its value is $100,000. Many of the works in it cannot be bought now at any price, orchestras being compelled to rent from publishers many of the scores which the Boston Symphony owns. Dr. Muck when he came to this country was astonished to find in America such a collection, and said it was doubtful if it could be duplicated by any orchestra on the continent.

The program for Tuesday night comprises three numbers:

Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg" ..... Wagner
Concerto for violin in B minor, No. 3, Op. 61 ..... Saint-Saens
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
III. Molto moderato e maestoso, Allegro non troppo.
Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92.. Beethoven
I. Poco sostenuto: Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto: Presto meno assai.
IV. Allegro con brio.

Paper Herald
City Rochester
Date JAN 28 1907 State NY

THEATERS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Be Heard at the Lyceum This Evening.

The best most complimentary to Rochester's musical discrimination is evidenced in the excellent sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concert at the Lyceum to-night. That this most famous body of instrumental players may come to Rochester without financial loss is gratifying and the more so in this case on account of this being the only city in the state in which the orchestra will play this season outside of New York City. The concert this evening will begin at 8.15 o'clock.

There are said to be over twenty big musical hits composed by Julian Edwards in the comic opera, "The Girl and the Governor," which Jefferson De Angelis presents at the Lyceum Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Among them are "The Serenade," "Chords Like These," "I Am So Fair," "That Is the Kind of Wily Savage That I Am," "I Have a Very Nasty Temper," "Wouldn't It Puzzle You," "The Land of the Free," "The Amorous Pigeon," "When a Maiden won't," and "Have You Ever Heard It Told That Way Before."

At the Lyceum Tuesday and Wednesday, Miss Emma Carus will present the new musical comedy, "Too Near Home." Miss Carus has recently had a successful run at the Walnut Street Theater, Philadelphia. There is a large supporting company and the scenery, costumes and other effects are said to be upon a scale of unusual splendor.

B. E. Forrester's comedy, "Bankers and Brokers," introducing the comedians Yorke and Adams, opens a three day engagement at the National Theater with two performances to-day. The entertainment combines mirth and music.

One of the many features to be presented by John W. Vogel's Minstrels, which appear at the National Theater the last half of this week, is a dancing number entitled, "The Great Event." The scene is laid at the famous Sheepshead Bay race course.

The following will comprise the bill of vaudeville to be presented at Cook Opera House this week: John T. Kelly and Company in "A Game of Con"; Clarice Vance, a Southern girl, singing coon songs: "The Sunny South," ten darkies in a plantation jubilee; Maxmillian, violinist; The Franciscos, travesty conjurers; Rosaire and Dorettò, comedy acrobats; Elmer Tenley, monologist; Mabel Sinclair, woman, ventriloquist, and moving pictures.

The Behman Company including Frank D. Bryan's "Congress of American Girls," will be the attraction at the Corinthian Theater this week.

Monday is the hardest day in the week for the Baker Theater Stock Company. The players report to Stage Manager Richard Baker at 10 a. m., rehearse until 1.30 p. m., play a matinee at 2.15, which lasts until about 5.00 o'clock and return for the night performance at 8.15. But to-day they have even more than that to do. Besides the regular rehearsal, special rehearsals of the specialties are held for to-day's first performance of "How Baxter Butted In," in which the players will be called upon to sing and dance as well as act.

Rochester Herald

IN THE THEATERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gave Great Concert.

LARGE AUDIENCE AT LYCEUM

Orchestra's Visit Was Made a Financial as Well as Artistic Success—New Attractions at Other Houses.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the third time in Rochester last evening at the Lyceum Theater. The first concert was several years over a decade ago, and Timothee Adamowski was the soloist. Then there was a dreary waste of years without it. The second concert took place last year at the Baker Theater, when a splendid and enthusiastic audience paid it tribute. The third concert was the joyous occasion at the Lyceum last night when one of the largest and most fashionable audiences of the season gathered to listen to what is very likely the most wonderful orchestral organization in the world today. It was an event long to be remembered—a satisfying programme, as nearly perfect a performance as lies within the range of human possibilities, an extraordinary exhibition of virtuoso conducting on the part of the leader, one of the most distinguished directors of our time, and a brilliant and exhilarating solo number. What more can the heart desire? The audience seemed to ask little more—they know that the tradition of the orchestra forbids encores—but they were convincing by lavish and prolonged applause of their delight.

It is gratifying to observe the attitude of Rochester music-lovers toward such performances as last night's. It is a pleasure to see them turn out in such numbers as to make these important concerts financially successful and it is also a pleasure to see them so warmly appreciative and enthusiastic toward the performance itself. Local culture appears to good advantage when the occasion is time-honored and of established repute. It now remains for it to inform itself concerning current successes and not allow such affairs to pass unheeded.

Rochester had its first taste of the prima donna conductor last night. For several years conductors have been the fads of concert-goers in Europe and they have been feted and adulated as the prima donna was of old. Ernst Van Dyck who is witty, although he is a tenor, once remarked that the old school of Italian opera was dying out and with it the old-fashioned prima donna was disappearing. "In fact," he said, "I suppose one may safely say that Jean de Reske is the last of the great prima donnas." Van Dyck did not foresee the present furore over conductors. It has raged over the European music centers and the Philharmonic Society of New York with its two seasons of "star" conductors spread the infection to America. During those two years the public was taught to go to concerts to hear Safonoff or Weingartner or Colonne or Henry Wood conduct as they had hitherto hastened only to hear Melba sing or Paderewski play. It was assuredly a perversion of taste and probably an unhealthy influence, but it has had the effect of giving America the benefit of the presence for more or less protracted periods of two celebrated conductors. They are Safonoff, who will conduct the Philharmonic for three years, and Dr. Muck, who will conduct the Boston Symphony for the present season—at any rate. Rochester felt the effect of this tendency in musical affairs for the first time last night.

Dr. Muck has been a famous man in Europe for many years. He is best known as an operatic conductor and has been for some time first conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin and a regular participant in the Bayreuth festivals. His first appearances in this country aroused very little enthusiasm. He was recognized as a man of superb command of the technique of conducting, but there seemed to be a lack of color and temperament; this probably because audiences were spoiled by the sensational efforts of so-called "star" conductors to startle their auditors at no matter what spectacular cost. But Dr. Muck has slowly achieved a most remarkable success both in Boston and New York and success of the most solid and healthy kind. His programmes have avoided the showy, pyrotechnic repertory and have presented works which had legitimate reason for their being and his concerts have been a climax of triumphs for his musicianship. He has conquered most conclusively in such works as the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and the First of Brahms, two of the most absolute and uncompromising things in music. The critics and the public have both risen to his reading of the Seventh Symphony and proclaimed him a great man and it was a most happy choice for the Rochester programme.

The performance last night justified all that had been told of it. The writer has heard several readings by famous conductors, including one by Weingartner, considered by many the greatest Beethoven conductor of the day, but he has never heard the slow movement given with such warmth. It was an exhibition of the subjective treatment of strict form such as one rarely hears. the transformation through emotional temperament, human personality, whatever one chooses to call it, of number into art. The whole symphony was supremely well done, but it was in this movement that Dr. Muck displayed his individual quality most distinctly. He was always a great conductor. The "Meistersinger" prelude was tremendous—full of variety of rhythm and color, and the dynamic control was nothing less than architectural. The accompaniment to the concerto was a miracle of sympathy and supporting strength, and done, it is said, after one rehearsal and one public performance.

The soloist, Timothee Adamowski, was the soloist at the first concert many years ago. Since then he has played in Rochester at two or three private musicales, but has not been publicly heard until last night. His reputation, both as a solo and ensemble player, is now national, and he has been for many years one of the most honored members of this superb band. He played last night the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor, a charming work, and he played with captivating brilliancy and verve and compelling beauty of tone. He was recalled half a dozen times to acknowledge the plaudits of his audience.

As to the orchestra itself—what is there to say? It is such perfect euphony as seems extra-mundane. It is a benediction of harmony that is unequaled in these times. Dr. Muck unhesitatingly says that it is the most accomplished and perfect orchestral organization in the world today. He is surely a great authority and one may accept his word. It only remains to pray devoutly for the annual beatification of a Boston Symphony concert.

Paper Post
City New York
Date JAN 28 1907 State NY

The following news items from Boston are official.

G. A. Ellis of Boston, is looking forward to a very busy season in 1907-1908. As manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Quartet, and the Longy Club, which give, all told, a rough total of 175 concerts in a season, he has enough to keep most men busy. The orchestra will make another week's trip to the Middle West in January, 1908, and the quartet will probably go west in the autumn. He is also the manager of Madame Melba, Paderewski, and Madame Samaroff. Madame Melba is now planning a long concert tour which will embrace about forty cities, and mean the whole of the season in America. This is being booked now. Paderewski comes to America in October, to give in the neighborhood of one hundred concerts. His tour will begin at the end of October and run into May. A goodly portion of these concerts are already booked. Madame Samaroff, who will have given about seventy concerts by the end of this season will give about the same number next year. She plans some concerts in England and the Continent next spring and autumn, but will begin her third American tournée in November.

Despite the printed reports that Dr. Muck has been reëngaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract for six years which goes into effect next fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is unfortunately very doubtful that this favor will be granted and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the very difficult task of replacing him next season.

Paper Star
City Cincinnati
Date JAN 28 1907 State O

Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra

—Copyright Portrait by Garo.

Much interest attaches to the coming to Cincinnati of Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he conducts. Dr. Muck is one of the foremost musicians of the day and his orchestra one of the most genuine

[129]

Paper Herald
City Rochester
Date State N.Y.

THEATERS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Be Heard at the Lyceum This Evening.

A fact most complimentary to Rochester's musical discrimination is evidenced in the excellent sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concert at the Lyceum to-night. That this most famous body of instrumental players may come to Rochester without financial loss is gratifying and the more so in this case on account of this being the only city in the state in which the orchestra will play this season outside of New York City. The concert this evening will begin at 8.15 o'clock.

There are said to be over twenty big musical hits composed by Julian Edwards in the comic opera, "The Girl and the Governor," which Jefferson De Angelis presents at the Lyceum Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Among them are "The Serenade," "Chords Like These," "I Am So Fair," "That is the Kind of Wily Savage That I Am," "I Have a Very Nasty Temper," "Wouldn't It Puzzle You," "The Land of the Free," "The Amorous Pigeon," "When a Maiden won't," and "Have You Ever Heard It Told That Way Before."

At the Lyceum Tuesday and Wednesday, Miss Emma Carus will present the new musical comedy, "Too Near Home." Miss Carus has recently had a successful run at the Walnut Street Theater, Philadelphia. There is a large supporting company and the scenery, costumes and other effects are said to be upon a scale of unusual splendor.

B. E. Forrester's comedy, "Bankers and Brokers," introducing the comedians Yorke and Adams, opens a three day engagement at the National Theater with two performances to-day. The entertainment combines mirth and music.

One of the many features to be presented by John W. Vogel's Minstrels, which appear at the National Theater the last half of this week, is a dancing number entitled, "The Great Event." The scene is laid at the famous Sheepshead Bay race course.

The following will comprise the bill of vaudeville to be presented at Cook Opera House this week: John T. Kelly and Company in "A Game of Con"; Clarice Vance, a Southern girl, singing coon songs: "The Sunny South," ten darkies in a plantation jubilee; Maxmillian, violinist; The Franciscos, travesty conjurers; Rosaire and Doretto, comedy acrobats; Elmer Tenley, monologist; Mabel Sinclair, woman ventriloquist, and moving pictures.

The Behman Company including Frank D. Bryan's "Congress of American Girls," will be the attraction at the Corinthian Theater this week.

Monday is the hardest day in the week for the Baker Theater Stock Company. The players report to Stage Manager Richard Baker at 10 a. m., rehearse until 1.30 p. m., play a matinee at 2.15, which lasts until about 5.30 o'clock and return for the night performance at 8.15. But to-day they have even more than that to do. Besides the regular rehearsal, special rehearsals of the specialties are held for to-day's first performance of "How Baxter Butted In," in which the players will be called upon to sing and dance as well as act.

Rochester Herald Jany 28. Feby 5. 1907.

IN THE THEATERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gave Great Concert.

LARGE AUDIENCE AT LYCEUM

Orchestra's Visit Was Made a Financial as Well as Artistic Success—New Attractions at Other Houses.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the third time in Rochester last evening at the Lyceum Theater. The first concert was several years over a decade ago, and Timothee Adamowski was the soloist. Then there was a dreary waste of years without it. The second concert took place last year at the Baker Theater, when a splendid and enthusiastic audience paid it tribute. The third concert was the joyous occasion at the Lyceum last night when one of the largest and most fashionable audiences of the season gathered to listen to what is very likely the most wonderful orchestral organization in the world today. It was an event long to be remembered—a satisfying programme, as nearly perfect a performance as lies within the range of human possibilities, an extraordinary exhibition of virtuoso conducting on the part of the leader, one of the most distinguished directors of our time, and a brilliant and exhilarating solo number. What more can the heart desire? The audience seemed to ask little more—they know that the tradition of the orchestra forbids encores—but they were convincing by lavish and prolonged applause of their delight.

It is gratifying to observe the attitude of Rochester music-lovers toward such performances as last night's. It is a pleasure to see them turn out in such numbers as to make these important concerts financially successful and it is also a pleasure to see them so warmly appreciative and enthusiastic toward the performance itself. Local culture appears to good advantage when the occasion is time-honored and of established repute. It now remains for it to inform itself concerning current successes and not allow such affairs to pass unheeded.

Rochester had its first taste of the prima donna conductor last night. For several years conductors have been the idols of concert-goers in Europe and they have been feted and adulated as the prima donna was of old. Ernst Van Dyck who is witty, although he is a tenor, once remarked that the old school of Italian opera was dying out and with it the old-fashioned prima donna was disappearing. "In fact," he said, "I suppose one may safely say that Jean de Reske is the last of the great prima donnas." Van Dyck did not foresee the present furore over conductors. It has raged over the European music centers and the Philharmonic Society of New York with its two seasons of "star" conductors spread the infection to America. During those two years the public was taught to go to concerts to hear Safonoff or Weingartner or Colonne or Henry Wood conduct as they had hitherto hastened only to hear Melba sing or Paderewski play. It was assuredly a perversion of taste and probably an unhealthy influence, but it has had the effect of giving America the benefit of the presence for more or less protracted periods of two celebrated conductors. They are Safonoff, who will conduct the Philharmonic for three years, and Dr. Muck, who will conduct the Boston Symphony for the present season—at any rate. Rochester felt the effect of this tendency in musical affairs for the first time last night.

Dr. Muck has been a famous man in Europe for many years. He is best known as an operatic conductor and has been for some time first conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin and a regular participant in the Bayreuth festivals. His first appearances in this country aroused very little enthusiasm. He was recognized as a man of superb command of the technique of conducting, but there seemed to be a lack of color and temperament; this probably because audiences were spoiled by the sensational efforts of so-called "star" conductors to startle their auditors at no matter what spectacular cost. But Dr. Muck has slowly achieved a most remarkable success both in Boston and New York and success of the most solid and healthy kind. His programmes have avoided the showy, pyrotechnic repertory and have presented works which had legitimate reason for their being and his concerts have been a climax of triumphs for his musicianship. He has conquered most conclusively in such works as the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and the First of Brahms, two of the most absolute and uncompromising things in music. The critics and the public have both risen to his reading of the Seventh Symphony and proclaimed him a great man and it was a most happy choice for the Rochester programme.

The performance last night justified all that had been told of it. The writer has heard several readings by famous conductors, including one by Weingartner, considered by many the greatest Beethoven conductor of the day, but he has never heard the slow movement given with such warmth. It was an exhibition of the subjective treatment of strict form such as one rarely hears, the transformation through emotional temperament, human personality, whatever one chooses to call it, of number into art. The whole symphony was supremely well done, but it was in this movement that Dr. Muck displayed his individual quality most distinctly. He was always a great conductor. The "Meistersinger" prelude was tremendous—full of variety of rhythm and color, and the dynamic control was nothing less than architectural. The accompaniment to the concerto was a miracle of sympathy and supporting strength, and done, it is said, after one rehearsal and one public performance.

The soloist, Timothee Adamowski, was the soloist at the first concert many years ago. Since then he has played in Rochester at two or three private musicales, but has not been publicly heard until last night. His reputation, both as a solo and ensemble player, is now national, and he has been for many years one of the most honored members of this superb band. He played last night the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor, a charming work, and he played with captivating brilliancy and verve and compelling beauty of tone. He was recalled half a dozen times to acknowledge the plaudits of his audience.

As to the orchestra itself—what is there to say? It is such perfect euphony as seems extra-mundane. It is a benediction of harmony that is unequaled in these times. Dr. Muck unhesitatingly says that it is the most accomplished and perfect orchestral organization in the world today. He is surely a great authority and one may accept his word. It only remains to pray devoutly for the annual beatification of a Boston Symphony concert.

Paper Press Post
City New York
Date State N Y

Dr. Muck, Paderewski, and Others.

The following news items from Boston are official.

C. A. Ellis of Boston, is looking forward to a very busy season in 1907-1908. As manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Quartet, and the Longy Club, which give, all told, a rough total of 175 concerts in a season, he has enough to keep most men busy. The orchestra will make another week's trip to the Middle West in January, 1908, and the quartet will probably go west in the autumn. He is also the manager of Madame Melba, Paderewski, and Madame Samaroff. Madame Melba is now planning a long concert tour which will embrace about forty cities, and mean the whole of the season in America. This is being booked now. Paderewski comes to America in October, to give in the neighborhood of one hundred concerts. His tour will begin at the end of October and run into May. A goodly portion of these concerts are already booked. Madame Samaroff, who will have given about seventy concerts by the end of this season will give about the same number next year. She plans some concerts in England and the Continent next spring and autumn, but will begin her third American tournée in November.

Despite the printed reports that Dr. Muck has been reëngaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract for six years which goes into effect next fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is unfortunately very doubtful that this favor will be granted and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the very difficult task of replacing him next season.

Paper Star
City Cincinnati
Date JAN 28 1907 State O

Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra

—Copyright Portrait by Garo.

Much interest attaches to the coming to Cincinnati of Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he conducts. Dr. Muck is one of the foremost conductors of his day and his orchestra one of the most prominent exponents of this branch of music.

[129]

Dienstag, 29. Januar 1907

Theater und Musik.

Lyceum. — Das Boston Symphonie - Orchester unter Dr. Carl Muck. — Selten wohl sah das Lyceum - Theater ein enthusiastischeres, dabei elegantes Publikum wie gestern Abend; ein Publikum, das nicht gekommen war, um gesehen zu werden, sondern um zu hören und selbst zu sehen. Klingt es nicht eigenthümlich, wenn man in ein Concert geht, um zu „sehen", wo doch keine berühmte Sängerin und Schönheit in glänzender Toilette auf der Bühne erschien? Nein, gewiß nicht, denn die musikalischen Leiter des Boston Symphonie - Orchester muß man auch sehen, und nie wohl hat Rochester eine interessantere Persönlichkeit am Dirigentenpulte gesehen, als gestern Abend, da das Boston Symphonie - Orchester zum dritten Mal seit seiner 26-jährigen Existenz hier seine Künstlerschaft bethätigte: Hof - Kapellmeister Dr. Carl Muck!

Wer Dr. Muck einmal gesehen, wird ihn, seine Persönlichkeit, wohl nie wieder vergessen; und doch wird ihn niemand für einen Orchester- oder Opern - Dirigenten halten; er sieht so ganz anders als seine Kollegen Nikisch, Weingartner, Safanoff, Fuchs, Hans Richter und Mahler aus. Ein markanter Kopf! Der Herr Hof - Kapellmeister werden verzeihen, und alle Leser desgleichen, aber im ersten Moment glaubt man einen modernen „Franz Moore" vor sich zu sehen; wir hörten auch „Peter Pan" nennen, doch eine elegante Erscheinung, ganz der „Hof" - Kapellmeister. Sein Dirigieren bedarf einer Studie für sich: ruhig, doch mit jeder Faser seiner Gelenke, kaum merklichen Fingerbewegungen dirigiert er erste und zweite Violinen, und glaubt fast die elektrischen Funken aus seiner Persönlichkeit auf jeden dieser Künstler - Genossenschaft überspringen zu sehen. Man sollte annehmen, daß irgend ein Orchester unter Dr. Muck's Leitung Brillantes leisten müßte, und doch können wir uns diesen Fürsten seines Faches nur an der Spitze einer Orchester-Organisation denken, wie es die Bostoner Meister sind, die uns gestern einen wahrhaft königlichen Ohrenschmaus bereitet.

Dr. Muck's Individualität kennzeichnete sich in grandioser Weise in den so conträren Werken, welche man für das Rochester Concert zur Aufführung wählte: „Meistersinger", Präludium von Richard Wagner, und Ludwig von Beethoven's „Siebente". Und wenn man von ihm und seiner Leitung spricht, kann man die Leistungen des Orchesters nicht individuell besprechen. Das eine geht im anderen auf. Dieser Rhythmus, dieses Farbenspiel, das sammtweiche Durchdringenlassen des Motivs waren herrlich. Und erst Meister Beethoven. Man nennt Weingartner den besten Beethoven - Interpreten, und glaubt dies bis man Muck gehört! Kann man sich etwas Vollkommeneres vorstellen, als die gestrige Durchführung der 7. Symphonie, und ganz besonders des zweiten Satzes? Da wird die Sprache arm, man kann die Worte nicht finden, um das Gefühl auszudrücken, das den Zuhörer bei dieser Interpretation überkommt. Mehr wie je kommt uns jener wahre Ausspruch in's Gedächtniß, „was die Sprache nicht auszudrücken vermag, die Musik kann's". Und ein weiteres Meisterstück bot Dr. Muck in der Begleitung des Solisten des Abends, Timothe Adamowski, 2. Concertmeisters des Boston Symphonie. Kann es jemand noch überraschen, von einem Orchester solche Darbietungen zu hören, wenn es Virtuosen von dem Range eines Adamowski zu seinen Mitgliedern zählt. Der Künstler wählt Saint - Saens' Concert in B Moll, No. 3, wohl weil ihm dieser Komponist neben Entwickelung [illegible]

Gibt es noch ein weiteres Wort der Bewunderung? Kann man über die Leistungen der Bostoner Künstler-Organisation und ihren genialen gegenwärtigen Dirigenten noch mehr sagen, oder gibt es zu kritisieren? Nein.

Wohl aber können wir unseren Lesern, die gleich uns den Genuß des gestrigen Concerts hatten, die bedauerliche Mittheilung machen, daß Dr. Muck während des ganzen Abends unter ärztlicher Behandlung stand, und vor und nach dem Concert das Bett hüten mußte. Es gehörte jedenfalls eine ordentliche Portion Willenskraft dazu, durch nahezu zwei Stunden in heftigem Fieber am Dirigentenpult zu stehen, ohne daß das Publikum auch nur irgend etwas merkt. Der Geschäftsleiter des Boston Symphonie - Orchesters, Herr F. R. Comee, von Boston, versicherte uns, daß Herr Dr. Muck nach dem Concert per Wagen in's Hotel gebracht wurde. Dr. Muck hat heute die Weiterreise nach Cleveland angetreten, wo heute Abend ein Concert stattfindet.

Daß Rochester die Ehre zu würdigen wußte, als eine der wenigen Städte des Landes diesen großartigen Genusses theilhaftig zu werden, hat hoffentlich den Effekt, daß das Boston - Symphonie - Orchester wenigstens seine jährliche Besuche in unserer Stadt in seinem regelmäßigen Reise - Concert - Programm aufnehme; es kann jederzeit, wie bisher bewiesen, auf ein volles Haus und herzlichen Empfang rechnen.

Unsererseits, das heißt des musikalischen Publikums Dank gebührt aber auch in erster Linie Herrn Fuller Jones, durch dessen eifriges Bemühen Rochester diese kaum zu vergessende

Paper Times
City Indianapolis
Date JAN 29 1907 State Ind.

A GREAT ORCHESTRA.

Indianapolis is to have the privilege this week of hearing the greatest orchestra in America, directed by one of the five great conductors of the world. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be at English's Friday evening. This is a large company of musicians, each one of whom is a specially selected player of his instrument, who might at any time be called upon to be a soloist, when he would win attention as a real virtuoso. Many of the men, indeed, have world-wide reputations as soloists. The orchestra is composed of men of many nations and it has taken careful inquiry in the world's musical centers and even in out-of-the-way places to bring this orchestra together at Boston.

Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, by special permission of the Emperor of Germany, was allowed a year's absence to come to America and direct this orchestra. In Germany he is one of the greatest conductors, and it was only after many trials that he could obtain leave of absence for a single year. His readings of the different scores that the orchestra plays this season have been commended by Boston's ablest critics as intellectual and noble — just interpretations of the masters that composed them.

The program selected for the Indianapolis concert embraces the Brahms First Symphony, the Richard Strauss "Don Juan," and the Wagner prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which are rich in musical expression of great themes. The announcement of the concert has created so wide an interest, that the audience for Friday evening promises to represent every part of the State. Indianapolis is one of the few cities away from the Eastern coast to have the orchestra, and if this concert has sufficient patronage, it will be brought here each season.

Paper Express
City Rochester
Date JAN 29 1907 State N. Y.

IN THE THEATERS.

THE LYCEUM.

Boston Symphony.

The Kaiser has gone up in popular esteem. His favorite conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, was here last night as generalissimo of the Boston Symphony and the emperor now shines in reflected musical glory. Truly the imperial taste will bear being put to the test, if Dr. Karl Muck is a sample of it; for he is a director to evoke enthusiasm—not so much the noisy plaudits of the unthinking multitude—though he can command these suffrages also, but probably disdains them,—something higher than that, the enthusiasm of cultivated musicians. There are three numbers on the programme submitted by the pilgrims from Boston, and each one was performed in such a way as to give the sincerest delight. It would be churlish to talk in cold, carefully cut phrases of such a masterly performance as that of the "Meistersinger" overture; sheer ingratitude to withhold the tribute of heartfelt gratitude for that truly inspiring reading of the Seventh Symphony; pedantry to cavil at the Saint Saens' concerto, for the performance dignified it beyond its intrinsic worth—and that is high, for here at least the Frenchman is serenely happy among his hundred and one musical idioms.

Strangers from other countries have been so accustomed in the past to talk about American music and musicians in a tone of condescension, as though the United States had not completely emerged from the colonial habit of mind, that many good people have accepted this foreign patronage as though it were uniformly based on fact. Dr. Karl Muck, if he chose to do so, could enlighten them. He could tell them that never in his life has he had a finer body of musicians under his baton than the gentlemen from Boston. The most musical countries of the Old World have sent their best to make an American holiday. There are no reed players to equal those who graduate from the Conservatory of Paris. But it is not in the Paris opera or the Parisian orchestras that you will find the pick of these men. It is in the Boston Symphony. And so it is with that matchless body of strings; the brass choir and the battery. Over this wonderful company of musicians Dr. Karl Muck is head and chief and he is commander worthy of his army. Philip Hale suggested that America ought to kidnap him, seeing that gold is powerless to tempt him. A single year in this country and he must return to his august master, who will willingly spare us Strauss and not boggle overmuch over Reger, but clings to Karl Muck as the chiefest musical treasure of his empire. Perhaps it is a good discipline to learn that American gold cannot buy everything. A great man is a rarer thing and a more precious than a mighty battleship or a New York skyscraper. The country which can produce the largest number of men of genius, rulers each in their own way, is the great nation, not the country which makes the most money. So the Emperor William is well advised to hold fast to Karl Muck; for what the Kaiser is over the bodies of his millions of subjects, that Karl Muck is over their musical souls. Each is a king in his own right; but, if the question of divine right be mooted, it is not the emperor who may justly claim that proud distinction; it is the musician.

What do we look for in a conductor—authority, personality, the ability to mold men to his liking. These things Karl Muck can do in sovereign fashion. The man vibrates with nervous energy, yet there is nothing neurotic or hysterical about him. He raises his men to the empyrean of tone by a sudden, swift uplifting of the arms, nothing violent or ungraceful, but a movement which seems to transform the soul of the man into action and make his volition a compelling force. It was a joy to watch the "Meistersinger" overture unfold like a rich tonal tapestry. While Dr. Muck never made himself aggressively present, yet he was all the time the evident and unmistakable architect of that marvelous fabric of sound. Probably nobody is less conscious of the fact than Dr. Muck himself; but his gestures, movements, inclinations of the head, and, above all, the lightnings of his eyes, resolve themselves into a language of musical expression which can be read as easily as the directions on a score and are infinitely more explicit. In appearance the man is a quiet student, small of stature—a sort of "Little Corporal" of the orchestra. His face is alert with intelligence. Following the score with an almost studious air, he beats the tempo as carefully as though he were drilling a body of amateurs and not the finest body of instrumentalists in the world. There is never any doubt about his beat; a glance will show the musician just what part of the measure has been reached. Yet, though the man seems immersed in the score, he indicates every important entry in a manner that cannot be misunderstood [illegible]

[illegible] once or twice in the Symphony he glanced towards the second violins with a smile and a slightly deprecating raising of the right hand, as though he said, "You are there, my children; I heard you; but not too much zeal." They say the men worship this slight, intense, masterful man. There need be no wonder at that. Men love a master, a man who, through some innate God-given power, is born to rule. That is the kind of man Karl Muck is. While his beat is precise, there is nothing angular, or hard about it. It is the outward sign of an inward musical grace. When the lightnings are in the air, as for example in that wonderful last movement of the Beethoven Symphony, then the baton became imperious, exacting, stern, but, at the same moment vibrant, inspiring, elevating. At times humor would diffuse from this magical wand. Karl Muck is no dryasdust interpreter of the great masters. Beethoven is a living brother to him and he led the Symphony as though it had been the work of someone dear to him. It is always a source of gladness to hear a Beethoven symphony; it is like reading the "Antigone" for the twentieth time; not contempt but devotion is born of familiarity. They used to say that seeing Edmund Keen act Shakespeare was like reading the poet by flashes of lightning. Hearing the Seventh symphony with Karl Muck conducting is like contemplating the composer in the light of a golden friendship. Rochester people will never forget the performance of that divine "Allegretto—" that movement which seems to open the door of sanctities so reverend that, like the cherubim in the divine presence, we must veil our eyes.

Last night's concert will remain in the minds of those who were privileged to be present as perhaps the most perfect concert Rochester has ever heard. It would be a mistake to go into details; for all was so nearly perfect; yet it was no pedantical perfection. Between the director and his forces there were subtle flashes of quiet fun—a question of a troublesome passage or a repeat and, when one of the reeds piped in a bar ahead of time, a smile pervaded the whole orchestral regiment. Much might be said about the Saint Saens concerto in B minor, in which Timothee Adamowski was the soloist. It was a beautiful performance. To say more than that is supererogation.

It is a matter of great satisfaction that the theater was crowded. The probable consequence of this practical recognition of what is good in music will be further visits from the Bostonians. May they come, and come soon.

Rochester Union and Advertiser
January 29, 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Remarkable Concert at Lyceum.

Musical Comedy at the National, and Vaudeville Bill at Cook Opera House.

"How Baxter Butted In" Stock Company Offering at Baker—Burlesque at Corinthian.

No richer treat has ever been spread for Rochester music lovers than that afforded last night at the Lyceum, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra, before a very large, representative and demonstratively enthusiastic audience, gave a concert that from every viewpoint was just about the most remarkable musical event in local annals. Praise of the orchestra is almost superfluous, for the organization practically stands admitted the most perfect of its kind, but it were unjust to dismiss such a performance as last night's without at least stating that an admirable programme was given as nearly perfect as possible a performance further made memorable by the conducting of Dr. Carl Muck. Wagner and Beethoven were the composers represented by the orchestral number, while the solo offering of Timothee Adamowski, violinist, Saint-Saens No. 3, 61, was a wonderful display of brilliancy and art. No fewer than six recalls were given the performer, but there was no deviation from the no-encore rule of the organization.

All in all last night's concert was a musical feast to be long remembered by all so fortunate as to attend and to inspire sincere hopes that Rochester may again be favored with a visit by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[130]

(Tägliche Ausgabe).
Herausgegeben von der
Rochester Herald Publishing Co.
Dienstag, 29. Januar 1907.

Theater und Musik.

Lyceum. — Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Dr. Carl Muck. — Selten wohl sah das Lyceum-Theater ein enthusiastischeres, dabei elegantes Publikum wie gestern Abend; ein Publikum, das nicht gekommen war, um gesehen zu werden, sondern um zu hören und selbst zu sehen. Klingt es nicht eigenthümlich, wenn man in ein Concert geht, um zu „sehen", wo doch keine berühmte Sängerin und Schönheit in glänzender Toilette auf der Bühne erschien? Nein, gewiß nicht, denn die musikalischen Leiter des Boston Symphonie-Orchester muß man auch sehen, und nie wohl hat Rochester eine interessantere Persönlichkeit am Dirigentenpulte gesehen, als gestern Abend, da das Boston Symphonie-Orchester zum dritten Mal seit seiner 26-jährigen Existenz hier seine Künstlerschaft bethätigte: Hof-Kepellmeister Dr. Carl Muck!

Wer Dr. Muck einmal gesehen, wird ihn, seine Persönlichkeit, wohl nie wieder vergessen; und doch wird ihn niemand für einen Orchester- oder Opern-Dirigenten halten; er sieht so ganz anders als seine Kollegen Nikisch, Weingartner, Safanoff, Fuchs, Hans Richter und Mahler aus. Ein markanter Kopf! Der Herr Hof-Kapellmeister werden verzeihen, und alle Leser desgleichen, aber im ersten Moment glaubt man einen modernen „Franz Moore" vor sich zu sehen; wir hörten auch „Peter Pan" nennen, doch eine elegante Erscheinung, ganz der „Hof"-Kapellmeister. Sein Dirigieren bedarf einer Studie für sich: ruhig, doch mit jeder Faser seiner Gelenke, kaum merklichen Fingerbewegungen dirigiert er erste und zweite Violinen, und glaubt fast die elektrischen Funken aus seiner Persönlichkeit auf jeden dieser Künstler-Genossenschaft überspringen zu sehen. Man sollte annehmen, daß irgend ein Orchester unter Dr. Muck's Leitung Brillantes leisten müßte, und doch können wir uns diesen Fürsten seines Faches nur an der Spitze einer Orchester-Organisation denken, wie es die Bostoner Meister sind, die uns gestern einen wahrhaft königlichen Ohrenschmaus bereitet.

Dr. Muck's Individualität kennzeichnete sich in grandioser Weise in den so conträren Werken, welche man für das Rochester Concert zur Aufführung wählte: „Meistersinger", Präludium von Richard Wagner, und Ludwig von Beethoven's „Siebente". Und wenn man von ihm und seiner Leitung spricht, kann man die Leistungen des Orchesters nicht individuell besprechen. Das eine geht im anderen auf. Dieser Rhythmus, dieses Farbenspiel, das sammtweiche Durchdringenlassen des Motivs waren herrlich. Und erst Meister Beethoven. Man nennt Weingartner den besten Beethoven-Interpreten, und glaubt dies bis man Muck gehört! Kann man sich etwas Vollkommeneres vorstellen, als die gestrige Durchführung der 7. Symphonie, und ganz besonders des zweiten Satzes? Da wird die Sprache arm, man kann die Worte nicht finden, um dasGefühl auszudrücken, das den Zuhörer bei dieser Interpretation überkommt. Mehr wie je kommt uns jener wahre Ausspruch in's Gedächtniß, „was die Sprache nicht auszudrücken vermag, die Musik kann's". Und ein weiteres Meisterstück bot Dr. Muck in der Begleitung des Solisten des Abends, Timothe Adamowski, 2. Concertmeisters des Boston Symphonie. Kann es jemand noch überraschen, von einem Orchester solche Darbietungen zu hören, wenn es Virtuosen von dem Range eines Adamowski zu seinen Mitgliedern zählt. Der Künstler wählt Saint-Saens' Concert in B Moll, No. 3, wohl weil ihm dieser Komponist neben Entwickelung technischer Fähigkeiten alle Gelegenheit zur Entfaltung eines großen, prächtig-warmen Tones gibt; und Herr Adamowski that gut daran. Seine geradezu grandiose Tonfülle, seine [illegible] die das Haus füllende Zuhörerschaar enthusiasmierend, und obschon der Künstler vielleicht ein halbes Dutzend mal vor die Rampe gerufen wurde, es erfolgte keine Zugabe, und wir können diese Consequenz nur gerechtfertigt finden; so gerne wir ja auch noch mehr gehört hätten. Wie schon erwähnt, war auch die orchestrielle Begleitung eine wundervolle.

Gibt es noch ein weiteres Wort der Bewunderung? Kann man über die Leistungen der Bostoner Künstler-Organisation und ihren genialen gegenwärtigen Dirigenten noch mehr sagen, oder gibt es zu kritisieren? Nein.

Wohl aber können wir unseren Lesern, die gleich uns den Genuß des gestrigen Concerts hatten, die bedauerliche Mittheilung machen, daß Dr. Muck während des ganzen Abends unter ärztlicher Behandlung stand, und vor und nach dem Concert das Bett hüten mußte. Es gehörte jedenfalls eine ordentliche Portion Willenskraft dazu, durch nahezu zwei Stunden in heftigem Fieber am Dirigentenpult zu stehen, ohne daß das Publikum auch nur irgend etwas merkt. Der Geschäftsleiter des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, Herr F. R. Comee, von Boston, versicherte uns, daß Herr Dr. Muck nach dem Concert per Wagen in's Hotel gebracht wurde. Dr. Muck hat heute die Weiterreise nach Cleveland angetreten, wo heute Abend ein Concert stattfindet.

Daß Rochester die Ehre zu würdigen wußte, als eine der wenigen Städte des Landes dieses großartigen Genusses theilhaftig zu werden, hat hoffentlich den Effekt, daß das Boston-Symphonie-Orchester wenigstens seine jährliche Besuche in unserer Stadt in seinem regelmäßigen Reise-Concert-Programm aufnehme; es kann jederzeit, wie bisher bewiesen, auf ein volles Haus und herzlichen Empfang rechnen.

Unsererseits, das heißt des musikalischen Publikums Dank gebührt aber auch in erster Linie Herrn Furlong, durch dessen eifriges Bemühen Rochester dieser kaum zu vergessende

Paper Herald
City Indianapolis
Date State Ind.
JAN 2 1907

A GREAT ORCHESTRA.

Indianapolis is to have the privilege this week of hearing the greatest orchestra in America, directed by one of the five great conductors of the world. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be at English's Friday evening. This is a large company of musicians, each one of whom is a specially selected player of his instrument, who might at any time be called upon to be a soloist, when he would win attention as a real virtuoso. Many of the men, indeed, have world-wide reputations as soloists. The orchestra is composed of men of many nations and it has taken careful inquiry in the world's musical centers and even in out-of-the-way places to bring this orchestra together at Boston.

Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, by special permission of the Emperor of Germany, was allowed a year's absence to come to America and direct this orchestra. In Germany he is one of the greatest conductors, and it was only after many trials that he could obtain leave of absence for a single year. His readings of the different scores that the orchestra plays this season have been commended by Boston's ablest critics as intellectual and noble—just interpretations of the masters that composed them.

The program selected for the Indianapolis concert embraces the Brahms First Symphony, the Richard Strauss "Don Juan," and the Wagner prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which are rich in musical expression of great themes. The announcement of the concert has created so wide an interest, that the audience for Friday evening promises to represent every part of the State. Indianapolis is one of the few cities away from the Eastern coast to have the orchestra, and if this concert has sufficient patronage, it will be brought here each season.

Paper Express
City Rochester
Date State N. Y.
JAN 29 1907

IN THE THEATERS.

THE LYCEUM.

Boston Symphony.

The Kaiser has gone up in popular esteem. His favorite conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, was here last night as generalissimo of the Boston Symphony and the emperor now shines in reflected musical glory. Truly the imperial taste will bear being put to the test, if Dr. Karl Muck is a sample of it; for he is a director to evoke enthusiasm—not so much the noisy plaudits of the unthinking multitude—though he can command these suffrages also, but probably disdains them,—something higher than that, the enthusiasm of cultivated musicians. There are three numbers on the programme submitted by the pilgrims from Boston, and each one was performed in such a way as to give the sincerest delight. It would be churlish to talk in cold, carefully cut phrases of such a masterly performance as that of the "Meistersinger" overture; sheer ingratitude to withhold the tribute of heartfelt gratitude for that truly inspiring reading of the Seventh Symphony; pedantry to cavil at the Saint Saens' concerto, for the performance dignified it beyond its intrinsic worth—and that is high, for here at least the Frenchman is serenely happy among his hundred and one musical idioms.

Strangers from other countries have been so accustomed in the past to talk about American music and musicians in a tone of condescension, as though the United States had not completely emerged from the colonial habit of mind, that many good people have accepted this foreign patronage as though it were uniformly based on fact. Dr. Karl Muck, if he chose to do so, could enlighten them. He could tell them that never in his life has he had a finer body of musicians under his baton than the gentlemen from Boston. The most musical countries of the Old World have sent their best to make an American holiday. There are no reed players to equal those who graduate from the Conservatory of Paris. But it is not in the Paris opera or the Parisian orchestras that you will find the pick of these men. It is in the Boston Symphony. And so it is with that matchless body of strings; the brass choir and the battery. Over this wonderful company of musicians Dr. Karl Muck is head and chief and he is commander worthy of his army. Philip Hale suggested that America ought to kidnap him, seeing that gold is powerless to tempt him. A single year in this country and he must return to his august master, who will willingly spare us Strauss and not boggle overmuch over Reger, but clings to Karl Muck as the chiefest musical treasure of his empire. Perhaps it is a good discipline to learn that American gold cannot buy everything. A great man is a rarer thing and a more precious than a mighty battleship or a New York skyscraper. The country which can produce the largest number of men of genius, rulers each in their own way, is the great nation, not the country which makes the most money. So the Emperor William is well advised to hold fast to Karl Muck; for what the Kaiser is over the bodies of his millions of subjects, that Karl Muck is over their musical souls. Each is a king in his own right; but, if the question of divine right be mooted, it is not the emperor who may justly claim that proud distinction; it is the musician.

What do we look for in a conductor—authority, personality, the ability to mold men to his liking. These things Karl Muck can do in sovereign fashion. The man vibrates with nervous energy, yet there is nothing neurotic or hysterical about him. He raises his men to the empyrean of tone by a sudden, swift uplifting of the arms, nothing violent or ungraceful, but a movement which seems to transform the soul of the man into action and make his volition a compelling force. It was a joy to watch the "Meistersinger" overture unfold like a rich tonal tapestry. While Dr. Muck never made himself aggressively present, yet he was all the time the evident and unmistakable architect of that marvellous fabric of sound. Probably nobody is less conscious of the fact than Dr. Muck himself; but his gestures, movements, inclinations of the head, and, above all, the lightnings of his eyes, resolve themselves into a language of musical expression which can be read as easily as the directions on a score and are infinitely more explicit. In appearance the man is a quiet student, small of stature—a sort of "Little Corporal" of the orchestra. His face is alert with intelligence. Following the score with an almost studious air, he beats the tempo as carefully as though he were drilling a body of amateurs and not the finest body of instrumentalists in the world. There is never any doubt about his beat; a glance will show the musician just what part of the measure has been reached. Yet, though the man seems immersed in the score, he indicates every important entry in a manner that cannot be misunderstood. He turns his head in the direction of the horns and there immediately responds, as by virtue of an incantation, the murmur of softly diffusive sound. Once or twice in the Symphony he glanced towards the second violins with a smile and a slightly deprecating raising of the right hand, as though he said, "You are there, my children; I heard you; but not too much zeal." They say the men worship this slight, intense, masterful man. There need be no wonder at that. Men love a master, a man who, through some innate God-given power, is born to rule. That is the kind of man Karl Muck is. While his beat is precise, there is nothing angular, or hard about it. It is the outward sign of an inward musical grace. When the lightnings are in the air, as for example in that wonderful last movement of the Beethoven Symphony, then the baton became imperious, exacting, stern, but, at the same moment vibrant, inspiring, elevating. At times humor would diffuse from this magical wand. Karl Muck is no dryasdust interpreter of the great masters. Beethoven is a living brother to him and he led the Symphony as though it had been the work of someone dear to him. It is always a source of gladness to hear a Beethoven symphony; it is like reading the "Antigone" for the twentieth time; not contempt but devotion is born of familiarity. They used to say that seeing Edmund Keen act Shakespeare was like reading the poet by flashes of lightning. Hearing the Seventh symphony with Karl Muck conducting is like contemplating the composer in the light of a golden friendship. Rochester people will never forget the performance of that divine "Allegretto—" that movement which seems to open the door of sanctities so reverend that, like the cherubim in the divine presence, we must veil our eyes.

Last night's concert will remain in the minds of those who were privileged to be present as perhaps the most perfect concert Rochester has ever heard. It would be a mistake to go into details; for all was so nearly perfect; yet it was no pedantical perfection. Between the director and his forces there were subtle flashes of quiet fun—a question of a troublesome passage or a repeat and, when one of the reeds piped in a bar ahead of time, a smile pervaded the whole orchestral regiment. Much might be said about the Saint Saens concerto in B minor, in which Timothee Adamowski was the soloist. It was a beautiful performance. To say more than that is supererogation.

It is a matter of great satisfaction that the theater was crowded. The probable consequence of this practical recognition of what is good in music will be further visits from the Bostonians. May they come, and come soon.

Rochester Union and Advertiser
Jany 29, 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Remarkable Concert at Lyceum.

Musical Comedy at the National, and Vaudeville Bill at Cook Opera House.

"How Baxter Butted In" Stock Company Offering at Baker—Burlesque at Corinthian.

No richer treat has ever been spread for Rochester music lovers than that afforded last night at the Lyceum, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra, before a very large, representative and demonstratively enthusiastic audience, gave a concert that from every viewpoint was just about the most remarkable musical event in local annals. Praise of the orchestra is almost superfluous, for the organization practically stands admitted the most perfect of its kind, but it were unjust to dismiss such a performance as last night's without at least stating that an admirable programme was given as nearly perfect as possible a performance further made memorable by the conducting of Dr. Carl Muck. Wagner and Beethoven were the composers represented by the orchestral number, while the solo offering of Timothee Adamowski, violinist, Saint-Saens No. 3, 61, was a wonderful display of brilliancy and art. No fewer than six recalls were given the performer, but there was no deviation from the no-encore rule of the organization.

All in all last night's concert was a musical feast to be long remembered by all so fortunate as to attend and to inspire sincere hopes that Rochester may again be favored with a visit by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[130]

Paper Herald
City Rochester New York
Date State N Y
JAN 29 1907

IN THE THEATERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gave Great Concert.

LARGE AUDIENCE AT LYCEUM

Orchestra's Visit Was Made a Financial as Well as Artistic Success—New Attractions at Other Houses.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the third time in Rochester last evening at the Lyceum Theater. The first concert was several years over a decade ago, and Timothee Adamowski was the soloist. Then there was a dreary waste of years without it. The second concert took place last year at the Baker Theater, when a splendid and enthusiastic audience paid it tribute. The third concert was the joyous occasion at the Lyceum last night when one of the largest and most fashionable audiences of the season gathered to listen to what is very likely the most wonderful orchestral organization in the world today. It was an event long to be remembered—a satisfying programme, as near perfect a performance as lies within the range of human possibilities, an extraordinary exhibition of virtuosity acting on the part of the leader, the most distinguished director of the time, and a brilliant and exhilarating number. What more can the public desire? The audience seemed to want more—they know that the traditions of the orchestra forbids encores—but were convincing by lavish and prolonged applause of their delight.

It is gratifying to observe the attitude of Rochester music-lovers toward such performances as last night's. It is a pleasure to see them turn out in such numbers as to make these important concerts financially successful and it is also a pleasure to see them so warmly appreciative and enthusiastic toward the performance itself. Local culture appears to good advantage when the occasion is time-honored and of established repute. It now remains for it to inform itself concerning current successes and not allow such affairs to pass unheeded.

Rochester had its first taste of the prima donna conductor last night. For several years conductors have been the idols of concert-goers in Europe and they have been feted and adulated as the prima donna was of old. Ernst Van Dyck, who is witty, although he is a tenor, once remarked that the old school of Italian opera was dying out and with it the old-fashioned prima donna was disappearing. "In fact," he said, "I suppose one may safely say that Jean de Reske is the last of the great prima donnas." Van Dyck did not foresee the present furore over conductors. It has raged over the European music centers and the Philharmonic Society of New York with its two seasons of "star" conductors spread the infection to America. During those two years the public was taught to go to concerts to hear Safonoff or Weingartner or Colonne or Henry Wood conduct as they had hitherto hastened only to hear Melba sing or Paderewski play. It was assuredly a perversion of taste and probably an unhealthy influence, but it has had the effect of giving America the benefit of the presence for more or less protracted periods of two celebrated conductors. They are Safonoff, who will conduct the Philharmonic for three years, and Dr. Muck, who will conduct the Boston Symphony for the present season—at any rate. Rochester felt the effect of this tendency in musical affairs for the first time last night.

Dr. Muck has been a famous man in Europe for many years. He is best known as an operatic conductor and has been for some time first conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin and a regular participant in the Bayreuth festivals. His first appearances in this country aroused very little enthusiasm. He was recognized as a man of superb command of the technique of conducting, but there seemed to be a lack of color and temperament; this probably because audiences were spoiled by the sensational efforts of so-called "star" conductors to startle their auditors at no matter what spectacular cost. But Dr. Muck has surely achieved a most remarkable success both in Boston and New York and is a success of the most solid and healthy kind. His programmes have avoided the showy, pyrotechnic repertory and have presented works which had legitimate reason for their being and his concerts have been a climax of triumphs for his [illegible] He has conquered most [illegible] in such works as the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and the [illegible] two of the most absorbing things in [illegible] and the public have [illegible]

[illegible] be ready the greatest conductor of the day, but he has never heard the slow movement given with such warmth. It was an exhibition of the subjective treatment of strict form such as one rarely hears. The transformation through emotional temperament, human personality, whatever one chooses to call it, of number into art. The whole symphony was supremely well done, but it was in this movement that Dr. Muck displayed his individual quality most distinctly. He was always a great conductor. The "Meistersinger" prelude was tremendous—full of variety of rhythm and color, and the dynamic control was nothing less than architectural. The accompaniment to the concerto was a miracle of sympathy and supporting strength, and done, it is said, after one rehearsal and one public performance.

The soloist, Timothee Adamowski, was the soloist at the first concert many years ago. Since then he has played in Rochester at two or three private musicales, but has not been publicly heard until last night. His reputation, both as a solo and ensemble player, is now national, and he has been for many years one of the most honored members of this superb band. He played last night the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor, a charming work, and he played with captivating brilliancy and verve and compelling beauty of tone. He was recalled half a dozen times to acknowledge the plaudits of his audience.

As to the orchestra itself—what is there to say? It is such perfect euphony as seems extra-mundane. It is a benediction of harmony that is unequaled in these times. Dr. Muck unhesitatingly says that it is the most accomplished and perfect orchestral organization in the world today. He is surely a great authority and one may accent his word. It only remains to pray devoutly for the annual beatification of a Boston Symphony concert.

Indianapolis News

TUESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1907

A GREAT ORCHESTRA.

Indianapolis is to have the privilege this week of hearing the greatest orchestra in America, directed by one of the five great conductors of the world. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be at English's Friday evening. This is a large company of musicians, each one of whom is a specially selected player of his instrument, who might at any time be called upon to be a soloist, when he would win attention as a real virtuoso. Many of the men, indeed, have world-wide reputations as soloists. The orchestra is composed of men of many nations and it has taken careful inquiry in the world's musical centers and even in out-of-the-way places to bring this orchestra together at Boston.

Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, by special permission of the Emperor of Germany, was allowed a year's absence to come to America and direct this orchestra. In Germany he is one of the greatest conductors, and it was only after many trials that he could obtain leave of absence for a single year. His readings of the different scores that the orchestra plays this season have been commended by Boston's ablest critics as intellectual and noble—just interpretations of the masters that composed them.

The program selected for the Indianapolis concert embraces the Brahms First Symphony, the Richard Strauss "Don Juan," and the Wagner prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which are rich in musical expression of great themes. The announcement of the concert has created so wide an interest, that the audience for Friday evening promises to represent every part of the State. Indianapolis is one of the few cities away from the Eastern coast to have the orchestra, and if this concert has sufficient patronage, it will be brought here each season.

Paper Press
City Detroit
Date State Mich
JAN 30 1907

Features of Symphony Concert.

There are always three features to a concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will appear tomorrow evening at the Light Guard armory—the conductors, the players and the program. The Boston Symphony orchestra has a world-wide reputation, the majority of the musicians being solo players of distinction. Two novelties are announced for the program that is to be rendered in Detroit; one from the pen of the much-discussed Richard Strauss, the other an example of the present school of Ro[illegible] music.

[illegible] TUESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1907

AMUSEMENTS

Lyceum Theater ..... Boston Symphony Orchestra
Baker Theater ..... "How Baxter Butted In"
National Theater ..... "Bankers and Brokers"
Cook Opera House ..... Vaudeville
Corinthian Theater ..... "Congress of American Girls"

At the Lyceum Theater last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance in Rochester since it has come under the directorship of Dr. Karl Muck. A very large audience was present—partly, no doubt, in honor of the new conductor, partly in recognition of the fact that this was one of the few cities selected for a visit by the organization on its present brief tour, but chief of all reasons because a musical treat of great richness is assured whenever this orchestra appears. Three composers were represented on the programme—Wagner, Saint-Saens and Beethoven. The first offering was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." It is recorded of this overture that when it was first performed in Leipsic a little over forty-five years ago, under Wagner's own leadership, the composer met with a discouragingly cold reception from a small audience. Yet the overture was so emphatically accepted by the few present that it was immediately played again. The comments of the critics were astonishingly diverse, some lavishing praise on it and others pronouncing it an unintelligible freak. But "music-drama" was then on trial; the music now accepted was then "the music of the future." and dramatic music detached from the drama was having a hard struggle to force itself on the public favor. The battle was won long ago—in this country with the help of Theodore Thomas—and this "Meistersinger" prelude is now liked, and comprehended in a measure, wherever symphony orchestras exist. It is superfluous to say that it had a superb technical presentation last night, and it is to be added that Dr. Muck's reading was splendidly warm and picturesque, yet without the slightest sacrifice of musical dignity.

The soloist of the evening, Mr. Timothee Adamowski, played the violin concerto No. 3, op. 61, by Saint-Saens. It was an immaculate exemplification of the art of violin playing. Saint-Saens is eminently an exponent of beauty in music. This concerto is affluent in melody, in thematic elaboration, in the magic of contrapuntal invention and in orchestral coloring of the accompaniment. It is hard enough, in all conscience, but it has no meaningless technical flights; all the difficulties mean something in the musical scheme. Mr. Adamowski played it with exquisite brilliancy and sensational verve. The applause was so tumultuous and prolonged that he had to bow his acknowledgments six times. The orchestral accompaniment was played faultlessly.

Beethoven's Seventh symphony brought the programme to a triumphant close. The stern and uncompromising first movement was given with superb vigor and clearness; the second was a revelation of melodic loveliness; the third, one of the most ingratiating of all musical appeals, was given with entrancing clarity and expressiveness; the fourth was electrifying with its impetuous and clearly proclaimed eloquence.

The orchestra seemed to be at its very best. Dr. Muck is economical of gestures, but he is constantly vigilant, and every movement of baton or hand has a definite meaning. He has emancipated the orchestra from everything having an appearance of servitude to the merely mechanical, and made of it a great instrument of soul, of poetry, of impulse, of vital and vivid interpretation. Probable no more enthusiastic audience than last night's ever assembled in the Lyceum.

Music Worth Hearing.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Indianapolis next Friday evening is a musical event of unusual importance. This orchestra is so far superior to other organizations of its kind in this country that it stands almost alone. In Boston it is regarded as far more than a mere company of instrumentalists; it has reached the dignity of a cherished institution.

For years this body of musicians has been under the training of skilled conductors and has attained a degree of perfection in rendering the highest forms of musical composition that fills the most critical listeners with enthusiasm. Hitherto music lovers have found it necessary to go to Boston to hear this orchestra. This season it is making a limited tour, and Indianapolis is fortunate enough to be included in its itinerary.

For several months its has been under the leadership of Dr. Muck, one of the half dozen great conductors of the world, who is absent from his own orchestra in Berlin on a year's special leave. He accompanies the Boston organization on its tour, and those who attend the concerts will have the opportunity to note his methods and will enjoy the benefit of the training the orchestra has received from him. This chance to hear really great music is one of which Indianapolis will no doubt show full appreciation.

[3]

Paper Times
City Rochester
Date State N.Y.
JAN 29 1907

THE THEATERS

A concert ranking among the best ever given in this city and one long to be remembered, was rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum Theater last evening. Under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck the musicians charmed a capacity house. The programme of three numbers, two orchestral, and the third a violin solo, began with Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Mr. T. Adamowski, the soloist, followed with Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor, op. 61. The concert ended with Beethoven's symphony in A major, op. 92. Each number was heartily applauded and appreciated, the audience even remaining in its seats after the final number to applaud.

When Dr. Muck with his baton took his stand before the musicians, it was evident that he was in truth the conductor. His every movement was noted by the players and strict attention paid. Dr. Muck did not give the players opportunities to theorize or dream over their work. His beat was decisive, strict, evident, and energetic at all times, and clearly demonstrated his ability to handle, with intelligence, so big a body of musicians.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Richard Wagner, with its big tonal qualities, massive expressions and vivacious phrases, was first played by the orchestra. Opening with the march theme, characterizing the Mastersingers, Wagner contributed a scholastic polyphony that was developed throughout the overture, the theme of the Mastersingers serving as the main motif. Dr. Muck cleverly directed the playing of the oboes, clarinets and flutes throughout the initial movement and gradually moved his musicians to the love theme, which is clearly recognized in the second theme of the prelude. This dominated until the allegretto movement, when the initial march was again introduced, with brilliant effects. The culmination of the overture was reached near the finale, when the brass and wind instruments combined in the production of the sonorous theme of the Mastersingers.

Camille Saint-Saens' concerto for the violin was played with fine execution and profound appreciation by T. Adamowski. Accompanied by the wood wind, the violin exposes the principal theme of the concerto. The second movement, andantino, with its sustained harmony in the strings and chords in the wood wind was quaint and prettily played.

The Sciliano rythm played by the solo violin was tastefully rendered. The echoing of the theme from one instrument to another was exceptionally well done, as was the short coda that closed the movement. The third movement was abundant in pianissimo harmony, with muted violins and soft accompaniments by the wood wind. The working out of the second theme, in high harmonies, was the most beautiful strains of the concerto. Mr. Adamowski showed considerable technique and fine comprehension of Saint-Saens' work. In the soft passages the pretty wedding theme sung itself from his instrument.

The programme ended with Beethoven's symphony in A major. Opening with crashing chords of the full orchestra against a melodic passage given first to the oboe and finally to the bassoons. The persistent rythm of the third movement was nicely noted by Dr. Muck, and he carefully conducted his players over the counter-theme at the end of the movement. The brilliant scherzo, with its sustained A, was melodious and noteworthy. The finale with its bacchantic theme, strong accents, brilliant passage work was well developed and hugely enjoyed.

M. F.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date State N Y
JAN 29 19

IN THE THEATERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gave Great Concert.

LARGE AUDIENCE AT LYCEUM

Orchestra's Visit Was Made a Financial as Well as Artistic Success—New Attractions at Other Houses.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the third time in Rochester last evening at the Lyceum Theater. The first concert was several years over a decade ago, and Timothee Adamowski was the soloist. Then there was a dreary waste of years without it. The second concert took place last year at the Baker Theater, when a splendid and enthusiastic audience paid it tribute. The third concert was the joyous occasion at the Lyceum last night when one of the largest and most fashionable audiences of the season gathered to listen to what is very likely the most wonderful orchestral organization in the world today. It was an event long to be remembered—a satisfying programme, as nearly perfect a performance as lies within the range of human possibilities, an extraordinary exhibition of virt ducting on the part of the lead the most distinguished directo time, and a brilliant and exhilar number. What more can the sire? The audience seemed to more—they know that the tra the orchestra forbids encores—t were convincing by lavish and p applause of their delight.

It is gratifying to observe the attitude of Rochester music-lovers toward such performances as last night's. It is a pleasure to see them turn out in such numbers as to make these important concerts financially successful and it is also a pleasure to see them so warmly appreciative and enthusiastic toward the performance itself. Local culture appears to good advantage when the occasion is time-honored and of established repute. It now remains for it to inform itself concerning current successes and not allow such affairs to pass unheeded.

Rochester had its first taste of the prima donna conductor last night. For several years conductors have been the idols of concert-goers in Europe and they have been feted and adulated as the prima donna was of old. Ernst Van Dyck who is witty, although he is a tenor, once remarked that the old school of Italian opera was dying out and with it the old-fashioned prima donna was disappearing. "In fact," he said, "I suppose one may safely say that Jean de Reske is the last of the great prima donnas." Van Dyck did not foresee the present furore over conductors. It has raged over the European music centers and the Philharmonic Society of New York with its two seasons of "star" conductors spread the infection to America. During those two years the public was taught to go to concerts to hear Safonoff or Weingartner or Colonne or Henry Wood conduct as they had hitherto hastened only to hear Melba sing or Paderewski play. It was assuredly a perversion of taste and probably an unhealthy influence, but it has had the effect of giving America the benefit of the presence for more or less protracted periods of two celebrated conductors. They are Safonoff, who will conduct the Philharmonic for three years, and Dr. Muck, who will conduct the Boston Symphony for the present season—at any rate. Rochester felt the effect of this tendency in musical affairs for the first time last night.

Dr. Muck has been a famous man in Europe for many years. He is best known as an operatic conductor and has been for some time first conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin and a regular participant in the Bayreuth festivals. His first appearances in this country aroused very little enthusiasm. He was recognized as a man of superb command of the technique of conducting, but there seemed to be a lack of color and temperament; this probably because audiences were spoiled by the sensational efforts of so-called "star" conductors to startle their auditors at no matter what spectacular cost. But Dr. Muck has slowly achieved a most remarkable success both in Boston and New York and success of the most solid and healthy kind. His programmes have avoided the showy, pyrotechnic repertory and have presented works which had legitimate reason for their being and his concerts have been a climax of triumphs for his musicianship. He has conquered most conclusively in such works as the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and the First of Brahms, two of the most absolute and uncompromising things in music. The critics and the public have both risen to his reading of the Seventh Symphony and proclaimed him a great man and it was a most happy choice for the Rochester programme.

The performance last night justified all that had been told of it. The writer has heard several readings by famous conductors, including one by Weingartner, considered by many the greatest Beethoven conductor of the day, but he has never heard the slow movement given with such warmth. It was an exhibition of the subjective treatment of strict form such as one rarely hears, the transformation through emotional temperament, human personality, whatever one chooses to call it, of number into art. The whole symphony was supremely well done, but it was in this movement that Dr. Muck displayed his individual quality most distinctly. He was always a great conductor. The "Meistersinger" prelude was tremendous—full of variety of rhythm and color, and the dynamic control was nothing less than architectural. The accompaniment to the concerto was a miracle of sympathy and supporting strength, and done, it is said, after one rehearsal and one public performance.

The soloist, Timothee Adamowski, was the soloist at the first concert many years ago. Since then he has played in Rochester at two or three private musicales, but has not been publicly heard until last night. His reputation, both as a solo and ensemble player, is now national, and he has been for many years one of the most honored members of this superb band. He played last night the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor, a charming work, and he played with captivating brilliancy and verve and compelling beauty of tone. He was recalled half a dozen times to acknowledge the plaudits of his audience.

As to the orchestra itself—what is there to say? It is such perfect euphony as seems extra-mundane. It is a benediction of harmony that is unequaled in these times. Dr. Muck unhesitatingly says that it is the most accomplished and perfect orchestral organization in the world today. He is surely a great authority and one may accept his word. It only remains to pray devoutly for the annual beatification of a Boston Symphony concert.

Indianapolis News.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1907

A GREAT ORCHESTRA.

Indianapolis is to have the privilege this week of hearing the greatest orchestra in America, directed by one of the five great conductors of the world. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be at English's Friday evening. This is a large company of musicians, each one of whom is a specially selected player of his instrument, who might at any time be called upon to be a soloist, when he would win attention as a real virtuoso. Many of the men, indeed, have world-wide reputations as soloists. The orchestra is composed of men of many nations and it has taken careful inquiry in the world's musical centers and even in out-of-the-way places to bring this orchestra together at Boston.

Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, by special permission of the Emperor of Germany, was allowed a year's absence to come to America and direct this orchestra. In Germany he is one of the greatest conductors, and it was only after many trials that he could obtain leave of absence for a single year. His readings of the different scores that the orchestra plays this season have been commended by Boston's ablest critics as intellectual and noble—just interpretations of the masters that composed them.

The program selected for the Indianapolis concert embraces the Brahms First Symphony, the Richard Strauss "Don Juan," and the Wagner prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which are rich in musical expression of great themes. The announcement of the concert has created so wide an interest, that the audience for Friday evening promises to represent every part of the State. Indianapolis is one of the few cities away from the Eastern coast to have the orchestra, and if this concert has sufficient patronage, it will be brought here each season.

Paper Press
City Detroit
Date State Mich
JAN 30 1907

Features of Symphony Concert.

There are always three features to a concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will appear tomorrow evening at the Light Guard armory—the conductors, the players and the program. The Boston Symphony orchestra has a world-wide reputation, the majority of the musicians being solo players of distinction. Two novelties are announced for the program that is to be rendered in Detroit; one from the pen of the much-discussed Richard Strauss, the other an example of the present school of Roman music.

ROCHESTER DEMOCRAT AND CHRONICLE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1907.

AMUSEMENTS

Lyceum Theater ——— Boston Symphony Orchestra
Baker Theater ——— "How Baxter Butted In"
National Theater ——— "Bankers and Brokers"
Cook Opera House ——— Vaudeville
Corinthian Theater ——— "Congress of American Girls"

At the Lyceum Theater last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance in Rochester since it has come under the directorship of Dr. Karl Muck. A very large audience was present—partly, no doubt, in honor of the new conductor, partly in recognition of the fact that this was one of the few cities selected for a visit by the organization on its present brief tour, but chief of all reasons because a musical treat of great richness is assured whenever this orchestra appears. Three composers were represented on the programme—Wagner, Saint-Saens and Beethoven. The first offering was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." It is recorded of this overture that when it was first performed in Leipsic a little over forty-five years ago, under Wagner's own leadership, the composer met with a discouragingly cold reception from a small audience. Yet the overture was so emphatically accepted by the few present that it was immediately played again. The comments of the critics were astonishingly diverse, some lavishing praise on it and others pronouncing it an unintelligible freak. But "music-drama" was then on trial; the music now accepted was then "the music of the future." and dramatic music detached from the drama was having a hard struggle to force itself on the public favor. The battle was won long ago—in this country with the help of Theodore Thomas—and this "Meistersinger" prelude is now liked, and comprehended in a measure, wherever symphony orchestras exist. It is superfluous to say that it had a superb technical presentation last night, and it is to be added that Dr. Muck's reading was splendidly warm and picturesque, yet without the slightest sacrifice of musical dignity.

The soloist of the evening, Mr. Timothee Adamowski, played the violin concerto No. 3, op. 61, by Saint-Saens. It was an immaculate exemplification of the art of violin playing. Saint-Saens is eminently an exponent of beauty in music. This concerto is affluent in melody, in thematic elaboration, in the magic of contrapuntal invention and in orchestral coloring of the accompaniment. It is hard enough, in all conscience, but it has no meaningless technical flights; all the difficulties mean something in the musical scheme. Mr. Adamowski played it with exquisite brilliancy and sensational verve. The applause was so tumultuous and prolonged that he had to bow his acknowledgments six times. The orchestral accompaniment was played faultlessly.

Beethoven's Seventh symphony brought the programme to a triumphant close. The stern and uncompromising first movement was given with superb vigor and clearness; the second was a revelation of melodic loveliness; the third, one of the most ingratiating of all musical appeals, was given with entrancing clarity and expressiveness; the fourth was electrifying with its impetuous and clearly proclaimed eloquence.

The orchestra seemed to be at its very best. Dr. Muck is economical of gestures, but he is constantly vigilant, and every movement of baton or hand has a definite meaning. He has emancipated the orchestra from everything having an appearance of servitude to the merely mechanical, and made of it a great instrument of soul, of poetry, of impulse, of vital and vivid interpretation. Probable no more enthusiastic audience than last night's ever assembled in the Lyceum.

Music Worth Hearing.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Indianapolis next Friday evening is a musical event of unusual importance. This orchestra is so far superior to other organizations of its kind in this country that it stands almost alone. In Boston it is regarded as far more than a mere company of instrumentalists; it has reached the dignity of a cherished institution.

For years this body of musicians has been under the training of skilled conductors and has attained a degree of perfection in rendering the highest forms of musical composition that fills the most critical listeners with enthusiasm. Hitherto music lovers have found it necessary to go to Boston to hear this orchestra. This season it is making a limited tour, and Indianapolis is fortunate enough to be included in its itinerary.

For several months its has been under the leadership of Dr. Muck, one of the half dozen great conductors of the world, who is absent from his own orchestra in Berlin on a year's special leave. He accompanies the Boston organization on its tour, and those who attend the concerts will have the opportunity to note his methods and will enjoy the benefit of the training the orchestra has received from him. This chance to hear really great music is one of which Indianapolis will no doubt show full appreciation.

[3]

Paper Times
City Rochester
Date State N Y
JAN 29 1907

THE THEATERS

A concert ranking among the best ever given in this city and one long to be remembered, was rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum Theater last evening. Under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck the musicians charmed a capacity house. The programme of three numbers, two orchestral, and the third a violin solo, began with Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Mr. T. Adamowski, the soloist, followed with Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor, op. 61. The concert ended with Beethoven's symphony in A major, op. 92. Each number was heartily applauded and appreciated, the audience even remaining in its seats after the final number to applaud.

When Dr. Muck with his baton took his stand before the musicians, it was evident that he was in truth the conductor. His every movement was noted by the players and strict attention paid. Dr. Muck did not give the players opportunities to theorize or dream over their work. His beat was decisive, strict, evident, and energetic at all times, and clearly demonstrated his ability to handle, with intelligence, so big a body of musicians.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Richard Wagner, with its big tonal qualities, massive expressions and vivacious phrases, was first played by the orchestra. Opening with the march theme, characterizing the Mastersingers, Wagner contributed a scholastic polyphony that was developed throughout the overture, the theme of the Mastersingers serving as the main motif. Dr. Muck cleverly directed the playing of the oboes, clarinets and flutes throughout the initial movement and gradually moved his musicians to the love theme, which is clearly recognized in the second theme of the prelude. This dominated until the allegretto movement, when the initial march was again introduced, with brilliant effects. The culmination of the overture was reached near the finale, when the brass and wind instruments combined in the production of the sonorous theme of the Mastersingers.

Camille Saint-Saens' concerto for the violin was played with fine execution and profound appreciation by T. Adamowski. Accompanied by the wood wind, the violin exposes the principal theme of the concerto. The second movement, andantino, with its sustained harmony in the strings and chords in the wood wind was quaint and prettily played.

The Sciliano rythm played by the solo violin was tastefully rendered. The echoing of the theme from one instrument to another was exceptionally well done, as was the short coda that closed the movement. The third movement was abundant in pianissimo harmony, with muted violins and soft accompaniments by the wood wind. The working out of the second theme, in high harmonies, was the most beautiful strains of the concerto. Mr. Adamowski showed considerable technique and fine comprehension of Saint-Saens' work. In the soft passages the pretty wedding theme sung itself from his instrument.

The programme ended with Beethoven's symphony in A major. Opening with crashing chords of the full orchestra against a melodic passage given first to the oboe and finally to the bassoons. The persistent rythm of the third movement was nicely noted by Dr. Muck, and he carefully conducted his players over the counter-theme at the end of the movement. The brilliant scherzo, with its sustained A, was melodious and noteworthy. The finale with its bacchantic theme, strong accents, brilliant passage work was well developed and hugely enjoyed.

E F

Paper Sun
City Indianapolis
Date JAN 29 1907 State Ind

BOSTON SYMPHONY AN ORCHESTRA OF VIRTUOES

EVERY PLAYER REGARDED AS AN ARTIST IN HIS LINE.

SIX QUARTETS AND TRIOS

"An Orchestra of Virtuosi" is a title which has been given the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose coming here marks the climax in the local history of music. It was William J. Henderson, the critic of the New York Sun, who hit upon this phrase. Undoubtedly not a small part of the artistic perfection of the orchestra is due to the presence in its ranks of so many men who are virtuosi. It was Ysaye who once said that he would rather play before any orchestra in the world than the Boston Symphony and by the same token would rather play with that orchestra than any other.

"Among the violins," he said, "there are a dozen or more great artists and I know that when I appear with that orchestra I have to play before men who are practically in the same rank with me. If I play badly, they know as well as I do. But if I play well, none is so quick to recognize it and when those men who have accompanied me applaud me at the end, I feel that I have done myself and my art honor."

These great artists are not confined to the strings. They are found as well in the wood-winds and the brass. And as a result, within the orchestra are several chamber music organizations which stand without rivals.

Six Chamber Music Organizations.

First comes the Boston Symphony Quartet, now in its third season. It comprises Prof. Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; E. Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, cello. Professor Hess is the concert master of the orchestra. Mr. Roth occupies the second desk among the first violins of the orchestra. Mr. Ferir is the principal viola and Mr. Warnke the principal cellist.

This quartet gives with great success a series of concerts in Boston, New York and Washington and other Eastern cities, in addition to many concerts in the larger New England towns. It is a permanent organization.

Besides this there are no less than five other chamber music organizations within the orchestra.

Next in importance, perhaps, is the Longy Club, of which Georges Longy is the leader. Mr. Longy is regarded as probably the first oboe of the world, and is, moreover, a talented musician. For several years he has been conductor of the Boston Orchestra Club, an amateur organization, the members of which are drawn from the highest society of Boston. The Longy Club is composed of the leading wood-wind and brass instruments of the orchestra and devotes itself to music written for these. It has become very popular in Boston, New York and the Eastern cities generally.

Plays Old Chamber Music.

The Rameau Club, under the leadership of Andre Maquarre, the first flute of the orchestra, is a similar organization, except that it devotes its attention chiefly to the old chamber music and often calls in string instruments to assist.

The Adamowski Trio is composed of Timothee Adamowski, who shares the first desk of the orchestra with Professor Hess; his brother, Josef Adamowski, one of the cellists of the orchestra, and Mme. Szumowska, who is the wife of Josef Adamowski. This organization is well known through the East.

The Hoffmann Quartet has as its leader Jacques Hoffmann, one of the first violins.

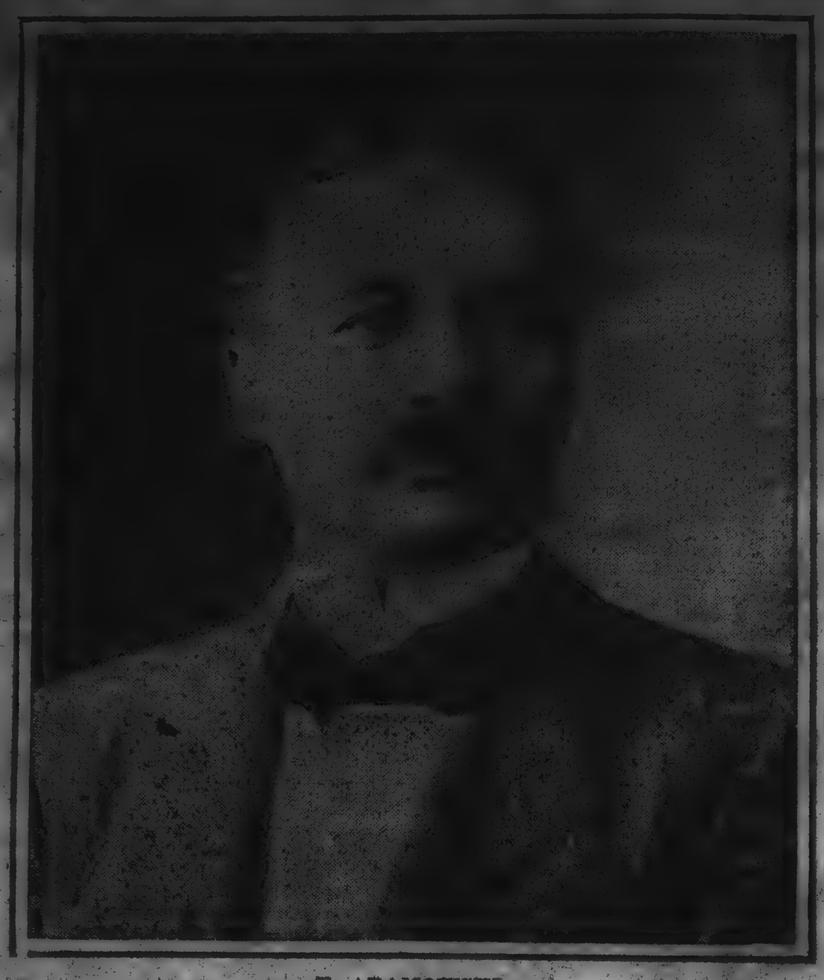
Finally there is the Boston Symphony Horn Quartet, led by Mr. Hackebarth, the first horn of the orchestra, which is a unique organization.

No orchestra in the world, it is stated, has so many great artists who are able to shine equally as orchestral and chamber music musicians and soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will begin in English's Opera-house at 8:15 precisely next Friday evening, and late-comers may not be seated until after the close of the first movement of the symphony.

The sale of seats opened this morning at the box office. All mail orders should be addressed to Ona B. Talbot.

GIFTED BOSTON MUSICIAN



T. ADAMOWSKI,
Second Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cleveland Leader June 30-'07

BOSTON ORCHESTRA UNDER DR. MUCK NEAR PERFECTION

Organization Becomes Living Organism Wherein Every Player Takes Part to Fullest Measure—Concert Marked by Simplicity.

BY PAUL E. TEICHERT.

In the twenty-five years of its existence the Boston Symphony Orchestra has followed a plan by means of which the organization has grown into one of the greatest bodies of players that can possibly be brought together. Players have been engaged from all parts of Europe until the ensemble has reached that state of perfection that borders closely on mechanical completeness.

Last night when I heard this orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, I missed somehow that peculiar characteristic by which it was formerly distinguishable—absolute invention. Yet there was the creative faculty of old, the ingenuity and skill. I watched the different choirs and found familiar faces. I listened to the singing of the voices and they spoke with the same authority. Gericke, the old conductor, was in my mind.

And then I understood. Dr. Muck, the new conductor, has been effacing his personality to such wonderful degree that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the greatest piece of musical machinery in this country, has become a living organism where every individual player takes part without restraint and in the fullest measure.

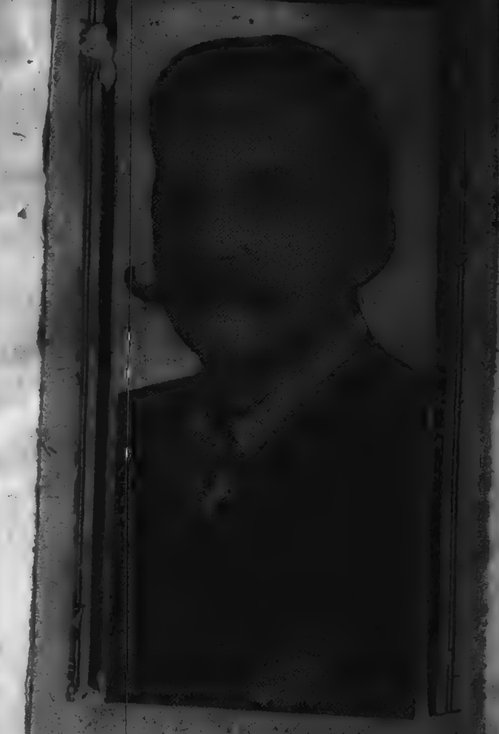
It seemed to me last night at the Grays' Armory that Dr. Muck's manner of conducting is the easiest, yet the most forceful, because effort is not apparent. He stands there as a simple medium, giving that amount of personal freedom to his players that results in the highest artistic achievement. People who attended last night's concert with the idea of seeing a highly emotional prima donna conductor must have been sadly disappointed. No doubt there were a few, yet there was none who by the time the beautiful "Allegretto" of the "Seventh Symphony" was read by Dr. Muck did not observe the simplicity of it all and applaud the clear, translucent and euphonious reading.

The playing of the "Meistersinger" prelude gave the key to Dr. Muck's intentions at the start. It was read with a total lack of the strictly emotional, but given sharply, forcefully, especially the ending with the brass section commanding the rest of the orchestra as I have never heard it played by this orchestra before.

Symphony concerts must still be given with a soloist as the special attraction. Our symphony concerts make no exception to the rule. Timothee Adamowski, a member of the violin section of the orchestra, played the "B Minor Violin Concerto" by Saint-Saens. It is a stupendous composition that calls for technical perfection and emotional qualities alike. The soloist possesses both. His tone is beautiful, his phrasing a delight. The technical mastery holds equal pace with his emotion.

Paper Sun
City Cincinnati
Date JAN 30 1907 State O.

SYMPHONY SOLOIST



—Photo by Garo.

Pleasant expectancy has been aroused in the coming of Prof. Willy Hess, soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will be heard with that organization in Music hall, February 2.

Paper Press
City Detroit
Date State Mich

HONORED BY ROYALTY

Timothee Adamowski is World-Renowned Artist.

Timothee Adamowski, the soloist who will play the justly celebrated and beautiful Saint-Saens Concerto at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Light Guard armory tonight, came to this country originally as the guest of Julia Ward Howe, of Boston.

After spending a summer in Boston and Newport, he decided to remain in America, appearing first with the Boston Philharmonic under Listemann. For several seasons he traveled with celebrated artists as soloist and organized a concert company of his own. He entered the Boston Symphony in 1884, and was its concert-meister in 1903.

He has achieved an international reputation as a soloist, being honored by royalty during a recent European tour. The concerto, written for and played by Sarasate, is one of Mr. Adamowski's greatest successes, arousing enthusiasm wherever it is heard. It is hoped that the audience will be seated to season for this concert, as it will be impossible during [illegible] of the Don Juan Strauss, and no [illegible]

TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI,
Famous Soloist Will Appear at Light Guard Tonight.

Paper Press
City New York
Date FEB 3 - 1907 State N Y

Two important works, one of which is entirely new to New York, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its next concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening, February 21, the symphony will be Sibelius's in E minor No. 1. This work, when played in Boston, created a profound impression and was regarded as being in every respect more important than the composer's second symphony in D major, which is better known. On Saturday afternoon the first number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played in New York but once, three years ago, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the direction of its composer. Mme. Samaroff will be the soloist on Thursday evening, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist on Saturday afternoon, playing Brahms's concerto in E flat major No. 2.

The Hippodrome, Haydn's "Creation," and the People's Choral Union, with its chorus of 350 voices and an orchestra of over sixty pieces, is the combination that Frank Damrosch offers for Sunday evening, Feb. 17.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date FEB 3 - 1907 State N. Y.

Two important works, one of which is entirely new to New York, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening, Feb. 21, the symphony will be Sibelius's in E minor, No. 1. This work when played in Boston created a most profound impression, and was regarded as being in every respect more important than the composer's second symphony in D major, which is better known. On Saturday afternoon, the first number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played in New York but once, three years ago, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the direction of its composer. Mme. Samaroff will be the soloist on Thursday evening, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist on Saturday afternoon, playing Brahms's concerto in E flat major No. 2.

The Hippodrome, Haydn's "Creation," and the People's Choral Union, with its chorus of 350 voices and an orchestra of over sixty pieces, is the combination that Frank Damrosch offers for Sunday evening, Feb. 17.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date State N Y
FEB 1 6

German Far Flies.

Dr. Muck was questioned in Chicago concerning one Richard Strauss.

"'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "Like every new work of Strauss'. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss' later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are 'Til Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklarung,' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compo[illegible] see no reason why I should [illegible]

[132]

Paper News
City Indianapolis
Date JAN 29 1907 State Ind

BOSTON SYMPHONY AN ORCHESTRA OF VIRTUOES

EVERY PLAYER REGARDED AS AN ARTIST IN HIS LINE.

SIX QUARTETS AND TRIOS

"An Orchestra of Virtuosi" is a title which has been given the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose coming here marks the climax in the local history of music. It was William J. Henderson, the critic of the New York Sun, who hit upon this phrase. Undoubtedly not a small part of the artistic perfection of the orchestra is due to the presence in its ranks of so many men who are virtuosi. It was Ysaye who once said that he would rather play before any orchestra in the world than the Boston Symphony and by the same token would rather play with that orchestra than any other.

"Among the violins," he said, "there are a dozen or more great artists and I know that when I appear with that orchestra I have to play before men who are practically in the same rank with me. If I play badly, they know as well as I do. But if I play well, none is so quick to recognize it and when those men who have accompanied me applaud me at the end, I feel that I have done myself and my art honor."

These great artists are not confined to the strings. They are found as well in the wood-winds and the brass. And as a result, within the orchestra are several chamber music organizations which stand without rivals.

Six Chamber Music Organizations.

First comes the Boston Symphony Quartet, now in its third season. It comprises Prof. Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; E. Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, cello. Professor Hess is the concert master of the orchestra. Mr. Roth occupies the second desk among the first violins of the orchestra. Mr. Ferir is the principal viola and Mr. Warnke the principal cellist.

This quartet gives with great success a series of concerts in Boston, New York and Washington and other Eastern cities, in addition to many concerts in the larger New England towns. It is a permanent organization.

Besides this there are no less than five other chamber music organizations within the orchestra.

Next in importance, perhaps, is the Longy Club, of which Georges Longy is the leader. Mr. Longy is regarded as probably the first oboe of the world, and is, moreover, a talented musician. For several years he has been conductor of the Boston Orchestra Club, an amateur organization, the members of which are drawn from the highest society of Boston. The Longy Club is composed of the leading wood-wind and brass instruments of the orchestra and devotes itself to music written for these. It has become very popular in Boston, New York and the Eastern cities generally.

Plays Old Chamber Music.

The Rameau Club, under the leadership of Andre Maquarre, the first flute of the orchestra, is a similar organization, except that it devotes its attention chiefly to the old chamber music and often calls in string instruments to assist.

The Adamowski Trio is composed of Timothee Adamowski, who shares the first desk of the orchestra with Professor Hess; his brother, Josef Adamowski, one of the cellists of the orchestra, and Mme. Szumowska, who is the wife of Josef Adamowski. This organization is well known through the East.

The Hoffmann Quartet has as its leader Jacques Hoffmann, one of the first violins.

Finally there is the Boston Symphony Horn Quartet, led by Mr. Hackebarth, the first horn of the orchestra, which is a unique organization.

No orchestra in the world, it is stated, has so many great artists who are able to shine equally as orchestral and chamber music musicians and soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will begin in English's Opera-house at 8:15 precisely next Friday evening, and late-comers may not be seated until after the close of the first movement of the symphony.

The sale of seats opened this morning at the box office. All mail orders should be addressed to Ona B. Talbot.

GIFTED BOSTON MUSICIAN

T. ADAMOWSKI,
Second Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cleveland Leader June 30-'07

BOSTON ORCHESTRA UNDER DR. MUCK NEAR PERFECTION

Organization Becomes Living Organism Wherein Every Player Takes Part to Fullest Measure—Concert Marked by Simplicity.

BY PAUL E. TEICHERT.

In the twenty-five years of its existence the Boston Symphony Orchestra has followed a plan by means of which the organization has grown into one of the greatest bodies of players that can possibly be brought together. Players have been engaged from all parts of Europe until the ensemble has reached that state of perfection that borders closely on mechanical completeness.

Last night when I heard this orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, I missed somehow that peculiar characteristic by which it was formerly distinguishable—absolute invention. Yet there was the creative faculty of old, the ingenuity and skill. I watched the different choirs and found familiar faces. I listened to the singing of the voices and they spoke with the same authority. Gericke, the old conductor, was in my mind.

And then I understood. Dr. Muck, the new conductor, has been effacing his personality to such wonderful degree that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the greatest piece of musical machinery in this country, has become a living organism where every individual player takes part without restraint and in the fullest measure.

It seemed to me last night at the Grays' Armory that Dr. Muck's manner of conducting is the easiest, yet the most forceful, because effort is not apparent. He stands there as a simple medium, giving that amount of personal freedom to his players that results in the highest artistic achievement. People who attended last night's concert with the idea of seeing a highly emotional prima donna conductor must have been sadly disappointed. No doubt there were a few, yet there was none who by the time the beautiful "Allegretto" of the "Seventh Symphony" was read by Dr. Muck did not observe the simplicity of it all and applaud the clear, translucent and euphonious reading.

The playing of the "Meistersinger" prelude gave the key to Dr. Muck's intentions at the start. It was read with a total lack of the strictly emotional, but given sharply, forcefully, especially the ending with the brass section commanding the rest of the orchestra as I have never heard it played by this orchestra before.

Symphony concerts must still be given with a soloist as the special attraction. Our symphony concerts make no exception to the rule. Timothee Adamowski, a member of the violin section of the orchestra, played the "B Minor Violin Concerto" by Saint-Saens. It is a stupendous composition that calls for technical perfection and emotional qualities alike. The soloist possesses both. His tone is beautiful, his phrasing a delight. The technical mastery holds equal pace with his emotion.

Paper Cincinnati
City
Date JAN 30 1907 State O.

SYMPHONY SOLOIST

—Photo by Garo.

Pleasant expectancy has been aroused in the coming of Prof. Willy Hess, soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will be heard with that organization in Music hall, February 2.

Paper Press
City Detroit
Date State Mich

HONORED BY ROYALTY

Timothee Adamowski is World-Renowned Artist.

Timothee Adamowski, the soloist who will play the justly celebrated and beautiful Saint-Saens Concerto at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Light Guard armory tonight, came to this country originally as the guest of Julia Ward Howe, of Boston.

TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI,
Famous Soloist Will Appear at Light Guard Tonight.

After spending a summer in Boston and Newport, he decided to remain in America, apeparing first with the Boston Philharmonic under Listemann. For several seasons he traveled with celebrated artists as soloist and organized a concert company of his own. He entered the Boston Symphony in 1884, and was its concert-meister in 1903.

He has achieved an international reputation as a soloist, being honored by royalty during a recent European tour. The concerto, written for and played by Sarasate, is one of Mr. Adamowski's greatest successes, arousing enthusiasm wherever it is heard. It is hoped that the audience will be seated in season for this concert, as entrance will be impossible during the playing of the Don Juan Fantasie by Strauss, and no note of this initial

Paper Press
City New York
Date State N Y

Two important works, one of which is entirely new to New York, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its next concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening, February 21, the symphony will be Sibelius's in E minor No. 1. This work, when played in boston, created a profound impression and was regarded as being in every respect more important than the composer's second symphony in D major, which is better known. On Saturday afternoon the first number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played in New York but once, three years ago, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the direction of its composer. Mme. Samaroff will be the soloist on Thursday evening, playing Tchaikovsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist on Saturday afternoon, playing Brahms's concerto in E flat major, No. 2.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N. Y.

Two important works, one of which is entirely new to New York, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening, Feb. 21, the symphony will be Sibelius's in E minor, No. 1. This work when played in Boston created a most profound impression, and was regarded as being in every respect more important than the composer's second symphony in D major, which is better known. On Saturday afternoon, the first number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played in New York but once, three years ago, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the direction of its composer. Mme Samaroff will be the soloist on Thursday evening, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist on Saturday afternoon, playing Brahms's concerto in E flat major No. 2.

The Hippodrome, Haydn's "Creation," and the People's Choral Union, with its chorus of 850 voices and an orchestra of over sixty pieces, is the combination that Frank Damrosch offers for Sunday evening, Feb. 17.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date State N Y

German Fur Flies.

Dr. Muck was questioned in Chicago concerning one Richard Strauss.

"'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "Like every new work of Strauss'. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss' later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are 'Til Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklarung,' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions, I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them again in public."

[132]

Paper Post
City Chicago
Date JAN 31 1907 State Ill

BIG CROWD GREETS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

First Performance in Chicago in Fifteen Years Arouses the Interest of Music Lovers.

WORK OF PLAYERS PRAISED

Strings Held Especially Admirable for Their Observance of Minutiae of Expression.

One of the most interesting events which the season has brought forth took place last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Karl Muck, gave a performance in the Auditorium.

Inasmuch as nearly fifteen years have elapsed since the orchestra has been heard in Chicago, and since, also, it is the oldest and the most famous organization of its kind in this country, the visit of the Boston Orchestra aroused the liveliest interest among the music-lovers of the city. The outward and visible token of that interest was evident in the host which thronged the vast concert-room, leaving hardly a seat unoccupied. It is possible that many a listener was drawn to the performance by a feeling of curiosity, as well as by the anticipation of much artistic enjoyment.

In the Thomas Orchestra Chicago also possesses an organization the fame of which has traveled to many lands. How do its abilities compare as with those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

To declare that the orchestra founded by Theodore Thomas suffered not at all by comparison with that which was heard last night is to bestow the highest possible praise upon it. For the Boston Symphony Orchestra represented, in its performance, the most exalted standard of proficiency. Finer playing than it gave would be difficult to discover in any country of the world, and there are organizations far older and even more renowned which have seldom played as well.

The strings are especially admirable, not only in their perfect ensemble but in the observance of those minutiae of expression which make for the most artistic performance.

In spite of the fact that the wind instrumentalists in the Boston Orchestra have been held up as models of their kind, the wood wind, and particularly the oboes and clarinets, are inferior in delicacy and refinement of tone to their colleagues in the Thomas Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a valuable acquisition to that body. The least demonstrative of any of the great conductors who have visited us, it is evident that the work that Dr. Muck accomplishes is done at rehearsals, and that he regards as superfluous any gestures but those which serve as reminders to his men of this effect or that.

The programme which he set forth comprised only four works, but they were calculated to show to every advantage not only his own skill as conductor, but the skill of the orchestra as well. The overture to Wagner's early opera "Rienzi" is not one of the illustrious master's most successful creations; it is, indeed, somewhat vulgar and commonplace, revealing little of the genius later to be matured. But the orchestra gave it so spirited an interpretation that the work sounded very imposing.

Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" supplied the Boston musicians with the first opoprtunity to show how great was their virtuosity and how effectively was that virtuosity tempered with artistic feeling. Like most of Strauss's work, "Don Juan" is a composition of amazing difficulty, but it is beautiful, too, and both beauty and brilliancy were admirably presented in Dr. Muck's reading of the piece and the orchestra's playing of it.

demands perfect technique and beauty of tone; demands, not less, a complete understanding by the players of the conception of the piece which the conductor has formed. All these qualifications were forthcoming in the playing of the symphony by the orchestra, and thereby a performance of wonderful excellence resulted.

So certain was the orchestra of its work that during the greater part of the scherzo Dr. Muck was able to stand motionless in front of his desk and permit his men to play without any other indication from himself than an occasional glance or the raising of a finger.

The soloist of the evening was Rudolph Ganz, who elected to be heard in the first piano concerto of Tschaikowsky. In his performance of this exacting composition Mr. Ganz achieved a great and well-deserved success. The knowledge which Tschaikowsky possessed of the piano was not of that practical nature which could permit him to write music calculated to be grateful to the player, and it is saying much in praise of Mr. Ganz's execution of that music that it sounded not only very brilliant, but also very well adapted to the instrument. In the slow movement the player produced an appealing quality of tone, and gave all possible dash and vigor to the impetuous finale.

FELIX BOROWSKI.

...D AND MUSICIANS.

...—such, in a word, was the ver... musical Chicago at the close of the ...ert of the Boston orchestra in the Audi... last evening. The audience that ...athered to hear the famous eastern ...anization included almost the entire mu... community. It gave evidence of a most cordial feeling and of keen expectancy that great things were about to happen as soon as the players had taken their places. The men were cordially greeted and Dr. Muck, the conductor, was also heartily received. And the expectations were fulfilled, for, as the evening wore on, there were continued expressions of enthusiastic approval which reached a climax with the magnificent performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony. And when the last note had been played there was the most grateful and thoroughly pleased body of auditors that has been seen in a local concert room for many a day.

Playing that showed wonderful technical finish was combined with interpretative powers of the first order, and the result was just what a high-class orchestra should furnish—an indelible impression of the power and beauty of masterpieces played with musical understanding. The auditors went home with the themes of the symphony re-echoing through their minds, and with vivid recollections of the entire programme, for the performance was one that could not be forgotten with the passing moment.

* * * * *

Dr. Muck's personality is one that commands immediate attention. Quiet in manner, and sparing in his use of gestures, he is still in absolute command at every moment. He dominated the orchestra at all times, yet he never made any aggressive assertions of his control. He showed himself to be both intellectual and highly temperamental in his readings; a musician who is a natural leader. His power of control, over his men as well as himself, is extraordinary and his hold is never relaxed, even though he stops beating time, as he did in the symphony, and allows the men to go ahead by themselves. There is a magnetic quality about his quiet mastery that holds the interest of the auditor without distracting the attention from the music to the conductor's personality. Here is a man who would surely go ahead on his own lines, wherever he might be, and he has the ability to carry his auditors with him; he does not need to try to follow their inclinations. A look, or a slight move of the hand, is sufficient for his purpose, the men understand instantly what is wanted and the desired effect is produced. Boston is to be congratulated upon having secured the services of such a man.

Even a conductor of this type could do little if his instrument—the orchestra under his command—were defective. But, given a leader of Dr. Muck's excellence, with an admirably drilled organization of able musicians under his baton, and remarkable results are to be expected. These conditions were fulfilled last evening. The orchestra itself is about as fine a body of players as could be brought together, and the men were on their mettle for this performance. They played with verve and enthusiasm and the tone was perfectly balanced as regards the relations of the various instruments. The pianissimos were especially beautiful. Dr. Muck reduced the tone several times to the finest possible point and these moments were exquisite in their charm.

All that has been said regarding the high qualities of the strings was abundantly verified. The violinists are all matured, able performers, with no youthful players in their ranks. The same observation might be extended to cover the entire orchestra, for a finer looking body of men is seldom seen on a concert platform. Being supplied with excellent instruments, and with years of hard drilling in routine work, these players work together with perfect unity, and the tone produced by them is of the finest quality. They are, however, allowed some freedom in bowing, this being a departure from the rule to which we have become accustomed. The volume of tone from the violins is surprising, the strings always being able to dominate. The seating of the men, of course, had something to do with this last evening, for all were back on the stage with the strings massed in front. In the forward part of the house, at least, the tone from the basses and 'cellos was several times almost obliterated and the woodwinds could not always hold their own, but this was due to the position of the players and not to any shortcomings on their part. The delicacy of nuance and the finish of the phrasing were qualities that also won considerable admiration, together with the precision and perfection of discipline.

* * * * *

For his opening number Dr. Muck selected the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi," which he presented in a rather broad tempo. The overture was played in a strong and stately spirit, yet it was not dragged, for ... and rhythm were there. The long crescendos showed the perfect control which the leader had over the players and the well-handled climaxes brought out a great ... of tone. In the second number, ... Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," ... was plenty of opportunity to study ... of the different divisions of the ... and close observation was well ... for there was no occasion for ... expressions of admiration. ... the orchestra an opportunity ... brilliancy and virtuosity ... as the quality ... and no ...

...in bowing, this being a departure ... the rule to which we have become accustomed. The volume of tone from the ... is surprising, the strings always ... able to dominate. The seating of the ..., of course, had something to do with ... last evening, for all were back on the ... with the strings massed in front. In ... forward part of the house, at least, the ... from the basses and 'cellos was several times almost obliterated and the woodwinds could not always hold their own, but this was due to the position of the players and not to any shortcomings on their part. ... delicacy of nuance and the finish of the ... were qualities that also won considerable admiration, together with the precision and perfection of discipline.

* * * * *

For his opening number Dr. Muck selected the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi," which he presented in a rather broad tempo. The overture was played in a strong and ... spirit, yet it was not dragged, for ... and rhythm were there. The long ... showed the perfect control which ... had over the players and the ... climaxes brought out a great ... of tone. In the second number, ... Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," ... plenty of opportunity to study ... of the different divisions of the ... and close observation was well ... for there was no occasion for ... expressions of admiration. ... the orchestra an opportunity ... brilliancy and virtuosity ... as the quality ... and no ...

...Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a valuable acquisition to that body. The least demonstrative of any of the great conductors who have visited us, it is evident that the work that Dr. Muck accomplishes is done at rehearsals, and that he regards as superfluous any gestures but those which serve as reminders to his men of this effect or that.

The programme which he set forth comprised only four works, but they were calculated to show to every advantage not only his own skill as conductor, but the skill of the orchestra as well. The overture to Wagner's early opera "Rienzi" is not one of the illustrious master's most successful creations; it is, indeed, somewhat vulgar and commonplace, revealing little of the genius later to be matured. But the orchestra gave it so spirited an interpretation that the work sounded very imposing.

Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" supplied the Boston musicians with the first opoprtunity to show how great was their virtuosity and how effectively was that virtuosity tempered with artistic feeling. Like most of Strauss's work, "Don Juan" is a composition of amazing difficulty, but it is beautiful, too, and both beauty and brilliancy were admirably presented in Dr. Muck's reading of the piece and the orchestra's playing of it.

...—such, in a word, was the verdict of musical Chicago at the close of the concert of the Boston orchestra in the Auditorium last evening. The audience that had gathered to hear the famous eastern organization included almost the entire musical community. It gave evidence of a most cordial feeling and of keen expectancy that great things were about to happen as soon as the players had taken their places. The men were cordially greeted and Dr. Muck, the conductor, was also heartily received. And the expectations were fulfilled, for, as the evening wore on, there were continued expressions of enthusiastic approval which reached a climax with the magnificent performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony. And when the last note had been played there was the most grateful and thoroughly pleased body of auditors that has been seen in a local concert room for many a day.

Playing that showed wonderful technical finish was combined with interpretative powers of the first order, and the result was just what a high-class orchestra should furnish—an indelible impression of the power and beauty of masterpieces played with musical understanding. The auditors went home with the themes of the symphony re-echoing through their minds, and with vivid recollections of the entire programme, for the performance was one that could not be forgotten with the passing moment.

* * * * *

Dr. Muck's personality is one that commands immediate attention. Quiet in manner, and sparing in his use of gestures, he is still in absolute command at every moment. He dominated the orchestra at all times, yet he never made any aggressive assertions of his control. He showed himself to be both intellectual and highly temperamental in his readings; a musician who is a natural leader. His power of control, over his men as well as himself, is extraordinary and his hold is never relaxed, even though he stops beating time, as he did in the symphony, and allows the men to go ahead by themselves. There is a magnetic quality about his quiet mastery that holds the interest of the auditor without distracting the attention from the music to the conductor's personality. Here is a man who would surely go ahead on his own lines, wherever he might be, and he has the ability to carry his auditors with him; he does not need to try to follow their inclinations. A look, or a slight move of the hand, is sufficient for his purpose, the men understand instantly what is wanted and the desired effect is produced. Boston is to be congratulated upon having secured the services of such a man.

Even a conductor of this type could do little if his instrument—the orchestra under his command—were defective. But, given a leader of Dr. Muck's excellence, with an admirably drilled organization of able musicians under his baton, and remarkable results are to be expected. These conditions were fulfilled last evening. The orchestra itself is about as fine a body of players as could be brought together, and the men were on their mettle for this performance. They played with verve and enthusiasm and the tone was perfectly balanced as regards the relations of the various instruments. The pianissimos were especially beautiful. Dr. Muck reduced the tone several times to the finest possible point and these moments were exquisite in their charm.

All that has been said regarding the high qualities of the strings was abundantly verified. The violinists are all matured, able performers, with no youthful players in their ranks. The same observation might be extended to cover the entire orchestra, for a finer looking body of men is seldom seen on a concert platform. Being supplied with excellent instruments, and with years of hard drilling in routine work, these players work together with perfect unity, and the tone produced by them is of the finest quality. They are, however, allowed some freedom in bowing, this being a departure from the rule to which we have become accustomed. The volume of tone from the violins is surprising, the strings always being able to dominate. The seating of the men, of course, had something to do with this last evening, for all were back on the stage with the strings massed in front. In the forward part of the house, at least, the tone from the basses and 'cellos was several times almost obliterated and the woodwinds could not always hold their own, but this was due to the position of the players and not to any shortcomings on their part. The delicacy of nuance and the finish of the phrasing were qualities that also won considerable admiration, together with the precision and perfection of discipline.

* * * * *

For his opening number Dr. Muck selected the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi," which he presented in a rather broad tempo. The overture was played in a strong and stately spirit, yet it was not dragged, for ... and rhythm were there. The long ... showed the perfect control which ... had over the players and the ... climaxes brought out a great ... of tone. In the second number, ... Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," ... plenty of opportunity to study ... of the different divisions of the ... and close observation was well ... for there was no occasion for ... expressions of admiration. ... the orchestra an opportunity ... brilliancy and virtuosity ... as the quality ... and no ...

...in bowing, this being a departure ... the rule to which we have become accustomed. The volume of tone from the ... is surprising, the strings always ... able to dominate. The seating of the ..., of course, had something to do with ... last evening, for all were back on the ... with the strings massed in front. In ... forward part of the house, at least, the ... from the basses and 'cellos was several times almost obliterated and the woodwinds could not always hold their own, but this was due to the position of the players and not to any shortcomings on their part. ... delicacy of nuance and the finish of the ...

COMPRISING
THE CHICAGO HERALD, THE CHICAGO TIMES,
THE CHICAGO RECORD.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 31, 1907.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

"Masterly"—such, in a word, was the verdict of musical Chicago at the close of the concert of the Boston orchestra in the Auditorium last evening. The audience that had gathered to hear the famous eastern organization included almost the entire musical community. It gave evidence of a most cordial feeling and of keen expectancy that great things were about to happen as soon as the players had taken their places. The men were cordially greeted and Dr. Muck, the conductor, was also heartily received. And the expectations were fulfilled, for, as the evening wore on, there were continued expressions of enthusiastic approval which reached a climax with the magnificent performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony. And when the last note had been played there was the most grateful and thoroughly pleased body of auditors that has been seen in a local concert room for many a day.

Playing that showed wonderful technical finish was combined with interpretative powers of the first order, and the result was just what a high-class orchestra should furnish—an indelible impression of the power and beauty of masterpieces played with musical understanding. The auditors went home with the themes of the symphony re-echoing through their minds, and with vivid recollections of the entire programme, for the performance was one that could not be forgotten with the passing moment.

* * * * *

Dr. Muck's personality is one that commands immediate attention. Quiet in manner, and sparing in his use of gestures, he is still in absolute command at every moment. He dominated the orchestra at all times, yet he never made any aggressive assertions of his control. He showed himself to be both intellectual and highly temperamental in his readings; a musician who is a natural leader. His power of control, over his men as well as himself, is extraordinary and his hold is never relaxed, even though he stops beating time, as he did in the symphony, and allows the men to go ahead by themselves. There is a magnetic quality about his quiet mastery that holds the interest of the auditor without distracting the attention from the music to the conductor's personality. Here is a man who would surely go ahead on his own lines, wherever he might be, and he has the ability to carry his auditors with him; he does not need to try to follow their inclinations. A look, or a slight move of the hand, is sufficient for his purpose, the men understand instantly what is wanted and the desired effect is produced. Boston is to be congratulated upon having secured the services of such a man.

Even a conductor of this type could do little if his instrument—the orchestra under his command—were defective. But, given a leader of Dr. Muck's excellence, with an admirably drilled organization of able musicians under his baton, and remarkable results are to be expected. These conditions were fulfilled last evening. The orchestra itself is about as fine a body of players as could be brought together, and the men were on their mettle for this performance. They played with verve and enthusiasm and the tone was perfectly balanced as regards the relations of the various instruments. The pianissimos were especially beautiful. Dr. Muck reduced the tone several times to the finest possible point and these moments were exquisite in their charm.

All that has been said regarding the high qualities of the strings was abundantly verified. The violinists are all matured, able performers, with no youthful players in their ranks. The same observation might be extended to cover the entire orchestra, for a finer looking body of men is seldom seen on a concert platform. Being supplied with excellent instruments, and with years of hard drilling in routine work, these players work together with perfect unity, and the tone produced by them is of the finest quality. They are, however, allowed some freedom in bowing, this being a departure from the rule to which we have become accustomed. The volume of tone from the violins is surprising, the strings always being able to dominate. The seating of the men, of course, had something to do with this last evening, for all were back on the stage with the strings massed in front. In the forward part of the house, at least, the tone from the basses and 'cellos was several times almost obliterated and the woodwinds could not always hold their own, but this was due to the position of the players and not to any shortcomings on their part. The delicacy of nuance and the finish of the phrasing were qualities that also won continual admiration, together with the precision and perfection of discipline.

* * * * *

For his opening number Dr. Muck selected the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi," which he presented in a rather broad tempo. The overture was played in a strong and stately spirit, yet it was not dragged, for life and rhythm were there. The long crescendos showed the perfect control which the leader had over the players and the well-handled climaxes brought out a great volume of tone. In the second number, Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," there was plenty of opportunity to study the quality of the different divisions of the orchestra, and close observation was well rewarded, for there was no occasion for anything but expressions of admiration. Strauss has given the orchestra an opportunity to display its brilliancy and virtuosity in this number, as well as the quality of tone of the various choirs, and no [illegible] allowed to escape without full [illegible] of its essential value. Dr. Muck was much more [illegible] tone-poem than in this overture and [illegible]

[illegible] pianist, appeared as soloist in the Tschaikowsky B flat concerto, No. 1, opus 23, and he demonstrated that he was fitted for the company in which he found himself. He began under high pressure, with uncommon volume of tone, and went through the first movement in the same spirit. In the second portion of the concerto he played as if he were a member of the orchestra, the blending of the piano with the other instruments being admirable. The finale was taken with life and energy. The player's uncommon technical abilities and the bigness of his tone are familiar to Chicago auditors, but they have seldom been more prominently brought out.

* * * * *

But it was the reading of the seventh symphony of Beethoven, which occupied the second half of the programme, that left the deepest impression of all that was done by the orchestra. In the interpretation of Dr. Muck there was no wide departure from that with which Chicago audiences are familiar, but it is seldom, if ever, that a finer, more convincing performance of a splendid work can be heard. This symphony is always one of the most grateful of its series, the orchestra has plenty of opportunity to display its good points and there is ample test for the conductor, in addition. And how finely all acquitted themselves last evening. It was a wonderfully impressive performance of a great work. In the third movement Dr. Muck dropped his baton and contented himself with making slight movements with his left hand, or with an occasional move of his head. Next he stopped all indications to his men and stood perfectly motionless, while the orchestra played on. It was a bit of remarkable work on the part of the players and showed the fine discipline of the organization.

It is announced that the orchestra will make another western trip in January of 1908, and Chicago will be included in the itinerary. No decision has been reached regarding the conductor who will be at the head of the orchestra when it next visits Chicago, for Dr. Muck's plans have not yet been made public.

FREDERIC H. GRISWOLD.

Paper Post
City Chicago
Date JAN 31 1907 State Ill

BIG CROWD GREETS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

First Performance in Chicago in Fifteen Years Arouses the Interest of Music Lovers.

WORK OF PLAYERS PRAISED

Strings Held Especially Admirable for Their Observance of Minutiae of Expression.

One of the most interesting events which the season has brought forth took place last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Karl Muck, gave a performance in the Auditorium.

Inasmuch as nearly fifteen years have elapsed since the orchestra has been heard in Chicago, and since, also, it is the oldest and the most famous organization of its kind in this country, the visit of the Boston Orchestra aroused the liveliest interest among the music-lovers of the city. The outward and visible token of that interest was evident in the host which thronged the vast concert-room, leaving hardly a seat unoccupied. It is possible that many a listener was drawn to the performance by a feeling of curiosity, as well as by the anticipation of much artistic enjoyment.

In the Thomas Orchestra Chicago also possesses an organization the fame of which has traveled to many lands. How do its abilities compare as with those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

To declare that the orchestra founded by Theodore Thomas suffered not at all by comparison with that which was heard last night is to bestow the highest possible praise upon it. For the Boston Symphony Orchestra represented, in its performance, the most exalted standard of proficiency. Finer playing than it gave would be difficult to discover in any country of the world, and there are organizations far older and even more renowned which have seldom played as well.

The strings are especially admirable, not only in their perfect ensemble but in the observance of those minutiae of expression which make for the most artistic performance.

In spite of the fact that the wind instrumentalists in the Boston Orchestra have been held up as models of their kind, the wood wind, and particularly the oboes and clarinets, are inferior in delicacy and refinement of tone to their colleagues in the Thomas Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a valuable acquisition to that body. The least demonstrative of any of the great conductors who have visited us, it is evident that the work that Dr. Muck accomplishes is done at rehearsals, and that he regards as superfluous any gestures but those which serve as reminders to his men of this effect or that.

The programme which he set forth comprised only four works, but they were calculated to show to every advantage not only his own skill as conductor, but the skill of the orchestra as well. The overture to Wagner's early opera "Rienzi" is not one of the illustrious master's most successful creations; it is, indeed, somewhat vulgar and commonplace, revealing little of the genius later to be matured. But the orchestra gave it so spirited an interpretation that the work sounded very imposing.

Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" supplied the Boston musicians with the first opoprtunity to show how great was their virtuosity and how effectively was that virtuosity tempered with artistic feeling. Like most of Strauss's work, "Don Juan" is a composition of amazing difficulty, but it is beautiful, too, and both beauty and brilliancy were admirably presented in Dr. Muck's reading of the piece and the orchestra's playing of it.

The most exacting test which the orchestra set for itself was the performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. In a work of this kind a fine interpretation involves many musical qualifications. It demands perfect technique and beauty of tone; demands, not less, a complete understanding by the players of the conception of the piece which the conductor has formed. All these qualifications were forthcoming in the playing of the symphony by the orchestra, and thereby a performance of wonderful excellence resulted.

So certain was the orchestra of its work that during the greater part of the scherzo Dr. Muck was able to stand motionless in front of his desk and permit his men to play without any other indication from himself than an occasional glance or the raising of a finger.

The soloist of the evening was Rudolph Ganz, who elected to be heard in the first piano concerto of Tschaikowsky. In his performance of this exacting composition Mr. Ganz achieved a great and well-deserved success. The knowledge which Tschaikowsky possessed of the piano was not of that practical nature which could permit him to write music calculated to be grateful to the player, and it is saying much in praise of Mr. Ganz's execution of that music that it sounded not only very brilliant, but also very well adapted to the instrument. In the slow movement the player produced an appealing quality of tone, and gave all possible dash and vigor to the impetuous finale.

FELIX BOROWSKI.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean,

January 31, 1907.

OSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

America's most celebrated musical organization and one of Europe's foremost conductors appeared in the Auditorium last night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, whom Emperor William has loaned to Mr. Higginson for the season, gave a concert which in point of popular interest was the most important event of the year. The splendid theater was filled with an audience that represented the most critical and conservative musical circles of the city. The public that supports our own orchestra so loyally was present in full force. Enthusiasts from neighboring cities, every important resident professional musician, and more than the usual proportion of students swelled the throng and lent it that quick sympathy and interest that is so vital an element in the success of any musical entertainment.

That the audience came prepared to extend a cordial welcome to their distinguished guests was shown by the hearty applause that greeted the members of the orchestra as they filed to their places a few minutes after the time appointed for the beginning of the concert. They are a fine looking body of men, almost all in the prime of life. Here and there a youthful face looked out from the rear ranks, and there were a few gray heads. Ninety-eight strong, they assembled on the great stage of the Auditorium, and memory harked back with a thrill and a pang to the years when our own orchestra gathered there to answer to a baton that beats no more.

Then came the leader. The audience caught a fleeting impression of a slight, graceful figure and a keen, cynical face as he quickly bowed his thanks while the hall rang again with applause. Then he turned to the orchestra and the concert began.

—

Dr. Muck conducts without any mannerisms, without an unnnecessary gesture. There is no attempt to interpret the music after the elaborate Delsarte system his colleague Nikisch has developed to such an irritating degree. He has other means of expression at his command. They are as manifold as music itself, yet it is possible to sum them up in two sentences: First, a wonderfully subtle scheme of dynamic proportions; second, a rare appreciation of rhythmical values. One need not be told that Dr. Muck is a representative exponent of Wagner, and his connection with Baireuth is not needed to emphasize that fact. His treatment of the orchestra in the matter of dynamics suffices to proclaim him a faithful disciple of the father of the modern orchestra, for if ever a conductor worked with definite dynamic standards it is Dr. Muck. He has an absolute and unmistakable piano, a volume of tone in forte that is equally definite, and between these poles the performance moves, passing beyond them to fortissimo or pianissimo, until only to study its beautifully symmetrical proportions becomes a source of keenest pleasure.

When, however, one sees the artistic intention these sensuously delightful proportions are so clearly proclaiming, there comes admiration for the interpretative genius back of this technical perfection. Dr. Muck is an absolutist in music. He is the perfectly transparent medium through which the thought of the composer finds rarely complete revealment. This was demonstrated in the "Rienzi" overture which opened the program. It was a strange selection, for there are many more grateful and more representative works which have remained exclusively in the repertory of the orchestra and not been distorted by the brass bands. But Dr. Muck's reason for this choice was soon made clear, for he read the overture with a breadth that emphasized its dignity and solemnity, the lyric beauty of its themes and the martial splendor of its finale.

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra

A gorgeous performance of Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," followed, one which glowed with all the wealth of orchestral and harmonic color that the genius of Strauss could conceive. Beauty is an element in music that this master of orchestral technic has ignored in his later works to a conspicuous degree. But it is abundantly present in "Don Juan," not merely in color, but in the themes themselves. Lascivious joys find no more eloquent plea in the whole realm of art than this tone-poem contains. But the work was redeemed of its stain of sensuality by Dr. Muck's interpretation, and became a message of beauty almost noble, and surely refined to a point where it lost a measure of its dramatic strength.

—

But the test of the evening came in the Beethoven symphony—the A major, No. 7. Most conductors make it a symphony with one movement—the second—and miss the message of joy and strength that sounds so unmistakably in the first movement, the scherzo and the finale, which all too frequently are played in perfunctory fashion. One can, however, say of his interpretation, as one said of Weingartner's reading of the fifth, that he presented the work as an artistic whole. It might well be taken as a standard of Beethoven interpretation, sane and wholesome in feeling, faithful to the text in the smallest detail of sforzandi accents, and characteristic pianos, maintaining artistic unity with firm yet elastic tempi, and attaining that variety so necessary to interest by its wonderful dynamic contrasts. It was one of those rare interpretations that seem to present a complete picture of the musical personality of the composer.

It was in the scherzo of the symphony that Dr. Muck permitted himself the only mannerism of the evening. He allowed the orchestra to play the first section and all its repetitions without beating time, after he had indicated the tempo in the first four measures. It greatly impressed the audience, for it seemed to indicate a remarkable proficiency on the part of the orchestra. In reality, the baton was not needed in this movement until the change of tempo came with the trio, and then Dr. Muck was careful to indicate his intentions. For the rest a glance of the eye was all that was necessary to signal the entrance of the various instruments, and that the conductor gave.

—

There can be no question of the excellence of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is as near perfection as orchestras ever attain. All sections are models of efficiency. The strings possess a unity and a fullness of tone that are remarkable. The woodwinds contain some artists at the first desks that any master of orchestra would find a joy, and the brasses are sonorous without hint of harshness. But those who seek to draw instructive comparisons between the Bostonians and our own orchestra are likely to miss the mark. In the first place the acoustics of the Auditorium and Orchestra hall render a comparison impossible. Then, familiarity with our own organization makes us better informed as to any shortcomings it may possess, while one hearing could hardly acquaint us with the faults of our distinguished visitors. Personally I believe both organizations are to be ranked with the world's best, which is sufficient honor for all.

—

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Rudolph Ganz, who scored one of the sensational successes of the season in the Tschaikowsky B flat minor concerto. This work has added to the fame of many an artist, for it invites the attention of the technical specialist. Herr A. plays it to show off his octaves in the first movement. Mme. B. displays her brilliant finger technic in the finale. Mr. Ganz is not a technical specialist. Nevertheless he possesses a truly colossal command of the keyboard. Therefore, he not only showed off his octaves in the first movement and his scales in the last, but he gave a musically complete interpretation of the work which revealed in fuller measure than it has ever been my pleasure to hear the poetic temperamental and dramatic content of this rarely grateful concerto. Even the confusing second movement became a perfectly clear and comprehensible tone-poem of exquisite beauty, while the tempestuous finale carried the audience by storm.

Though many times recalled, Mr. Ganz refused an encore.

GLENN DILLARD GUNN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Written for "The Press" by Wilson G. Smith.

IN THE score book in which I followed Dr. Muck's reading of the Beethoven symphony Tuesday evening there reposes a program 23 years old. It is a Theo. Thomas concert program, and recalls to my memory an illuminative interpretation of the seventh symphony that I have never heard approached in classic simplicity and charm until I heard the Bostonians under Muck.

There is a striking similarity between Muck's passive potency and aggressiveness, and Theo. Thomas. A glance of the eye, a gesture of the hand, or an inclination of the head awakens the desired response from his men. And his men—they have become a mechanism pregnant with vitalized force. Muck has only to touch the artistic button and they do the rest.

Did you notice that when Muck at intervals discontinued the use of the baton the playing went on with the same mechanical perfection and tonal finish? The waters rush over Niagara Falls by virtue of the same reason—they can't help it.

* * *

The Boston orchestra has been under the greatest drill masters for the past two decades. Its complement is of the best artistic material and, if you noted it, its members have all arrived at years of artistic discretion.

There is no untamed youth to slop over emotionally or run rampant in technical complications.

Muck has the benefit of all this, and he has made the most of his opportunity. It is the best balanced orchestra I have ever heard. In the strings, wood-wind and brass choirs there is such a tonal blend that the most perfectly artistic nuances of shading and emotional expression are not only possible, but adequately realized.

I have heard the Thomas exposition of the wonderful "Allegretto" echoing in my memory for 23 years, and I expect to heard Muck's for a similar term if I live that long.

It was an idealized exposition of classic chastity, and shone as resplendent as a marble statue in the sunlight. And what is true of this movement applies to the entire reading of Beethoven's immortal symphony. Wagner's Meistersinger Prelude I have heard done fully as well—if not better—by Paur. It reached the borders of blatancy at times in some of its climaces.

* * *

Dr. Muck is my ideal of a director. He has the torrential emotion of a volcano, but it is repressed and dominated by intellectual equilibrium. Evidently his interpretative work is done at rehearsals. His men—perfectly drilled and responsive—need but the suggestion of his eye to realize his behests.

Adamowski gave a brilliant and musicianly interpretation to Saint Saens' violin concerto. I liked him best in the lyrical "Siciliano" and the final movement, which last was played with scintilating verve and brilliancy.

The first movement seemed a trifle uncertain, both in technical clarity and tonal finish. The concert was one of memorable interest and import, and established for us a standard of perfect orchestral interpretation. By it we can judge others that follow.

Tribune

JANUARY 31, 1907.

NEWS OF THE THEATERS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Chicago music lovers paid a splendid tribute to Boston's great orchestra last evening in the Auditorium. The concert room was filled to its last available space, not a seat in box, parquet, balcony, or galleries being vacant. And it was an audience notable for quality as well as numbers. All that is best in the city's musical, literary, and professional circles was liberally represented, and the approval bestowed upon the famous orchestra and on Dr. Muck, its leader, was the approval of the most discriminating and most cultured music lovers Chicago possesses.

There was cordiality in the air from the start. Everybody seemed glad to be present and the vast assemblage and the keyed up expectancy which was inseparable from the hearing of the orchestra after full fifteen years of absence from the city gave the occasion a gala character which held throughout the entire evening. As soon as the men began to appear on the stage they were greeted with a round of applause, and when they all were seated and Dr. Muck came into view a welcome of most cordial kind was extended them and him.

After every number there were recalls for the leader, and when, after the Strauss tone poem, he had the entire orchestra rise, the huge wave of applause which swept up to it could but have told that every one present admired, approved, and was grateful not only for what then was offered but for that for which the Boston organization stands—that generous spirit which has made the founding of symphony orchestras in various cities throughout the United States possible. This eastern organization is the eldest of existent symphonic bodies in this country, and as such it commands a kindly admiration entirely apart from that which its exceptional abilities compel.

The concert was a source of sincerest, truest enjoyment. There is no other place in Chicago and but few others in the country where orchestral music sounds so well as it does in the Auditorium. The wonderful acoustic properties of the great hall give to the tone of every instrument its fullest, purest beauty. Everything is perfectly clear, and yet every individual tonal value blends with all the others. The strings of the orchestra take on a velvety softness—a tonal glory which makes their every sound a delight to the ear; the wood winds never are hard or shrill; the brasses never are blatant or blaring—all is rich, rounded, liquid in quality.

Mr. Thomas was wont to declare that in no other concert room in which he ever had directed had every instrument come so perfectly to hearing as in the Auditorium. Our own orchestra cast aside its tonal halo when it became necessary to move to Orchestra hall, and that halo never has been recovered, bravely and ceaselessly though Mr. Stock and the men of the orchestra have striven. The Boston players came, therefore, into glorifying conditions when they began their concert. Not only the splendid audience was inspiring, but the consciousness of each musician that the tone of his instrument was at its best—and how instantly every musician feels this—placed the orchestra at its finest, and the result was exhilaration for every one concerned.

—

The performance last evening was notable, first, for the wonderful tonal beauty that characterized it. Lovelier tone, both individual and in mass, has not been heard from any instrumentalists here in Chicago. The strings were source of unending delight—strong, vibrant, vital, and yet glorified with a golden softness and richness that made them seem not the product of material substance.

The wood wind choir, of which so much had been written in praise and of which consequently so much was expected, proved truly splendid, albeit not so startlingly superior as had been anticipated. We have a wood wind choir which we hear every week the excellence of which safely stands comparison with that of the one of the Boston orchestra. And stating this as explanation for failure to be astonished speaks no disparagement of the superb quality of the visitors' work. It is of the finest, and hearing last evening was a joy.

The brasses, too, are wonderfully sonorous, full, and rich. The whole organization is one easily without superior in the world, and with but extremely few equals. Tonally and technically it is virtually faultless. There is nothing it cannot do, and everything it does is certain to be beautiful, at least as far as tone itself is concerned.

And the musical side of the performance? That depends largely upon the leader, and in the person of Dr. Muck the audience made the acquaintance of a conductor and musician who commands the sincerest respect and heartiest admiration. There is nothing of the "prima donna, virtuoso" conductor about Dr. Muck. A man young and active, slight of figure and medium as regards height, his smooth shaven face strong and characterful, his dark hair worn slightly tousled but at only normal length, he comes quietly and simply forward, takes his place at the desk, bows his acknowledgment, and begins. There is nothing of frill, of pose, or of self-consciousness about anything he does. A man evidently who knows his powers and respects them, but does not parade them.

He directs with exceptional quietness. Theodore Thomas in his calmest moments made no less motion than does Dr. Muck a greater part of the time. His gestures are graceful and easy and invariably meaningful. He caresses and draws the tone from the orchestra rather than punches and digs it out. All is unobtrusively and directly done. In certain places in the last two movements of the Beethoven symphony he did no directing at all with his hands. He stood easily at rest and only an occasional motion of the head told that his eyes were following every movement in the orchestra and that his mind was keen and alert. In many men such a procedure would have smacked of affectation, but it did not in Dr. Muck. He suggested rather the pleasure felt in seeing a perfect mechanism working perfectly—as when an engineer, feeling his mighty machine responding to his slightest wish and finding a stretch of clear, straight track ahead of him, drops his hand from the throttle and sits back admiringly watching the faultless working of that which he has set in motion and which he controls.

Dr. Muck is fond of deliberate tempos. He does not drag anything, but he realizes that in certain works a slight broadening of the time may give added nobility and worth. The "Rienzi" Overture of Wagner, with which the concert opened, brilliantly exemplified this. The composition is far from the worthiest of the Wagner creations—it is weak Wagner and not especially good Meyerbeer—and few are the performances of it which do not impress with the tawdriness of the music. Dr. Muck last evening by taking a slow tempo and giving the melodic line a semblance of real value actually made the overture seem musically important. The cheapness of the latter portion was cleverly concealed, and the whole performance thus made one of the most original of the evening.

The Strauss "Don Juan" followed. It, too, was taken deliberately, but with sufficient passion to lend it brilliancy, and the fine big sweep that belong to it. The latter half of the program was devoted to the seventh symphony of Beethoven, and in it Dr. Muck showed himself a reader par excellence of the works of the mighty Ludwig. There were saneness, logic, and musical reason in everything he did and abundant spirit, a neat sense of humor, a nice blending of sentiment, and a humanness about it all that made the interpretation beautiful, convincing, inspiring, and vital. It was live Beethoven. Dr. Muck knows the value of the melodic line just as do Mr. Weingartner and Mr. Stock, and he raises it constantly into prominence just as do they. The result is the whole orchestra becomes lyric, and its utterance a song. Especially beautiful in the symphony was his reading of the allegretto and of the presto.

The soloist of the evening was Rudolph Ganz, who in the Tschaikowsky B flat minor Concerto placed to his credit one of the most brilliant performances both technically and musically that has been heard from any pianist in Chicago in years. The great, splendid work was played with just the right bigness and sweep, and yet with the sentiment and fine emotional quality which it demands. Never has Mr. Ganz loomed larger artistically than he did last night, when both he and the orchestra gave a performance which was virtually faultless in every respect.

W. L. HUBBARD.

[134]

...EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

THURSDAY, JANUARY 31, 1907

...USIC AND DRAMA.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA REAPPEARS IN CHICAGO

...First Concert There in Fifteen Years—A Notable Audience, Reception and Reward—The Praise of the Reviewers for the Orchestra and for Dr. Muck—Expectations That Were Wholly Fulfilled—The Withdrawal of "Salome"—The Question of Performances Outside New York Still Undecided—An Impending Flood of Musical Plays

For the first time in fifteen years our ...mphony Orchestra gave a concert, last ...ening, in Chicago. For weeks expectation has run high; Chicago is more keenly and widely interested in orchestral music than any other American city, and the present concert-going generation there has known the Boston orchestra only by reputation. Dr. Muck was as new to it and his coming as conductor raised anticipation higher. By all accounts this morning the conductor and the band fulfilled every expectation. The reviewers call the concert "memorable"; the audience was equally notable for its numbers, quality and eager interest, and its applause could hardly have been warmer. The programme comprised Beethoven's seventh symphony, Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan"; Wagner's overture to his opera, "Rienzi," and Tschaikovski's first piano concerto with Mr. Ganz playing the solo part. Below are extracts from the reviews of the concert that appear today in the Chicago Tribune, Record-Herald and Inter-Ocean.

In the Tribune, Mr. Hubbard writes: Chicago music lovers paid a splendid tribute to Boston's great orchestra last evening in the auditorium. The concert room was filled to its last available space, not a seat in box, parquet, balcony, or galleries being vacant. And it was an audience notable for quality as well as numbers. All that is best in the city's musical, literary and professional circles was liberally represented, and the approval bestowed upon the famous orchestra and on Dr. Muck, its leader, was the approval of the most discriminating and most cultured music lovers Chicago possesses. There was cordiality in the air from the start. Everybody seemed glad to be present and the vast assemblage and the keyed-up expectancy which were inseparable from the hearing of the orchestra after full fifteen years of absence from the city gave the occasion a gala character, which held throughout the entire evening. As soon as the men began to appear on the stage they were greeted with a round of applause, and when they were seated and Dr. Muck came into view a welcome of most cordial kind was extended them and him. After every number there were recalls for the leader, and when, after Strauss's tone-poem, he had the entire orchestra rise, the huge wave of applause which swept up to it could but have told that every one present admired, approved, and was grateful not only for what then was offered but far that for which the Boston organization stands—the generous spirit which has made the founding of symphony orchestras in various cities throughout the United States possible. This Eastern organization is the eldest of existing symphony bodies in this country, and as such it commands a kindly admiration entirely apart from that which its exceptional abilities compel.

The performance was notable, first, for the wonderful tonal beauty that characterized it. Lovelier tone, both individual and in mass, has not been heard from any instrumentalists here in Chicago. The strings were a source of unending delight—strong, vibrant, vital, and yet glorified with a golden softness and richness that made them seem not the product of material substance. The woodwind choir, of which so much has been written in praise and of which consequently so much was expected, proved truly splendid, albeit not so startlingly superior as had been anticipated. We have a woodwind choir which we hear every week, the excellence of which safely stands comparison with that department of the Boston Orchestra. And to state this as explanation for failure to be astonished speaks no disparagement of the superb quality of the visitors' work. It is of the finest and to hear it was a joy. The brasses, too, are wonderfully sonorous, full and rich. The whole organization is one easily without superior in the world and with but extremely few equals. Tonally and technically it is virtually faultless. There is nothing it cannot do, and everything it does is certain to be beautiful, at least as far as tone itself is concerned.

And the musical side of the performance? That depends largely upon the leader, and in the person of Dr. Muck the audience made the acquaintance of a conductor and a musician who commands the sincerest respect and heartiest admiration. There is nothing of the "prima donna" or the "virtuoso" conductor about Dr. Muck. A man, young and active, slight of figure and medium as regards height; his smooth-shaven face, strong and characterful; his dark hair worn slightly tousled, but at only moderate length, he comes quietly and simply forward, takes his place at the desk, makes his acknowledgment and begins. There is no trace of frill, of pose, or of self-consciousness about anything he does. A man who knows his powers and respects them, but does not parade them. He has an exceptional quietness. Theodore Thomas in his calmest moments made more motion than does Dr. Muck a large part of the time. His gestures are few and invariably meaningful. He gets the tone from the instruments, and he gets it with the least effort that is consistent with clearness and force. He does not use his baton as a club to beat the orchestra into submission, but it is used as a means of communication between himself and the men, and he digs it out. All is unobtrusively and directly done. In certain places in the last two movements in the Beethoven Seventh Symphony he did no directing at all with his hands. He stood easily at rest and only an occasional motion of the head told that his eyes were following every movement in the orchestra and that his mind was keen and alert. In many men such a procedure would have smacked of affectation, but it did not in Dr. Muck. He suggested rather the pleasure felt in seeing a perfect mechanism working perfectly—as when an engineer, feeling his mighty machine responding to his slightest wish and finding a stretch of clear, straight track ahead of him, drops his hand from the throttle and sits back admiringly watching the faultless working of that which he has set in motion and which he controls.

In the Record-Herald Mr. Griswold continues: "Masterly," such in a word, was the verdict of musical Chicago at the close of the concert of the Boston Orchestra in the Auditorium last evening. The audience that had gathered to hear the famous Eastern organization included almost the entire musical community. It gave evidence of most cordial feeling and of keen expectancy that great things were about to happen as soon as the players had taken their places. The men were cordially greeted, and Dr. Muck, the conductor, was also heartily received. And the expectations were fulfilled, for, as the evening wore on, there were continued expressions of enthusiastic approval which reached a climax with the significant performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony. When the last note had been played there was the most grateful and thoroughly pleased body of auditors that has been seen in a local concert room for many a day. Playing that showed wonderful technical finish was combined with interpretative powers of the first order, and the result was just what a high-class orchestra should furnish, an indelible impression of the power and beauty of masterpieces played with musical understanding. The auditors went home with the themes of the symphony reëchoing through their minds, with vivid recollections of the entire programme, for the performance was one that could not be forgotten with the passing moment.

Dr. Muck personally is one that commands immediate attention. Quiet in manner, and sparing in his use of gestures, he was still in absolute command at every moment. He dominated the orchestra at all times, yet he never made any aggressive assertion of his control. He showed himself to be both intellectual and highly temperamental in his reading, a musician who is a natural leader. His power of control over his men as well as himself is extraordinary, and his hold is never relaxed, even though he stops beating the time, as he did in the symphony, and allows the men to go ahead by themselves. There is a magnetic quality about his quiet mastery that holds the interest of the auditor without distracting his attention from the music to the conductor's personality. Here is a man who would surely go ahead on his own lines wherever he might be and he has the ability to carry his auditors with him. He does not need to try to follow their inclinations. A look or a slight move of the hand is sufficient for his purpose. The men understand instantly what is wanted and the desired effect is produced. Boston is to be congratulated upon having secured the services of such a man.

Even a conductor of this type could do little if his instrument—the orchestra under his command—were defective. But, given a leader of Dr. Muck's excellence, with an admirably drilled organization of able musicians under his baton, and remarkable results are to be expected. These conditions were fulfilled last evening. The orchestra itself is about as fine a body of players as could be brought together and the men were on their mettle for this performance. They played with verve and enthusiasm and the tone was perfectly balanced as regards the relations of the various instruments. The pianissimos were especially beautiful. Dr. Muck reduced the tone several times to the finest possible point and these moments were exquisite in their charm.

All that has been said regarding the high qualities of the strings was abundantly verified. The violinists were all matured, able performers, with no youthful players in their ranks. The same observation might be extended to cover the entire orchestra, for a finer looking body of men is seldom seen on a concert platform. Being supplied with excellent instruments, and with years of hard drilling in routine work, these players work together with perfect unity, and the tone produced by them is of the finest quality. They are, however, allowed some freedom in bowing, this being a departure from the rule to which we have been accustomed. The volume of tone from the violins is surprising, the strings always being able to dominate. The seating of the men of course had something to do with this last evening, for all were back on the stage with the strings massed in front. In the forward part of the house, at least, the tone from the basses and cellos was several times almost obliterated, and the woodwinds could not always hold their own, but this was due to the position of the players and not to any shortcomings on their part. The delicacy of nuance and the finish of the phrasing were qualities that also won continual admiration, together with the precision and perfection of discipline.

In the Inter-Ocean Mr. Dunn concludes: America's most celebrated musical organization and one of Europe's foremost conductors appeared in the Auditorium last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, whom Emperor William has loaned to Mr. Higginson for the season, gave a concert which in point of popular interest was the most important musical event of the year. The splendid theatre was filled with an audience that represented the most critical and conservative [illegible] the world and but it that quite [illegible] and interest that are so vital an element in the success of any musical entertainment. That the audience came prepared to extend a cordial welcome to their distinguished guests was shown by the hearty applause that greeted the members of the orchestra as they filed to their places a few minutes after the time appointed for the beginning of the concert. They are a fine looking body of men, almost all in the prime of life. Here and there a youthful face looked out from the rear ranks and there were a few gray heads. Ninety-eight strong, they assembled on the great stage of the Auditorium and memory harked back with a thrill and a pang to the years when our own orchestra gathered there to answer to a baton that beats no more.

Then came the leader. The audience caught a fleeting impression of a slight, graceful figure and a keen, cynical face as he quickly bowed his thanks while the hall rang again with the applause. Then he turned to the orchestra and the concert began. Dr. Muck conducts without any mannerisms, without an unnecessary gesture. There is no attempt to interpret the music after the elaborate Delsarte system that a predecessor, Nikisch, had developed to such an irritating degree. Dr. Muck has other means of expression at his command. They are as manifold as music itself, yet it is possible to sum them up in two sentences: First, a wonderfully subtle scheme of dynamic proportions; second, a rare appreciation of rhythmical values. One need not be told that Dr. Muck is a representative exponent of Wagner and his connection with Baireuth is not needed to emphasize that fact. His treatment of the orchestra in the matter of dynamics suffices to proclaim him a faithful disciple of the father of the modern orchestra, for if ever a conductor worked with definite dynamic standards it is Dr. Muck. He has an absolute and unmistakable piano, a volume of tone in forte that is equally definite, and between these poles the performance moves, passing beyond them to fortissimo or pianissimo, until only to study its beautifully symmetrical proportions becomes a source of keenest pleasure. When, however, one sees the artistic intention these sensuously delightful proportions are so clearly proclaiming, there comes admiration for the interpretative genius back of this technical perfection. Dr. Muck is an "absolutist" in music. He is the perfectly transparent medium through which the thought of the composer finds rarely complete revealment.

There can be no question of the excellence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is as near perfection as orchestras ever attain. All sections are models of efficiency. The strings possess a unity and a fulness of tone that are remarkable. The woodwinds contain some artists at the first desks that any master of orchestration would find a joy, and the brasses are sonorous without hint of harshness. But these who seek to draw instructive comparisons between the Bostonians and our own orchestra are likely to miss the mark. In the first place the acoustics of the Auditorium and of Orchestra Hall make a comparison impossible. Then familiarity with our own organization makes us better informed as to any shortcomings it may possess, while one hearing could hardly acquaint us with the faults of our distinguished visitors. Both organizations are to be ranked with the world's best, which is sufficient honor for all.

...ulty in securing results, but happily the ...liance in this case is of the sort that ...combined, works wonders.

"Rienzi" Overture Played.

Wagner's "Rienzi" overture opened the programme in a deliberate tempo that impressed its breadth in the stately movement, the sweeping crescendos showing the unity of artistic association, while leadership led on to climaxes splendid in tonal volume. The tone poem of Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" had an opulence of color in its tone and there was sufficient to gratify the most exacting; while a certain refinement of performance in this reading eliminated the languorous sensuality that Strauss presents in its acme in "Salome." The softness and rich roundness of the strings revealed dulcet quality; the famed wood-wind choir gave well-tempered response and the brass was never blatant, was vibrant, singularly sonorous; all united in well-modulated effect, individual and en masse; but there are others, and Chicagoans have no ground for either adverse comparison or complaint. The fact that the Don Juan music was not carried with passionate intensity and had that artistic deliberativeness of delivery seemingly characteristic of this director did not militate against it, for its message came beautifully and brilliantly with a dignified sweep that carried conviction.

Second Half of Programme.

The Beethoven symphony in A major occupied the second half of the programme and made a deep impression, testing the organization and its leadership on all points and finding it unwanting, eminently satisfactory. It was fitting that Rudolph Ganz, a Chicago pianist, should have been the soloist with this great eastern organization in its tourney of the west. The medium of his appearance was Tschaikowsy's concerto in B flat minor and its broad and virile interpretation marked his growth as an artist worthy of such association. He started with a big tone that he sustained unwavering in truth and spirit through the entire movement without apparent effort. Mr. Ganz played the andantino with such reverential respect for the baton of Dr. Muck that he was ever in harmonious sympathy with the orchestra; while the final movement was marked by amazing vitality that kept the solo instrument superior to the orchestral force, yet the subtle blending of beauty was always apparent. All in all it was a great night for Chicago, the Boston symphony orchestra, et al.

THE DAILY NEWS,

JANUARY 31, 1907.

DR. KARL MUCK LEADS

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Splendid Concert at the Auditorium.

HAS NINETY-SIX MUSICIANS

Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Beethoven's Symphony in A Major.

A distinctive and discriminating audience crowded the Auditorium last evening to welcome Dr. Karl Muck and pay tribute to the Boston Symphony orchestra as the oldest organization of its class in America and one second to none in the world. In speaking of the effect of the music as heard in the Auditorium, it is well to emphasize again its superiority of construction in securing rare acoustical values; therein the visiting orchestra certainly enjoyed advantages in a hearing that unerringly revealed all the finer nouances of tone and expression. The Boston Symphony orchestra had on this occasion its highest enlistment of ninety-six instrumentalists and never appeared here before to better advantage. While many of the players have been associated with it for years, they all appear to be in the prime of life: and in ensemble work there is such close, strong sympathy, it sometimes seems as if the Kneisel quartet were merely multiplied in this great company. At times the effects last evening had the delicacy of a whisper and the tone ever had a roundness, sympathy and clarity [illegible]

Paper News

City Detroit Milwaukee

FEB 1 - 1907 State Wis Mich

Dr. Carl Muck Proves Deserving of the Highest Praise

No single listener of the vast audience that attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Light Guard armory Thursday night, the fourth of the Detroit Orchestral association's series, could have gone away with anything but a feeling of artistic satisfaction.

In reviewing this performance one's first thought is of Dr. Karl Muck, whose conducting has been eagerly anticipated in Detroit. Surely his praises have not been sung too highly.

Dr. Muck combines most satisfactorily the intellectual and the emotional. Almost Italian in appearance, the precise, controlled way in which he leads up to a finale does not seem incongruous, while the delicacy with which he stills that organization of more than 75 different personalities to the last whispering notes is like the descent of a fairy staircase. He believes in absolutely faithful interpretation of the score under his hand, filling the ears of his hearers, regardless of their possession or lack of technical training, with the purest classics and most of all in the eternal and sympathetic interest of his orchestra.

For the first time in his picturesque career, Timothee Adamowski appeared in Detroit as a soloist. To have heard Saint Saens' B-minor concerto played by this man, whose superlative temperamental powers have been intensified, especially of late years, by earnest application, is to have heard an appeal that could not help but strike home.

The orchestra itself needs no commendation. Like a huge artery, it throbs and pulsates with a single purpose. Fully two-thirds of its personnel remains unchanged. From the heart-stirring "Longing" theme of the Strauss tone poem to the magnificent climax of the "Glazounoff Symphony," it thrilled and satisfied. Appreciation of these numbers, performed here for the first time, was greatly enhanced by the copious annotations provided by Mrs. N. J. Corey.

[135]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
THURSDAY, JANUARY 31, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA REAPPEARS IN CHICAGO

Its First Concert There in Fifteen Years—A Notable Audience, Reception and Reward—The Praise of the Reviewers for the Orchestra and for Dr. Muck—Expectations That Were Wholly Fulfilled—The Withdrawal of "Salome"—The Question of Performances Outside New York Still Undecided—An Impending Flood of Musical Plays

For the first time in fifteen years our Symphony Orchestra gave a concert, last evening, in Chicago. For weeks expectation has run high; Chicago is more keenly and widely interested in orchestral music than any other American city, and the present concert-going generation there has known the Boston orchestra only by reputation. Dr. Muck was as new to it and his coming as conductor raised anticipation higher. By all accounts this morning the conductor and the band fulfilled every expectation. The reviewers call the concert "memorable"; the audience was equally notable for its numbers, quality and eager interest, and its applause could hardly have been warmer. The programme comprised Beethoven's seventh symphony, Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan"; Wagner's overture to his opera, "Rienzi," and Tschaikovski's first piano concerto with Mr. Ganz playing the solo part. Below are extracts from the reviews of the concert that appear today in the Chicago Tribune, Record-Herald and Inter-Ocean.

In the Tribune, Mr. Hubbard writes: Chicago music lovers paid a splendid tribute to Boston's great orchestra last evening in the Auditorium. The concert room was filled to its last available space, not a seat in box, parquet, balcony, or galleries being vacant. And it was an audience notable for quality as well as numbers. All that is best in the city's musical, literary and professional circles was liberally represented, and the approval bestowed upon the famous orchestra and on Dr. Muck, its leader, was the approval of the most discriminating and most cultured music lovers Chicago possesses. There was cordiality in the air from the start. Everybody seemed glad to be present and the vast assemblage and the keyed-up expectancy which were inseparable from the hearing of the orchestra after full fifteen years of absence from the city gave the occasion a gala character, which held throughout the entire evening. As soon as the men began to appear on the stage they were greeted with a round of applause, and when they were seated and Dr. Muck came into view a welcome of most cordial kind was extended them and him. After every number there were recalls for the leader, and when, after Strauss's tone-poem, he had the entire orchestra rise, the huge wave of applause which swept up to it could but have told that every one present admired, approved, and was grateful not only for what then was offered but for that for which the Boston organization stands—the generous spirit which has made the founding of symphony orchestras in various cities throughout the United States possible. This Eastern organization is the eldest of existing symphony bodies in this country, and as such it commands a kindly admiration entirely apart from that which its exceptional abilities compel.

The performance was notable, first, for the wonderful tonal beauty that characterized it. Lovelier tone, both individual and in mass, has not been heard from any instrumentalists here in Chicago. The strings were a source of unending delight—strong, vibrant, vital, and yet glorified with a golden softness and richness that made them seem not the product of material substance. The woodwind choir, of which so much has been written in praise and of which consequently so much was expected, proved truly splendid, albeit not so startlingly superior as had been anticipated. We have a woodwind choir which we hear every week, the excellence of which safely stands comparison with that department of the Boston Orchestra. And to state this as explanation for failure to be astonished speaks no disparagement of the superb quality of the visitors' work. It is of the finest and to hear it was a joy. The brasses, too, are wonderfully sonorous, full and rich. The whole organization is one easily without superior in the world and with but extremely few equals. Tonally and technically it is virtually faultless. There is nothing it cannot do, and everything it does is certain to be beautiful, at least as far as tone itself is concerned.

And the musical side of the performance? That depends largely upon the leader, and in the person of Dr. Muck the audience made the acquaintance of a conductor and a musician who commands the sincerest respect and heartiest admiration. There is nothing of the "prima donna" or the "virtuoso" conductor about Dr. Muck. A man, young and active, slight of figure and medium as regards height; his smooth-shaven face, strong and characterful; his dark hair worn slightly tousled, but at only normal length, he comes quietly and simply forward, takes his place at the desk, bows his acknowledgment and begins. There is nothing of frill, of pose, or of self-consciousness about anything he does. A man evidently who knows his powers and respects them, but does not parade them. He directs with exceptional quietness. Theodore Thomas in his calmest moments made no less motion than does Dr. Muck a greater part of the time. His gestures are graceful and easy and invariably meaningful. He caresses and draws the tone from [illegible] than [illegible] and digs it out. All is unobtrusively and directly done. In certain places in the last two movements in the Beethoven Seventh Symphony he did no directing at all with his hands. He stood easily at rest and only an occasional motion of the head told that his eyes were following every movement in the orchestra and that his mind was keen and alert. In many men such a procedure would have smacked of affectation, but it did not in Dr. Muck. He suggested rather the pleasure felt in seeing a perfect mechanism working perfectly—as when an engineer, feeling his mighty machine responding to his slightest wish and finding a stretch of clear, straight track ahead of him, drops his hand from the throttle and sits back admiringly watching the faultless working of that which he has set in motion and which he controls.

In the Record-Herald Mr. Griswold continues: "Masterly," such in a word, was the verdict of musical Chicago at the close of the concert of the Boston Orchestra in the Auditorium last evening. The audience that had gathered to hear the famous Eastern organization included almost the entire musical community. It gave evidence of most cordial feeling and of keen expectancy that great things were about to happen as soon as the players had taken their places. The men were cordially greeted, and Dr. Muck, the conductor, was also heartily received. And the expectations were fulfilled, for, as the evening wore on, there were continued expressions of enthusiastic approval which reached a climax with the significant performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony. When the last note had been played there was the most grateful and thoroughly pleased body of auditors that has been seen in a local concert room for many a day. Playing that showed wonderful technical finish was combined with interpretative powers of the first order, and the result was just what a high-class orchestra should furnish, an indelible impression of the power and beauty of masterpieces played with musical understanding. The auditors went home with the themes of the symphony reëchoing through their minds, with vivid recollections of the entire programme, for the performance was one that could not be forgotten with the passing moment.

Dr. Muck personally is one that commands immediate attention. Quiet in manner, and sparing in his use of gestures, he was still in absolute command at every moment. He dominated the orchestra at all times, yet he never made any aggressive assertion of his control. He showed himself to be both intellectual and highly temperamental in his reading, a musician who is a natural leader. His power of control over his men as well as himself is extraordinary, and his hold is never relaxed, even though he stops beating the time, as he did in the symphony, and allows the men to go ahead by themselves. There is a magnetic quality about his quiet mastery that holds the interest of the auditor without distracting his attention from the music to the conductor's personality. Here is a man who would surely go ahead on his own lines wherever he might be and he has the ability to carry his auditors with him. He does not need to try to follow their inclinations. A look or a slight move of the hand is sufficient for his purpose. The men understand instantly what is wanted and the desired effect is produced. Boston is to be congratulated upon having secured the services of such a man.

Even a conductor of this type could do little if his instrument—the orchestra under his command— were defective. But, given a leader of Dr. Muck's excellence, with an admirably drilled organization of able musicians under his baton, and remarkable results are to be expected. These conditions were fulfilled last evening. The orchestra itself is about as fine a body of players as could be brought together and the men were on their mettle for this performance. They played with verve and enthusiasm and the tone was perfectly balanced as regards the relations of the various instruments. The pianissimos were especially beautiful. Dr. Muck reduced the tone several times to the finest possible point and these moments were exquisite in their charm.

All that has been said regarding the hign qualities of the strings was abundantly verified. The violinists were all matured, able performers, with no youthful players in their ranks. The same observation might be extended to cover the entire orchestra, for a finer looking body of men is seldom seen on a concert platform. Being supplied with excellent instruments, and with years of hard drilling in routine work, these players work together with perfect unity, and the tone produced by them is of the finest quality. They are, however, allowed some freedom in bowing, this being a departure from the rule to which we have been accustomed. The volume of tone from the violins is surprising, the strings always being able to dominate. The seating of the men of course had something to do with this last evening, for all were back on the stage with the strings massed in front. In the forward part of the house, at least, the tone from the basses and cellos was several times almost obliterated, and the woodwinds could not always hold their own, but this was due to the position of the players and not to any shortcomings on their part. The delicacy of nuance and the finish of the phrasing were qualities that also won continual admiration, together with the precision and perfection of discipline.

In the Inter-Ocean Mr. Dunn concludes: America's most celebrated musical organization and one of Europe's foremost conductors appeared in the Auditorium last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, whom Emperor William has loaned to Mr. Higginson for the season, gave a concert which in point of popular interest was the most important musical event of the year. The splendid theatre was filled with an audience that represented the most critical and conservative musical c[illegible] that supports our own orchestra so loyally was present in full force. Enthusiasts from neighboring cities, every important resident professional musician, and more than the usual proportion of students swelled the throng and lent it that quick sympathy and interest that are so vital an element in the success of any musical entertainment. That the audience came prepared to extend a cordial welcome to their distinguished guests was shown by the hearty applause that greeted the members of the orchestra as they filed to their places a few minutes after the time appointed for the beginning of the concert. They are a fine looking body of men, almost all in the prime of life. Here and there a youthful face looked out from the rear ranks and there were a few gray heads. Ninety-eight strong, they assembled on the great stage of the Auditorium and memory harked back with a thrill and a pang to the years when our own orchestra gathered there to answer to a baton that beats no more.

Then came the leader. The audience caught a fleeting impression of a slight, graceful figure and a keen, cynical face as he quickly bowed his thanks while the hall rang again with the applause. Then he turned to the orchestra and the concert began. Dr. Muck conducts without any mannerisms, without an unnecessary gesture. There is no attempt to interpret the music after the elaborate Delsarte system that a predecessor, Nikisch, had developed to such an irritating degree. Dr. Muck has other means of expression at his command. They are as manifold as music itself, yet it is possible to sum them up in two sentences: First, a wonderfully subtle scheme of dynamic proportions; second, a rare appreciation of rhythmical values. One need not be told that Dr. Muck is a representative exponent of Wagner and his connection with Baireuth is not needed to emphasize that fact. His treatment of the orchestra in the matter of dynamics suffices to proclaim him a faithful disciple of the father of the modern orchestra, for if ever a conductor worked with definite dynamic standards it is Dr. Muck. He has an absolute and unmistakable piano, a volume of tone in forte that is equally definite, and between these poles the performance moves, passing beyond them to fortissimo or pianissimo, until only to study its beautifully symmetrical proportions becomes a source of keenest pleasure. When, however, one sees the artistic intention these sensuously delightful proportions are so clearly proclaiming, there comes admiration for the interpretative genius back of this technical perfection. Dr. Muck is an "absolutist" in music. He is the perfectly transparent medium through which the thought of the composer finds rarely complete revealment.

There can be no question of the excellence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is as near perfection as orchestras ever attain. All sections are models of efficiency. The strings possess a unity and a fulness of tone that are remarkable. The woodwinds contain some artists at the first desks that any master of orchestration would find a joy, and the brasses are sonorous without hint of harshness. But those who seek to draw instructive comparisons between the Bostonians and our own orchestra are likely to miss the mark. In the first place the acoustics of the Auditorium and of Orchestra Hall make a comparison impossible. Then familiarity with our own organization makes us better informed as to any shortcomings it may possess, while one hearing could hardly acquaint us with the faults of our distinguished visitors. Both organizations are to be ranked with the world's best, which is sufficient honor for all.

THE DAILY NEWS,
JANUARY 31, 1907.

DR. KARL MUCK LEADS

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Splendid Concert at the Auditorium.

HAS NINETY-SIX MUSICIANS

Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Beethoven's Symphony in A Major.

A distinctive and discriminating audience crowded the Auditorium last evening to welcome Dr. Karl Muck and pay tribute to the Bostion Symphony orchestra as the oldest organization of its class in America and one second to none in the world. In speaking of the effect of the music as heard in the Auditorium, it is well to emphasize again its superiority of construction in securing rare acoustical values; therein the visiting orchestra certainly enjoyed advantages in a hearing that unerringly revealed all the finer nouances of tone and expression. The Boston Symphony orchestra had on this occasion its highest enlistment of ninety-six instrumentalists and never appeared here before to better advantage. While many of the players have been associated with it for years, they all appear to be in the prime of life: and in ensemble work there is such close, strong sympathy, it sometimes seems as if the Kneisel quartet were merely multiplied in this great company. At times the effects last evening had the delicacy of a whisper and the tone ever had a roundness, smoothness and clarity that told of the long association and high artistic efficiency of this instrumental combination.

Dr. [illegible] the new director has a pronounced personality; a man of slender, graceful figure, a strikingly well-balanced head and a face of ascetic type, with Dantean profile. As a conductor he has poise that suggests authority, an easy grace that is free from mannerism; not excessive in gesture, he has a fund of resource in expression that keeps his instrumentalists ever in the sphere of his radiating influence; and there is something expressive in his attitude that makes him meduimistic for the audience and the music. His sense of proportion in dynamic values is remarkable (possibly begotten of his Wagnerian experiences), while his appreciation of the rhythmical is delightful and decisive. In the scherzo of the Beethoven symphony he allowed the orchestra to play the entire first section without beating time, after merely indicating the tempo; when the trio changed the tempo he was quick again to swing the baton. It was impressive arrested motion, yet free from theatricalism, and showed his quiet magnetic mastery of men and music. If the orchestral body was in any sense deficient a conductor of this type would have [illegible]culty in securing results, but happily the [illegible]liance in this case is of the sort that [illegible]combined, works wonders.

"Rienzi" Overture Played.

Wagner's "Rienzi" overture opened the programme in a deliberate tempo that impressed its breadth in the stately movement, the sweeping crescendos showing the unity of artistic association, while leadership led on to climaxes splendid in tonal volume. The tone poem of Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" had an opulence of color in its tone and there was sufficient to gratify the most exacting; while a certain refinement of performance in this reading eliminated the languorous sensuality that Strauss presents in its acme in "Salome." The softness and rich roundness of the strings revealed dulcet quality; the famed wood-wind choir gave well-tempered response and the brass was never blatant, was vibrant, singularly sonorous; all united in well-modulated effect, individual and en masse; but there are others, and Chicagoans have no ground for either adverse comparison or complaint. The fact that the Don Juan music was not carried with passionate intensity and had that artistic deliberativeness of delivery seemingly characteristic of this director did not militate against it, for its message came beautifully and brilliantly with a dignified sweep that carried conviction.

Second Half of Programme.

The Beethoven symphony in A major occupied the second half of the programme and made a deep impression, testing the organization and its leadership on all points and finding it unwanting, eminently satisfactory. It was fitting that Rudolph Ganz, a Chicago pianist, should have been the solist with this great eastern organization in its tourney of the west. The medium of his appearance was Tschaikowsy's concerto in B flat minor and its broad and virile interpretation marked his growth as an artist worthy of such association. He started with a big tone that he sustained unwavering in truth and spirit through the entire movement without apparent effort. Mr. Ganz played the andantino with such reverential respect for the baton of Dr. Muck that he was ever in harmonious sympathy with the orchestra; while the final movement was marked by amazing vitality that kept the solo instrument superior to the orchestral force, yet the subtle blending of beauty was always apparent. All in all it was a great night for Chicago, the Boston symphony orchestra, et al.

Paper News
City Milwaukee
FEB 1 - 1907 State Wis

Dr. Carl Muck Proves Deserving of the Highest Praise

No single listener of the vast audience that attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Light Guard armory Thursday night, the fourth of the Detroit Orchestral association's series, could have gone away with anything but a feeling of artistic satisfaction.

In reviewing this performance one's first thought is of Dr. Karl Muck, whose conducting has been eagerly anticipated in Detroit. Surely his praises have not been sung too highly.

Dr. Muck combines most satisfactorily the intellectual and the emotional. Almost Italian in appearance, the precise, controlled way in which he leads up to a finale does not seem incongruous, while the delicacy with which he stills that organization of more than 75 different personalities to the last whispering notes is like the descent of a fairy staircase. He believes in absolutely faithful interpretation of the score under his hand, filling the ears of his hearers, regardless of their possession or lack of technical training, with the purest classics and most of all in the eternal and sympathetic interest of his orchestra.

For the first time in his picturesque career, Timothee Adamowski appeared in Detroit as a soloist. To have heard Saint Saens' B-minor concerto played by this man, whose superlative temperamental powers have been intensified, especially of late years, by earnest application, is to have heard an appeal that could not help but strike home.

The orchestra itself needs no commendation. Like a huge artery, it throbs and pulsates with a single purpose. Fully two-thirds of its personnel remains unchanged. From the heart-stirring "Longing" theme of the Strauss tone poem to the magnificent climax of the "Glazounoff Symphony," it thrilled and satisfied. Appreciation of these numbers, performed here for the first time, was greatly enhanced by the copious annotations provided by Mrs. N. J. Corey.

[135]

ENTERED AT CHICAGO (ILL.) POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MAIL MATTER.

NEWS OF THE THEATERS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Chicago music lovers paid a splendid tribute to Boston's great orchestra last evening in the Auditorium. The concert room was filled to its last available space, not a seat in box, parquet, balcony, or galleries being vacant. And it was an audience notable for quality as well as numbers. All that is best in the city's musical, literary, and professional circles was liberally represented, and the approval bestowed upon the famous orchestra and on Dr. Muck, its leader, was the approval of the most discriminating and most cultured music lovers Chicago possesses.

There was cordiality in the air from the start. Everybody seemed glad to be present and the vast assemblage and the keyed up expectancy which was inseparable from the hearing of the orchestra after full fifteen years of absence from the city gave the occasion a gala character which held throughout the entire evening. As soon as the men began to appear on the stage they were greeted with a round of applause, and when they all were seated and Dr. Muck came into view a welcome of most cordial kind was extended them and him.

After every number there were recalls for the leader, and when, after the Strauss tone poem, he had the entire orchestra rise, the huge wave of applause which swept up to it could but have told that every one present admired, approved, and was grateful not only for what then was offered but for that for which the Boston organization stands—that generous spirit which has made the founding of symphony orchestras in various cities throughout the United States possible. This eastern organization is the eldest of existent symphonic bodies in this country, and as such it commands a kindly admiration entirely apart from that which its exceptional abilities compel.

The concert was a source of sincerest, truest enjoyment. There is no other place in Chicago and but few others in the country where orchestral music sounds so well as it does in the Auditorium. The wonderful acoustic properties of the great hall give to the tone of every instrument its fullest, purest beauty. Everything is perfectly clear, and yet every individual tonal value blends with all the others. The strings of the orchestra take on a velvety softness—a tonal glory which makes their every sound a delight to the ear; the wood winds never are hard or shrill; the brasses never are blatant or blaring—all is rich, rounded, liquid in quality.

Mr. Thomas was wont to declare that in no other concert room in which he ever had directed had every instrument come so perfectly to hearing as in the Auditorium. Our own orchestra cast aside its tonal halo when it became necessary to move to Orchestra hall, and that halo never has been recovered, bravely and ceaselessly though Mr. Stock and the men of the orchestra have striven. The Boston players came, therefore, into glorifying conditions when they began their concert. Not only the splendid audience was inspiring, but the consciousness of each musician that the tone of his instrument was at its best—and how instantly every musician feels this—placed the orchestra at its finest, and the result was exhilaration for every one concerned.

The performance last evening was notable, first, for the wonderful tonal beauty that characterized it. Lovelier tone, both individual and in mass, has not been heard from any instrumentalists here in Chicago. The strings were source of unending delight—strong, vibrant, vital, and yet glorified with a golden softness and richness that made them seem not the product of material substance.

The wood wind choir, of which so much had been written in praise and of which consequently so much was expected, proved truly splendid, albeit not so startlingly superior as had been anticipated. We have a wood wind choir which we hear every week the excellence of which safely stands comparison with that of the one of the Boston orchestra. And stating this as explanation for failure to be astonished speaks no disparagement of the superb quality of the visitors' work. It is of the finest, and hearing last evening was a joy.

The brasses, too, are wonderfully sonorous, full, and rich. The whole organization is one easily without superior in the world, and with but extremely few equals. Tonally and technically it is virtually faultless. There is nothing it cannot do, and everything it does is certain to be beautiful, at least as far as tone itself is concerned.

And the musical side of the performance? That depends largely upon the leader, and in the person of Dr. Muck the audience made the acquaintance of a conductor and musician who commands the sincerest respect and heartiest admiration. There is nothing of the "prima donna, virtuoso" conductor about Dr. Muck. A man young and active, slight of figure and medium as regards height, his smooth shaven face strong and characterful, his dark hair worn slightly tousled but at only normal length, he comes quietly and simply forward, takes his place at the desk, bows his acknowledgment and begins. There is nothing of frill, of pose, or of self-consciousness about anything he does. A man evidently who knows his powers and respects them, but does not parade them.

He directs with exceptional quietness. Theodore Thomas in his calmest moments made no less motion than does Dr. Muck a greater part of the time. His gestures are graceful and easy and invariably meaningful. He caresses and draws the tone from the orchestra rather than punches and digs it out. All is unobtrusively and directly done. In certain places in the last two movements of the Beethoven symphony he did no directing at all with his hands. He stood easily at rest and only an occasional motion of the head told that his eyes were following every movement in the orchestra and that his mind was keen and alert. In many men such a procedure would have smacked of affectation, but it did not in Dr. Muck. He suggested rather the pleasure felt in seeing a perfect mechanism work[illegible] perfectness when an engineer, feeling [illegible] responding to his slightest [illegible]

The concert this evening is [illegible] worthiest of the Wagner creations—it is weak Wagner and not especially good Meyerbeer—and few are the performances of it which do not impress with the tawdriness of the music. Dr. Muck last evening by taking a slow tempo and giving the melodic line a semblance of real value actually made the overture seem musically important. The cheapness of the latter portion was cleverly concealed, and the whole performance thus made one of the most original of the evening.

The Strauss "Don Juan" followed. It, too, was taken deliberately, but with sufficient passion to lend it brilliancy, and the fine big sweep that belong to it. The latter half of the program was devoted to the seventh symphony of Beethoven, and in it Dr. Muck showed himself a reader par excellence of the works of the mighty Ludwig. There were saneness, logic, and musical reason in everything he did and abundant spirit, a neat sense of humor, a nice blending of sentiment, and a humanness about it all that made the interpretation beautiful, convincing, inspiring, and vital. It was live Beethoven. Dr. Muck knows the value of the melodic line just as do Mr. Weingartner and Mr. Stock, and he raises it constantly into prominence just as do they. The result is the whole orchestra becomes lyric, and its utterance a song. Especially beautiful in the symphony was his reading of the allegretto and of the presto.

The soloist of the evening was Rudolph Gans, who in the Tschaikowsky B flat minor Concerto placed to his credit one of the most brilliant performances both technically and musically that has been heard from any pianist in Chicago in years. The great, splendid work was played with just the right bigness and sweep, and yet with the sentiment and fine emotional quality which it demands. Never has Mr. Gans loomed larger artistically than he did last night, when both he and the orchestra gave a performance which was virtually faultless in every respect.

W. L. HUBBARD.

Indianapolis Feby 1 - 07

RECEPTION AND RIDE FOR FAMOUS CONDUCTOR

DR. MUCK AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARRIVE.

AT ENGLISH'S 8:15 TO-NIGHT

Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck, of Berlin, and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived this morning at the Claypool Hotel, from Detroit where the orchestra played last night. The morning was spent quietly at the hotel, and this afternoon Dr. and Mrs. Muck and several Indianapolis people who speak German (Dr. Muck does not speak English), were taken on a trip over the city in Hugh J. McGowan's private car, the Martha.

The ride was over the principal streets, the last one being Pennsylvania, where the car stopped at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Henry Jameson, who gave an informal reception for the distinguished visitors. Dr. Muck is the famous director of Berlin, who was granted a year's leave of absence by Emperor William to come to America and conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a season.

Dr. Muck is only forty-one years of age and he has become one of the five greatest orchestra conductors in the world. He is delightful in manner and is enjoying the triumphal tour of the orchestra. In each of the few cities possible to visit in this one week away from the East, the orchestra has been greeted by tremendous audiences. That in Chicago is said to have numbered 5,000 persons, while audiences to pack every auditorium where the orchestra has played, has been the rule.

From All Parts of State.

Indianapolis is particularly fortunate to have the privilege of hearing the orchestra, and hundreds of persons from all parts of the State have come to-day for the concert. Among the guests at the reception this afternoon were: Frances Macmillen, the American violinist; Richard Hageman, his remarkable accompanist, who is from Amsterdam, and Mrs. S. E. Macmillen, of Chicago. In the car party and at the reception were Mr. and Mrs. Otto F. Haueisen, who came over on the same steamer from Europe with Dr. and Mrs. Muck and Mr. Hageman. Mr. Muck and Mr. Hageman are especial friends, and are enjoying their visit together in this city.

Dr. Muck has a distinguished personality, and his force and strength of character are seen in his face and manner. He is lithe and slender, and his profile has been described as Dantean. Mr. Muck would like particularly well to speak English, on this trip, where he is meeting so many new people.

Wife as Interpreter.

Indianapolis is the only place on the tour where there is anything of a special social nature for Dr. and Mrs. Muck, as their time here is longer than in any other city. Mrs. Muck is a very charming woman, who speaks excellent English, and she is frequently the interpreter for Dr. Muck.

The concert this evening will begin promptly at 8:15, and those who are not in their seats at that time, will have to wait in the foyer until the end of the first movement of the Brahms Symphony, with which the program opens. The other numbers will be the "Don Juan" tone poem, of Richard Strauss, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." The playing of the orchestra in the Eastern cities and on the tour has received the highest praise from all the critics, and it is pronounced as "near perfection." The Chicago critics spoke in [illegible] terms of the concert in that city.

Strong Sympathy.

Dr. Muck [illegible] Indianapolis [illegible] Strauss's tone poem, 'Don Juan,' supplied the Boston musicians with the first opportunity to show how great was their virtuosity and how effectively was that virtuosity tempered with artistic feeling. Like most of Strauss's work, 'Don Juan' is a composition of amazing difficulty, but it is beautiful, too, and both beauty and brilliancy were admirably presented in Dr. Muck's reading of the piece and the orchestra's playing of it."

Interest Among Music Lovers.

The Chicago Post said: "One of the most interesting events which the season has brought forth took place last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Karl Muck, gave a performance in the Auditorium.

"Inasmuch as nearly fifteen years have elapsed since the orchestra has been heard in Chicago, and since, also, it is the oldest and the most famous organization of its kind in this country, the visit of the Boston orchestra aroused the liveliest interest among the music-lovers of the city. The outward and visible token of that interest was evident in the host which thronged the vast concert-room, leaving hardly a seat unoccupied. It is possible that many a listener was drawn to the performance by a feeling of curiosity, as well as by the anticipation of much artistic enjoyment."

Admirably Presented.

Of the "Don Juan" number on the Indianapolis program, the Post said: "Richard Strauss's tone poem, 'Don Juan,' supplied the Boston musicians with the first opportunity to show how great was their virtuosity and how effectively was that virtuosity tempered with artistic feeling. Like most of Strauss's work, 'Don Juan' is a composition of amazing difficulty, but it is beautiful, too, and both beauty and brilliancy were admirably presented in Dr. Muck's reading of the piece and the orchestra's playing of it."

Dr. Carl Muck Proves Deserving of the Highest Praise

No single listener of the vast audience that attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Light Guard armory Thursday night, the fourth of the Detroit Orchestral association's series, could have gone away with anything but a feeling of artistic satisfaction.

In reviewing this performance one's first thought is of Dr. Karl Muck, whose conducting has been eagerly anticipated in Detroit. Surely his praises have not been sung too highly.

Dr. Muck combines most satisfactorily the intellectual and the emotional. Almost Italian in appearance, the precise, controlled way in which he leads up to a finale does not seem incongruous, while the delicacy with which he stills that organization of more than 75 different personalities to the last whispering notes is like the descent of a fairy staircase. He believes in absolutely faithful interpretation of the score under his hand, filling the ears of his hearers, regardless of their possession or lack of technical training, with the purest classics and most of all in the eternal and sympathetic interest of his orchestra.

For the first time in his picturesque career, Timothee Adamowski appeared in Detroit as a soloist. To have heard Saint Saens' B-minor concerto played by this man, whose superlative temperamental powers have been intensified, especially of late years, by earnest application, is to have heard an appeal that could not help but strike home.

The orchestra itself needs no commendation. Like a huge artery, it throbs and pulsates with a single purpose. Fully two-thirds of its personnel remains unchanged. From the heart-stirring "Longing" theme of the Strauss tone poem to the magnificent climax of the "Glazounoff Symphony," it thrilled and satisfied. Appreciation of these numbers, performed here for the first time, was greatly enhanced by the copious annotations provided by Mrs. N. J. Corey.

Paper Ledger
City Philadelphia
Date FEB 1 - 1907 State Pa.

Reports that Doctor Muck had been reengaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Doctor Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years, which goes into effect next fall. It requires to

Highest Praise

No single listener of the vast audience that attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Light Guard armory Thursday night, the fourth of the Detroit Orchestral association's series, could have gone away with anything but a feeling of artistic satisfaction.

In reviewing this performance one's first thought is of Dr. Karl Muck, whose conducting has been eagerly anticipated in Detroit. Surely his praises have not been sung too highly.

Dr. Muck combines most satisfactorily the intellectual and the emotional. Almost Italian in appearance, the precise, controlled way in which he leads up to a finale does not seem incongruous, while the delicacy with which he stills that organization of more than 75 different personalities to the last whispering notes is like the descent of a fairy staircase. He believes in absolutely faithful interpretation of the score under his hand, filling the ears of his hearers, regardless of their possession or lack of technical training, with the purest classics and most of all in the eternal and sympathetic interest of his orchestra.

For the first time in his picturesque career, Timothee Adamowski appeared in Detroit as a soloist. To have heard Saint Saens' B-minor concerto played by this man, whose superlative temperamental powers have been intensified, especially of late years, by earnest application, is to have heard an appeal that could not help but strike home.

The orchestra itself needs no commendation. Like a huge artery, it throbs and pulsates with a single purpose. Fully two-thirds of its personnel remains unchanged. From the heart-stirring "Longing" theme of the Strauss tone poem to the magnificent climax of the "Glazounoff Symphony," it thrilled and satisfied. Appreciation of these numbers, performed here for the first time, was greatly enhanced by the copious annotations provided by Mrs. N. J. Corey.

Paper Free Press
City Detroit
Date FEB 1 - 1907 State Mich

THE DETROIT NEWS, FEBRUARY 1, 1907.

Dr. Carl Muck Proves Deserving of the Highest Praise

No single listener of the vast audience that attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Light Guard armory Thursday night, the fourth of the Detroit Orchestral association's series, could have gone away with anything but a feeling of artistic satisfaction.

In reviewing this performance one's first thought is of Dr. Karl Muck, whose conducting has been eagerly anticipated in Detroit. Surely his praises have not been sung too highly.

Dr. Muck combines most satisfactorily the intellectual and the emotional. Almost Italian in appearance, the precise, controlled way in which he leads up to a finale does not seem incongruous, while the delicacy with which he stills that organization of more than 75 different personalities to the last whispering notes is like the descent of a fairy staircase. He believes in absolutely faithful interpretation of the score under his hand, filling the ears of his hearers, regardless of their possession or lack of technical training, with the purest classics and most of all in the eternal and sympathetic interest of his orchestra.

For the first time in his picturesque career, Timothee Adamowski appeared in Detroit as a soloist. To have heard Saint Saens' B-minor concerto played by this man, whose superlative temperamental powers have been intensified, especially of late years, by earnest application, is to have heard an appeal that could not help but strike home.

The orchestra itself needs no commendation. Like a huge artery, it throbs and pulsates with a single purpose. Fully two-thirds of its personnel remains unchanged. From the heart-stirring "Longing" theme of the Strauss tone poem to the magnificent climax of the "Glazounoff Symphony," it thrilled and satisfied. Appreciation of these numbers, performed here for the first time, was greatly enhanced by the copious annotations provided by Mrs. N. J. Corey.

ORCHESTRA PLEASES MANY AT ARMORY

Boston Symphony Players, Under Leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, Are Delight.

With galleries and auditorium of the Light Guard armory filled by an expectant audience, Detroit turned out last night to welcome Dr. Karl Muck, in America by the grace of the kaiser, and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he is conducting while he is on leave. It was a big crowd and an appreciative one, for though the program contained three numbers only, and those seldom heard, each one was the signal for prolonged applause.

Chief interest naturally centered on the Strauss "Don Juan" music. The much-discussed Richard's "Salome" has led the American public to think that Strauss is at his best when he is attempting to portray the play of human erotic passion, and inasmuch as people are in general more thoroughly familiar with the Don Juan of fable than with the Salome of biblical lore, they were on tiptoe last night to hear the musical setting of a Don Juan at the hands of Richard Strauss. They overlooked the fact that Strauss wrote his symphonic poem years before he touched the Wilde libretto, at a period when his following after strange musical gods had not yet led him very far from accepted paths. The music is both coherent and harmonious. Plenty of passion is written into the score, but there is little or no attempt at writing mere "program music." It curiously suggests the earlier Richard, Wagner, and is full of delicacy and grace.

Timothee Adamowski, soloist of the evening, is a delight to hear. His Polish blood warmed to the inspiration of the glittering Saint-Saens concerto (the B minor) and he played it last night as if the venerable composer had been conducting. Mr. Adamowski has nothing to learn of the finer feeling for rhythm, for melody and for execution. His interpretation is beautifully polished without being affected and his scholarship is ripe.

Glazounoff's symphony in B flat major closed the program. Its four movements comprehend the feelings of the Russian people of the niggard soil as only the music of a true Russian can. Richly scored and full of the characteristic themes of the Slav music, it unfolds in constantly increasing interest up to the last movement, expressive of the Russian people, united in martial purpose.

[136]

THE TRIBUNE CO., PUBLISHERS.

ENTERED AT CHICAGO (ILL.) POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MAIL MATTER.

NEWS OF THE THEATERS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Chicago music lovers paid a splendid tribute to Boston's great orchestra last evening in the Auditorium. The concert room was filled to its last available space, not a seat in box, parquet, balcony, or galleries being vacant. And it was an audience notable for quality as well as numbers. All that is best in the city's musical, literary, and professional circles was liberally represented, and the approval bestowed upon the famous orchestra and on Dr. Muck, its leader, was the approval of the most discriminating and most cultured music lovers Chicago possesses.

There was cordiality in the air from the start. Everybody seemed glad to be present and the vast assemblage and the keyed up expectancy which was inseparable from the hearing of the orchestra after full fifteen years of absence from the city gave the occasion a gala character which held throughout the entire evening. As soon as the men began to appear on the stage they were greeted with a round of applause, and when they all were seated and Dr. Muck came into view a welcome of most cordial kind was extended them and him.

After every number there were recalls for the leader, and when, after the Strauss tone poem, he had the entire orchestra rise, the huge wave of applause which swept up to it could but have told that every one present admired, approved, and was grateful not only for what then was offered but for that for which the Boston organization stands—that generous spirit which has made the founding of symphony orchestras in various cities throughout the United States possible. This eastern organization is the eldest of existent symphonic bodies in this country, and as such it commands a kindly admiration entirely apart from that which its exceptional abilities compel.

The concert was a source of sincerest, truest enjoyment. There is no other place in Chicago and but few others in the country where orchestral music sounds so well as it does in the Auditorium. The wonderful acoustic properties of the great hall give to the tone of every instrument its fullest, purest beauty. Everything is perfectly clear, and yet every individual tonal value blends with all the others. The strings of the orchestra take on a velvety softness—a tonal glory which makes their every sound a delight to the ear; the wood winds never are hard or shrill; the brasses never are blatant or blaring—all is rich, rounded, liquid in quality.

Mr. Thomas was wont to declare that in no other concert room in which he ever had directed had every instrument come so perfectly to hearing as in the Auditorium. Our own orchestra cast aside its tonal halo when it became necessary to move to Orchestra hall, and that halo never has been recovered, bravely and ceaselessly though Mr. Stock and the men of the orchestra have striven. The Boston players came, therefore, into glorifying conditions when they began their concert. Not only the splendid audience was inspiring, but the consciousness of each musician that the tone of his instrument was at its best—and how instantly every musician feels this—placed the orchestra at its finest, and the result was exhilaration for every one concerned.

The performance last evening was notable, first, for the wonderful tonal beauty that characterized it. Lovelier tone, both individual and in mass, has not been heard from any instrumentalists here in Chicago. The strings were source of unending delight—strong, vibrant, vital, and yet glorified with a golden softness and richness that made them seem not the product of material substance.

The wood wind choir, of which so much had been written in praise and of which consequently so much was expected, proved truly splendid, albeit not so startlingly superior as had been anticipated. We have a wood wind choir which we hear every week the excellence of which safely stands comparison with that of the one of the Boston orchestra. And stating this as explanation for failure to be astonished speaks no disparagement of the superb quality of the visitors' work. It is of the finest, and hearing last evening was a joy.

The brasses, too, are wonderfully sonorous, full, and rich. The whole organization is one easily without superior in the world, and with but extremely few equals. Tonally and technically it is virtually faultless. There is nothing it cannot do, and everything it does is certain to be beautiful, at least as far as tone itself is concerned.

And the musical side of the performance? That depends largely upon the leader, and in the person of Dr. Muck the audience made the acquaintance of a conductor and musician who commands the sincerest respect and heartiest admiration. There is nothing of the "prima donna, virtuoso" conductor about Dr. Muck. A man young and active, slight of figure and medium as regards height, his smooth shaven face strong and characterful, his dark hair worn slightly tousled but at only normal length, he comes quietly and simply forward, takes his place at the desk, bows his acknowledgment, and begins. There is nothing of frill, of pose, or of self-consciousness about anything he does. A man evidently who knows his powers and respects them, but does not parade them.

He directs with exceptional quietness. Theodore Thomas in his calmest moments made no less motion than does Dr. Muck a greater part of the time. His gestures are graceful and easy and invariably meaningful. He caresses and draws the tone from the orchestra rather than punches and digs it out. All is unobtrusively and directly done. In certain places in the last two movements of the Beethoven symphony he did no directing at all with his hands. He stood easily at rest and only an occasional motion of the head told that his eyes were following every movement in the orchestra and that his mind was keen and alert. In many men such a procedure would have smacked of affectation, but it did not in Dr. Muck. He suggested rather the pleasure felt in seeing a perfect mechanism working perfectly—as when an engineer, feeling his mighty machine responding to his slightest wish and finding a stretch of clear, straight track ahead of him, drops his hand from the throttle and sits back admiringly watching [illegible]

Dr. Muck [illegible] does not drag [illegible] but he realizes that in certain works a slight broadening of the time may give added nobility and worth. The "Rienzi" Overture of Wagner, with which the concert opened, brilliantly exemplified this. The composition is far from the worthiest of the Wagner creations—it is weak Wagner and not especially good Meyerbeer—and few are the performances of it which do not impress with the tawdriness of the music. Dr. Muck last evening by taking a slow tempo and giving the melodic line a semblance of real value actually made the overture seem musically important. The cheapness of the latter portion was cleverly concealed, and the whole performance thus made one of the most original of the evening.

The Strauss "Don Juan" followed. It, too, was taken deliberately, but with sufficient passion to lend it brilliancy, and the fine big sweep that belong to it. The latter half of the program was devoted to the seventh symphony of Beethoven, and in it Dr. Muck showed himself a reader par excellence of the works of the mighty Ludwig. There were saneness, logic, and musical reason in everything he did and abundant spirit, a neat sense of humor, a nice blending of sentiment, and a humanness about it all that made the interpretation beautiful, convincing, inspiring, and vital. It was live Beethoven. Dr. Muck knows the value of the melodic line just as do Mr. Weingartner and Mr. Stock, and he raises it constantly into prominence just as do they. The result is the whole orchestra becomes lyric, and its utterance a song. Especially beautiful in the symphony was his reading of the allegretto and of the presto.

The soloist of the evening was Rudolph Ganz, who in the Tschaikowsky B flat minor Concerto placed to his credit one of the most brilliant performances both technically and musically that has been heard from any pianist in Chicago in years. The great, splendid work was played with just the right bigness and sweep, and yet with the sentiment and fine emotional quality which it demands. Never has Mr. Ganz loomed larger artistically than he did last night, when both he and the orchestra gave a performance which was virtually faultless in every respect.

W. L. HUBBARD.

Indianapolis
Feby 1 - 07

RECEPTION AND RIDE FOR FAMOUS CONDUCTOR

DR. MUCK AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARRIVE.

AT ENGLISH'S 8:15 TO-NIGHT

Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck, of Berlin, and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived this morning at the Claypool Hotel, from Detroit where the orchestra played last night. The morning was spent quietly at the hotel, and this afternoon Dr. and Mrs. Muck and several Indianapolis people who speak German (Dr. Muck does not speak English), were taken on a trip over the city in Hugh J. McGowan's private car, the Martha.

The ride was over the principal streets, the last one being Pennsylvania, where the car stopped at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Henry Jameson, who gave an informal reception for the distinguished visitors. Dr. Muck is the famous director of Berlin, who was granted a year's leave of absence by Emperor William to come to America and conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a season.

Dr. Muck is only forty-one years of age and he has become one of the five greatest orchestra conductors in the world. He is delightful in manner and is enjoying the triumphal tour of the orchestra. In each of the few cities possible to visit in this one week away from the East, the orchestra has been greeted by tremendous audiences. That in Chicago is said to have numbered 5,000 persons, while audiences to pack every auditorium where the orchestra has played, has been the rule.

From All Parts of State.

Indianapolis is particularly fortunate to have the privilege of hearing the orchestra, and hundreds of persons from all parts of the State have come to-day for the concert. Among the guests at the reception this afternoon were: Frances Macmillen, the American violinist; Richard Hageman, his remarkable accompanist, who is from Amsterdam, and Mrs. S. E. Macmillen, of Chicago. In the car party and at the reception were Mr. and Mrs. Otto F. Haueisen, who came over on the same steamer from Europe with Dr. and Mrs. Muck and Mr. Hageman. Mr. Muck and Mr. Hageman are especial friends, and are enjoying their visit together in this city.

Dr. Muck has a distinguished personality, and his force and strength of character are seen in his face and manner. He is lithe and slender, and his profile has been described as Dantean. Mr. Muck would like particularly well to speak English, on this trip, where he is meeting so many new people.

Wife as Interpreter.

Indianapolis is the only place on the tour where there is anything of a special social nature for Dr. and Mrs. Muck, as their time here is longer than in any other city. Mrs. Muck is a very charming woman, who speaks excellent English, and she is frequently the interpreter for Dr. Muck.

The concert this evening will begin promptly at 8:15, and those who are not in their seats at that time, will have to wait in the foyer until the end of the first movement of the Brahms Symphony, with which the program opens. The other numbers will be the "Don Juan" tone poem, of Richard Strauss, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." The playing of the orchestra in the Eastern cities and on the tour has received the highest praise from all the critics, and it is pronounced as "near perfection." The Chicago critics spoke in high terms of the concert in that city.

Strong Sympathy.

The Chicago News said: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra had on this occasion its highest [illegible] of ninety-six in- [illegible] before the [illegible] advantage, [illegible] many of the players have been associated with it for years, they all appear to be in the prime of life; and in ensemble work there is such close, strong sympathy, it sometimes seems as if the Kneisel quartet were merely multiplied in this great company. At times the effects last evening had the delicacy of a whisper and the tone ever had a roundness, smoothness and clarity that told of the long association and high artistic efficiency of this instrumental combination."

Dr. Muck as Director.

"As a conductor Dr. Muck has poise that suggests authority, an easy grace that is free from mannerism; not excessive in gesture, he has a fund of resource in expression that keeps his instrumentalists ever in the sphere of his radiating influence; and there is something expressive in his attitude that makes him mediumistic for the audience and the music. His sense of proportion in dynamic values is remarkable (possibly begotten of his Wagnerian experiences), while his appreciation of the rhythmical is delightful and decisive. In the scherzo of the Beethoven symphony he allowed the orchestra to play the entire first section without beating time, after merely indicating the tempo; when the trio changed the tempo he was quick again to swing the baton. It was impressive arrested motion, yet free from theatricalism, and showed his quiet, magnetic mastery of men and music. If the orchestral body was in any sense deficient a conductor of this type would have difficulty in securing results, but happily the alliance in this case is of the sort that, combined, works wonders."

Interest Among Music Lovers.

The Chicago Post said: "One of the most interesting events which the season has brought forth took place last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Karl Muck, gave a performance in the Auditorium.

"Inasmuch as nearly fifteen years have elapsed since the orchestra has been heard in Chicago, and since, also, it is the oldest and the most famous organization of its kind in this country, the visit of the Boston orchestra aroused the liveliest interest among the music-lovers of the city. The outward and visible token of that interest was evident in the host which thronged the vast concert-room, leaving hardly a seat unoccupied. It is possible that many a listener was drawn to the performance by a feeling of curiosity, as well as by the anticipation of much artistic enjoyment."

Admirably Presented.

Of the "Don Juan" number on the Indianapolis program, the Post said: "Richard Strauss's tone poem, 'Don Juan,' supplied the Boston musicians with the first opportunity to show how great was their virtuosity and how effectively was that virtuosity tempered with artistic feeling. Like most of Strauss's work, 'Don Juan' is a composition of amazing difficulty, but it is beautiful, too, and both beauty and brilliancy were admirably presented in Dr. Muck's reading of the piece and the orchestra's playing of it."

Dr. Carl Muck Proves Deserving of the Highest Praise

No single listener of the vast audience that attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Light Guard armory Thursday night, the fourth of the Detroit Orchestral association's series, could have gone away with anything but a feeling of artistic satisfaction.

In reviewing this performance one's first thought is of Dr. Karl Muck, whose conducting has been eagerly anticipated in Detroit. Surely his praises have not been sung too highly.

Dr. Muck combines most satisfactorily the intellectual and the emotional. Almost Italian in appearance, the precise, controlled way in which he leads up to a finale does not seem incongruous, while the delicacy with which he stills that organization of more than 75 different personalities to the last whispering notes is like the descent of a fairy staircase. He believes in absolutely faithful interpretation of the score under his hand, filling the ears of his hearers, regardless of their possession or lack of technical training, with the purest classics and most of all in the eternal and sympathetic interest of his orchestra.

For the first time in his picturesque career, Timothee Adamowski appeared in Detroit as a soloist. To have heard Saint Saens' B-minor concerto played by this man, whose superlative temperamental powers have been intensified, especially of late years, by earnest application, is to have heard an appeal that could not help but strike home.

The orchestra itself needs no commendation. Like a huge artery, it throbs and pulsates with a single purpose. Fully two-thirds of its personnel remains unchanged. From the heart-stirring "Longing" theme of the Strauss tone poem to the magnificent climax of the "Glazounoff Symphony," it thrilled and satisfied. Appreciation of these numbers, performed here for the first time, was greatly enhanced by the copious annotations provided by Mrs. N. J. Corey.

Paper Ledger

City Philadelphi State Pa

Date FEB 1 - 1907

Reports that Doctor Muck had been reengaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Doctor Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years, which goes into effect next fall. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from this engagement in Berlin

Dr. Carl Muck Proves Deserving of the Highest Praise

No single listener of the vast audience that attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Light Guard armory Thursday night, the fourth of the Detroit Orchestral association's series, could have gone away with anything but a feeling of artistic satisfaction.

In reviewing this performance one's first thought is of Dr. Karl Muck, whose conducting has been eagerly anticipated in Detroit. Surely his praises have not been sung too highly.

Dr. Muck combines most satisfactorily the intellectual and the emotional. Almost Italian in appearance, the precise, controlled way in which he leads up to a finale does not seem incongruous, while the delicacy with which he stills that organization of more than 75 different personalities to the last whispering notes is like the descent of a fairy staircase. He believes in absolutely faithful interpretation of the score under his hand, filling the ears of his hearers, regardless of their possession or lack of technical training, with the purest classics and most of all in the eternal and sympathetic interest of his orchestra.

For the first time in his picturesque career, Timothee Adamowski appeared in Detroit as a soloist. To have heard Saint Saens' B-minor concerto played by this man, whose superlative temperamental powers have been intensified, especially of late years, by earnest application, is to have heard an appeal that could not help but strike home.

The orchestra itself needs no commendation. Like a huge artery, it throbs and pulsates with a single purpose. Fully two-thirds of its personnel remains unchanged. From the heart-stirring "Longing" theme of the Strauss tone poem to the magnificent climax of the "Glazounoff Symphony," it thrilled and satisfied. Appreciation of these numbers, performed here for the first time, was greatly enhanced by the copious annotations provided by Mrs. N. J. Corey.

Paper Free Press

City Detroit State Mich

Date FEB 1 - 1907

THE DETROIT NEWS, FEBRUARY 1, 1907.

Dr. Carl Muck Proves Deserving of the Highest Praise

No single listener of the vast audience that attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Light Guard armory Thursday night, the fourth of the Detroit Orchestral association's series, could have gone away with anything but a feeling of artistic satisfaction.

In reviewing this performance one's first thought is of Dr. Karl Muck, whose conducting has been eagerly anticipated in Detroit. Surely his praises have not been sung too highly.

Dr. Muck combines most satisfactorily the intellectual and the emotional. Almost Italian in appearance, the precise, controlled way in which he leads up to a finale does not seem incongruous, while the delicacy with which he stills that organization of more than 75 different personalities to the last whispering notes is like the descent of a fairy staircase. He believes in absolutely faithful interpretation of the score under his hand, filling the ears of his hearers, regardless of their possession or lack of technical training, with the purest classics and most of all in the eternal and sympathetic interest of his orchestra.

For the first time in his picturesque career, Timothee Adamowski appeared in Detroit as a soloist. To have heard Saint Saens' B-minor concerto played by this man, whose superlative temperamental powers have been intensified, especially of late years, by earnest application, is to have heard an appeal that could not help but strike home.

The orchestra itself needs no commendation. Like a huge artery, it throbs and pulsates with a single purpose. Fully two-thirds of its personnel remains unchanged. From the heart-stirring "Longing" theme of the Strauss tone poem to the magnificent climax of the "Glazounoff Symphony," it thrilled and satisfied. Appreciation of these numbers, performed here for the first time, was greatly enhanced by the copious annotations provided by Mrs. N. J. Corey.

ORCHESTRA PLEASES MANY AT ARMORY

Boston Symphony Players, Under Leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, Are Delight.

With galleries and auditorium of the Light Guard armory filled by an expectant audience, Detroit turned out last night to welcome Dr. Karl Muck, in America by the grace of the kaiser, and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he is conducting while he is on leave. It was a big crowd and an appreciative one, for though the program contained three numbers only, and those seldom heard, each one was the signal for prolonged applause.

Chief interest naturally centered on the Strauss "Don Juan" music. The much-discussed Richard's "Salome" has led the American public to think that Strauss is at his best when he is attempting to portray the play of human erotic passion, and inasmuch as people are in general more thoroughly familiar with the Don Juan of fable than with the Salome of biblical lore, they were on tiptoe last night to hear the musical setting of a Don Juan at the hands of Richard Strauss. They overlooked the fact that Strauss wrote his symphonic poem years before he touched the Wilde libretto, at a period when his following after strange musical gods had not yet led him very far from accepted paths. The music is both coherent and harmonious. Plenty of passion is written into the score, but there is little or no attempt at writing mere "program music." It curiously suggests the earlier Richard, Wagner, and is full of delicacy and grace.

Timothee Adamowski, soloist of the evening, is a delight to hear. His Polish blood warmed to the inspiration of the glittering Saint-Saens concerto (the B minor) and he played it last night as if the venerable composer had been conducting. Mr. Adamowski has nothing to learn of the finer feeling for rhythm, for melody and for execution. His interpretation is beautifully polished without being affected and his scholarship is ripe.

Glazounoff's symphony in B flat major closed the program. Its four movements comprehend the feelings of the Russian people of the niggard soil as only the music of a true Russian can. Richly scored and full of the characteristic themes of the Slav music, it unfolds in constantly increasing interest up to the last movement, expressive of the Russian people, united in martial purpose.

[136]

...FEBRUARY 1, 1907.

...dience For ...r. Muck's Orchestra ...and Strauss Tone Poem

The spot light having rested rather persistently on Richard Strauss of ... doubtless interest in the music ...en by the composer of the erotic ...ome" was somewhat piqued and ... placing of "Don Juan" on the pro... given by the Boston Symphony ...estra at the Light Guard armory Thursday evening was a popular ...ove. This fact alone, however, did not account for the splendid audience that greeted Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston organization, as fine a gather... as has ever turned out for a musical event in Detroit. It was legitimate homage to the best orches... of the country.

"Don Juan," the first offering, tempts ... to stray from the paths of re... impressions to the discussion ... the efficacy of program music. ...auss took the poem of Lenau for his theme, a fervid and emotional ef... well calculated to prompt the composer to an interesting mood. The enthusiastic annotators would have one believe that "Don Juan" in its musical form has definite meanings, that one can follow the ideas of the composer and of the author, can iden... personages, can follow the trend of the emotions; some even go so far as to read into the thing an actual sequence of events, and they fortify themselves against the opposition by stating that if you don't see it as they do it is because you lack that world-wide culture that the great genius always takes for granted in his auditors.

At the risk of being slated beyond the pale, it may be recorded as the impression of one that such an attitude toward "Don Juan" and any of the other samples of its class is idle, even puerile. Music can never go as far as that in interpretation, no matter how great the genius of the writer or how wide the sympathy and understanding of the hearer.

"Don Juan" suggests the mood of the composer, his emotional state; it is impossible to follow him any farther. If, however, such a composition had the benefit of stage accessories, of scenery and light, of vocal declamation and of characters visualized in the flesh, the composer would convey his meaning far more clearly. But, however this may be, "Don Juan," played by the Boston band, was full of interest and beauty; there were moments of ravishment; it was well within the province of common sense to receive it as the painting of a mood.

One of the most pleasing moments on the program came in the second movement of the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor for the violin, and played by Timothee Adamowski. After the rather cold and formal first movement, there followed a very graceful and pleasing theme in which the solo instrument and the orchestra vied with each other in expounding a beautiful melody. Mr. Adamowski played his piece with considerable brilliancy and verve. He began his labor, however, in a somewhat ragged manner, was uncertain and unsteady in his attack, but finished with strength. Altogether, his performance was not much above the mediocre, if one takes into account what might have been done with the composition when played by some of the great virtuosi.

There was much in the Glazounoff symphony to warm the heart and stimulate the emotions. The scherzo, with its elaborate work for flutes and oboe, was exquisite, and the allegro maestoso brought the matter to a glorious and stirring close. Just preceding this number, N. J. Corey, secretary of the Detroit Orchestral association, made an address in which he commented on the work of President F. K. Stearns, the condition of the association and the possibility of a music hall in the near future.

LOUIS LING.

Paper Journal
City Indianapolis
Date FEB 1 - 1907 State Ind

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IS VERY NEAR PERFECTION

BECOMES LIVING ORGANISM UNDER DIRECTOR DR. MUCK.

VIEWS OF CLEVELAND CRITIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Cleveland Tuesday night, and Paul E. Teichert, formerly of this city, who is the music critic for the Cleveland Leader, gave the following notice of the concert:

In the twenty-five years of its existence the Boston Symphony Orchestra has followed a plan by means of which the organization has grown into one of the greatest bodies of players that can possibly be brought together. Players have been engaged from all parts of Europe until the ensemble has reached that state of perfection that borders closely on mechanical completeness.

Last night when I heard this orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, I missed somehow that peculiar characteristic by which it was formerly distinguishable—absolute invention. Yet there was the creative faculty of old, the ingenuity and skill. I watched the different choirs and found familiar faces. I listened to the singing of the voices and they spoke with the same authority. Gericke, the old conductor, was in my mind.

And then I understood. Dr. Muck, the new conductor, has been effacing his personality to such wonderful degree that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the greatest piece of musical machinery in this country, has become a living organism where every individual player takes part without restraint and in the fullest measure.

Manner of Conducting Easiest.

It seemed to me last night at the Grays' armory that Dr. Muck's manner of conducting is the easiest, yet the most forceful, because effort is not apparent. He stands there as a simple medium, giving that amount of personal freedom to his players that results in the highest artistic achievement. People who attended last night's concert with the idea of seeing a highly emotional prima donna conductor must have been sadly disappointed. No doubt there were a few, yet there was none who by the time the beautiful "Allegretto" of the "Seventh Symphony" was read by Dr. Muck did not observe the simplicity of it all and applaud the clear, translucent and euphonious reading.

The playing of the "Meistersinger" prelude gave the key to Dr. Muck's intentions at the start. It was read with a total lack of the strictly emotional, but given sharply, forcefully, especially the ending with the brass section commanding the rest of the orchestra, as I have never heard it played by this orchestra before.

Symphony concerts must still be given with a soloist as the special attraction. Our symphony concerts make no exception to the rule. Timothee Adamowski, a member of the violin section of the orchestra, played the "B Minor Violin Concerto" by Saint-Saens. It is a stupendous composition that calls for technical perfection and emotional qualities alike. The soloist possesses both. His tone is beautiful, his phrasing a delight. The technical mastery holds equal pace with his emotion.

Freitag, 1. Februar 1907.

Seltener Hochgenuß.

Das gestrige Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters.

Es ist uns nicht erinnerlich, daß seit Bestehen der Konzerte unter den Auspizien des Detroit Orchestral Association der Light Guard Armory = Saal jemals ein so großes und begeistertes Publikum aufgewiesen hatte als an dem gestrigen Abend, da Dr. Karl Muck mit dem Bostoner Symphonie Orchester das Konzertprogramm besorgte. Man sah nur wenige leere Stühle in dem Saal und auf der Gallerie; im Gegenteil; der sonst durch einen Vorhang abgetrennte äußerste rechte Flügel des Saales, in dem sich bei den früheren Konzerten die Musiker während der Pause aufhielten, diente als Raum für eine neue Sitzreihe, die vollkommen okkupiert war, ebenso wies die Gallerie mehr Sitzplätze als sonst auf.

Und was das Publikum anlangt, so sah man natürlich die treuen Freunde und Freundinnen, die Garantoren und die stets sich einstellenden Kunstjünger, wie bei allen früheren Konzerten in dieser Saison wieder, aber die vielen neuen Gesichter, die man zu sehen bekam, bewiesen, daß wer immer nur den kleinen Eintrittsbetrag entbehren konnte und sich noch ein wenig Sinn für ernste Musik erübrigt hatte, es sich nicht nehmen ließ, Dr. Karl Muck zu hören.

Ja, Dr. Karl Muck! Auf ihn konzentrierte sich das Hauptinteresse, er allein schien all die tausenden Leute angelockt zu haben, die Musiker aber bloß die Staffage, ohne die ein Dr. Karl Muck nicht gedacht werden kann. Und doch, wer da aufmerksamer Dr. Muck als Dirigent betrachtete, konnte sehen, daß diese Musiker zeitweilig ebenso gut auch ohne den Dirigenten auskamen. Er schien bisweilen, selbst entzückt von dem künstlerischen Spiel seiner Leute, in Träumerei zu versinken, um daraus zu erwachen, wenn ein paar kraftvolle Passagen einsetzen sollten. Diese Selbstverzückung darf sich ein Dirigent erlauben, wenn er derartige Künstler, ältere, erfahrene Musiker in seinem Orchester sitzen hat wie Dr. Muck. Er weiß, sie „brennen ihm nicht durch", ein „Ruck" mit dem Taktstock und sie folgen wieder seiner Führung.

Es ist uns nicht erinnerlich, daß seit Bestehen der Konzerte unter den Auspizien des Detroit Orchestral Association der Light Guard Armory = Saal jemals ein so großes und begeistertes Publikum aufgewiesen hatte als an dem gestrigen Abend, da Dr. Karl Muck mit dem Bostoner Symphonie Orchester das Konzertprogramm besorgte. Man sah nur wenige leere Stühle in dem Saal und auf der Gallerie; im Gegenteil; der sonst durch einen Vorhang abgetrennte äußerste rechte Flügel des Saales, in dem sich bei den früheren Konzerten die Musiker während der Pause aufhielten, diente als Raum für eine neue Sitzreihe, die vollkommen okkupiert war, ebenso wies die Gallerie mehr Sitzplätze als sonst auf.

Und was das Publikum anlangt, so sah man natürlich die treuen Freunde und Freundinnen, die Garantoren und die stets sich einstellenden Kunstjünger, wie bei allen früheren Konzerten in dieser Saison wieder, aber die vielen neuen Gesichter, die man zu sehen bekam, bewiesen, daß wer immer nur den kleinen Eintrittsbetrag entbehren konnte und sich noch ein wenig Sinn für ernste Musik erübrigt hatte, es sich nicht nehmen ließ, Dr. Karl Muck zu hören.

Ja, Dr. Karl Muck! Auf ihn konzentrierte sich das Hauptinteresse, er allein schien all die tausenden Leute angelockt zu haben, die Musiker aber bloß die Staffage, ohne die ein Dr. Karl Muck nicht gedacht werden kann. Und doch, wer da aufmerksamer Dr. Muck als Dirigent betrachtete, konnte sehen, daß diese Musiker zeitweilig ebenso gut auch ohne den Dirigenten auskamen. Er schien bisweilen, selbst entzückt von dem künstlerischen Spiel seiner Leute, in Träumerei zu versinken, um daraus zu erwachen, wenn ein paar kraftvolle Passagen einsetzen sollten. Diese Selbstverzückung darf sich ein Dirigent erlauben, wenn er derartige Künstler, ältere, erfahrene Musiker in seinem Orchester sitzen hat wie Dr. Muck. Er weiß, sie „brennen ihm nicht durch", ein „Ruck" mit dem Taktstock und sie folgen wieder seiner Führung.

Für das gestrige Programm bedurfte man aber mehr als das durchschnittliche Musikverständnis der Konzertbesucher. Abgesehen davon, daß sämtliche drei Nummern in Detroit zum ersten Mal in diesen Konzerten gehört wurden, ist ihr ganzer Aufbau ein so kunstvoller, daß man sich selbst bei größeren Kenntnissen der Musik nur schwer hindurchwinden kann. Allerdings kommt es beim Durchschnitts = Konzertbesucher nicht auf den Bau des Werkes, sondern auf die Wirkung auf das Ohr an und daß diese eine reine, unzweideutige sei, dafür sorgte das Genie Dr. Karl Muck's. Von dem „sehnsüchtigen Schmerz des Jünglings" in der „Don Juan"= Tondichtung von Richard Strauß, bis zu dem Allegro maestoso der Glazounoff'schen B=Dur Symphonie, No. 5, hörte man jene Musik, die der Komponist schrieb, und nicht die, die etwa das subjektive Empfinden eines Dirigenten uns zu Gehör bringen wollte. Das ist eben das Großartige an dem „Dirigenten" Dr. Karl Muck. Er giebt uns eine möglichst objektive Interpretation des Werkes, er läßt die Empfindung des Komponisten in uns erstehen, „komponiert" nicht selbst wie die Mehrzahl seiner Kollegen vom Taktstock.

Auf die Werke selbst hier einzugehen, finden wir für überflüssig. Wer dem Konzerte beigewohnt hat und den Vorträgen gefolgt ist, hat ihre Schönheit, ihren symphonischen Klang empfunden. Wer das Konzert versäumte, könnte auch durch die ausführlichste Darstellung in Worten die Wirkung der Töne nicht empfinden.

Der gestrige Abend brachte noch Saint Saens H=Moll = Konzert für Violine und Orchester, dessen Solopart der Konzertmeister des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, Herr T. Adamowski, spielte. Wir können nur sagen, daß unter den vielen Violinvirtuosen, die wir im Laufe der Jahre hier in Detroit begrüßt haben, Adamowski einer der besten ist. So war es denn auch nicht zu wundern, daß ein Künstler seines Ranges einen schier endlosen Applaus erntete.

Detroit Times Feby-1-07.

DR. KARL MUCK AND BOSTON ORCHESTRA CHARM AUDIENCE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr. Karl Muck, gave the fourth concert in the series of the Detroit Orchestral association in the presence of a big audience in the Light Guard armory Thursday evening.

Unusual interest centered in the coming of this orchestra, not only because it stands at the head of organizations of the kind in the country, but because Dr. Muck, who has been "loaned" to the association for the year by the German emperor, is one of the greatest conductors of his time. It is said to the credit of this man, who heretofore was unknown to Detroit except through the reports of critics, that while he directed in a masterly manner and fulfilled even the extravagant promises of the advance man, he never obtruded himself as is often the case with a conductor who has every opportunity to make himself conspicuous. It was the Boston Symphony orchestra first and Dr. Muck of secondary importance—music first, the man after. But withal, the greatest camaraderie evidently exists between the conductor and his men.

Of the orchestra nothing but words of highest praise could be said, the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," and the Glazounoff symphony being rendered in a flawless manner by that body of admirably trained men.

Timothee Adamowski, the soloist of the evening, demonstrated in the violin concerto by Saint-Saens that he possesses all the fine musical attributes of his race, his playing being that of the finished artist.

The fifth concert of the season will be given by the Thomas orchestra Monday evening, Feb. 25.

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date FEB 2 1907 State N Y

Despite the printed reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened, and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician, and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years, which goes into effect next fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is unfortunately very doubtful that this favor will be granted, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the very difficult task of replacing Dr. Muck next season.

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date FEB 2 1907 State N.Y.

Despite the printed reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician, and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years which goes into effect next fall; for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is, unfortunately, very doubtful that this favor will be granted, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the very difficult task of replacing him next season.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date FEB 2 - 1907 State N Y

Despite the printed reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years which goes into effect next fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II.

[137]

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—
FEBRUARY 2, 1907.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

The fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, after the return of the orchestra from its Western trip. Mme. Olga Samaroff, the pianist, who is well known here in Boston, will be the soloist, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano No. 1. The program in full is as follows:

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice".....Paul Dukas
Concerto for piano No. 1.....Tschaikowsky
Three symphonic tone pictures on Corneille's tragedy, "Polieucte".....Edg. Tinel
(First time here.)

THE LONGY CLUB.

The third and last concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall on next Wednesday evening, Feb. 6, at 8.15 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Mr. J. Keller, 'cello. The program is as follows:

Trio (op. 11) for clarinet, 'cello and piano

THE DETROIT JOURNAL
FEBRUARY 1, 1907.

Unusual Audience For Dr. Muck's Orchestra and Strauss Tone Poem

The spot light having rested rather persistently on Richard Strauss of late, doubtless interest in the music written by the composer of the erotic "Salome" was somewhat piqued and the placing of "Don Juan" on the program given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Light Guard armory Thursday evening was a popular move. This fact alone, however, did not account for the splendid audience that greeted Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston organization, as fine a gathering as has ever turned out for a musical event in Detroit. It was legitimate homage to the best orchestra of the country.

"Don Juan," the first offering, tempts one to stray from the paths of reporting impressions to the discussion of the efficacy of program music. Strauss took the poem of Lenau for his theme, a fervid and emotional effusion well calculated to prompt the composer to an interesting mood. The enthusiastic annotators would have one believe that "Don Juan" in its musical form has definite meanings, that one can follow the ideas of the composer and of the author, can identify personages, can follow the trend of the emotions; some even go so far as to read into the thing an actual sequence of events, and they fortify themselves against the opposition by hinting that if you don't see it as they do it is because you lack that world-wide culture that the great genius always takes for granted in his auditors.

At the risk of being slated beyond the pale, it may be recorded as the impression of one that such an attitude toward "Don Juan" and any of the other samples of its class is idle, even puerile. Music can never go as far as that in interpretation, no matter how great the genius of the writer or how wide the sympathy and understanding of the hearer.

"Don Juan" suggests the mood of the composer, his emotional state; it is impossible to follow him any farther. If, however, such a composition had the benefit of stage accessories, of scenery and light, of vocal declamation and of characters visualized in the flesh, the composer would convey his meaning far more clearly. But, however this may be, "Don Juan," played by the Boston band, was full of interest and beauty; there were moments of ravishment; it was well within the province of common sense to receive it as the painting of a mood.

One of the most pleasing moments on the program came in the second movement of the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor for the violin, and played by Timothee Adamowski. After the rather cold and formal first movement, there followed a very graceful and pleasing theme in which the solo instrument and the orchestra vied with each other in expounding a beautiful melody. Mr. Adamowski played his piece with considerable brilliancy and verve. He began his labor, however, in a somewhat ragged manner, was uncertain and unsteady in his attack, but finished with strength. Altogether, his performance was not much above the mediocre, if one takes into account what might have been done with the composition when played by some of the great virtuosi.

There was much in the Glazounoff symphony to warm the heart and stimulate the emotions. The scherzo, with its elaborate work for flutes and oboe, was exquisite, and the allegro maestoso brought the matter to a glorious and stirring close. Just preceding this number, N. J. Corey, secretary of the Detroit Orchestral association, made an address in which he commented on the work of President F. K. Stearns, the condition of the association and the possibility of a music hall in the near future.

LOUIS LING.

Paper Herald
City Indianapolis
Date State Ind
JAN 31 - 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IS VERY NEAR PERFECTION

BECOMES LIVING ORGANISM UNDER DIRECTOR DR. MUCK.

VIEWS OF CLEVELAND CRITIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Cleveland Tuesday night, and Paul E. Teichert, formerly of this city, who is the music critic for the Cleveland Leader, gave the following notice of the concert:

In the twenty-five years of its existence the Boston Symphony Orchestra has followed a plan by means of which the organization has grown into one of the greatest bodies of players that can possibly be brought together. Players have been engaged from all parts of Europe until the ensemble has reached that state of perfection that borders closely on mechanical completeness.

Last night when I heard this orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, I missed somehow that peculiar characteristic by which it was formerly distinguishable—absolute invention. Yet there was the creative faculty of old, the ingenuity and skill. I watched the different choirs and found familiar faces. I listened to the singing of the voices and they spoke with the same authority. Gericke, the old conductor, was in my mind.

And then I understood. Dr. Muck, the new conductor, has been effacing his personality to such wonderful degree that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the greatest piece of musical machinery in this country, has become a living organism where every individual player takes part without restraint and in the fullest measure.

Manner of Conducting Easiest.

It seemed to me last night at the Grays' armory that Dr. Muck's manner of conducting is the easiest, yet the most forceful, because effort is not apparent. He stands there as a simple medium, giving that amount of personal freedom to his players that results in the highest artistic achievement. People who attended last night's concert with the idea of seeing a highly emotional prima donna conductor must have been sadly disappointed. No doubt there were a few, yet there was none who by the time the beautiful "Allegretto" of the "Seventh Symphony" was read by Dr. Muck did not observe the simplicity of it all and applaud the clear, translucent and euphonious reading.

The playing of the "Meistersinger" prelude gave the key to Dr. Muck's intentions at the start. It was read with a total lack of the strictly emotional, but given sharply, forcefully, especially the ending with the brass section commanding the rest of the orchestra, as I have never heard it played by this orchestra before.

Symphony concerts must still be given with a soloist as the special attraction. Our symphony concerts make no exception to the rule. Timothee Adamowski, a member of the violin section of the orchestra, played the "B Minor Violin Concerto" by Saint-Saens. It is a stupendous composition that calls for technical perfection and emotional qualities alike. The soloist possesses both. His tone is beautiful, his phrasing a delight. The technical mastery holds equal pace with his emotion.

Detroit Times Feby-1-07.

DR. KARL MUCK AND BOSTON ORCHESTRA CHARM AUDIENCE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr. Karl Muck, gave the fourth concert in the series of the Detroit Orchestral association in the presence of a big audience in the Light Guard armory Thursday evening.

Unusual interest centered in the coming of this orchestra, not only because it stands at the head of organizations of the kind in the country, but because Dr. Muck, who has been "loaned" to the association for the year by the German emperor, is one of the greatest conductors of his time. Be it said to the credit of this man, who heretofore was unknown to Detroit except through the reports of critics, that while he directed in a masterly manner and fulfilled even the extravagant promises of the advance man, he never obtruded himself as is often the case with a conductor who has every opportunity to make himself conspicuous. It was the Boston Symphony orchestra first and Dr. Muck of secondary importance—music first, the man after. But withal, the greatest camaraderie evidently exists between the conductor and his men.

Of the orchestra nothing but words of highest praise could be said, the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," and the Glazounoff symphony being rendered in a flawless manner by that body of admirably trained men.

Timothee Adamowski, the soloist of the evening, demonstrated in the violin concerto by Saint-Saens that he possesses all the fine musical attributes of his race, his playing being that of the finished artist.

The fifth concert of the season will be given by the Thomas orchestra Monday evening, Feb. 25.

Täglliches
Michigan Volksblatt.
Freitag, 1. Februar 1907.

Seltener Hochgenuß.

Das gestrige Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters.

Es ist uns nicht erinnerlich, daß seit Bestehen der Konzerte unter den Auspizien des Detroit Orchestral Association der Light Guard Armory = Saal jemals ein so großes und begeistertes Publikum aufgewiesen hatte als an dem gestrigen Abend, da Dr. Karl Muck mit dem Bostoner Symphonie Orchester das Konzertprogramm besorgte. Man sah nur wenige leere Stühle in dem Saal und auf der Gallerie; im Gegenteil; der sonst durch einen Vorhang abgetrennte äußerste rechte Flügel des Saales, in dem sich bei den früheren Konzerten die Musiker während der Pause aufhielten, diente als Raum für eine neue Sitzreihe, die vollkommen okkupiert war, ebenso wies die Gallerie mehr Sitzplätze als sonst auf.

Und was das Publikum anlangt, so sah man natürlich die treuen Freunde und Freundinnen, die Garantoren und die stets sich einstellenden Kunstjünger, wie bei allen früheren Konzerten in dieser Saison wieder, aber die vielen neuen Gesichter, die man zu sehen bekam, bewiesen, daß wer immer nur den kleinen Eintrittsbetrag entbehren konnte und sich noch ein wenig Sinn für ernste Musik erübrigt hatte, es sich nicht nehmen ließ, Dr. Karl Muck zu hören.

Ja, Dr. Karl Muck! Auf ihn konzentrierte sich das Hauptinteresse, er allein schien all die tausenden Leute angelockt zu haben, die Musiker aber bloß die Staffage, ohne die ein Dr. Karl Muck nicht gedacht werden kann. Und doch, wer da aufmerksamer Dr. Muck als Dirigent betrachtete, konnte sehen, daß diese Musiker zeitweilig ebenso gut auch ohne den Dirigenten auskamen. Er schien bisweilen, selbst entzückt von dem künstlerischen Spiel seiner Leute, in Träumerei zu versinken, um daraus zu erwachen, wenn ein paar kraftvolle Passagen einsetzen sollten. Diese Selbstverzückung darf sich ein Dirigent erlauben, wenn er derartige Künstler, ältere, erfahrene Musiker in seinem Orchester sitzen hat wie Dr. Muck. Er weiß, sie „brennen ihm nicht durch", ein „Ruck" mit dem Taktstock und sie folgen wieder seiner Führung.

Und wie weiß Dr. Muck diesen Taktstock zu schwingen! Bloß dieses Dirigieren zu sehen, ist ein unvergeßlicher Genuß. Wer diesem Taktstock folgt, den Bewegungen der beiden Arme und des Kopfes dieses genialen Dirigenten, kann daraus allein ein gut Teil Verständnis für das aufgeführte Werk schöpfen.

